122/v12

A GENERAL

DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interſperſed with ſeveral thouſand LIVES never before publiſhed.

The whole containing the Hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of all Ages and Nations, particularly thoſe of Great Britain and Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accompliſhments.

With Reflections on ſuch Paſſages of Mr. BAYLE, as ſeem to favour Scepticiſm and the Manichee Syſtem.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH, M.A. and F.R.S.
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

VOLUME VIII.

LONDON,

Printed by James Bettenham,

For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. SHUCKBURGH, C. CORBET, G. HAWKINS in Fleetſtreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New-Bond-ſtreet; J. WOOD in Pater-Noſter-Row; C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship without Temple Bar, and at their Shops in Coney-Street York, and at Scarborough-Spaw; J. BETTENHAM near, and E. CAVE at St. John's Gate.

MDCCXXXIX.

TO THE

RIGHT HONOURABLE

ALGERNON,

EARL of HERTFORD,

BARON PIERCY,

This EIGHTH VOLUME of the

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical,

Is humbly dedicated by

His Lordſhip's moſt obliged and

Moſt devoted Servants,

The Authors.

A GENERAL

DICTIONARY

Hiſtorical and Critical.

O

OBSEQUENS (JULIUS) a Latin writer, whoſe native country is unknown, as well as the time when he lived. It is only conjectured that he lived ſome time before the Emperor Honorius's reign. Scaliger hints (a) that he flouriſhed before St. Jerome wrote his Supplements to Euſebius's Chronicle (b). Friſius has been groſly miſtaken [A]. It is not well known of what religion Obſequens was; but we may infer from what is extant of his collection of prodigies, that he was an heathen. That work contained chiefly a catalogue of the prodigies, which Livy related in his hiſtory [B]. What remains of it begins with the Conſulſhip of Lucius Scipio and Caius Lælius, that is to ſay, about the year of Rome 561 [C]. There are ſeveral editions of thoſe remains [D]. Lycoſthenes endeavoured to ſupply what is wanting in the original. Moreri in this article quotes his authorities in the moſt wretched manner [E].

(a) Scaliger, Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 1186, p. m. 347.

(b) He wrote them under the Emperor Valens: and Valens died in the year 379.

[A] Friſius has been groſly miſtaken (1).] He aſſerts that our Obſequens lived in the time of Panætius and Polybius, 240 years before Chriſt; which is impoſſible, ſince Obſequens ſpeaks of Auguſtus.

(1) Joh. Jacobus Friſius, in ſua Bibliotheca, apud Schefferum in Præfat. in Jul. Obſequentem.

[B] His work contained . . . a catalogue of the Prodigies, which Livy related in his Hiſtory.] There are two reaſons to make us think ſo: 1. That collection ends with the year of Rome 743, like Livy's decads. 2. Obſequens often makes uſe of the ſame expreſſions with that author.

[C] That is to ſay, about the year of Rome 561.] Some authors put that Conſulſhip under that year; others put it under the year 563; none ſhould venture to put it under the year 505; and yet Beatus Rhenanus aſſerts in the title page of his edition of Obſequens's remains, that they begin with the year of Rome 505. Balthazar Bonifacius has tranſcribed that blunder (2). The learned Schefferus could not but know that theſe two authors aſſert this (3), and yet he does not paſs any cenſure on them, nor does he give us notice of their blunder. It is alſo to be met with in the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

(2) Balth. Bonifac. de Scriptor. Hiſt. Rom. Obſerves that Zeller, who quotes him in Hiſtoricis, part I. p. 55. puts 55 inſtead of 505.

(3) See what he puts after his preface, and alſo his firſt note.

[D] There are ſeveral Editions of thoſe remains.] Schefferus mentions the following (4). Aldas Manutius is the firſt who publiſhed that work; he printed it at Venice in the year 1508 (5). Beatus Rhenanus had it printed ſix years after at Strasburg, with ſome other tracts. Aſulanus, Aldas Manutius's father-in-law, gave a new edition of it in the year 1518. Robert Stephens publiſhed it ſome time after at Paris. In the year 1552, John Oporinus printed it at Baſil with the Supplements of Lycoſthenes, who was then Corrector and Director of the Preſs to Oporinus (6.). He took care to diſtinguiſh with Stars Lycoſthenes's additions. The next year John de Tournes counterfeited that edition, but he took care to preſerve the marks of diſtinction very exactly But ſince Voſſius (7) mentions an edition of John de Tournes, in which Lycoſthenes's additions are blended together with Obſequens's work, without any mark to diſtinguiſh them, there are reaſons to think, that that Printer became more careleſs in a ſecond edition. His careleſſneſs has occaſioned many miſtakes. Some expreſſions of Lycoſthenes have been quoted as the words of an old Author, and his authority has been urged as that of an antient Writer (8). That defect has been corrected in Schefferus's edition (9). All that Obſequens wrote, is printed in a Roman letter, and Lycoſthenes's ſupplements are printed in Italicks. Let us give an inſtance of the miſtakes occaſioned by the confuſion we have mentioned. Alexander ab Alexandro aſſerts, that when Tarquin was driven from Rome, a dog ſpoke, and a ſnake barked (10). Tiraqueau, who has acquainted us with the originals from which that Author extracted his remarks, obſerves that Livy ſays only, that a ſnake fell down from a wooden ſtatue (11). Julius Obſequens, adds he, has related that prodigy, with all that Alexander ab Alexandro aſſerts here. But it is Lycoſthenes, and not Obſequens *, who relates that a dog ſpoke and a ſnake barked. He had no doubt borrowed that prodigy from Alexander ab Alexandro; and thus by a ſtrange reciprocation, the Tranſcriber is quoted to ſupport the original. Is not this what the School-men call mutua cauſalitas?

(4) In the preface to his edition.

(5) From the manuſcript, which Jucundus of Verona gave him.

(6) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 711.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 711.

(9) Printed at Amſterdam, 1679, in 8vo.

(10) Satis conſtat . . . canem loquutum fuiſſe, ſerpentemque latraſſe. Alex. ab Alexandro, Genialium Dierum. Lib. 3. cap. 15. p. m. 733.

(11) Tiraquellus, Not. in hunc locum Alex. ab Alexandro.

* The Printers have put here Alexander ab Alexandro, inſtead of Obſequens, which makes Mr. Bayle talk nonſenſe.

[E] Moreri . . . . quotes his authorities in the moſt wretched manner.] He quotes Sebaſtian, Conrad, in Quæſt. p. 41. This leads the reader to think, that two Authors, the one named Sebaſtian, and the other Conrad, will acquaint him with ſeveral particulars concerning Obſequens, if he will but take the trouble to conſult them; and yet theſe are chimerical authors: But ſuppoſe Sebaſtian Corradus were quoted, this would nevertheleſs miſlead us. For that Author gives us only the bare name of Obſequens. He cannot be quoted, but juſt to let us know that he thought Oroſius lived before Obſequens: and this is the only uſe Voſſius makes of the quotation from Corradus. Sebaſtianus Corradus in quæſtura ſua, p. 41 videtur in alia fuiſſe ſententia (quam quæ ſtatuit antiquiorem Obſequentem Oroſio) quia utrumque nominans Oroſium præmittit (12); i. e. "Sebaſtian Corradus ſeems to have "been of another opinion (namely than that of thoſe "who think that Obſequens was more eminent than "Oroſius) for mentioning theſe two Authors, he "names Oroſius firſt."

(12) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 711.

OCHINUS (BERNARDINUS) was one of thoſe Italian clergymen, who left their native country in the 16th Century, in order to profeſs the Proteſtant Religion. He was born at Sienna, and had been firſt a Cordelier, and afterwards a Capuchin (a): He continued in the order of the Capuchins from 1534 to the year 1542 (b). They who have aſſerted that he was the founder of that order, or one of the four who firſt engaged in it, were miſtaken [A]; but it is true that he was father confeſſor to the Pope (c), as ſome have aſſerted. He practiſed the rules of his order with a wonderful regularity [B], and preached with an incomparable zeal [C]: It is very probable that he had not the leaſt thought of leaving his order and his church, when the converſations he had with a Spaniſh Civilian (d), who had reliſhed Luther's doctrine in Germany, raiſed ſcruples in his mind. He ſpoke with that civilian at Naples, and began there to preach ſome things which appeared very ſtrange and new [D]. This raiſed ſuſpicions againſt him; he was ſummoned before the court of Rome (e), and was going thither, when he met at Florence with his good friend Peter Martyr [E], whom he acquainted with the

(a) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(b) Idem, ad ann. 1525. num. 27.

(c) See the Remark (D) towards the end.

(d) His name was John Valdeſius.

(e) Spondanus, ad ann. 1525. n. 27.

[A] They who have aſſerted that he was the founder of the Order of the Capuchins . . . . were miſtaken.] Zacharias Boverius proves it both by authorities and by arguments (1). He obſerves among other things, that it is certain the Order of the Capuchins was eſtabliſhed in the year 1525, and that above 300 perſons entered in it, before Ochinus took the habit of that Order in the year 1534. Monſieur Varillas (2) urged the ſame argument to refute the Biſhop of Amelia (3), who aſſerted the ſame thing with Beza (4), namely, that Ochinus was the founder of the Order of the Capuchins. That paſſage of Varillas is quoted in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(1) In his Annals of the Capuchins, apud Spondan. ad ann. 1525. num. 27.

(2) Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. 59. of the Dutch Edition.

(3) Antonio Maria Gratiani, Hiſtorei du Cardinal Commendon, Liv. 2. c. 9.

(4) Barnardinus ille Ochinus maximi prius in Italia nominis monachus, & Capucinorum (quos vocant) ordinis auctor, i. e. "Bernardinus "Ochinus, firſt "a celebrated "Monk in Ita- "ly, and the "founder of the "Order of the "Capuchins, as "they are cal- "led." Beza in Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

[B] He practiſed the rules of his Order with a wonderful regularity.] The Biſhop of Amelia, in the chapter which I have quoted from the hiſtory of Cardinal Commendon, obſerves, that Ochinus was revered like a Saint, and that he performed very exactly all the viſible acts of mortification. His old age, ſays he, his auſtere way of living, the rough garment of a Capuchin, his long beard which reached below his breaſt, his grey hairs, his pale and lean face, a certain appearance of a weak conſtitution very artfully affected, the opinion of his Holineſs, which was ſpread all around, made him be looked upon as a very extraordinary man . . . Not the common people only, but even the greateſt Lords and ſovereign Princes revered him for a Saint. When he viſited them, they uſed to go and meet him with the greateſt demonſtrations of love and eſteem imaginable, and waited upon him after the ſame manner, when he went away. For his part, he made uſe of all the artifices that could ſupport the good opinion men had of him. He always walked on foot in his journies; and though he was old, and of a weak conſtitution, yet he was never ſeen on horſeback. When Princes obliged him to lodge at their palaces, neither the ſtatelineſs of the buildings, nor the magnificent dreſſes, nor all the pomp of this world, could make him abate any thing of his uſual poverty, nor omit the leaſt mortification required by the ſtatutes of his Order. At entertainments he would never eat but of one ſort of meat, and even of the coarſeſt and the moſt common, and he drank hardly any wine. He was deſired to lye on very good beds, richly adorned, to refreſh himſelf a little of the fatigues of his journies; but he would only ſpread his cloke upon the ground and lye on it. The reputation he gained, and the honours he received throughout all Italy are incredible.

[C] He preached with an incomparable zeal.] Let us hear again the Biſhop of Amelia. We may ſay (5) that he had ſome learning, but he had applied himſelf to eloquence, and to the beauty of expreſſions, rather than to the doctrines of the Church, and to the art of reaſoning. He hardly learned any Latin; but when he ſpoke in his mother-tongue, he expreſſed what he knew with ſuch a grace, ſuch a politeneſs, and ſo copiouſly, that he raviſhed his whole audience. When he was to preach any where, ſays again the Biſhop of Amelia, people flocked thither; whole Cities came to hear him, nor was there a Church large enough for the multitude that thronged to hear him. The number of women was generally larger than that of men. When he was to paſs through ſome town, an infinite number of people went to meet him, to hear his inſtructive diſcourſes. Bzovius has ſummed up in a few words a great elogy of him. In tanta tum erat exiſtimatione (Ochinus) ut unus optimus totius Italiæ concionator haberetur, ut qui admirabili quadam cum actione, tum linguæ facundia auditorum animos quocunque vellet raperet, ac tanto magis quod vita doctrinæ reſonaret (6), i. e. "Ochinus was ſo highly eſteemed, "that he was looked upon as the beſt preacher in all "Italy, who by a wonderful delivery, and admira- "ble eloquence, turned people's mind as he pleaſed, "the rather, becauſe his life was anſwerable to his "preaching."

(5) Mr. Varillas, Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. 59, & 60. has paraphraſed this paſſage and the foregoing with his uſual liberty.

(6) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542. n. 32.

[D] He began at Naples to preach ſome things, which appeared very ſtrange and new.] Tomaſo Coſto (7) who wrote the hiſtory of the troubles which aroſe at Naples, when they would eſtabliſh the Court of Inquiſition there, aſſerts, that Ochinus had ſpread the firſt ſeeds of theſe diſorders by his ſermons (8). The Biſhop of Amelia does not ſay that any Heretick, who came from Germany, as for inſtance John Valdes, ſpoiled this Capuchin; he pretends that his pride ruined him, and that out of ſpite that he was not promoted to the dignity of a Cardinal: He dropt artfully in his ſermons ſome expreſſions and ſome opinions tending to leſſen and to cry down the authority of the ſee of Rome (9). Bzovius ſays in general terms, that Ochinus dropt ſomething amiſs in a ſermon, Quod pro concione quadam ſecus dicta effudiſſet (10). Here follows a commentary on theſe words: It is pretended that on a Palm-Sunday he preached before the Pope, and ſeverely cenſured his pride, making a parallel between Jeſus Chriſt and him. It is added, that after ſermon a Cardinal gave Ochinus notice of the Pope's reſentment, and adviſed him to make his eſcape immediately. Nimirum (prout alii ſcripto conſignarunt) quod in Dominica palmarum faſtum Papæ Romani in ipſius præſentia ex ſuggeſtu acriter perſtrinxerit, (facta comparatione Domini Jeſu in pauperi ſtatu Hieroſolymam ingredientis) et Pontificum Romanorum vitam. Qua concione finita unus Cardinalium Papam offenſum eſſe ipſi ſignificat, atque ut protinus præſenti periculo fuga ſeſe eripiat, ſuadet (11). Some have aſſerted that he propoſed the cenſure of the pride and pomp of the Pope's court only as ſo many objections made by the Hereticks, but that having ſpent upon this topick the whole time his ſermon was to laſt, he ended it without anſwering thoſe objections. The author, from whom I borrow this obſervation, aſſerts, that Ochinus was Father Confeſſor and preacher to the Pope. Fuit is patria Senenſis, conditione monachus, & Pontifici Rom. à ſacris concionibus & confeſſionibus. Is ob parrheſiam, qua motus in auribus ſummi Pontificis & totius Aulæ Romanæ Pontificiam arrogantiam & tyrannidem antichriſtianam, velut ex mente Lutheranorum, non addita objectionum, poſtquam eis ſtudio præſtitutam horam impendit, ſolutione, Italia cedere . . . . neceſſe habuit (12). Here are many particulars, which I relate without pretending to warrant the truth of them. I have read, for inſtance, in the learned Seckendorf's large work (13), that they printed in Germany twenty ſermons, which Ochinus preached whilſt he was ſtill a Monk, and which contain almoſt the ſound doctrine of the Proteſtants concerning juſtification, good works, auricular confeſſion, ſatisfaction, indulgence, purgatory, and other articles. There is a little difficulty ſtill behind, namely, whether theſe ſermons were printed in Germany exactly as they had been preached in Italy. However it be, they were printed at Newburg in 4to in the year 1545, having been tranſlated into Latin by Joſeph Hochſteter.

(7) Supplem. ad Mambrin. Liv. 4. apud Spondanum, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(8) Eos ſeminatis ab impio Ochino dum ante aliquot annos publice concionaretur in Eccleſia Metropolitana falſis dogmatibus attribuat, quibus à mentibus & linguis hominum iis infectorum reſecandis, Prorex Inquiſitionis remedium afferre voluerit. Spondan. Ibid.

(9) Ant. Maria Gratiani, Vie du Cardinal Commendon, p. 205. of Monſieur Flechier's French tranſlation, Paris edition in 12mo.

(10) Ad ann. 1542. num. 34. apud Bibliothec. Anti-Trinitariorum, p. 3.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Staniſlaus Lubieniecius, Hiſt. Reformat. Poloniæ, Lib. 2. cap. 5. p. m. 110. See alſo Bibliothec. Anti-Trinitar. p. 2.

(13) In Hiſt. Lutheran. Supplem. Indicis 1.

[E] He met at Florence with his good friend Peter Martyr.] This I think muſt be taken for matter of fact; for nothing could oblige Peter Martyr to falſify the the intelligence he had received of the danger he would run, if he ſhould put himſelf in the Pope's power. Having ſeriouſly conſidered the matter together, they both reſolved to retire into ſome country where they might be ſafe. Ochinus ſet out firſt, and went to Geneva: Martyr went off two days after, and retired into Switzerland (f). A Continuator of Baronius aſſerts, that Ochinus provided himſelf with a female companion, who followed him to Geneva, and that he married her there publickly, to give an authentic proof of his having entirely renounced Popery (g). If we are to judge of this particular by ſome others which the ſame author relates, we might think that he did not extract his Hiſtory from very good Memoirs [F]. Ochinus's eſcape vexed the Pope extremely [G]. He did not ſettle at Geneva, but went to Augſburg, where he publiſhed ſome ſermons. He made a voyage to England with Peter Martyr in the year 1547 (b); Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury had ſent for them both, when he found, after the death of Henry VIII. that things were ripe for a reformation (i). The alterations which were made in the national religion after King Edward's death, obliged thoſe two doctors to leave their country. They croſſed the ſea again in the year 1553, and

(f) Joſias Simler, in Vita Petri Martyris, apud Melchiorem Adamum, p. 36.

(g) Spondanus, ad ann. 1525. num. 27.

(b) Sleidan. Lib. 19. fol. m. 358 verſo.

(i) Simler, in Vita Petri Martyris, p. 40.

the circumſtance of the place; he has therefore related it faithfully in the Memoirs, which have furniſhed materials for writing his life; ſo that Joſias Simler, who drew up that life, is to be credited rather than the Biſhop of Amelia, who relates, 1. That Ochinus was at Verona, when the Pope's order was notified to him. 2. That Matthew Giberti Biſhop of Verona adviſed him to go and clear himſelf. 3. That Ochinus, who followed that advice with reluctancy, went as far as Bologna, where Cardinal Gaſpar Contarini, Legate of that place, was then. 4. That finding the Legate was ſick, ſo that he could not confer with him about his buſineſs, he reſolved to make his eſcape, and that caſting off his Monk's hood, he took a Layman's habit, and retired amongſt the Hereticks (14). Monſieur Varillas, who pretends, that before Ochinus left Verona, he conſulted Peter Martyr by letters, did in all likelihood forge that circumſtance out of his own brains; we may reject it as a mere falſity, ſince there is no room to queſtion, but theſe two men were together at Florence, when they reſolved to retire into a Proteſtant country, (14) Hiſt. du Cardinal Commendon, p. 205, &c.

MISTAKES of Spondanus.

[F] We might think that he did not extract his Hiſtory from very good Memoirs]. For indeed, Spondanus gives us a very erroneous account of Ochinus's life (15). He makes him immediately an Arian, who did not dare to diſcover his hereſy in a city where Michael Servetus had been put to death. We have already quoted Sleidan, who with regard to ſuch particulars, muſt paſs with all the world for an unqueſtionable witneſs: now, he aſſerts that Ochinus went from Geneva to Augsburg, before he ſet out for England; and he went thither in the year 1547; he did not therefore retire from Geneva on account of Servetus's puniſhment: for that Heretick was not burnt but in the year 1553. Spondanus adds, that Ochinus, concealing his opinions for the reaſon we have already mentioned, left Geneva, either of his own accord, or, as others pretend, becauſe Calvin had him baniſhed (16). If Calvin had cauſed him to be baniſhed, he would not have given him in the year 1550 the good character he gave him then. Quos hac noſtra ætate monachos habuit Germania, qui vel doctrina vel ſanctitate cum Luthero, Bucero, Oecolampadio & ſimilibus conferre ſe niſi nimis impudenter audeant? Quos Itali Bernardino Ochino & Petro Vermilio opponent (17)? i. e. "What Monks have there "been in Germany in our time, who with re"gard to learning and an holy life could without the "utmoſt impudence compare themſelves with Luther, "Bucer, Oecolampadius, and others? What Monks "can Italy compare with Bernardinus Ochinus, and "Peter Vermilius?" He would have had him baniſhed before the year 1547, which is the year when Peter Martyr and Ochinus went into England. The Annaliſt continues thus: Ochinus retired from Geneva to Zurich, whence he was alſo baniſhed ſome time after: He met with the ſame fate at Baſil: He came afterwards to England with Martyr, he left that country under Queen Mary's reign, and retired into Germany; and finally into Poland and Tranſilvania. There are ſeveral errors in that account. A man, who is obliged to retire from England under a Roman Catholick Queen, was no doubt came thither under a Proteſtant Prince. Ochinus therefore muſt have come to England in King Edward's reign. Now before he ſet out for this country, he had left Geneva, according to Spondanus, becauſe he dreaded the flames which had conſumed Servetus. He could not therefore retire from Geneva before the latter end of the year 1553. How could he then come to England under King Edward's reign? That Prince died in July 1553, and Servetus was not burnt till the month of October following. The Annaliſt has been guilty here of a prodigious careleſſneſs. Further, it is not true, that Ochinus was baniſhed from Zurich and Baſil before he left England under Queen Mary. He was not driven from Zurich till in the year 1563. He wrote in Poland, ſays Spondanus, a dialogue againſt the Sect of the Gods upon Earth, (he meant the miniſters of Switzerland, and thoſe of Geneva) and afterwards ſome other dialogues, which abounded with atheiſtical notions, and in which he not only aſſerted the doctrine of Polygamy, but alſo attacked the holy Scripture, the Divinity of Chriſt, the Trinity, and even God himſelf. This alſo is not accurate. The dialogues mentioned here were the occaſion of his being baniſhed from Switzerland, which obliged him to go into Poland. He did not therefore write them in Poland. They contain indeed ſeveral errors, but no impious doctrines; nor is it true, that Ochinus, one of the perſons introduced in theſe dialogues, always confeſſes himſelf vanquiſhed by the adverſary, whom he makes to argue againſt him. Ita ſe iis geſerens, ut quamvis omnia Catholica dogmata defendere præ ſe ferret, demum ſe tamen adverſarii argumentis victum profiteretur. (18) i. e. "He acts as though he would defend all the "Catholick doctrines: but yet at laſt he confeſſes "himſelf vanquiſhed by his adverſaries." Bzovius has committed ſome errors like theſe. He pretends that Ochinus being forced to retire from Cracow, made his eſcape into Tranſilvania, and wrote his dialogues there, and that theſe dialogues have been ſince tranſlated into Latin by Caſtalio (19). There are three errors here: For 1. theſe dialogues were written before the author went into Poland. 2. He did not go from Poland into Tranſilvania. 3. Caſtalio was dead before Ochinus left Poland.

(15) Ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(16) Cum non auderet eam ibi profiteri ubi Servetus illam igne luiſſet, ſive ſponte, ſive, ut quidam habent, à Calvino pulſus. Spondanus, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(17) Calvin. de Scandalis, Opuſculor. p. 96.

(18) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(19) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542. num. 30. p. 88.

[G] Ochinus's eſcape vexed the Pope extremely.] The Pope's anger was ſo great, that he was ready to vent it upon the whole Order of the Capuchins; he had a mind to ſuppreſs the whole Order, and could hardly be pacified, even when he came to know that the whole Order was innocent, and Ochinus alone guilty. Cujus apoſtaſia adeo animus Pontificis perculſus eſt, ut de extinguendo univerſo Ordine tractaverit, vixque placari potuerit cognita Ordinis innocentia (20). Monſieur Varillas (21) can hardly believe this, becauſe he thinks Paul III. . . . was too great a politician to give Ochinus an opportunity to boaſt, that the Roman Catholicks had ſo great an eſteem for him, as to revenge on an whole Order the loſs they ſuffered when he left them. This author's incredulity here is more excuſable, than the liberty he took to paraphraſe Spondanus's words; for he had unqueſtionably that original before him when he ſpoke of our Ochinus. Conſider well Spondanus's words which we have juſt now quoted *; is it poſſible to gather from them, that the Pope's anger was owing to Ochinus's impudence, who inſerted into his writings the moſt outragious things he could imagine againſt the religion he had forſaken,

(20) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(21) Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. 64.

* The whole ſenſe of them is given in the words which precede them.

and retired to Straſburg (k) [H]. Ochinus was at Baſil in the year 1555 [I]; but he was called the ſame year to Zurich, to be miniſter of an Italian church which was gathering there. It conſiſted of ſome refugees from Locarno (l), who had not been able to obtain in their own country the liberty of profeſſing the Reformed Religion, becauſe the Roman Catholick Cantons oppoſed it. Ochinus made no difficulty to ſubſcribe the articles of faith agreed upon by the church of Zurich, and met in that city with Bullinger, who proved a very good friend to him (m). He performed his functions in the Italian church of Zurich till the year 1563, where he was baniſhed by the magiſtrates becauſe of ſome Dialogues which he publiſhed, and which amongſt other errors, contained the erroneous doctrine of Polygamy (K). He retired to Baſil, and deſired the miniſters and profeſſors of that city to get leave for him from the magiſtrates to ſettle there. Some examined him upon the doctrines contained in his dialogues: He anſwered that he was of the ſame opinion with them on all thoſe articles; he conſented even to give a clear and diſtinct declaration of his faith, as they required of him; he conſented to it, I ſay, on condition that they ſhould get him leave from the magiſtrates to paſs the winter at Baſil with his children. But the magiſtrates being acquainted with his requeſt, and having heard the advice of the doctors concerning his opinions, commanded him to retire immediately, and declared that they would take his dialogues into conſideration another time, and conſider alſo of the diſgrace he had done their city, by cauſing them to be printed there (n). Andrew Dudithius complained to Beza of the cruel uſage that old man

(k) Sleidanus, Lib. 25. folio 721 verſo.

(l) One of the four Bailiwicks which the Switzers poſſeſs in Italy.

(m) Joſias Simlerus, in Vita Bullingeri, folio 28 verſo.

(n) Idem, ibid. folio 38 verſo, and 39.

ſaken, and the moſt abuſive reflections againſt the Holy See in general, and particularly againſt Pope Paul III. himſelf? And yet Monſieur Varillas found all this in Spondanus's words. I do not deny but Spondanus obſerved (22), that this Monk's apology abounds with reproaches againſt the Holy See, and againſt the Roman Catholick Church.

(22) I quote his words in the remark [Q], quotation (58).

[H] Peter Martyr and he retired to Straſburg.] We ſhall now quote an hiſtorian, who is not much more accurate than Spondanus: I mean father Maimbourg. He aſſerts that Ochinus being baniſhed from England left Peter Martyr, and retired into Poland, that he might be at liberty to profeſs Arianiſm (23). There, ſays he, he wrote his dialogues, which abound with a thouſand abominable blaſphemies againſt Jeſus Chriſt and the Holy Ghoſt. But as he was ſo impudent as to preach in behalf of Polygamy, and to dedicate to King Sigiſmund Auguſtus a book in which he pretended to prove the lawfulneſs of Polygamy, he was forced to retire from Poland, all the world riſing up againſt him. Ochinus, after his return from England, continued about ten years in Switzerland, and would have been glad to end his days there, if they would have ſuffered him, upon the terms of the recantation he promiſed: Which ſhews that he did not ſo earneſtly wiſh to profeſs Arianiſm freely in Poland. The ſecond fault of that writer is, that he goes beyond the truth in the character he gives of the errors diſperſed throughout Ochinus's dialogues. Laſt he did not know, that the book upon Polygamy was written before Ochinus's journey to Poland. I queſtion very much whether Ochinus ever dedicated a work upon that ſubject to Sigiſmund. The Biſhop of Amelia would not have omitted ſo remarkable a particular, nor would the Socinians be ſo little acquainted with it as they are; they know nothing of that book but what they read of it in Bzovius, namely, that Ochinus wrote it in Poland, and dedicated it to the King (24). I ſay it again, I do not queſtion but Bzovius tells us a falſity there, nor do I think that Ochinus ever preached in vindication of Polygamy. If I am not miſtaken, he only wrote what he thought upon that ſubject; and if he had preached it at Poland, the Biſhop of Amelia, who was upon the ſpot, would certainly have known it and publiſhed it.

(23) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, Tom. 3. p. 353, of the Dutch edition.

(24) Liber de Polygamia in Polonia conſcriptus, & Sigiſmundo 2 Regi Poloniæ dedicatus, teſte Bzovio ſub an. 1542. num. 30. Biblioth. Anti-Trin. p. 5.

[I] Ochinus was at Baſil in the year 1555]. This appears from a letter of Olympia Fulvia Morata, Salutem dic meis verbis tuæ familiæ, & D. Bernardino Ocello quem in Chriſti valde diligo, i. e. "This "ſervice to your family, and to Bernardinus Ochinus, "whom I very much love in Chriſt." This is the concluſion of a letter, which ſhe wrote to Curio from Heidelberg, May the 7th 1555 (25). Curio lived at Baſil; he anſwered her the 26th of Auguſt following, and let her know that he had acquitted himſelf of her commiſſion. Tuo nomine ſalutavi . . . Bernardinum Ocellum ſenem doctiſſimum & ſanctiſſimum (26), i. e. "I have given your ſervice to Ber-"nardinus Ochinus, a moſt learned and moſt holy "old man." We read in another letter (27): Audio Bernardinum Ocellum Senenſem virum ſincerè Chriſtianum ex Anglia Genevam profugiſſe, i. e. "I hear that "Bernardinus Ochinus of Sienna a ſincere Chriſtian, "is fled from England to Geneva." This letter was not written in the year 1555, as the author of the Bibliotheque of the Anti-Trinitarians imagines (28), but in the year 1554.

(25) Lib. 2. p. m. 168. The year is not ſet down there; but Curio's anſwer being dated 7 Calend. Sept. (Auguſt the 26th) 1555, ſhews evidently that I have ſet down the true year.

(26) Curio, Ibidem, p. 169.

(27) Pag 178.

(28) Pag. 3.

[K] His dialogues . . . . contained amongſt other errors the erroneous doctrine of Polygamy]. The work conſiſts of thirty dialogues, the twenty firſt of which treats of Polygamy. Ochinus compoſed and publiſhed them in Italian: Caſtalio tranſlated them into Latin, and had them printed at Baſil in the year 1563. Some Senators of Zurich received letters from foreign countries, in which they had notice given them that Ochinus had publiſhed a book, in which he taught hereſies, and particularly Polygamy. This was the reaſon why the Senate ſent for the miniſters, who declared that being told, Ochinus had ſome works printing which it were better to ſuppreſs, they had exhorted him to remember that he had promiſed to publiſh nothing without the Synod's approbation. They add, 1. That when they knew his book was printed, they complained to him of his contempt for their admonition. 2. That he ſaid in his defence, that his book was already in the preſs, when they firſt admoniſhed him. 3. That though he argues for and againſt Polygamy, yet it is eaſily perceived that he approves it. Quod dialogum de Polygamia attinet, diſputari in utramque partem, ſed ita ut facile appareat quonam ipſe inclinet, præſertim cum ita concludat, & moneat eum qui plures ducere volebat, ut ſi non poſſit ſe continere & una contentus eſſe, ſequatur inſtinctum ſpiritus in hac re (29), i. e. "As to his dialogue on Polygamy, though "he argues pro and con, yet he does it ſo as to "declare plain enough to which ſide of the queſ-"tion he inclines; eſpecially ſince he adviſes the "man, who would marry ſeveral wives, that if he "cannot contain himſelf, and be content with one "woman, he ſhould follow the motion of the ſpirit." That they had received letters full of complaints againſt the other dialogues, and that they would examine the whole work with the utmoſt attention. They adviſed the author privately both before and after the Senate's ſentence to explain his opinion in an orthodox manner, but they could not prevail upon him to hearken to their advice. Here follows the ſentence that was paſt upon him (30). Quoniam Ochinus contra leges & edicta Magiſtratuum librum publicaſſet, quem ſatius erat ſupprimi, & cujus nomine Eccleſia & Reſpublica male audit, ideo ſe velle & jubere ut quam primum ex urbe & agro Tigurino diſcedat, i. e. "Whereas Ochinus, againſt the laws and edicts "of the magiſtrates, has publiſhed a book, which it "had been better to ſuppreſs (31), and on account "of which the church and ſtate are traduced, there-"fore we command him to withdraw himſelf imme-"diately out of the city and territories of Zurich."

(29) Simler. in Vita Bullingeri, fol. 39.

(30) Idem, ibid.

(31) Would they have expreſſed themſelves ſo faintly, if the book had been ſuch as F. Maimbourg repreſents it, who certainly never looked into it?

man met with [L] from them, who forced him to go and look for a ſanctuary in the coldeſt ſeaſons of the year. Ochinus was then threeſcore and ſixteen years old [M]. He retired into Poland; but the Nuncio Commendon ſoon drove him from thence by the edict, which was publiſhed againſt all the Hereticks who were foreigners. They retired to ſeveral places. Ochinus went into Moravia where he died ſoon after. The plague carried him off with his wife, his two daughters and his ſon (o), if we may believe the writer of Cardinal Commendon's life [N]. The circumſtances of his death are variouſly reported

(o) The life of Cardinal Commendon, by Antonio Maria Gratiani, Liv. 2. c. 9.

[L] Andrew Dudithius complained . . . of the cruel uſage that old man met with.] Our work not being a book of controverſy, no man ought to find fault with us, for obſerving that Beza did not anſwer Dudithius with the ſincerity which became him. He imagined his Wit would bring him off, and he endeavoured only to caſt a miſt before the Reader's eyes. You will ſoon be able to judge of it, by comparing the objection with his anſwer. Ochinum præterea narras indicta cauſa, hyeme acri, decurſa jam ætate ſenem cum uxore & liberis Tiguro ejectum; i. e. "You aſſert that Ochinus "was baniſhed from Zurich without a Tryal, in the "midſt of a ſevere winter, in his old age, attended "with a wife and children." Thus Beza propoſes the objection (32). It renders the Senate of Zurich odious for theſe three reaſons: 1. Becauſe the affair had not been examined. 2. Becauſe the ſeverity of the weather had not been minded in the leaſt. 3. Becauſe a man of a decrepit age, and incumbred with a family, had been forced to travel in a ſharp winter. With regard to the firſt head, Beza anſwers, that is a falſity, and a great injury to a wiſe and pious Senate, to ſay that Ochinus's cauſe was not examined. That it is true indeed, that every particular was not thoroughly canvaſſed, but that this was done from a principle of great mercy (33). On the 2d head, that Ochinus had not one day's journey to go (34). On the 3d head, that the older he was, the greater offender he was (35); and further, that he had loſt his wife. The firſt anſwer is very wretched; for it is certain, that the Senate of Zurich condemned Ochinus, not only without hearing his defence, but alſo without having his dialogues examined. The Miniſters, who were conſulted by the Senate, made no poſitive anſwer, except to what related to Polygamy; they declared in general, that they had letters, containing many complaints againſt Ochinus's dialogues, and promiſed to examine the matter carefully. But in the mean time, what did the Senate do? They commanded Ochinus to depart immediately from the City and Canton of Zurich. Simler, who, as he was Profeſſor at Zurich, was ſtill more obliged than Beza, to give this affair the beſt turn he could, does yet relate it exactly as I have done. To ſay that if any thing was not canvaſſed with the utmoſt accuracy, it was owing to a principle of mercy, is a mere evaſion, to which any Judge may have recourſe, when he thinks fit to condemn a man without a fair tryal. The third anſwer is not much better; it tends to the overthrowing of a maxim grounded on common ſenſe, and which is univerſally practiſed. Old age is revered even in criminals; if two men, the one of threeſcore and ten, and the other of forty years, were condemned to the rack, it would be ordered to torture the old man leſs ſeverely than the other. So that our Ochinus's old age was very proper to render the ſentence of the Senate of Zurich odious, but not to excuſe it. If Beza had made a good uſe of his wit, he would have granted Dudithius's maxim, and anſwered, that the Magiſtrates of Zurich had really ſome regard for Ochinus's old age, and that if he had been a young man, they would not have condemned him only to baniſhment. This is what Beza ought to have anſwered, inſtead of urging that maxim, that the older the Hereticks are, the leſs they deſerve any mercy from their Judges. The ſecond anſwer is not fair; for it ſuppoſes that all Ochinus's trouble conſiſted in travelling five or ſix leagues. This would be well enough, if he could have met with a ſanctuary in the neighbourhood: but we have ſeen above, that he could not get leave to paſs the winter in that neighbourhood. Beza was not ignorant of it; he knew very well, that Dudithius could add new ſtrength to his objection, by inſiſting upon what was done at Baſil. How then could Beza imagine he anſwered Dudithius effectually? for that man's deſign was only to upbraid the Proteſtants beyond the Rhine with their ſevere uſage towards the Hereticks. He urges among other inſtances, the treatment which Ochinus met with from the Magiſtrates of Zurich, who baniſhed him in the midſt of winter. To which it is anſwered, that this Baniſhment expoſed him only to the inconveniencies and fatigues of a journey of five or ſix leagues. Ochinus met therefore with a ſafe retreat at five or ſix leagues diſtance; for if he met with no ſafe retreat, but on the contrary, with a good Proteſtant Senate, who drove him away, Dudithius's objection, grounded on the circumſtance of the time, remains in its full ſtrength, with regard to the deſign he had to ſhew, that Ochinus was a remarkable inſtance of the ſevere temper of the Evangelicks. It is morally impoſſible, but Beza muſt have known this, and yet he choſe to anſwer as he has done, rather than be ſilent. He took care not to hint in the leaſt, that he had any knowledge of what paſt at Baſil (36). The little extent of the Canton of Zurich furniſhed him with a ſhew of argument, with a little artifice: He makes uſe of it, hoping, no doubt, that the Reader would be amuſed by it.

A COMPARISON between Dudithius's objection and Beza's anſwer.

(32) Beza, Epiſt. prima, Oper. Tom. 3. p. 190.

(33) Delatus ad Magiſtratum, pro eo quod ſeveram pœnam pro tantis ſceleribus merebatur, non ſane indicta cauſa (quod qui dicunt magnam juſto & pio Magiſtratui injuriam faciunt) ſed non ad vivum reſectis omnibus, ut cum illo quam clementiſſime ageretur, juſſus eſt è Tigurinorum agro diſcedere. Beza, ibidem.

(34) At hyems erat: nempe longa fuit non unius integri diei via. Ibidem.

(35) At ſenex erat? tanto nocentior veterator. Ibid.

(36) I mean of Ochinus's baniſhment; for he confeſſes that the opinions of that Heretick were condemned there. Baſileam igitur venit, ubi quum itidem ſuos errores damnatos videret, tandem ad ſuos ſive Tritheitas, ſive Arrianos, ſive Samoſatenianos ſe contulit; i. e. "He came "therefore to "Baſil, and "finding that "his errors were "alſo condemn-"ed there, he "retired to his "friends the "Tritheites, "or Arians, or "Samoſetani-"ans." Would not one think, that Ochinus retired from Baſil of his own accord? and yet he was commanded to leave that City. Was it fairly done to conceal that particular?

[M] Ochinus was then threeſcore and ſixteen years old.] Peter Perna aſſerts it in his letters to Czechovicius. I have not read it, I have only ſeen it quoted (37.) At that rate, Gratiani muſt be miſtaken, who aſſerts that Ochinus turned Heretick at the age of threeſcore years, without conſidering, ſays he (38), either his age, or his profeſſion, or the vow of continence he had made; but being a Prieſt, a Capuchin, and ſixty years old, he married immediately a young girl. Ochinus left his Convent, and retired to Geneva in the year 1545. He was not therefore ſixty years old then, but at moſt fifty-five, if it be true, that in the year 1563, when he was baniſhed from Zurich, he was but threeſcore and fifteen.

(37) Anno 1563 natus annos 76 (teſte Petro Perna in Epiſtola ad Czechovicium) a Tigurinis pulſus eſt. Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 3.

(38) Vie du Cardinal Commendon, p. 208.

(39) Oper. Tom. 3. p. 190.

[N] The plague carried him off, with his wife . . . if we may believe the Writer of Cardinal Commendon's life.] I make uſe of this reſtriction, becauſe he is miſtaken with regard to the wife. Ochinus was a widower, when he was baniſhed from Zurich, and it is not at all probable that he married again. It is from Beza I learn that Ochinus was a widower: Beza does even pretend to dive into the impenetrable judgments of Providence; he aſſerts in a theological ſtyle, that Ochinus's wife broke her neck, divine juſtice purſuing that wicked wretch within his own houſe, before his impiety was known abroad. At uxorem & liberos habebat, but he had a wife and children. This is part of Dudithius's objections. Beza anſwers (39): De uxore falſum eſt, quod ex bono Alciato ſive quovis alio cognoviſti. Fregerat enim collum, horrendo Dei judicio domi impium ſenem perſequente, priuſquam foras productum eſſet ipſius ſcelus; i. e. "It is falſe with regard to his wife, "as honeſt Alciat, or any other man may have told "you; for ſhe broke her neck, &c." Staniſlaus Lubienietzki (40) gives an account of Ochinus's laſt moments after this manner. Ochinus retired into Moravia and into Poland, and even there he was not out of the reach of Calvin's letters. He returned into Moravia after King Sigiſmund's edict, who in the year 1564, puniſhed with baniſhment all thoſe who were called Tritheites, Arians, &c. Some gentlemen endeavoured to keep him in Poland; but he anſwered, that men muſt obey the Magiſtrates, and that he would obey them, even were he to die amongſt the wolves in the woods. During his journies, he fell ſick of the plague at Pinczow, and received there all poſſible offices of charity and kindneſs at the houſe of one of the brethren, name Philippovius. His two ſons and his daughter (41) died of the Plague. As for him, he continued his journey to Moravia, and died within three weeks at Sclavonia (42). Lubienietzki did not know more particulars of him. I do not find in any good Author, that Ochinus ever was in Tranſilvania: for Maimbourg who aſſerts it, is not in that reſpect a credible witneſs. He was obliged, ſays he,

(40) Hiſtor. Reformat. Polonica, Lib. 2. c. 4. p. 110. See alſo Budzinius, Hiſt. Eccleſiar. Poloni-car. MS. c. 26. apud Bibl. Anti-Trin. p. 3.

(41) Gratiani ſays on the contrary his two daughters and his ſons.

(42) I think it ſhould be at Slaukovia, or Slawkaw.

ported [O], nor are writers agreed with regard to the hereſies he embraced, after he left Switzerland: Some ſay he turned Anabaptiſt, after he had openly preached the hereſy of Macedonius (p); that is to ſay, denied the Perſonality of the Holy Ghoſt: Others ſay in general, that he refuted the myſtery of the Trinity. The Anti-Trinitarians place him amongſt their authors. He wrote ſeveral works, a catalogue of which is inſerted in their Bibliotheque [P]: but they forgot to inſert in that catalogue the apology he wrote for his changing he (43), to leave Poland . . . and after he had wandered for ſome time in Tranſilvania, he retired at laſt, being overwhelmed with miſery and want, into a village, where he died of the plague, being forſaken by all the world. The Biſhop of Amelia is quoted for theſe particulars, and yet he mentions neither Ochinus's Poverty, nor his being thus forſaken; he aſſerts (44) on the contrary, that Ochinus ended his days at the houſe of one of his antient friends. He left a conſiderable eſtate to his heirs, if we may depend on Beza's teſtimony. Ochinus . . . . familia non mediocri ſumptu circumducta tandem obiit, tam inops & egens ſcilicet, cui nec petere nec accipere unquam religio fuerat, ut plus ſanè reliquerit hæredibus, quam bona collegii noſtri pars poſſideat (45). This is the laſt ſtroke that is levelled at him in the anſwer to Dudithius; he was never aſhamed to aſk and to receive, and got a good ſum of money by that means.

(p) In Poloniam cum perveniſſet dicitur palam illic oppugnaſſe hypoſtaſin Spiritus Sancti. Sed nec illic ei diutius conſiſtere licuit. Quare ſe in Moraviam ad Anabaptiſtarum conventicula recepit, & illic obiit. Simler. in Vita Bullingeri, folio 40.

(43) Hiſt. de l'Arianiſme, Tom. 3. p. 352.

(44) Hiſt. du Cardinal Commendon, p. 213.

(45) Beza, Epiſt. ad Dudithium, Opeſcum Tom. 3. p. 190.

[O] The circumſtances of his death are variouſly reported]. I have given ſeveral proofs of this aſſertion in the foregoing remark; here follows another argument to the ſame purpoſe. It is aſſerted in the Annals of the Capuchins that he died a good Roman Catholick. Eum tamen immenſa Dei benignitate ante mortem reſipuiſſe, & hæreſes abjuraſſe, ac peccata ritu Catholico confeſſum eſſe, denique vere pœnitentem obiiſſe, Annales Capucinorum multis diverſorum teſtimoniis affirmant (46), i. e. "It is nevertheleſs aſſerted in the "Annals of the Capuchins, and confirmed by many "authorities, that through God's infinite mercy he "repented before his death, abjured his hereſies, con-"feſſed his ſins after the Roman Catholick manner, "and died at laſt a true penitent." Others (47) on the contrary ſuppoſe, that he died, not only being forſaken of all mankind, and the moſt miſerable wretch in the world, but alſo like an Atheiſt.

(46) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547, num. 22. He quotes the Annals of the Capuchins, ad ann. 1543. See the remark [AA].

(47) Moreri is one of them.

Theophilus Raynaud relates, that ſome perſons were offended at his writing, that Ochinus died miſerably in the communion of the Arian Hereticks, and not a Martyr at Geneva repenting of his apoſtacy. Theſe perſons complained of it to John de Montacaliero General of the Capuchins, which obliged him to read Theophilus Raynaud's book (48), but he did not meet with any thing in it, which in his opinion deſerved to be cenſured. You have here an inſtance of the ſtrange and odd temper of the Capuchins; they are ſorry that men will not admit all thoſe fables, which would make the world believe that Ochinus had a mind to enter again into their Order, and that he was murthered for that reaſon. The author, againſt whom they brought their complaints before their General, obſerves that when he mentioned the unhappy end of that Heretick, he followed Andrew Traſius's account; and that Toſſinianus, in the ſecond book of his Seraphick Hiſtory, Florimond de Raymond in the fifth chapter of the third book of his hiſtory of Hereſies, Arthur of Munſter * in the Martyrology of the Franciſcans, under January the 4th, in the third paragraph, and in general all thoſe who wrote before the year 1630 (49), gave the ſame account of Ochinus's death (50).

(48) Intitled Judæ poſteri, apoſtatæ à religioſis ordinibus.

* F. Th. Raynaud ſays, Arturus a Monaſterio, which ſhould be tranſlated Arthur du Monſtier, a French Recollect Monk, born at Roan, who wrote a martyrology of the Franciſcans, in Latin, printed at Paris in folio, in the year 1638. Taken from the remarks printed at the end of the Paris edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

[P] He wrote ſeveral works, a catalogue of which is inſerted in the Bibliotheque of the Anti-Trinitarians.] He publiſhed ſix volumes of ſermons in the Italian tongue; an expoſition of St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Galatians; a treatiſe De Cœna Domini contra Joachimum Weſtphalum, i. e. "Of the Lord's Supper againſt "Joachim Weſtphalus." Labyrinthi de Prædeſtinatione et libero arbitrio, i. e. "Diſcourſes concerning Pre-"deſtination and Free Will." Apologues (51); a dialogue concerning Purgatory, &c. I do not believe that he publiſhed any work in Latin. He compoſed all that he wrote in the Italian tongue, and had it afterwards tranſlated. Some of his works have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages. It is but one day ſince I looked over his Labyrinths (or diſcourſes concerning Predeſtination) they ſeemed to me the work of a man, who had a very clear head, and a quick genius. Ochinus proves there by very ſtrong arguments, that they, who aſſert that man acts freely, entangle themſelves in four very great difficulties; and that they who maintain that man acts neceſſarily, expoſe themſelves to four other ſtrong objections; which altogether make up eight Labyrinths, four againſt free will, and four againſt neceſſity or fate. He turns himſelf every way imaginable, in order to find out an iſſue; and meeting with none, he concludes every article by a fervent prayer to God, to be delivered out of theſe mazes. However in the following part of his work he attempts to furniſh us with ſome hints to extricate ourſelves out of thoſe perplexities: but he concludes upon the whole, that the only method is to ſay with Socrates, Unum ſcio, quod nihil ſcio; the only thing I know is, that I know nothing: We ought to be ſilent, ſays he, and to judge that God does not require of us to take either the affirmative or the negative ſide of the queſtion upon ſuch difficult ſubjects. Here follows the title of the laſt chapter. *Qua via ex omnibus ſupradictis labyrinthis cito exiri poſſit, quæ docta * ignorantiæ via vocatur*, i. e. "By what means we may ſoon get out of the foregoing "Labyrinths, by what is called the way of a learned "ignorance." D'Aubigné mentions a book of our Ochinus, and ſpeaks of it after ſuch a manner as to perſuade us that it is a very curious piece. Here follow his words (52). Firſt that divine ſervice be performed in French, provided ſome fooliſh things were left out, which would make people laugh; as for inſtance, to begin the maſs with and, and ſome other abſurdities, which are very pertinently and juſtly deſcribed by Bernard Ochinus, in his treatiſe della Nativita della Miſſa (of the birth of the Maſs). As for the ornaments, let the moſt ridiculous be ſuppreſſed, and for the reſt, let it be anſwered, as the ſaid Ochinus does, that it is the Lord's Supper diſguiſed, and turned a nun per parer piu ſanta, in order to appear more holy. I think that to ſpeak more accurately D'Aubigné ſhould not have ſaid in the treatiſe, but in the ſermon della Nativita della Miſſa. For having juſt now looked over Ochinus's twelve ſermons on the Lord's Supper (53), I have found that the ſeventh is intitled, Miſſæ Tragœdia, ac primum quomodo concepta, nata, baptizata fuerit, i. e. "The tragedy of the Maſs, and firſt how ſhe "was conceived, born, and baptized." The eighth is intitled, Quemadmodum nutrita educataque fuerit Miſſa, adoleveritque, et ornata, ditataque, ad ſummam dignitatem præſtantiamque pervenerit, i. e. "How the "Maſs was nurſed, and educated, how ſhe grew up, "and how being adorned and enriched, ſhe arrived "at laſt to the higheſt dignity and pre-eminence." The title of the ninth is, Miſſæ accuſatio, ejuſdemque reſponſio, et adverſus eam acta, i. e. "The Maſs's im-"peachment, and her anſwer, with the proceedings "againſt her." The tenth is intitled, Sententia à Deo contra Miſſam lata, i. e. "God's ſentence againſt the Maſs." This dramatick method of preaching is too much in the taſte of the Italians.

* I ſuppoſe it ſhould be doctæ.

(52) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, Liv. 2. c. 2. p. m. 390, 391. See alſo Chap. 6. of the 1 Book, p. 346.

(53) Tranſlated into Latin, and printed at Baſil with the ſame Author's Labyrinths.

Sleidan obſerves, that there was publiſhed a moſt abuſive ſatyr againſt Paul III. in the year 1549, which was not written by Ochinus, though his name was prefixed to it. Sleidan gives the ſubſtance of this libel. Prius quam decederet libellus exiit Italicus vehemens in illum atque gravis, titulo quidem Bernardini Ochini, ſed ab aliis, ut creditur, compoſitus, cum præfatione ad Aſcanium Columnam quem ille proſtigarat (54), i. e. "Before he (Paul III.) died, there came out a "moſt violent and ſmart ſatyr againſt him, which "in the title page was aſcribed to Bernardinus Ochi-"nus, but which was thought to be written by ano-"ther hand; with a preface to Aſcanius Colonna, "whom he had routed." I have already mentioned the 30 dialogues, which were the occaſion of Ochinus's baniſhment: but I muſt add here, that Monſieur Simon gives a very good account of them (55). He acknowledges that he did not openly declare in thoſe dialogues his Anti-trinitarian Hereſies.

(54) Sleidanus, Hiſtor. Lib 21. folio m. 602 verſo.

(55) He is miſtaken, when he ſuppoſes that Ochinus was called to Zurich in the year 1562, and when he aſcribes to Melchior Adam the life of Bullingerus, which was written by Joſiah Simler.

(49) He ſuppoſes Boverius wrote his Annals of the Capuchins that year.

(50) Ex Theophil. Raynaudo, Syntagm. de Libris propriis, num. 23. p. 42. Apopompæi. See hereunder the remark [AA].

(51) Which have been tranſlated out of Italian into German by Chriſtopher Wirſungus.

changing of his Religion [Q]. He addreſſed it to the Pope, and filled it with the moſt outrageous reflections againſt the Roman Catholick Church. That piece did not remain unanſwered. The confeſſion he made publickly is remarkable. He acknowledged in a preface, that if he could have continued without danger of his life, to preach the truth, after the manner he had preached it for ſome years, he would never have laid down the habit of his Order (q), but as he did not find within his breaſt that courage, which is requiſite for a man to expoſe himſelf to martyrdom (r), he took ſanctuary in a Proteſtant country. Some have erroneouſly aſſerted that he was the author of the book De Tribus Impoſtoribus [R]; (of the three Impoſtors). It is ſaid that he promiſed Cardinal de Lorrain, that he would convict the Proteſtant Churches of two dozen of errors [S]. I find that writers have often exaggerated the particulars which concern him [T]. Monſieur Varillas has related many falſities with regard to this ex-Capuchin [U]. Nor is Moreri's account

(q) Non diſſimulans manere ſe voluiſſe, modo Chriſtum, etſi occultius & veluti obvelatum, prædicare ſibi licuiſſet. In the preface to the Sermons, which he preached in Italy, and which were printed in Germany in the year 1545. See Seckendorf, in Supplementis Indicis I Hiſtoriæ Lutheran.

(r) Cum ſe ad mortem ſponte obeundam non ſatis firmum eſſe deprehenderet. In the ſame Preface.

ſies. He did not ſet up there for a downright Unitarian, he gives only the arguments on both ſides . . . In his dialogue on the Trinity, he relates at large the arguments of the Catholicks, and of the Anti-Trinitarians, and inſiſts very much upon thoſe of the latter, with a pretence to refute them (56). Bullingerus aſſerts (57), that theſe dialogues were burnt in a noted city.

(56) Simon, Hiſt. Critique des Comment. du Nouv. Teſtam. Chap. lv. p 831.

(57) Apud Boxhorn. Hiſt. Univerſ. p. 74. ad ann. 1552.

[Q] The apology he wrote for his changing of his religion.] One of the continuators of Baronius mentions it after this manner. Genevam appulſus Apologiam de fuga ſua ad Pontificem ſcripſit, maledicentiis et calumniis in ſedem Apoſtolicam, et Eccleſiam Catholicam Rom. refertiſſimam (58), i. e. "Being arrived at Geneva he wrote an apology for his flight, directed to the Pope, which abounded with ſlanders and calumnies againſt the Apoſtolick See, and the Roman Catholick Church." Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, who was afterwards Pope under the name of Paul IV. wrote an anſwer to Ochinus, which has been inſerted in the hiſtory of the Theatins. Contra Ochini Apologiam nonnulli ſtylum acuerunt; inter quos Joannes Petrus Caraffa Cardinalis Theatinus, qui deinde fuit Paulus Papa IV. paræneticam egregiam ſcripſit Epiſtolam, quam Joannes Baptiſta Acerrarum Epiſcopus Hiſtoriæ Theatinorum inſeruit (59), i. e. "Some exerted their pen againſt Ochinus's apology, amongſt whom Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, Biſhop of Theate *, who was afterwards Pope under the name of Paul IV. wrote an excellent admonitory epiſtle, which John Baptiſt Biſhop of Acerra inſerted in his hiſtory of the Theatins.

(58) Spondanus, ad ann. 1547. num. 22.

(59) Idem, ibid. See alſo Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. m. 64.

* Thence the Theatins, which Order he eſtabliſhed took their name.

[R] Some have erroneouſly aſſerted that he was the author of the book De Tribus Impoſtoribus.] The perſon who wrote the notes on the Phyſician's Religion (Religio Medici) does not affirm it poſitively; he ſpeaks only doubtfully of it, neſcio an Bernhardinus Ochinus . . . . an alius hujus auctor ſit (60), i. e. "I cannot tell whether Bernardinus Ochinus . . . or ſome other be the author of it." Micrælius is not more poſitive (61); but Scavonius aſſerts it. See what Rhodius ſays upon this ſubject (62), towards the end of Placcius's work De Scriptoribus Anonymis, (of anonymous writers). He declares amongſt other things, that he does not know of any perſon, who ever found fault with the other twenty nine dialogues of Ochinus's. It is very ſtrange that ſo learned a man as he was could declare this. I have related above (63) ſeveral particulars, which prove the contrary.

(60) In Sect. 19. p. m. 126.

(61) Syntagm. Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. p. m. 863.

(62) Pag. 33.

(63) See the remarks [F] [H] and [K].

[S] It is ſaid that he promiſed Cardinal de Lorrain, that he would convict the Proteſtant Churches of . . . errors.] The whole fact, as Simler relates it (64), is as follows. Ochinus met with that Cardinal on the road to Schaffhauſen, and told him that he thought himſelf very unhappy, ſince he was condemned to baniſhment for a book, which he wrote with no other view but to vindicate againſt the objections of the adverſaries thirty true doctrines, hard to be believed, which he found in the Reformed Religion. He preſented the Cardinal with ſome copies of his dialogues, and deſired that he would be pleaſed to read them. We ſhall ſee them, anſwered the Cardinal, and if we do not like them, we ſhall throw them into the fire. Ochinus added, that he would undertake to convince the Reformed Churches of twenty four errors. Take away twenty of them, replied the Cardinal, and there will ſtill remain too many. Beza relates the ſame particular, and gives it as a matter of fact: but he carries the number of falſe doctrines, which Ochinus promiſed to confute, much higher †. The Cardinal deſpiſed

(64) In Vita Bullingeri, folio 40.

† To the number of an hundred.

a Monk, who was ſo often guilty of apoſtacy. Vix Baſilea egreſſo (quod narro, ſcito me non ut rumorem incertum, ſed ut certam hiſtoriam narrare) occurrit Lotharingus Cardinalis ex Italia rediens, cui ſeſe operamque ſuam omnem obtulit, pollicitus ſeſe centum errores iſtorum inter quos tamdiu hæſiſſet hæreticorum demonſtraturum. Sprevit hominem toties apoſtatam Cardinalis (65).

(65) Beza, Operum, Tom. 3. p. 190. The ſenſe of that paſſage is given in the words before it.

[T] Writers have often exaggerated the particulars which concern him.] Beſides what I have touched upon in the other remarks (66), I ſhall obſerve here that they do not give a faithful account of his opinions, who aſſert with Gratiani, that he endeavoured to prove by inſtances, and by arguments fetched from the holy ſcripture and from the art of politicks, that it is proper every man ſhould labour to people the world, and to get a numerous family, and that it is not only lawful for the Chriſtians, but that they are even commanded to marry as many women as they pleaſe (67). Read the beginning of the dialogue De Polygamia, you will ſee that the ſtate of the queſtion is this: When a man, who wiſhes to have children, is married with a woman who is barren, and ſickly, and with whom we cannot agree, is it not lawful for him in ſuch a caſe to marry another wife, without divorcing the firſt? Ochinus ſuppoſes that his advice is aſked upon a caſe of conſcience: He takes the negative ſide of the queſtion; and having made the perſon who conſults him urge the ſtrongeſt arguments in favour of Polygamy, he anſwers them with very good reflections; though he inſiſts but faintly upon them, he concludes with adviſing his friend to have his recourſe to prayer, and by aſſerting that if a man begs the gift of continence from God with faith, he ſhall certainly obtain it: Laſtly he obſerves, that if God do not grant that gift, nor the faith neceſſary to pray for it with ſucceſs, a man may in ſuch a caſe act without ſin according to that inſtinct, which he will know certainly to come from God. Is this then aſſerting dogmatically that the goſpel commands Chriſtians to marry as many wives as they pleaſe? Ochinus is certainly miſtaken; he introduces Fanaticiſm; but as we ought to do juſtice to all the world, it muſt be confeſſed that the writings in which his opinions are mentioned, contain a very unfair account of them.

(66) Above, remarks [F] and [H].

(67) Vie du Cardinal Commendon, p. 212.

[U] Monſieur Varillas has related many falſities with this ex-Capuchin.] Let us refer them to ſeveral heads.

I. I do not queſtion but his whole account of the quarrels between Calvin and Ochinus is nothing but a mere romance, which he forged himſelf, or ſtole from ſome other writer. But I can warrant that he is certainly miſtaken when he aſſerts (68), that Ochinus being at Geneva attacked the holy Trinity, and revived the Arian Hereſy . . . . and that he publiſhed upon that ſubject an hundred extravagant notions, in the libels which he compoſed in Italian, and which his friends tranſlated into Latin. One can demonſtrate that all this is falſe. Ochinus had left Geneva before the year 1547. I have quoted Sleidan's words, which aſſure us of this particular. Calvin commends Ochinus in a book (69), which he publiſhed in the year 1550. Whence it follows that he had not yet obſerved at that time thoſe monſtrous Hereſies of Ochinus. Farther, would they have ſent into England in the year 1547 an ex-Capuchin, who had been known for a Tritheiſt or for an Arian? But we want no other arguments againſt Varillas, than the paſſages in Beza, by which it appears that Ochinus concealed his hereſies for a long while within his breaſt, and that they were not obſerved till he printed his dialogues: Now account of him every way accurate [X]. Palearius (s) has very much commended this Monk.

(68) Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. m. 65.

(69) His book de Scandalis.

(s) Orat. 3. p. 91, 92. Editionis 1696. See alſo p. 505.

There was nothing againſt Florimond de Remond in the firſt edition of this article; and yet that writer is not accurate in the account he gives us of Ochinus [Y]. It is from him

Now they were not publiſhed before the year 1562. Sceleratus hypocrita Arrianorum clandeſtinus fautor, polygamiæ defenſor, omnium Chriſtianæ Religionis dogmatum irriſor, quum eò tandem audaciæ erupiſſet ut ſua portenta in publicum ederet (juſto ſanè Dei judicio ne LATERE diutius tantum malum poſſet) delatus ad Magiſtratum . . . juſſus eſt è Tigurinorum agro faceſſere (70), i. e. "That "wicked Heretick, the ſecret ſupport of the Arians, "the aſſertor of Polygamy, the ridiculer of all the "doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion, came out at "laſt to that height of audaciouſneſs, that he pub- "liſhed his monſtrous opinions (God's juſt judgment "not ſuffering that ſo great an evil ſhould continue "any longer CONCEALED) ſo that he was accuſed "before the magiſtrates . . . . and commanded to re- "tire from the territories of Zurich." With theſe words Beza begins his anſwer to Dudithius's complaints. It appears moſt evidently from that paſſage, that Ochinus's ſecret opinions were not known but by the printing of his dialogues. The friendſhip which Bullingerus (71) had for him till that publication, is another unqueſtionable proof of the ſame fact. Beza ſeldom mentions Ochinus without obſerving that he continued a great while an hypocrite. Favit etiam illis, ſed NIMIUM SERO detectus, Bernardinus ille Ochinus, impuriſſimus hypocrita (72), i. e. "Bernardi- "nus, that moſt abominable Heretick, but who was "TOO LATE diſcovered, favoured them alſo." Beza obſerving that Peter Martyr went to England in the year 1547, and that Ochinus accompanied him thither, adds (73), Maximi prius in Italia nominis monachus & Capucinorum (quos vocant) ordinis auctor, idemque quod MULTIS demum POST annis patefecit, ſceleratus hypocrita, i. e. "Firſt, a very famous Monk "in Italy, and the founder of the Order of the Capu- "chins (as it is called) but a moſt wicked Hypocrite, "which however he did not diſcover till after "MANY YEARS."

(70) Beza, Operum, Tom. 3. p. 190.

(71) See his life by Joſiah Simler, folio 28 verſo, 39 verſo.

(72) Epiſt 81. Operum, Tom. 3. p. 295.

(73) In Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

II. Here follows another romance. "It is ſurpri- "ſing that Calvin had him only baniſhed from Ge- "neva, and did not put him into the hands of the "magiſtrates, to have him burnt, as he did after- "wards with regard to Servetus, who was guilty of "the ſame crime (74)." Varillas endeavours to find out the reaſons of ſuch an inconſiſtent behaviour; he mentions two or three of thoſe reaſons, after which he adds that Ochinus was baniſhed from Geneva by a ſentence of the Senate, and that he retired to Baſil. A man muſt have a great deal of time to ſpare, who endeavours to find out the reaſons of a wild fancy. The fact muſt be firſt clearly proved, and then you may inquire after the cauſes of it. It is falſe that Ochinus was baniſhed from Geneva, and that he diſcovered his Hereſies there.

(74) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 17. p. 65.

III. He would have ſuffered a long perſecution at Baſil, continues Monſieur Varillas, becauſe Calvin's friends had a great intereſt there, had not Bucer, who could eaſily agree with all ſorts of Hereticks, prevailed with the Magiſtrates of Strasburg, to offer Ochinus the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which he accepted. The ſame Bucer took him and Vermilli with him to England. I have neither time, nor the neceſſary books to collect good arguments againſt this account of Varillas: but I am perſuaded, that all reaſonable men will be ſatisfied with Sleidan's ſilence. Would that famous hiſtorian, who reſided at Straſburg, have only obſerved (75), when he mentioned Peter Martyr and Bernardinus Ochinus's voyage to England, that the latter retired firſt to Geneva, and then to Augſburg? Would he have ſaid nothing of that Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which Bucer prevailed upon the Magiſtrates of Strasburg to offer Ochinus, and which he accepted? He does not forget to obſerve expreſly, that Peter Martyr had been Profeſſor in that City. I have juſt now met with ſomething which is more to the purpoſe ſtill. Ochinus was at Augſburg in the year 1546, and preached there in the Italian tongue (76). It is falſe that Bucer took Ochinus and Vermilli with him to England; he did not go thither before the year 1549; and the two others were gone thither towards the end of the year 1547.

(75) Lib. 19. ad ann. 1547.

(76) See Seckend. Hiſtoire du Lutheran. Liv. 3. p. 613.

IV. The Duke of Somerſet had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with their behaviour . . . Ochinus diſperſed ſecretly his fanatical notions on the myſtery of the Trinity (77). This is ſaid at random, and cannot be ſupported by any authority; and it is inconſiſtent with the elogium, which one of the moſt zealous Anti-papiſts of England beſtows on Ochinus (78).

(77) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 3. p. 66.

[X] Moreri's account of him is not every way accurate.] I. He is in the wrong to aſſert that Ochinus took the Monks habit amongſt the Capuchins towards the year 1525, or 26. He ſhould have ſaid in the year 1534. II. It was not in the year 1543 but in 1542 that Ochinus and Martyr ſtript themſelves of their monkiſh habit. III. No man, that I know of, ever reproached Ochinus with aſſerting the doctrine of Pologamy for his own private intereſt, and becauſe he would marry ſeveral wives, not being ſatisfied with one. IV. It is falſe, that in order to juſtify his diſſoluteneſs and incontinence, he publiſhed that Polygamy is lawful. When he publiſhed his dialogues he was a widower, and threeſcore and ſixteen years old (79). Neither his private intereſt nor his paſſions could at that time make him wiſh that Polygamy were permitted: for being a widower he might marry again according to the laws; and as he was threeſcore and ſixteen years old, one woman would only have cut out more work for him, than he would well have compaſſed. He ought to have been well pleaſed, and to have looked upon himſelf as a very extraordinary man, if at that age he could have gratified all the deſires of one woman only. Moreri betrays therefore a very great want of judgment, and an exceſſive ignorance of the particulars of this man's life, when he aſſerts, that he publiſhed that doctrine in order to juſtify his own deſire of marrying ſeveral women. It has been obſerved of ſome looſe Caſuiſts, that they were more ſtrict and ſevere with regard to their own conduct, than with regard to other people's. The ſame may be ſaid of ſome authors, who have aſſerted the doctrine of Polygamy: one Lyſerus (80) ſpent his time, his health, and his very life, in maintaining that doctrine, and yet he had no manner of occaſion to wiſh it had been lawful to marry ſeveral wives, for it is thought that if he had had one only, he would not have known what to do with her. I will not be ſo unjuſt as to aſſert that the author of the Paſtoral Letters * was of the ſame opinion with Lyſerus; let it only be obſerved that his morals were too remiſs in that reſpect, and countenanced incontinency too much; I mean principles of morality, which he aſſerted in order to excuſe thoſe reformers, who gave the Landgrave of Heſſe leave to marry two wives together (81). Now of all the miniſters, he was perhaps the perſon, who on account of his private intereſt, had the leaſt reaſons to wiſh that Polygamy were lawful. V. It is not true that Ochinus put himſelf at the head of thoſe infamous Libertines, who were called Polygamiſts. Theſe people never formed a Sect, nor did Ochinus leave any more Diſciples united in a body, than Lyſerus did. VI. It is falſe that Ochinus left Germany to retire into Tranſilvania: it is more falſe ſtill, that he retired thither, becauſe he did not meet in Germany with ſufficient opportunities to gratify his pride and his ambition. Being baniſhed from Zurich he took ſanctuary at Baſil, whence he was alſo driven. He would have been baniſhed after the ſame manner from all the cities in the world, where the miniſters had any credit with the magiſtrates; ſo that he had no choice left; the only courſe he could take was to retire into Poland, and caſt himſelf into the arms of the Hereticks of thoſe quarters. In caſe God did not ſhew him mercy, they, who have promoted his baniſhment with ſo much zeal and eagerneſs, will be anſwerable for the loſs of that ſoul. VII. Moreri ought not to have quoted Prateolus V. Polig. for he ſays nothing of Ochinus in that place.

(78) Deum immortalem, quales illi duo ſenes peregrini, quos in urbem veſtram recepiſtis (he ſpeaks to the people of Zurich) Petrus Martyr & Bernardinus Ochinus? Quæ duo luminaria? quorum alterum ſi aliæ haberent Eccleſiæ, magno theſauro & ornamento ditatæ & beatæ viderentur. Felix Anglia dum hæc paria habuit, miſera dum amiſit. Balæus, Præfat. in Act. Rom. Pontific. i. e. "Good God! "how worthy "theſe two men "are, whom "you have re- "ceived in your "City (Zurich) "I mean Peter "Martyr and "Bernardinus "Ochinus, "thoſe great "Luminaries: "if other "Churches had "but either of "them, they "would think "themſelves "bleſſed with "an immenſe "treaſure; "happy Eng- "land, when ſhe "enjoyed them "both; wretch- "ed when ſhe "loſt them."

(79) See above, the remark [L].

(80) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for April 1685, Article 2.

* Monſieur Jurieu.

(81) See the Article LUTHER, remark [K].

[Y] Florimond de Remond . . . . . is not accurate in the account he gives us of Ochinus.] He aſſerts (82) that this Monk leaving Geneva, retired to Zurich, whence he was baniſhed ſoon after, as alſo from Baſil.

(82) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 3. c. 5. p. m. 293, 294.

him Bzovius extracted the following particular, namely, that this Monk's wife was obliged to get her bread by following the trade of a laundreſs [Z]. But he has borrowed much more particulars ſtill, from the Annaliſt of the Capuchins. It is from him he tranſcribed a long account of the apoſtacy and pretended martyrdom of our Ochinus [AA]. This deſerves to be examined.

OCTAVIA,

ſil, of which Dudithius complains in his letter to Beza. That man being expelled from Switzerland, adds he, went into Germany, and thence into Poland. He wrote a book on Polygamy dedicated to King Sigiſmund II. He preached the ſame doctrine at Cracow, as Reſcius the Polander writes. The whole female ſex in thoſe quarters was not leſs concerned at this, than formerly the Roman ladies, when they found themſelves impoſed upon by young Papirius: ſo that poor Ochinus, who was accuſed of having left his wife at Geneva, though ſhe died of her fall, was forced to leave the city, and to retire into Tranſilvania. He publiſhed his dialogues, which have been ſince tranſlated into ſeveral languages. Caſtalio was the author of the Latin tranſlation. This whole account abounds with chronological errors, and other falſities; the Reader will be convinced of it, by reading what I have obſerved, either againſt Spondanus, or againſt Monſieur Varillas, or againſt other Writers who copied from Florimond de Remond, the chief Author whom the Roman Catholick Writers tranſcribe, when they ſpeak of the Reformers who lived in the XVIth Century.

[Z] . . . It is from him Bzovius extracted . . . that this Monk's wife was . . . a laundreſs.] Florimond de Remond is never merrier, than when he mentions the wives of the Monks. Let us hear him on the ſubject before us. When they came to Zurich and Baſil, ſays he (83), ſpeaking of Peter Martyr and Bernardinus Ochinus, their arrival thither was ſuſpicious. The people wondering to ſee theſe two eminent preachers, whoſe fame was ſpread over all Italy, come thither, feared leſt they ſhould be two crafty Sinons, who came ſlily into their city, with a deſign to hatch ſome treaſon, and to ſeduce their ſouls, after they had ſubdued them. But the company which Bernard Ochinus led with him, namely a young and beautiful Italian wench, whom he had debauched, having promiſed her marriage, and alſo the dreſs he appeared in, removed their fears. For inſtead of his hair-cloth, he wore a ſoldier's habit. In order to make an indiſſoluble contract with the Hereticks, he entered into articles with that girl, and married her. This is the Gordian knot, with which thoſe, whom the paſſions of pride and luſt drive from their convents, tye themſelves to that party. This Okinus † continued ſome time at Geneva with his wife, who was almoſt reduced to get a livelihood by the meaneſt and moſt contemptible labour: for they had both brought but a very little money with them. She was therefore Madam Okinus the laundreſs (84). . . Martyr took alſo (85) his nun with him, to comfort him in his labours and lucubrations. He did not do like Okinus, who being ſatiated with his laundreſs, got rid of her. For though Beza aſſerts that ſhe broke her neck, ſupporting his aſſertion by the teſtimony of Alciat, that other Arian, who did ſo much miſchief in Poland, yet there were ſome ſuſpicions that Okinus had haſtened her death; however they would not make any further inquiries into the matter, becauſe he had not yet declared himſelf an Arian, and behaved like a good brother in CHRIST. This is what that writer dares to aſſert, without giving the leaſt proof of it, or quoting any author whatſoever. So that I have no occaſion to criticiſe any further upon him.

(83) Ibid. p. 293.

† Thus Florimond de Remond ſpels our Author's name.

(84) Ibid. p. 296, 297.

(85) That is to ſay, when he ſet out for England.

Bzovius (86) has tranſcribed faithfully, and word for word, almoſt ſix pages (87) of the hiſtory of Peter Martyr and Bernardinus Ochinus, as he found them in Florimond de Remond (88). He has not omitted the paſſage, in which it is obſerved, that Martyr had the ſame inclinations with Luther, longing after the nuns, as it is the practice of thoſe who caſt off their Monk's habit. And ſince that time he always ſighed for thoſe recluſe maidens, who under a veil do much eaſier preſerve the beauty of their complection. But I wonder he did not tranſcribe that other paſſage (89); though Peter Martyr "was already loaded with years, he could "not yet curb the deſire of the fleſh: he went to "meet a nun at Geneva, whom the like deſires had "drove from her nunnery; her name was Catherine "Merande; ſhe had been recommended to him, ſo "that he married her. He cared for no other wo-"men, but ſuch as left their nunneries . . . . Brence "attacked him very ſeverely upon that account, and "Martyr being exaſperated at Brence's audaciouſ-"neſs, who had treated him after ſo unchriſtian a "manner, was preparing an anſwer to him; but "being quite ſpent with the fatigues, which it be-"came him to undergo in order to pleaſe his new "ſpouſe, he fell ſick and died in the ſame city of "Zurich."

(86) Bzovius, Annal. Tom. 20. p. 87, &c. ad ann. 1542. He quotes the Author he tranſcribes.

(87) That is to ſay of the edition in 4to, of Florimond de Remond

(88) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, Liv. 3. c. 5. p. 293.

(89) Ibid. p. 297.

Let us obſerve here, that if it were true that Ochinus paſſed the Alps with the perſon who was afterwards his wife, we ought to judge charitably that he conducted her into Switzerland, only becauſe he feared leſt ſhe would otherwiſe loſe the opportunity to retire from Babylon. For he would have been very ſilly, and too cautious, had he imagined that it was neceſſary to provide himſelf before hand againſt the want of women, when he was going into a Proteſtant country. Such a want is not to be feared there, no more than in any other country in the world. He muſt have been ſenſible, that in caſe it were neceſſary for him to marry at the age of fifty five, either that he might not be obliged to ſtruggle with the lewd deſire of nature, or in order to undeceive thoſe, who might have thought that he ſtill judged the monaſtick vows to be binding, there would not be wanting officious perſons, who would find him a wife. I do not believe there is one ſingle inſtance of a converted Monk, who continued unmarried for want of meeting with a woman willing to join in wedlock with him.

[AA] Bzovius has tranſcribed from the Annaliſt of the Capuchins a long account of the apoſtacy and pretended martyrdom of Ochinus.] I ſhall confine myſelf to what regards his martyrdom. Bzovius, tranſcribing the very words of Zachariah Boverius who wrote the Annals of the Capuchins, relates that Ochinus, living at Geneva, fell ſick there, and had ſuch remorſe as obliged him to ſend ſecretly for a curate of the neighbourhood, to whom he confeſſed his ſins, and begged of him to be admitted again into the pale of the Catholick Church, ſince he repented that he ever left it, and that he preached heretical doctrines for about fifteen years ſucceſſively (90). The curate adminiſtred him the ſacrament of penance, and repreſented to him that he was under an obligation to make a publick recantation of his hereſies. Ochinus promiſed he would do it as ſoon as he was recovered, or if he did not recover, that he would declare poſitively his converſion to his followers, and to all thoſe who would come to ſee him: Upon thoſe terms he received abſolution, and was readmitted into the pale of the Church. He wiſhed to take the Sacrament; but the Prieſt judging it was dangerous to bring him the Viaticum, comforted him with theſe words of St. Auguſtin, crede & manducaſti, believe, and you have eat it. Ochinus ſoon declar'd his converſion to thoſe of his followers who came to viſit him, and earneſtly exhorted them to forſake, like him, the Hereſies he had taught them. They imagined at firſt that he was light-headed: but finding afterwards that he was in his ſenſes, and talked very ſeriouſly, they gave the Magiſtrates notice of it, who commanded them to inquire of him whether he continued in thoſe ſentiments, and if he did, to kill him. His followers obey'd that command; for as ſoon as they had heard the fine diſcourſes he made to them concerning his repentance and converſion, they ſtabbed him in his bed. Others aſſert that he was dragged out of the City by the Magiſtrates command, and ſtoned to death (91). The Annaliſt of the Capuchins urges the teſtimonies of ſeven perſons, whoſe names and titles he ſets down. At the head of theſe ſeven witneſſes you ſee a Doge of Venice: the others are all perſons of note, conſiderable either by their birth, or by the employments they have had in Monaſteries: however none of them aſſert any thing elſe, but

(90) Take notice of this date; it would follow from thence, that Ochinus was murthered at Geneva in the year 1557, or thereabout; and it can be proved that he was baniſhed from Zurich in the year 1563.

(91) Quare mox illi arreptis pugionibus quos occultos geſtabant in lecto jacentem & manus ad Cœlos tendentem confodiunt. Alii vero eum Magiſtratus edicto extra Urbem raptatum, lapidibuſque obrutum fuiſſe tradunt. Bzovius, ad ann. 1542. num. 68. p. 96.

OCTAVIA, to whom Julius Cæsar was great uncle (a), was the sister of Augustus, and one of the most illustrius Ladies of antient Rome. She was first married to Claudius Marcellus, who was Consul the year of Rome 704, and who died a little after the war of Perusia. Soon after she married Mark Anthony [A]; the friends of both parties having promoted those nuptials (b), hoping that it would make the peace, which had been just before concluded between Augustus and Mark Anthony, lasting. This virtuous Lady was formed with a very happy disposition for that purpose; but Mark Anthony became so much enamoured with Cleopatra, and so great a slave to her charms, that he was quite lost to wisdom and conduct. Before he was so completely captivated by that Egyptian Queen, his wife's counsels were of great advantage to him (c). He left her in Italy (d) after he had had a conference at Tarentum with Augustus, anno 717, and returned into the East. Some time after she set out to meet him; and being informed by the letters she received from him, that he was desirous she should stop in Athens, she accordingly stopt there, till she had evidently found that her husband only made a fool of her. She then returned to Rome, and could not be prevailed upon by Augustus to leave her husband's palace; but continued to live there, and to take the same care of every thing, as though he had been the best of husbands (e). She was as affectionate to the children of Mark Anthony and Fulvia as before, and equally careful of their education (f). She would not for the world have consented, that the injurious treatment she met with from Mark Anthony should occasion a civil war (g); and, for that reason in obeying the order he sent her to quit her house, she burst into tears upon no other account (h), than because she saw that she should be considered as one of the causes of the war. This glorious behaviour of Octavia was, though very much against her inclination, of the highest prejudice to her husband (i); the Romans hating and despising Mark Anthony, when they saw him prefer, to her, a woman of Cleopatra's abandoned character [B]. 'Tis well known that Mark Anthony was completely ruined by this war. Fortune

(a) She was the daughter of Caius Octavius, and of Atia, daughter of Atius Balbus; and of Julia, sister to Julius Cæsar.

(b) Plutarch in Anton. p. 929.

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) Plutarch in Anton. p. 932.

(e) Idem, ibid. p. 940.

(f) Idem, ibid. p. 941.

(g) Idem, ibid. p. 940.

(h) Idem, ibid. p. 912.

(i) See remark [B] citat. (8).

but that he has heard so. To these testimonies is added what Beza has acknowledged (92), namely, that Ochinus shewed himself at last a very great hypocrite (93). But, as Theophilus Raynaud (94) has very well proved it by a letter of Beza (95), that hypocrisy did not consist in Ochinus's returning to popery, but in his asserting the heresy of the Anti-trinitarians, &c. Pray, observe with how little judgment the Monks compose the Chronicles of their Orders. There are positive and unquestionable proofs, that Ochinus retired with the Sectaries of Poland, and that he died in those parts; and yet the Capuchins make no scruple to publish that he died a Martyr of the Catholick religion at Geneva, and they think it strange that any person should question it, as we have seen above (96).

(92) Beza, in Iconibus, in Petro Martyre.

(93) Bzovius, ad ann. 1542. num. 70 & seq.

(94) Th. Raynaud, in Syntagm. de Libris propriis, num. 23. p. 42. Apopompæi.

(95) That which he wrote to Dudithius; see the remark [L].

(96) In the remark [O], quotation (48).

[A] Soon after she married Mark Anthony.] All widows were forbid, by the laws of Rome, to marry till ten months after the decease of their husbands; but Octavia was dispensed from this statute by a decree of the Senate (1). This the publick welfare required; the Romans having but too much cause to fear, that Mark Anthony and Augustus would engage in eternal contests, and prolong the civil war, if some good mediator did not preserve a good harmony between them; and nothing was thought so proper to bring about this happy mediation, as Mark Anthony and Octavia. 'Twas therefore concluded with all imaginable dispatch; they not waiting even till Octavia was brought to bed (2). 'Twas hoped that her prudence and beauty would be productive to the most happy effects. Τοῦτον ἅπαντες εἰσηγοῦντο τὸν γάμον, ἐλπίζοντες τὴν Ὀκταβίαν, ἐπὶ κάλλει τοσούτῳ σεμνότητα καὶ νοῦν ἔχουσαν, εἰς ταυτὸ τῷ Ἀντωνίῳ παραγενομένην, καὶ στέρξειν εἰκὸς, τοιαύτην γυναῖκα, πάντων πραγμάτων αὐτοῖς σωτηρίαν ἔσεσθαι καὶ σύγκρασιν (3); i. e. "Every one "was for promoting this match, from a supposition "that Octavia, whose exquisite beauty was heightened by gravity and prudence, when married to "Anthony, would certainly enflame him with her "numberless charms, and consequently bring about "a most happy and lasting peace." These nuptials were solemnized the year of Rome 714 (4). Three years after, the hopes of the Romans were fulfilled. Augustus was carrying on a war against Pompey's son, and was to have been succoured by Mark Anthony. The last mentioned returned from the East into Italy, not so much with a design of assisting Augustus, as to enquire into the state of affairs, and to take advantage of the conjunctures at that time. Their correspondence lessened daily; they complained of each other; and there was but too just reason to fear, lest their jealousy should rise still higher; but Octavia imployed so much skill in her endeavours to reconcile them, that she at last succeeded (5). Plutarch is much more circumstantial in this affair than Dion. He relates, that after these Triumvirs had concluded a peace with Pompey's son, the one continued in Italy, and the other went, with his wife Octavia, into Greece. Mark Anthony spent the winter with her in Athens; and having been exasperated against Augustus by some ill reports which were spread, he set sail towards Italy; and being refused entrance into the harbour of Brundusium, he went ashore at Tarentum, whence he sent Octavia to Augustus. This Lady met her brother by the way, and affected him to such a degree, that he was quite pacified and went to Tarentum, where the interview between him and his brother-in-law was heightened by a thousand demonstrations of Friendship. Plutarch's words are as follow: Ἡ δὲ ἀπαντήσασα καθ' ὁδὸν Καίσαρι, καὶ παραλαβοῦσα τῶν ἐκείνου φίλων Ἀγρίππαν καὶ Μαικηνᾶν ἐντυγχάνει, πολλὰ πονηρευομένη καὶ πολλὰ δεομένη μὴ περιιδεῖν αὐτὴν ἐκ μακαριωτάτης γυναικὸς ἀθλιωτάτην γενομένην. νῦν μὲν γὰρ ἅπασιν ἀνθρώποις εἰς αὐτὴν ἀποβλέπειν, αὐτοκρατόροιν δυοῖν, τὸν μὲν γυναῖκα, τὸν δὲ ἀδελφὴν οὖσαν. Εἰ δὲ τὰ χείρω κρατήσειεν, (ἔφη) καὶ γένοιτο πόλεμος, ὑμῶν μὲν ἄδηλον ὁτῳ κρατεῖν ἢ κρατεῖσθαι πέπρωται, τὰ ἐμὰ δὲ ἀμφοτέρως ἄθλια. τούτοις ἐπικλασθεὶς ὁ Καῖσαρ, ἦκεν εἰρηνικῶς εἰς Τάραντα (6). i. e. "Octavia meeting Cæsar by the "way, had a conference with him, together with his "friends Agrippa and Mecænas. She conjured him "in the most pathetic terms, not to let her, from being the most happy of her sex, become the most "wretched. For now, says she, the whole world "looks upon me as related to two Emperors; the one "as wife, the other's sister; but if pernicious counsels, added she, should prevail, and a war break "out, 'tis doubtful which of you two would conquer; "but my fate would either way be wretched. Cæsar being overcome by these words, came to Tarentum quite pacified."

(1) Plutarch in Anton. p. 929, 930.

(2) Dio, Lib. 48. p. m. 429. ad ann. 714.

(3) Plut. ibid. p. 829. [F].

(4) According to Calvisius, ann. 713.

(5) See Dion, Lib. 49. fub fin.

(6) Plutarch in Anton. p. 931. [E].

[B] The Romans hating and detesting Mark Anthony, when they saw him prefer to her a woman of Cleopatra's abandoned character.] Those who had seen Cleopatra, were more surprized than the others at Mark Anthony's infatuation; they not finding her to be younger or more beautiful than Octavia. He consequently shewed a great deal of folly in not preferring Octavia to her, as this latter was infinitely her superior in virtue and wisdom. Ῥωμαῖοι δὲ οὐκτιρον οὐκ ἐκείνην ἀλλ' Ἀντώνιον, καὶ μᾶλλον οἱ Κλεοπάτραν ἑωρακότες, ὅτε κάλλει τῆς Ὀκταβίας ὅτε ὥρᾳ διαφέρουσαν. Populum vero Romanum miserebat non ita illius (Octaviæ), ut Antonii, atque impensius eos qui Cleopatram viderant, neque forma Octaviæ neque ætatis flore præcellentem (7). The admi-

(7) Plutarch in Anton. p. 942 [D].

tune ſeemed to flatter Octavia with the proſpect of the higheſt worldly felicity. She had a ſon, a moſt accompliſhed youth, who married Auguſtus's daughter, and was conſidered as the preſumptive heir of the Empire: but he died in the bloom of his years [C], which afflicted his mother to ſo violent a degree, that ſhe continued for ever inconſolable admiration in which the Romans held Octavia, who did all the good offices in her power to the children and friends of her huſband, without reſenting in any manner the ill treatment ſhe met with from him, did great prejudice to Mark Anthony; ſo that this illuſtrious Lady, contrary to her intentions, expoſed him prodigiouſly to the hatred of the Romans. Ἄκυρα δὲ ἐγένετο διὰ τοῦτον Ἀντώνιον· ἐμίσουν γὰρ ἀδικῶν τοιαύτην. Enimvero hiſce rebus effecit invita Antonio. Invidia namque flagrabat, quod talem fœminam violaret (8). And indeed it is ſaid, that the only reaſon which prevailed with Auguſtus to conſent that Octavia ſhould go to her huſband, was, his ſuppoſing that ſhe would meet with ſome ſignal ill uſage from him; and he knew very well, that this would be conſidered by the Romans as a juſt cauſe for him to light up the war anew. To this I may add, that he did not doubt but ſuch a conduct would exaſperate the Romans in the higheſt degree againſt Mark Anthony. Ἐν δὲ Ῥώμῃ βουλομένης Ὀκταβίας πλεῦσαι πρὸς Ἀντώνιον ἐπέτρεψε Καῖσαρ, ὡς οἱ πλείους λέγουσιν οὐκ ἐκείνῃ χαριζόμενος, ἀλλ' ὅπως περιωδυρισθεῖσα καὶ καταμεληθεῖσα, πρὸς τὸν πόλεμον αἰτίαν εὐπρεπῆ παράσχοι. Romæ inſtituenti ad Antonium navigare Octaviæ annuit Cæſar, non, ut plerique tradunt, quo illi indulgeret: verùm quo contumelia affecta deſpectaque colorem præberet bello movendo honeſtum (9). What good opinion ſoever Cleopatra entertained of her charms, ſhe yet dreaded thoſe of Octavia in a prodigious degree; for which reaſon ſhe had recourſe to the moſt ſtudied artifices, in order to perſuade Mark Anthony not to let her come near him. Αἰσθομένη δὲ ἡ Κλεοπάτρα τὴν Ὀκταβίαν ὁμόσε χωροῦσαν αὐτῇ, καὶ φοβηθεῖσα μὴ τῷ τρόπῳ τῇ σεμνότητι καὶ τῇ Καίσαρος δυνάμει προσκλησαμένη τὸ καθ' ἡδονὴν ὁμιλεῖν καὶ θεραπεύειν Ἀντώνιον, ἅμαχος γένηται, καὶ κρατήσῃ παντάπασι τοῦ ἀνδρὸς, ἐρᾶν αὐτὴ προσεποιεῖτο τοῦ Ἀντωνίου. At Cleopatra conferre ſecum pedem animadvertens Octaviam, veritaque ne cum gravitate morum & Cæſaris potentia placidam adjungens conſuetudinem & Antonii obſervantiam, inſuperabilis eſſet & ſemel potiretur viro, deperire ſimulabat ſe Antonii amore (10). She made her inamorato believe, that it would be impoſſible for her to live in caſe he ſhould abandon her; ſhe repreſented to him, that it was enough for Octavia to be a lawful wife; whilſt Cleopatra, Queen of ſo mighty a nation, went by no other name but that of Concubine; a name which yet ſhe would ſubmit to (11), provided that Mark Anthony's abſence did not plunge her into deſpair. Ὀκταβίαν μὲν . . . τὸ τῆς γαμετῆς ὄνομα καρπώσασθαι· Κλεοπάτραν δὲ, τοσούτων ἀνθρώπων βασιλεύουσαν, ἐρωμένην Ἀντωνίου καλεῖσθαι· καὶ τοῦνομα τοῦτο μὴ φεύγειν μηδ' ἀπαξιοῦν ἕως ὁρᾷν ἐκεῖνον ἕξοι καὶ συζῇν, ἀπελαυνομένην δὲ τούτου μὴ περιδώσεσθαι. Octaviam enim . . . nomine frui uxoris. Cleopatram verò, tam multorum reginam mortalium, pellicem Antonii nominari: neque eam hoc defugere vel dedignari nomen, quoad aſpicere illum & una liceat vivere: quo ſi orbaretur, non ducturam ultra ſpiritum (12). Mark Anthony's friends adviſed him to ſend Cleopatra back into Egypt, ſhe having followed him as far as Epheſus, where all things ſeemed to ſpeak a moſt fatal rupture; but fearing leſt Octavia ſhould once again reconcile her brother with her huſband, Φοβουμένη τὰς δι' Ὀκταβίας πάλιν αὐτῷ διαλύσεις, Novam interprete Octavia timens reconciliationem (13), ſhe bribed a certain perſon, who perſuaded Mark Anthony to take her along with him whitherſoever he might go. So great was her emulation, that being in Athens where Octavia had received the higheſt honours, ſhe was extremely liberal to the people, in hopes of obtaining the like (14).

(8) Plutarch in Anton. p. 941.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 940 [B].

(10) Idem, ibid. [C].

(11) Compare this with what Heloiſe ſaid in the remark [U] of her article.

(12) Plutarch in Anton. p. 942 [D].

(13) Idem, bid. p. 941 [F].

(14) Idem, ibid. p. 942 [C].

[C] Her ſon died in the bloom of his years.] This was Marcus Claudius Marcellus. His elogium was introduced with ſuch exquiſite ſkill into the Æneid, and turned in ſo wonderful a manner, that the moſt ſtupid reader muſt neceſſarily be ſtruck with it. I have read it above an hundred times, and never without tranſports of admiration; and upon my reading it again, the inſtant I am writing, it appears more beautiful than ever. Several excellent Judges have aſſured me that they are of the ſame mind. I am therefore perſuaded that my Readers will excuſe me for tranſcribing the whole upon this occaſion.

Atque hic Æneas (unâ namque ire videbat
Egregium formâ juvenem, & fulgentibus armis;
Sed frons læta parùm, & dejecto lumina vultu)
Quis, pater, ille, virum qui ſic comitatur euntem?
Filius? an-ne aliquis magnâ de ſtirpe nepotum?
Quis ſtrepitus circa comitum! quantum inſtar in ipſo eſt!
Sed nox atra caput triſti circumvolat umbrâ.
Tum pater Anchiſes lacrymis ingreſſus obortis:
O nate, ingentem luctum ne quære tuorum.
Oſtendent terris hunc tantum fata; neque ultra
Eſſe ſinent: nimium vobis Romana propago
Viſa potens, Superi, propria hæc ſi dona fuiſſent.
Quantos ille virûm magnam Mavortis ad urbem
Campus aget gemitus! vel quæ, Tiberine, videbis
Funera, cum tumulum præterlabêre recentem!
Nec puer Iliacâ quiſquam de gente Latinos
In tantum ſpe tollet avos: nec Romula quondam
Ullo ſe tantum tellus jactabit alumno.
Heu pietas, heu priſca fides, invictaque bello
Dextera! non illi quiſquam ſe impunè tuliſſet
Obvius armato; ſeu cùm pedes iret in hoſtem;
Seu ſpumantis equi foderet calcaribus armos.
Heu miſerande puer! ſi quâ fata aſpera rumpas,
Tu Marcellus eris: manibus date lilia plenis:
Purpureos ſpargam flores, animamque nepotis
Hic ſaltem accumulem donis, & fungar inani
Munere (15).

(15) Virgil. Æneid. Lib. 6. verſe 860, &c.

" Æneas, here, beheld of form divine
" A God-like youth, in glitt'ring armour ſhine:
" With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
" But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face.
" He ſaw, and, wond'ring, aſk'd his airy guide,
" What, and of whence he was, who preſs'd the " hero's ſide?
" His ſon, or one of his illuſtrious name,
" How like the former, and almoſt the ſame:
" Obſerve the crowds that compaſs him around;
" All gaze, and all admire, and raiſe a ſhouting
" ſound:
" But hov'ring miſts around his brows are ſpread,
" And night, with ſable ſhades, involves his head.
" Seek not to know (the ghoſt reply'd with tears)
" The ſorrows of thy ſons in future years.
" This youth (the bliſsful viſion of a day)
" Shall juſt be ſhewn on earth, and ſnatch'd away.
" The Gods too high had rais'd the Roman ſtate,
" Were but their gifts as permanent as great.
" What groans of men ſhall fill the martial field!
" How fierce a blaze his flaming pile ſhall yield!
" What fun'ral pomp ſhall floating Tiber ſee,
" When, riſing from his bed, he views the ſad
" ſolemnity!
" No youth ſhall equal hopes of glory give:
" No youth afford ſo great a cauſe to grieve.
" The Trojan honour, and the Roman boaſt;
" Admir'd when living, and ador'd when loſt!
" Mirror of antient faith, in early youth!
" Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!
" No foe unpuniſh'd in the fighting field,
" Shall dare thee, foot to foot, with ſword and
" ſhield.
" Much leſs, in arms, oppoſe thy matchleſs force,
" When thy ſharp ſpurs ſhall urge the foaming
" horſe.
" Ah, cou'dſt thou break through fate's ſevere
" decree,
" A new Marcellus ſhall ariſe in thee!
" Full caniſters of fragrant lilies bring,
" Mix'd with the purple roſes of the ſpring:
" Let me with funeral flowers his body ſtrow,
" This gift which parents to their children owe,
" This unavailing gift at leaſt I may beſtow.

Dryden.

The Emperor and Octavia burſt into tears at the reading

ble [D]. Octavia withdrew to a deep ſolitude, where, in the deepeſt melancholy, ſhe ſpent the remainder of her days. She died in 744 (k), leaving two daughters ſhe had brought Mark Anthony, and who both married to very great advantage (l). Thoſe who ſay that ſhe was not Auguſtus's ſiſter by the mother's ſide, are miſtaken [E].

(k) Dio, Lib. 54. p. 625.

(l) See the article ANTONIA.

OCTAVIA,

reading of theſe verſes; and Virgil was obliged to inform them the book was near ending, otherwiſe they would not have let him go on. He was rewarded in a very ſplendid manner. Et conſtat hunc librum tanta pronuntiatione Auguſto & Octaviæ eſſe recitatum, ut fletu nimio imperarent ſilentium; niſi Virgilius finem eſſe dixiſſet, qui pro hoc ære gravi donatus eſt, id eſt, maſſis (16). Others ſay that Octavia fainted away at theſe words, (16) Servius, in Æneid. Lib. 6. verſe 862.

Tu Marcellus eris——

i. e. A new Marcellus ſhall ariſe in thee, and that was with the greateſt difficulty ſhe was recovered: after which ſhe rewarded the Poet with a conſiderable ſum for every verſe. Tres omnino libros recitavit, ſecundum videlicet, quartum & ſextum, ſed hunc præcipue ob Octaviam, quæ cum recitationi intereſſet, ad illos de filio ſuo verſus, Tu Marcellus eris, defeciſſe fertur atque ægrè refocillata, dena ſeſtertia pro ſingulo verſu Virgilio dari juſſit (17). Marcellus died the year of Rome 731 (18). Authors are univerſally agreed that he died very young, but few give his exact age. This Propertius has done (19), he declaring him to have been twenty, in which he ſeems to write with more truth than Servius, who ſays he was but eighteen (20). Glandorpius is miſtaken, in affirming that Servius ſaid he was twenty three (21). He aſſerts, elſewhere (22), without citing any author, that Marcellus died at twenty four years of age.

(17) Donatus, in Vita Virgil.

(18) Dio, Lib. 53. circa fin.

(19) Propert. Eleg. 17. Lib. 3.

(20) Servius, in Virgil. Æn. Lib. 6. verſe 862.

(21) Gland. Onomaſt. p. 233.

(22) Ibid. p. 434.

[D] . . . She continued for ever inconſolable.] In my opinion, the particulars of her affliction were worth the notice of all thoſe hiſtorians who mention her and her ſon; they being ſo vaſtly ſingular that they have almoſt the air of a prodigy. Octavia grew ſo ſick of the world, that ſhe ſought for nothing but ſolitude, and ſhe even was diſpleaſed at her brother's glory. The being a mother was enough to become the object of her indignation. She did not keep any portrait of her ſon; would never hear him mentioned, and rejected all the verſes which were made in honour of his memory (23). Seneca is the only author, who informs us of theſe particulars: and he is ſo circumſtantial on this occaſion, that his words deſerve to be tranſcribed. Octavia Marcellum, cui & avunculus & ſocer incumbere cæperat, in quem onus imperii reclinare: adoleſcentem animo alacrem, ingenio potentem; ſed & frugalitatis continentiæque in illis aut annis aut opibus non mediocriter admirandum; patientem laborum, voluptatibus alienum; quantumcumque imponere illi avunculus, & (ut ita dicam) inædificare voluiſſet, laturum. Benè legerat nulli ceſſura ponderi fundamenta. Nullum finem, per omne vitæ ſuæ tempus, fiendi gemendique fecit: nec ullas admiſit voces, ſalutare aliquid afferentes: ne avocari quidem ſe paſſa eſt. Intenta in unam rem, & toto animo affixa, talis per omnem vitam fuit, qualis in funere: non dico non auſa conſurgere, ſed allevari recuſans: ſecundam orbitatem judicans, lacrimas omittere. Nullam habere imaginem filii cariſſimi voluit, nullam ſibi fieri de illo mentionem. Oderat omnes matres, & in Liviam maximè furebat: quia videbatur ad illius filium tranſiſſe, ſibi promiſſa felicitas. Tenebris & ſolitudini familiariſſima, ne ad fratrem quidem reſpiciens, carmina celebrandæ Marcelli memoriæ compoſita, alioſque ſtudiorum honores rejecit, & aures ſuas adverſus omne ſolatium clauſit, à ſolemnibus officiis ſeducta, & ipſam magnitudinis fraternæ nimis circumlucentem fortunam exoſa, defodit ſe, & abdidit. Aſſidentibus liberis, nepotibus, lugubrem veſtem non depoſuit; non ſine contumeliâ omnium ſuorum, quibus ſalvis orba ſibi videbatur (24), i. e. "Octavia bewailed with tears, ſo long as ſhe lived, the "death of Marcellus, on whoſe ſhoulders his uncle "and father-in-law was thinking to lay the bur-"then of Empire: a youth of a chearful diſpoſition, "and a very ſtrong genius. So great was his tempe-"rance and reſerve, that it was juſtly the ſubject of ad-"miration in one ſo young and of ſuch high quality; "he was patient under toils, and averſe to pleaſures; "and able to ſupport all that his uncle might be de-"ſirous of laying, or (if I may uſe the expreſſion) of "building upon him. Such foundations were laid as "could never be ſhaken. She would not allow any "perſon to adminiſter the leaſt conſolation to her, "nor could be prevailed with to take the leaſt diver-"ſion. Having fixed her whole mind and ſoul on "this ſingle object, ſuch was her deportment through-"out the whole courſe of her life, as if ſhe had "been at a funeral; I don't ſay not daring to riſe, "but refuſing to be lifted up; imagining that, were "ſhe to refrain from tears, it would be a ſecond loſs "to her. She would not have any image or por-"trait of her deareſt ſon, nor allow the leaſt mention "to be made of him. She had all mothers in ab-"horrence; but directed her rage chiefly againſt "Livia, becauſe the happineſs ſhe had promiſed her-"ſelf ſeemed to be transferred to her ſon. Solitude "and darkneſs were her delight, not having any re-"gard for her brother. She rejected all poems wrote "in honour of Marcellus's memory, and compliments "of every kind. She was deaf to all conſolation, "withdrawing from every ſort of ſolemnity; and "abhorring even her brother's too dazzling great-"neſs, ſhe hid, and buried herſelf. She appeared in "her weeds, before her children and grandchildren; "a circumſtance that gave great diſguſt to her family; "as though ſhe had ſeemed to be bereaved of them, "notwithſtanding they were living and well."

(23) This does not agree with what I mentioned in the foregoing remark.

(24) Senec. Conſol. ad Marciam, c. 2. p. m. 736, 737.

[E] Thoſe who ſay that ſhe was not Auguſtus's ſiſter by the mother's ſide, are miſtaken.] Plutarch has committed this error. He imagines that our Octavia was the daughter of Ancharia, firſt wife of Caius Octavius; and that Atia, ſecond wife of this Octavius, was Auguſtus's mother (25). But the contrary may be ſhewn many ways. Glandorpius (26) furniſhes two very good ones, the firſt being founded on a paſſage of Cicero, and the ſecond on a paſſage of Dion. The latter ſays that Caius Marcellus made Conſul in 703 (27), was Julius Cæſar's enemy though his relation by marriage. Τῷ Καίσαρι καίπερ ἐξ ἐπιγαμίας προσήκων ἐχθρὸς ἦν. Cæſaris quamquam cum eo ipſi affinitas intercedebat, inimicus erat (28). Now this kindred or relation aroſe from this Marcellus's marriage with Octavia. His wife muſt therefore have been Atius's daughter; for had ſhe been Ancharia's daughter, ſhe would not have been Julius Cæſar's relation. Had Glandorpius confirmed this by a paſſage from Suetonius, his proof would have amounted to a demonſtration. Suetonius informs us, that Julius Cæſar was deſirous of marrying Octavia, the wife of Caius Marcellus, and his ſiſter's grandaughter; that he was deſirous, I ſay, of marrying her to Pompey. Ad retinendam autem Pompeji neceſſitudinem ac voluntatem, Octaviam ſororis ſuæ neptem, quæ C. Marcello nupta erat, conditione ei detulit (29). With regard to the paſſage in Cicero, it informs us that Lucius Philippus was married to a woman of Aricia, who had a daughter married to Caius Marcellus. This wife of Lucius Philippus was Auguſtus's mother (30). 'Tis therefore indiſputably true, that the wife of Caius Marcellus was that Emperor's ſiſter by the mother's ſide; for, to uſe the words of a Journaliſt, no perſon can ever think it falſe, that the wife of this Marcellus was the daughter of that Philip's wife, ſince 'tis ridiculous to ſuppoſe, that Cicero had made ſuch an aſſertion in open Senate, without well knowing it to be a truth (31). 'Tis in the third Philippic that Cicero ſays this. Doubtleſs Lucius Philippus, and Caius Marcellus, were preſent when he ſpoke it, as Perizonius obſerves (32), Sed hoc clariſſimi viri viderint, L. Philippus qui habet Aricinam uxorem, C. Marcellus qui Aricinæ filiam: quos certo ſcio dignitatis optimarum feminarum non pœnitere (33), i. e. "But let thoſe "illuſtrious men look to this; L. Philippus, whoſe "wife is of Aricia, and C. Marcellus, who mar-"ried an Arician's daughter; who, I am certain "entertain no mean idea of the dignity of thoſe "excellent women." In this manner Cicero ends his anſwer to an objection of Mark Anthony againſt Octavia; an objection, I ſay, grounded on Octavia's mother being born in Aricia (34). Ignobilitatem objicit C, Cæſæris filio: cujus etiam naturalis pater, ſi

(25) Plut. in Anton. p. 929 [D].

(26) Gland. Onomaſt. p. 86.

(27) 704, according to others.

(28) Dio, Lib. 40. p. 166.

(29) Sueton. in Cæſare, c. 27.

(30) Sueton. in Auguſt. c. 8.

(31) Nouv. de la Republique des Lettres, June 1685. article 1. p. 597.

(32) Animadv. Hiſt. p. 116.

(33) Cic. Philipp. 3. p. m. 782.

(34) Idem, ib. p. 781.

OCTAVIA, daughter of the imperial Claudius and Meſſalina, was born the year of Rome 795 [A]. She was bethrothed very young to Lucius Silanus; but this contract was broke by the ambitious artifices of Agrippina, who was deſirous of marrying Octavia to Nero her ſon. It was neceſſary to make uſe of ſome ſpecious pretences on this occaſion, and ſome were found. Vitellius, an artful courtier and great flatterer, undertook to do this; and accordingly drew up a ſpacious accuſation [B], by virtue of which he diveſted vita ſuppeditaſſet, Conſul factus eſſet. Aricina mater. Suetonius's teſtimony is expreſs againſt Plutarch. Decedens Macedonia (C. Octavius) prius quam profiteri ſe candidatum conſulatus poſſet, morte obiit repentina, ſuperſtitibus liberis, Octavia majore, quam ex Ancharia: & Octavia minore; item Auguſto, quos ex Atia tulerat (35), i. e. "Caius Octavius leaving "Macedon, before he could ſet up as a Candidate "for the Conſulate, was ſnatched away ſuddenly; "leaving the following iſſue, the elder Octavia "whom Ancharia had brought him; and Octavia "the younger, with Auguſtus, his children by his "wife Atia." See Perizonius, who has ſet all theſe reaſons in a fair light, to ſhew the error of Plutarch, which was followed by Antoninus Auguſtinus, Juſtus Lipſius, and ſome other Literati (36). The author of Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres expatiated very much on this criticiſm, in giving the extract of Perizonius's work. But he committed a conſiderable miſtake, in ſaying that Marcellus's wife was the daughter of Aricina (37). This expreſſion ſignifies that Aricina was the name of that Lady's family, which is abſolutely falſe, it being only an epithet given her becauſe ſhe was born in Aricia. The learned Manutius affirms, that Octavius's mother was not born there; and wonders how ſhe came to have ſuch a ſirname. Miror autem Aricinam Atiam eſſe dictam, cum nec ipſa nec pater ejus Balbus Ariciæ natus eſſet, fuit enim, Suetonio teſte, paterna ſtirpe Aricinus (38), i. e. "I wonder how Atia happened to be called a "native of Aricia, ſince neither herſelf, nor Balbus "her father, were born in Aricia; he being an "Arician by the father's ſide, according to Sueto-"nius." But he is greatly in the wrong in ſpeaking after this manner; for if Atius and his daughter had not been natives of Aricia, Cicero could not have failed to make uſe of that proof, in order to convict of an untruth, Mark Anthony, who upbraided Octavius's mother with being born in that country. He was too well ſkilled in the art of refuting, and too dextrous in taking advantages of the moſt inconſiderable circumſtances, to have overlooked ſo flagrant a falſhood in his adverſary. Since therefore he grants the matter of fact, and only refutes the conſequence which Mark Anthony had drawn from it; we cannot doubt but that Manutius had made a very falſe remark on this occaſion. But then, will it be objected, where will become of the paſſage from Suetonius? I anſwer, that it reſembles a phraſe frequently enough employed by the French writers. They ſay that ſuch a man is originaire (ſprung from) ſuch a place (39); and mean, not only that his anceſtors were born there, but likewiſe himſelf. I own that this expreſſion is not very accurate in the laſt ſenſe. Originaire, in writers who pretend to be extremely correct, relates only to a man's father, grandfather, &c. But who will pretend to ſay that Suetonius ever ſet up for a very accurate writer?

Perizonius has juſtly cenſured Triſtan, who imagined that the mother of Marcellus, Auguſtus's ſon-in-law, was not married to Mark Anthony. He grounds his aſſertion on the paſſage of Seneca, relating to the deep affliction, with which that Lady was ſeized on account of her dear ſon. Whatever is here ſaid of Octavia, ſays Triſtan (40), after citing the paſſage in queſtion from Seneca, cannot, in my opinion, be any ways underſtood of her (of the two Octavia's, ſiſter to Auguſtus) whoſe ſecond husband was Mark Anthony. For that ſo ſingular and ſavage a way of life, of a woman, who was every day drowned in tears, and who eclipſed the ſplendor and luſtre of her auguſt houſe, in darkneſs, retirement, and in ſhunning, to the utmoſt of her power, company and light, covering her ceaſeleſs grief with mournful weeds; cannot be reconciled with what hiſtory relates concerning her marriage with Mark Anthony; of what followed thereupon; of the honours and extreme affliction which Auguſtus had for her; of the great honours which was paid her elſewhere, particularly in Corinth, where, as Pauſanias informs us in his Corinthiaca, a temple was built to her; with the reputation ſhe enjoyed and deſerved, viz. of being a brave, conſtant, and virtuous wife; and of bringing up the ſeven children whom Mark Anthony had by her and Cleopatra (41), as though they had been her own, though he had put her from him. To conclude, with all the honourable particulars related concerning her in hiſtory. His opinion is therefore, that the oldeſt of Auguſtus's ſiſters was married to Marcellus, and fell into the diſconſolate ſtate mentioned by Seneca, and that the youngeſt married Mark Anthony. Now this is a falſe ſuppoſition, and raiſing ſcruples about a mere trifle; for had he but called to mind, that Octavia was married to Mark Anthony, almoſt ſeventeen years before the death of young Marcellus, he might very eaſily have reconciled Seneca with the other authors (42). In the Journal des Savans (43) is a learned Diſſertation on the true degree of conſanguinity, between Auguſtus and Octavia, communicated to the Journaliſt by an able antiquary (44), and a man of honour. In that diſſertation he ſets the truth in the cleareſt light; but is a little miſtaken in ſtating Triſtan's objection. The Octavia of Marcellus, ſays he (45), whom Suetonius calls young Octavia †, had already been propoſed for a wife to Pompey by her great uncle; ſo that ſhe was twice conſidered as an inſtrument of reconciliation. This furniſhes us with an anſwer to the objection made by ſome moderns, who, becauſe they read in Seneca §, that the widow of Marcellus was inconſolable, after her husband's death, declare that ſhe was not afterwards married to Mark Anthony; it being well known, that perſons of ſuch exalted quality are commonly victims to the government. Octavia, in ſpite of her grief, was forced to conſent to this ſecond marriage for the good of the publick, and her brother's intereſt; and 'tis highly probable, that 'twas merely from a political view Mark Anthony was prompted to marry a woman, whoſe extraction he had inveigh'd againſt: accordingly, he abandoned her ſoon after, to devote himſelf entirely to Cleopatra. 'Tis plain this writer ſuppoſes, that Triſtan quoted Seneca to prove that this abovementioned Lady was inconſolable for her huſband's death. Nevertheleſs he does not quote him, and ought not to be quoted upon any account, but to ſhew the deep affliction into which her ſon's death threw her. 'Tis alſo plain, that he ſuppoſes that Octavia named, with the utmoſt reluctance, Mark Anthony, in the afflicted ſtated in which ſhe is drawn by Seneca. But if the Reader conſults the laſt mentioned Author, he will find this ſuppoſition entirely groundleſs.

[A] She . . . was born the year of Rome 795.] If we may credit Tacitus; but there is ſome reaſon to believe he is miſtaken. He relates (1) that Octavia was in her twentieth year, when ſhe was put to death; and that this was under the Conſulate of P. Marius and L. Aſinius, i. e. the year of Rome 815. This implies therefore, that ſhe was born in the year 795: but ſince he has fixed (2) her marriage with Nero, under the Conſulſhip of D. Junius and Q. Haterius, i. e. the year of Rome 806, we muſt conclude that ſhe was then, at leaſt, twelve years of age, and conſequently that ſhe was born in the year 794. Add to this, that her father betrothed her to Silanus, in the firſt year of his reign (3), i. e. the year of Rome 793; and that Suetonius gives us to underſtand that Britannicus was born after her (4). Now Britannicus was born the twentieth day of his father's empire (5).

[B] Vitellius, an artful courtier . . . drew up a ſpecious accuſation.] One of the moſt advantageous qualities a courtier can poſſeſs, is to foreſee, from far, thoſe perſons, for whom fortune is preparing her moſt ſhining favours; for the ſervices which are done them beforehand, whilſt they are aggrandizing themſelves, (35) Suet. in Auguſt. c. 4.

(36) Jac. Perizon. Animadv. Hiſt. p. 116, & ſeq.

(37) Nouv. de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1685, article 1. p. 597.

(38) Paulus Manut. in Cicer. Philipp. 3. p. m. 782.

(39) Moreri often employs that phraſe.

(40) Triſtan. Comment. Hiſtoriques, vol. 1. p. 54.

(41) Why does not Triſtan take ſome notice of the children of Mark Anthony and Fulvia, brought up by Octavia? How comes he to be ignorant of what Plutarch ſays in Antonio, p. 955. that, of the ſeven children whom Mark Anthony left behind him (including the two daughters whom Octavia had brought him) the eldeſt was killed by Auguſtus, and the other ſix were brought up by Octavia?

(42) See Perizonius, Animadv. Hiſtoric. p. 120. and the Nouv. de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1685, art. 1. p. 598.

(43) Of January 21, 1686, p. 25 & ſeq. Dutch edit.

(44) Mr. Rainſſant, Phyſician in Rheims, Keeper of the medals in the King's cabinet.

(45) Journal des Savans, for Jan. 21, 1686, p. 27, 28.

† Suet. Jul. 27.

§ Senec. Conſ. ad Marc.

(1) Tacitus, Annal. Lib. 14. c. 64.

(2) Idem, Annal. Lib. 12. c. 58.

(3) Dio, Lib. 60. p. 668. cited by Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. 1. p. 1019.

(4) Suetonius in Claudio, c. 28.

(5) Idem, ibid.

diveſted Silanus of his ſenatorial Dignity. Octavia was betrothed ſoon after to Agrippina's ſon, and was married to him when he had attained his ſixteenth year (a): but becauſe Claudius had adopted him, ſhe was transferred to another family by a ſimulated adoption (b); otherwiſe this would have been an inceſtuous marriage. She was very unhappy in it, her huſband immediately entertaining an averſion for her [C], and divorcing her upon pretence that ſhe was barren. Poppea, who married him the inſtant after, ſuborned a man, who accuſed Octavia of being engaged in a criminal correſpondence with one of her ſlaves (c). Accordingly the female attendants of that Princeſs were put to the torture, to oblige them to inform againſt their miſtreſs. Some of them, unable to bear up under the violence of the torments, accuſed her; but the greateſt part of them had the courage to pronounce her innocent; and one of them employed a very particular expreſſion on that occaſion [D]. However, Octavia was baniſhed, and a ſtrong guard ſet ſelves, aſpire them with greater gratitude, than for thoſe ſervices which are done them when they are raiſed to the zenith of power and authority. Vitellius had the talent to foreſee thoſe perſons whom fortune prepared for future grandeur. By this talent he knew that the Emperor Claudius would marry Agrippina, and that ſhe would manage her conſort as ſhe pleaſed. The artifices of the wife, and the huſband's imbecillity, were ſure foundations for this prognoſtic. 'Tis therefore no wonder, that Vitellius ſet every engine at work to ruin Silanus, for Agrippina's intereſt required him to fall a ſacrifice. She wanted Octavia to be at liberty to be betrothed to Nero; and, before this could be done, it was neceſſary to diſengage her from her contract with Silanus. Silanus had a ſiſter very famous for her beauty and gaiety. There were no proofs that he had enjoy'd her perſon; but then he had not taken the leaſt care to conceal the paſſion he had for her. This gave Vitellius an opportunity of diveſting him of the ſenatorial dignity; for being Cenſor, he was impowered by his office to remove all perſons who behaved ill. The inſtant Silanus had been thus diſgraced, Claudius broke off the match, and obliged Silanus to diveſt himſelf of the Pretorſhip. But Tacitus's words give a nobler account than I can of this affair. Igitur Vitellius nomine Cenſoris ſerviles fallacias obtegens, ingruentiumque dominationum proviſor, quo gratiam Agrippinæ pararet, conſiliis ejus implicari, ferere crimina in Silanum, cui ſane decora & procax ſoror Junia Calvina haud multum ante Vitellii nurus fuerat: hinc initium accuſationis, fratrumque non inceſtum, ſed incuſtoditum amorem ad infamiam traxit. Et præbebat Cæſar aures, accipiendis adverſum generum ſuſpicionibus caritate filiæ promptior. At Silanus inſidiarum neſcius, ac forte eo anno prætor, repente per edictum Vitellii ordine ſenatorio movetur, quamquam lecto pridem ſenatu, luſtroque condito. Simul affinitatem Claudius diremit; adactuſque Silanus ejurare magiſtratum, & reliquus præturæ dies in Eprium Marcellum collatus eſt (6). Silanus killed himſelf on the day that Claudius and Agrippina were married. His ſiſter was ſent into baniſhment, and expiations were appointed on account of their inceſtuous commerce. The whole world laughed at this, becauſe the Emperor, who gave orders for theſe expiations, had himſelf ſo lately engaged in an inceſtuous marriage. Die nuptiarum Silanus ſibi mortem conſcivit; ſive eo uſque ſpem vitæ produxerat, ſeu delecto die, augendam ad invidiam. Calvina ſoror ejus Italia pulſa eſt. Addidit Claudius, ſacra ex legibus Tullii regis, piaculaque apud lucum Dianæ per pontifices danda: inridentibus cunctis, quod pœnæ procurationeſque inceſti id temporis exquirerentur (7).

(a) Tacitus, Annal. Lib. 12. p. 58.

(b) Dio, Lib. 60. p. 687. cited by Tillemont, Tom. 1. p. 391.

(c) Tacitus, Annal. Lib. 14. c. 60.

(6) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 12. c. 4. ad ann. 801.

(7) Idem, ibid. c. 8.

[C] Her huſband immediately entertained an averſion for her.] His friends obſerved to him, that he was greatly in the wrong to have his wife ſo ſoon in contempt, and to deprive her of thoſe blandiſhments and careſſes which he owed to her, as being her huſband. Let her reſt ſatisfied, ſays he, with being called my wife; for this is an ornament and honour that ought to content her. Fine contemplation indeed! Octaviæ conſuetudinem cito adſpernatus, corripientibus amicis, ſufficere illi debere reſpondit uxoria ornamenta. Eandem mox ſæpe fruſtra ſtrangulare meditatus, dimiſit ut ſterilem, ſed improbante divortium populo, nec parcente convitiis, etiam relegavit. Denique occidit ſub crimine adulteriorum, adeo impudenti falſoque, ut in quæſtione pernegantibus cunctis, Anicetum pædagogum ſuum indicem ſubjecerit, qui dolo ſtupratam à ſe fateretur (8). i. e. "Having ſoon "deſpiſed his wife's careſſes, and his friends repro- "ving him for it, he replied, that ſhe ought to be "contented with having the honour of being his "conſort. Intending ſoon after to ſtrangle her, and "being diſappointed in his horrid deſign, he put "her from him, upon pretence that ſhe was barren: "but the people being diſpleaſed at him for divor- "cing her, and exclaiming againſt him on that ac- "count, he ſent her into baniſhment. At laſt he "put her to death, upon pretence of her having been "guilty of adulterous practices; but the charge was "ſo ſcandalous and falſe, that, upon its being denied "by all the witneſſes when put to the rack, he "prevailed with Anicetus, who had been his ſchool- "maſter, to confeſs that he had debauched her by "a ſtratagem." 'Twas doubtleſs a freſh mortification to Octavia, to ſee Nero fall diſtractedly in love with a maid-ſervant, and perſons of the greateſt wiſdom conniving at ſo ſhameful a conduct: for theſe had rather he ſhould ſatiate his luſt with that creature, who did not concern herſelf with affairs of government, rather than ſee him ſtrike at the honour of the moſt illuſtrious Ladies, as he would infallibly have done, had he not been ſmit with the ſervant-wench in queſtion; he not being endued with the gift of continence, and making no uſe of his wife. He had not the leaſt affection for her; whether this aroſe from ſome natural antipathy, or that he was infinitely more delighted with unlawful pleaſures, than with thoſe of a lawful kind. I will cite a Roman Author, to ſhew the antiquity of this ridiculouſly-abominable conduct in love ſo much in vogue. Delapſo Nerone in amorem libertæ cui vocabulum Acte fuit . . . ne ſevérioribus quidem principis amicis adverſantibus, muliercula nulla cujuſquam injuria cupidines principis explente: quando uxore ab Octavia nobili quidem, & probitatis ſpectatæ, fato quodam, ad quia prævalent illicita, abhorrebat: metuebaturque ne in ſtupra feminarum illuſtrium prorumperet, ſi illa libidine prohiberetur (9).

(8) Sueton. in Nerone, c. 35.

(9) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 13. c. 12.

[D] One of her female attendants employ'd a very particular expreſſion on that account.] Tigellinus, a creature the moſt devoted to the moſt infamous and moſt cruel paſſions of Nero, was preſent, when Octavia's maids were put to the torture, and was urgent with them to confeſs the accuſations which were laid to their miſtreſs's charge (10). One of them made him the following reply; Her private parts are chaſter than thy mouth. Actæ ob id de ancillis quæſtiones, & vi tormentorum victis quibuſdam, ut falſa annuerent, plures perſtitere ſanctitatem dominæ tueri. Ex quibus una inſtanti Tigellino, caſtiora eſſe muliebria Octaviæ, reſpondit, quàm os ejus (11). Dion informs us that ſhe was called Pythias; but declares that ſhe was the only one among Octavia's female attendants who was faithful, and that all the reſt betray'd her, in order to make their court to Poppea. He adds, that Pythias ſpit in Tigellinus's face, ſaying the words juſt mentioned. The Greek words of Dion are as free, at leaſt, as Tacitus's Latin. Μόνη δ' ἡ Πυθιὰς ὅτί τι καὶ ἐφιύσαλο αὐτῆς, καίπερ πικρόταλα βασανισθεῖσα, ἢ τίλ☉ ὡς ὁ Τιγελλῖν☉ ἐνέκειλο αὐτῇ, προσέπλυσέ τε αὐτῷ καὶ εἶπε, Καθαρώτερον, ὦ Τιγελλῖνε, τὸ αἰδοῖόν ἡ δέσποινά μου τοῦ σοῦ σ'όμαλ☉ ἔχει, i. e. Sola Pythias, licet acerrimis tormentis coacta, noluit in eam mentiri: quumque Tigellinus inſtaret vehementius, faciem ejus conſputt, Mundior eſt (inquit) Tigelline, vulva dominæ meæ, quàm os tuum (12). By the way, the ſervant, whom it was pretended this Princeſs had had an intrigue with, was a flute-player.

(10) Xiphilin. in Nerone, p. m. 176.

(11) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 14. c. 60.

(12) Xiphil. in Nerone, p. 176.

ſet over her ; but the common people, who generally are bolder than thoſe who have poſts and employments to loſe, murmured to ſuch a degree, that Nero was determined to recall her. Inde crebri queſtus, nec occulti per vulgum, cui minor ſapientia, & ex mediocritate fortunæ pauciora pericula ſunt (d). Words could never expreſs the joy that was ſpread univerſally over Rome at the return of this Princeſs, nor the honours that were paid her (e). Poppea thought ſhe ſhould be ruined in caſe ſhe did not ruin Octavia, for which reaſon ſhe fell at Nero's feet, and inforced her intreaties with ſo many political reaſons, that her deſires were ſatisfied (f) : for Nero prevailed with a man, who had diſpatched his mother [E], to ſwear that he had lain with Octavia, upon which ſhe was baniſhed to an iſland ; and forced, a few days after, to bleed herſelf to death, then her head was cut off, and preſented to her rival (g). Nero changed his note ; for having before complained that Octavia was barren, he now charged her with deſtroying the fruit of her womb [F]. This

(d) Tacitus, Annal. Lib. 14. c. 60.

(e) Idem, ibid. c. 61.

(f) Tacitus, Lib. 14. c. 61.

(g) Idem, ibid. c. 63, 64.

player. Quemdam ex miniſtris Octaviæ impulit, ſervilem ei amorem objicere. Deſtinaturque reus cognomento Eucærus, natione Alexandrinus, canere tibiis doctus (13). Muſicians are lucky fellows; and it is my opinion, that among the profeſſions in this claſs, none can furniſh ſo great a number of perſons as theſe, who have been ſuſpected by Kings and Princes. Nevertheleſs, Nero did not think it probable that Octavia had committed adultery with this man ; he thinking his ſtation of life too low, to give riſe to the leaſt juſt ſuſpicions of that kind. Parum valebat ſuſpicio in ſervo (14).

(13) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 14. c. 60.

(14) Tacitus, ibid. c. 62.

[E] Nero prevailed with a man, who had diſpatched his mother.] This man, if Suetonius (15) may be credited, was Nero's maſter ; but Tacitus informs us, that he commanded the fleet which that Emperor had at Miſenus. Ever ſince the time that Nero had employed him to murder Agrippina, he at firſt treated him with ſome coldneſs, but at laſt hated him ; for the ſight of thoſe who have been employed to perpetrate mighty crimes, is no ways agreeable, it being thought that they are for ever reproaching their guilt. Levi poſt admiſſum ſcelus gratia, dein graviore odio : quia malorum facinorum miniſtri quaſi exprobantes adſpiciuntur (16). But wanting him to execute a freſh crime, he was extremely kind ; putting him in mind of the former ſervices he had done him, which he declared was of the higheſt importance ; and told him, that now he had another opportunity of doing him another, which was no leſs eſſential ; and was only this, to declare that he had lain with Octavia. He promiſed this man a handſome, tho' not an immediate, reward ; but threatened to murder him in caſe he refuſed to comply. Accitum eum Cæſar operæ prioris admonet ; ſolum incolumitati Principis adverſus inſidiantem matrem ſubveniſſe ; locum haud minoris gratiæ inſtare, ſi conjugem infenſam depelleret. Nec manu aut telo opus. Fateretur Octaviæ adulterium. Occulta quidem ad præſens, ſed magna ei præmia, & receſſus amœnos promittit ; vel ſi negaviſſet, necem intentat (17). This villain promiſed to comply with whatever Nero deſired of him ; and he even declared more falſities than had been deſired. He was baniſhed to Sardinia for form ſake ; but lived calm and undiſturbed in that iſland, and there died a natural death. In Sardiniam pellitur, ubi non inops exſilium toleravit, & fato obiit (18).

(15) I cited his words above, remark [C].

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) Ibid.

It will not, in my opinion, be improper to make a reflection or two on Suetonius's relation. It cannot be denied but that this author epitomizes with ſkill, but he ſometimes carries the contracting art too far, whereby it ſometimes happens, that the intervals and diſtinctions of events do not always appear in his works. Here follows an inſtance of what I now aſſert. He makes the injuſtice of Nero towards Octavia to riſe but by three ſteps or degrees (19) She was firſt divorced, as being barren ; afterwards baniſh'd becauſe the people exclaimed againſt Nero for divorcing her ; and laſtly, put to death, upon pretence of her having committed adultery ; though all who had been put to the torture denied it, and Anicetus only depoſed that he had lain with her by a ſtratagem. If the reader conſults Tacitus, he will not doubt but that Suetonius has committed ſome errors on this occaſion. The misfortunes of this Princeſs ought, according to Tacitus, to be ranked or diſpoſed in the following manner. Nero's falling in love with Poppea, made him weary of his wife, and reſolve to divorce her. Accordingly Octavia was divorced, upon pretence of barrenneſs, and Nero married Poppea. And now, by the artifices and intrigues of this latter, Octavia was impeached as guilty of adultery, when her female attendants being put to the torture, moſt of them inſiſted ſhe was a woman of ſtrict virtue ; nevertheleſs the decree of divorce continued in force, and after ſome preſents had been beſtowed upon her, Domumque Burri, & prædia Plauti, infauſta dona accepit (20), ſhe was baniſhed to Campania, and there put under an arreſt. However, the murmurs of the common people, or ſome remorſe of conſcience, obliged Nero to recal her ; which delighted the people to ſuch a degree, that Poppea did not think ſhe could be ſafe unleſs Octavia was put to death. Accordingly ſhe applied ſo artfully to the Emperor on this occaſion, that he prevailed with Anicetus to depoſe that he had lain with Octavia, upon which the unhappy Princeſs in queſtion was carried to the iſland of Pandathara, and there put to death. It does not appear that ſhe returned to Rome after the divorce, ſhe being ſtill in Campania, where the people diſcovered ſo much joy for her being recalled, as appears from the following words of Poppea : Vitam ipſam in extremum adductam à clientelis & ſervitiis Octaviæ, quæ plebis ſibi nomen indiderint, ea in pace auſis quæ vix bello evenirent. Arma illa adverſus principem ſumpta. Ducem tantum defuiſſe, qui motis rebus facile reperiretur. Omitteret modo Campaniam, & in urbem ipſam pergeret, ad cujus nutum abſentis tumultus cierentur (21) ; and as the rejoicings abovementioned by the people, made Poppea intreat Nero to make away with Octavia, and that her requeſt was indulged ; 'tis not probable that the order for Octavia's return was ever put in execution ; and therefore the following words of Tacitus, conjugem revocavit Octaviam (22), i. e. " He recalled his wife Octavia," are a little fallacious. But Suetonius's faults are much more inexcuſable. 'Tis manifeſt he has confounded the incidents, and omitted particulars, the omiſſion of which is not to be permitted, for the ſake of being conciſe. Is it any way probable, that the falſe witneſs, whom Nero ſuborned, ſhould depoſe, that he was obliged to employ artifice, in order to ſatiate his paſſion with Octavia ? Was not this extenuating the guilt of that Princeſs ? And this was not what Nero wanted. 'Tis to be obſerved, that Triſtian ſuppoſes, that Octavia returned actually to her huſband, and even that ſhe was recalled from the iſland of Pandathara (23) ; the former circumſtance is no ways probable, and the latter is abſolutely falſe.

(19) See his words in the remark [C].

(20) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 14. c. 60.

(21) Ibid. c. 51.

(22) Ibid. c. 60.

(23) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. 1. p. 138.

[F] Nero charged her with deſtroying the fruit of her womb.] I have met with ſome people, who found fault with Tacitus, for looking upon the two pretences of Octavia's diſgrace as a contradiction. At Nero præfectum in ſpem ſociandæ claſſis corruptum, & incuſatæ paullo ante ſterilitatis oblitus, abactos partus conſcientia libidinum, eaque ſibi comperta, edicto memorat (24), i. e. " But Nero, forgetting that he had ſo " lately accuſed Octavia of barrenneſs, charges her, " (by an edict) with cauſing herſelf to miſcarry ſe- " veral times, in order to conceal her intrigues with " Anicetus, whom (he ſaid) ſhe had corrupted, in " the hopes of making herſelf miſtreſs of the fleet." Nero grounded Octavia's divorce, upon pretence of her being barren ; a little after which he affirmed that he knew very well, that ſhe had taken things in order to procure abortion. Now there is no contradiction in all this. When we take notice that a married woman is never with child, we juſtly ſuppoſe that ſhe is barren ; but if we diſcover that ſhe makes herſelf

(24) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 14. c. 63.

This Princeſs's life was almoſt one perpetual ſeries of ill fortune [G].

herſelf miſcarry, 'tis no contradiction in us to deny her being barren. Where then is Nero's contradiction? I replied to thoſe criticks, that the hiſtorian does not pretend to ſay that the Emperor was guilty of an expreſs contradiction; he only obſerved, that 'twas great imprudence in Nero, to charge Octavia with procuring abortions, a little after he had accuſed her of being barren. The imprudence did not conſiſt, in Nero's giving the world room to ſuppoſe, that he was miſinformed with regard to Octavia's conduct, at the time that he divorced her; for he might have anſwered, that the moſt ſagacious Princes are very often not quick ſighted enough, to pry into all the ſecrets of their wives bedchambers; and that chance ſometimes diſcovers to them in a ſingle hour, what their moſt viligant ſpies had been ignorant of for many years; ſo artful are the fair in concealing their intrigues. But the injuſtice of the divorce lay here. He informed the whole world, that he had not performed conjugal duty with regard to Octavia; for had he done this, ſhe would not have had any cauſe to take things to procure abortion, to conceal her adulterous practices. Now is it not a flagrant injuſtice for a huſband to put away his wife upon pretence of barrenneſs, after living with her in a manner no ways matrimonial (25). For this reaſon, Tacitus ſays nothing, that can reflect on his judgment, when he obſerves a contradiction between the Emperor's firſt and ſecond pretence. I muſt not omit one circumſtance which makes Nero's injuſtice ſtill more flagrant, viz. his being perſuaded at the ſame time that Octavia was a woman of virtue. The expreſs words of Nero have been recorded, which he uttered, when he imagined that an opportunity for marrying Poppea preſented itſelf. Ipſa principis verba referam, ſays Tacitus (26), quin inquit Nero depoſito metu nuptias Poppææ ob ejuſmodi terrores dilatas maturare parat, Octaviamque conjugem amoliri, quamvis modeſte agat, & nomine patris, & ſtudiis populi gravem? i. e. "I will repeat the Emperor's own words: Nero "laying aſide all fear, prepared to haſten his nup- "tials with Poppea, which the apprehenſions he was "under had till then ſuſpended; and to put away "his wife, notwithſtanding her modeſty, and the "reverence due to her, on account of her father's "memory and her great popularity."

(25) See the article of GUISE (CLAUDE DUKE of) remark [A].

(26) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 14. c. 59.

[G] This Princeſs's life was almoſt one perpetual ſeries of ill fortune.] The inhabitants of the iſland, to which ſhe was baniſhed, were more touched with her miſfortunes, than they had been with thoſe of other Ladies who had been exiled among them. Thoſe were now advanced in years, and conſequently abler to bear up under the reverſes of fortune; not to mention that they might comfort themſelves from the reflection of their paſt felicity. But Octavia was but about twenty years of age, and had always been unfortunate. The firſt year after her marriage proved a ſeaſon of mourning, becauſe of the affliction into which ſhe was plunged by her father and brother's death, who had been killed by poiſon. A concubine enjoyed all her huſband's love; ſhe herſelf was divorced, and afterwards expoſed to the violent hatred of Nero's new wife; and, at laſt, ſent into exile, as guilty of a crime, the ſtigma of which is more grievous than death itſelf. Nevertheleſs, it was with the utmoſt ſtruggles ſhe could think of parting with life, tho' the ſwords of the ſoldiers who guarded her were perpetually over her head; and when ſhe received orders to diſpatch herſelf, ſhe employ'd all the entreaties ſhe could think of, to ſuſpend that fatal hour. However, it was all to no purpoſe: Octavia was bound, and her veins opened; but her terrors were ſo great, that little or no blood came from her, ſo that they were obliged to ſtifle her with the ſteam of a hot bath. Tacitus paints the paſſions with ſo maſterly a hand, that every one of his lines is ſuch a ſtroke as is above imitation, for which reaſon I will cite his words (27): Non alia exſul viſentium oculos majore miſericordia affecit. Meminerant adhuc quidam Agrippinæ, à Tiberio; recentior Juliæ memoria obverſabatur, à Claudio pulſæ. Sed illis robur ætatis affuerat. Læta aliqua viderant, & preſentem ſævitiam melioris olim fortunæ recordatione allevabant (28). Huic primus nuptiarum dies loco funeris fuit, deductæ in domum, in qua nihil niſi luctuoſum haberet, erepto per venenum patre, & ſtatim fratre. Tum ancilla domina validior. Et Poppæa non niſi in perniciem uxoris nupta. Poſtremo crimen omni exitio gravius. Ac puella viceſimo ætatis anno, inter centuriones & milites, præſagio malorum jam à vita exempta, nondum tamen morte acquieſcebat. Paucis dehinc interjectis diebus, mori jubetur: cum jam viduam ſe & tantum ſororem teſtaretur, communeſque Germanicos & poſtremo Agrippinæ nomen cieret, qua incolumi infelix quidem matrimonium, ſed ſine exitio pertuliſſet. Reſtringitur vinculis, venæque ejus per omnes artus exſolvuntur: & quia preſſus pavore ſanguis tardius labebatur, præfervidi balnei vapore enecatur. He had forgot to obſerve, that Octavia, before her marriage, had ſeen her mother Meſſalina murthered. It is here ſhe begins the relation of her misfortunes, in the tragedy that bears her name, and which is printed with thoſe of Seneca. She continues it, by relating the ſeverity of Agrippina, who was doubly her ſtep-mother; and of ſuch a temper, as qualified her exactly in every reſpect for that character, and to verify whatever we are told with regard to the antipathy, which ſuch women are ſaid to entertain againſt their daughters-in-law.

(27) Idem, ibid. lib. 14. c. 63.

(28) This was purſuant to the precepts of Epicurus. Many people, on the contrary, grieve in adverſity, upon calling to mind their paſt happineſs, and ſay with one of the French Poets,

Felicité paſſée
qui ne peut revenir,
Tourment de ma penſée,
Que n'ai-je en te perdant perdu le ſouvenir!

i. e. "Paſt happineſs that can return no more: death to my thought! why did I not, in loſing thee, loſe my memory at the ſame time.

Tulimus ſævæ juſſa novercæ,
Hoſtilem animum, vultuſque truces.
Illa illa meis triſtis Erinnys
Thalamis Stygios prætulit ignes,
Teque extinxit miſerande pater.

The ſenſe is,

"Beneath a cruel ſtep-mother I groan'd.
"Her face, her mind, for ever rag'd with paſſion.
"To her, dread fury, all my ills are owing.
"'Twas ſhe brought death inſtead of nuptial joys;
"And ſent my tortur'd father to his tomb."

If Homer could not admit, that ſome perſons are ſerved only out of the bad veſſel (29); he at leaſt could have ſaid, that Jupiter does not mix above two or three drops out of the good veſſel, in the large goblet, filled with bad liquor, out of which he makes them drink. Such was the Fate of our Octavia, and yet ſhe was deſirous of living, death appearing, in her eye, more dreadful than all her calamities; but her youth ought to plead for her want of judgment on this occaſion.

(29) See the article of the MANICHEES, remark [C] from citation (35) to the end.

OECOLAMPADIUS (JOHN) one of the reformers of the Church in the 16th Century, was born in Winſperg in Franconia, anno 1482. His mother was the occaſion of his being devoted to a ſtudious life, his father intending to make a merchant of him, but changed his reſolution at the earneſt ſolicitations of his wife. They ſent their ſon to the College of Heilbrun, and afterwards to the univerſity of Heildelberg, where he took his bachelors degree at fourteen years of age. He afterwards was ſent to Bologna to ſtudy the law; and after reſiding there ſix months, he returned to Heidelberg, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of divinity. The authors he ſtudied with the greateſt application, where Thomas Aquinas, Richard and Gerſon; he deſpiſing the ſubtleties of Scotus, and not following the humour which prevailed at that time in the Univerſities. He took very little notice of the chicane of the ſchoolmen, and abſtained from diſputations, but endeavoured to ſtock his mind with uſeful knowledge, regardleſs of the fame which is gained in the publick exerciſes in the Univerſities. He nevertheleſs was looked upon upon as a very learned young man. His reputation in this reſpect, joined to his well known character for virtue and wiſdom, prompted the Elector Palatine to make choice of him for preceptor to his youngeſt ſon; but being ſick of the court, after having exerciſed the employment above mentioned ſome time, he went and reſumed his theological ſtudies.

OENONE, the daughter of Cebrenus, a river of Phrygia (a), and wife to Paris, was, according to ſome writers, a famous ſorcereſs [A]. Others ſay only that ſhe was perfectly well ſkilled in the virtue of herbs, and that ſhe attained this knowledge in exchange for her maidenhead [B]. The gift of prophecy is alſo aſcribed to her (b). By her knowledge in futurity, ſhe foreſaw that her huſband's voyage to Helen would be productive of numberleſs evils; for which reaſon ſhe uſed all the arguments poſſible to divert Paris from that enterprize. Finding all her remonſtrances were to no purpoſe, ſhe foretold him that he would be wounded [C]; and that then he would be obliged to have recourſe to her, as the only perſon who was able to cure him (c). Having been wounded by Philoctetes at the ſiege of Troy, he called to mind Oenone's prediction, and therefore (a) Apollodor. lib. 3. Parthenius, in Eroticis, c. 4.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Apoll. & Parthen. ibid.

[A] She was a famous Sorcereſs.] Oenone, by the power of her incantations, could draw down the moon from the ſkies; lions grew as tame as ſheep, and rivers ran back to their ſprings. Paris affirms that he had been an eye-witneſs of all theſe things (1).

(1) In the epiſtle feigned, by Sabinus, as written by Paris; in anſwer to that which Ovid feigns Oenone had writ to him.

Quod ſi vertendæ ſpem mentis concipis hujus;
Cur ceſſant herbæ, carmina curve tua?
Nam te nec Phœbi ſollertior artibus ulla eſt;
Phœbeæque Hecates ſomnia vera vides.
Te cum ſideribus, te cum deducere Lunam
Nubibus, & memini ſurripuiſſe diem.
Paſcebam tauros: interque armenta leones
Obſtupui placidos vocibus ire tuis.
Quid retro Xanthum, retro Simoënta vocatum
Adjiciam curſus non tenuiſſe ſuos?
Ipſe pater Cebren, natæ male tutus ab ore,
Cantatus quoties reſtitit inter aquas!

" If any hope, Oenone, you retain,
" Of ever freeing me from Helen's chain,
" Quick to thoſe pow'rful herbs and arts repair,
" By which thou rul'ſt in heaven, in earth, and air.
" Not Phœbus ſelf is learneder than thee,
" Scarce are the Gods from thy ſtrong magic free.
" Thou, by the mighty workings of thine art,
" From their pale orbs the trembling ſtars canſt
" part,
" Call down the moon, the ſun's ſwift motion ſtay,
" Protract the darkneſs, and arreſt the day.
" As bulls I fed, among the herd there came " Fierce lions, made by thy enchantments tame.
" Swift Simois and Xanthus' cryſtal wave
" Forbore to flow, when your command you gave.
" Your father Cebres waters too ſubmit;
" Nor ſlight thy charms, ſince all acknowledge it.
Saluſbury.

'Tis very probable that Apollodorus related that the nymph in queſtion practiſed magic; whence we may look upon the following words of book III. as a falſe reading; Ἡ γὰρ Οἰνώνη ἰατρικὴν καὶ μουσικὴν ἤσκει. i. e. (2) " For Oenone was verſed in the ſciences of phyſic " and muſic." If we ſubſtitute μουσικὴν, inſtead of μαγικὴν, we ſhall give a very juſt ſenſe to this author's words. He had juſt before ſaid, that Oenone carried medicines to Paris when dangerouſly wounded; if he adds, as the editions have it, for ſhe practiſed phyſic and muſic, he adds a groſs ſuperfluity to the context; but if he adds, for ſhe practiſed phyſic and magic, the ſenſe is much more proper and agreeable. Paſſerat underſtood this paſſage perfectly well, he tranſlating it as follows; for ſhe was perfectly well ſkilled in phyſic, and the art of charming diſeaſes (3).

(2) Apollodor. Biblioth. lib. 3. p. 227.

(3) See Meziriac, on Ovid's epiſtles, p. 460.

[B] She attained to this knowledge, in exchange for her maidenhead (4).] If the Reader peruſes Oenone's epiſtle to Paris, he will find that our nymph boaſts her having been courted by the ſatyrs, and even by Faunus himſelf; but that ſhe eluded all their amorous deſigns. She confeſſes that Apollo cropt her virgin-flower, tho' ſhe ſtruggled with all her might, and even ſcratched his face. In fine, ſhe obſerves, that ſhe did not require either gold or precious ſtones for a reward, but that Apollo revealed to her all the ſecrets of Botany; ſo that ſhe could perform a thouſand wonderful cures; but that this knowledge was of no ſervice to her in curing the paſſion of love, there being no herb capable of producing that effect.

(4) Compare this with what is ſaid of CASSANDRA, remark [A] of her article.

Me fide conſpicuos Trojæ munitor amavit.
Ille meæ ſpolium virginitatis habet.
Id quoque luctando, rupi tamen ungue capillos;
Oraque ſunt digitis aſpera facta meis.
Nec pretium ſtupri gemmas aurumve popoſci.
Turpiter ingenuum munera corpus emunt.
Ipſe, ratus dignam, medicas mihi tradidit artes;
Admiſitque meas ad ſua dona manus.
Quæcumque herba potens ad opem, radixque medendi
Utilis in toto naſcitur orbe, mea eſt.
Me miſeram, quod amor non eſt medicabilis herbis (5)!

(5) Ovid, in Epiſtola Oenones ad Parid.

" Me Faunus too, who o'er the mountains fled,
" Purſu'd, with leafy chaplets on his head;
" And Phœbus, who, but with much force, ob-
" tain'd
" That bliſs, for which the reſt in vain complain'd.
" I tore my hair, while my ſoft limbs he preſt,
" And that curſt fate for which I was digrac'd.
" No ſordid recompence of wealth I ſought;
" That creature's mean, whoſe love is to be bought:
" But me the grateful God with knowledge ſtor'd,
" And the ſame gifts for which himſelf's ador'd.
" For no one plant the fertile earth does yield,
" But in its virtues I am amply ſkill'd.
" Wretch! of what uſe does thy vain knowledge " prove?
" No drug, alas! can cure the wounds of love.
Mr. John Cooper.

Ovid is not very obſervant of decorum and veriſimilitude. Confeſſions like theſe are ſeldom made to a huſband; and this was not a proper method to make Paris repent of his inconſtancy. For a man to be told, that he was taken for a fool, and that he falſely imagined he had cropt the virgin-flower in the nuptial bed, is far from being any agreeable piece of news; the ſcratching the inamorato's face on the one hand, and the ſecrets of phyſic on the other, are far from making up the breach. What therefore was Ovid thinking on? Tho' he had added the gift of prophecy (6) to the knowledge of plants, in the rewards beſtowed by Apollo, he would not have gilded the pill ſufficiently. Clemens Alexandrinus was not ignorant that our nymph pretended to prophecy. See, in the margin, a conjecture on his words (7).

(6) According to Apollodor. lib. 3. Oenone learnt divination of Rhea.

(7) Ἔλενον δὲ καὶ Λαοκόωντα, καὶ Οἰνώνην, καὶ Βρῆνον ἐν Ἰλίῳ. Tam Helenus, & Laocoon, & Oenone, & Brenus in Ilio. Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. 1. p. 334. Inſtead of καὶ Βρῆνος, Canterus would read Κασσάνδρος. But we had better read ἢ Κασσάνδρος, which would ſignify, Oenone, daughter of Cebren. See Canterus on Lycophron, verſe 57.

[C] She foretold him that he would be wounded.] Conon has confounded and blended the different periods, and by that means claſhed with veriſimilitude. He ſuppoſes that Oenone did not utter this prediction, nor leave her huſband's houſe, till after Paris had killed her ſon Corythus (8). The Reader is to know, that Corythus, the ſon of Paris and Oenone, was ſo great with Helen, that Paris was fired with the ſtrongeſt jealouſy on that account, and for that reaſon reſolved to make away with Corythus. 'Tis no ways probable, that Oenone cohabited with her huſband, after Helen had taken poſſeſſion of the houſe; ſo that Conon has embarraſſed himſelf unreaſonably with a chronology different from that of other Authors.

(8) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186. p. 434, 436.

had himſelf carried upon mount Ida, to get the cure which ſhe only could favour him with; but he died before he had got far enough to be cured by Oenone (d). Some authors ſay, that ſhe made ſo little haſte [D], purely out of revenge, that ſhe let him die before ſhe applied her remedies; and nevertheleſs that ſhe was ſeized with deſpair, when ſhe found her huſband had breathed his laſt. This is variouſly related [E]; and ſome writers ſay, that ſhe attempted an early revenge. She employed her ſon for this purpoſe [F]; whom ſome ſay ſhe ſent into Greece, to ſtir up the Princes to make war againſt the Trojans; whilſt others declare, that ſhe cauſed him to inflame the breaſt of Helena, in order to make Paris feel the direct effects of jealouſy.

(d) Apollodor. lib. 3. Parthenius, in Eroticis, c. 4.

[D] She made . . . little haſte.] The meſſenger who brought her word, that Paris had ordered himſelf to be carried to mount Ida, that he might be cur'd by her, was ſent back roughly with the following jealous words, let him go to Helen, and have his wounds dreſſed (9). However, her former tenderneſs ſoon reviving, ſhe repented that ſhe had been ſo unkind; and therefore reſolved to go and meet her huſband with the medicaments neceſſary, but came too late. The anſwer ſhe had made the meſſenger was faithfully told Paris; and it afflicted him to ſuch a degree, that he expired that inſtant (10). The firſt thing that Oenone did at her arrival was, to throw a ſtone at the abovementioned meſſenger, which killed him, for having preſumed to ſay, that ſhe was the cauſe of Paris's death. She then embraced, with the utmoſt tenderneſs, the corps of her unfaithful huſband; and after making great moan, ſhe put her girdle about her neck, and ſtrangled herſelf (11).

(9) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186. p. 434, 436.

(10) Parthenius in Eroticis, c. 4.

(11) Conon, apud Photium, num. 186. p. 436.

[E] This is variouſly related.] We juſt now ſaid, that ſhe ſtrangled herſelf with her own girdle. Apollodorus ſays (12) barely that ſhe hanged herſelf. Parthenius (13) ſays only that ſhe killed herſelf. Quintus Calaber (14) affirms that ſhe threw herſelf on the funeral pile where Paris's body was burnt. Lycophron (15) ſays, that ſhe flung herſelf from the top of a tower. "Dictys Cretenſis relates, that Paris being "dead, his relations cauſed his body to be carried "to Oenone, in order that ſhe might procure it bu"rial; but that Oenone ſeeing the dead body, was "ſtruck to ſuch a degree, that ſhe ran diſtracted; and "devoting herſelf to melancholy, by inſenſible de"grees, ſhe died of grief, and was buried with Pa"ris. This paſſage from Dictys Cretenſis makes me "ſuſpect, either that the Latin verſion of this Au"thor, altho' very antient, is not very juſt, or that "it is corrupted in many places; for Tzetzes on "Lycophron, ſays expreſly, that Oenone, according "to Dictys Cretenſis, ſtrangled herſelf; and Cedre"nus, who ever follows Dictys in all things relating "to the war of Troy, alſo makes Oenone die the "ſame kind of death: whence I conjecture, that "theſe two Authors had Dictys's work in Greek; "and that the Latin tranſlation we have of it, does "not always agree with the Greek text (16)." This is ſo curious a piece of literature, that I could not diſpenſe with quoting exactly as we find it in Meziriac. By the way, Quintus Calaber ſuppoſes that Oenone treated her huſband with the utmoſt inhumanity (17), when lying proſtrate at her feet (18), and being ready to expire (19), he implored her aſſiſtance, and begg'd a thouſand pardons for his infidelity; but that ſhe was ſo deeply concerned at his death, that ſhe threw herſelf on the funeral pile, and was there burnt alive, together with the body of Paris.

(12) Liv. 3. p. 227.

(13) In Eroticis, c. 4.

(14) Lib. 10. ver. 467.

(15) In Caſſandra, ver. 61.

(16) Meziriac ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 509.

[F] She employed her ſon for that purpoſe.] The river Cebren upbraiding in ſuch harſh terms his daughter Oenone for loving a huſband who was ſo falſe to her, rouzed her to ſuch a pitch of revenge, that ſhe ſent her ſon Corythus to the Grecian Princes; commanding him to excite them to denounce war againſt Troy, and likewiſe to be their guide (20). The Scholiaſt on Lycophron relates theſe particulars (21). Conon (22) makes Corythus the inſtrument of Oenone's revenge after another manner. He informs us that Corythus was ſtill handſomer than Paris his father; and that Oenone ſent him to Helen, both to fire Paris with jealouſy, and to procure an opportunity of ruining Helen. This Lady was ſoon captivated by the charms of Corythus; and ſo great a familiarity was contracted between them, that Paris was no ways pleaſed at it: in ſhort, the father grew ſo very jealous of his ſon, that ſeeing him one day with Helen, he killed him. Oenone muſt have been born under a moſt ill-fated planet; the expedient ſhe employ'd to ſatiate her revenge on her rival, coſt her only ſon his life; and was productive of no other effect, but to give Helen an opportunity of ſpending ſome moments delightfully. Some (23) have related, that Helen indeed loved Corythus; that he had a reciprocal paſſion for her, and that Paris killed him; however, they do not obſerve that his mother had ſuborned him to enſnare her rival; but ſay that he went to the ſiege of Troy. Others (24) pretend, that Corythus ſprung from the amours of Paris and Helen, which is abſurd; for, from the rape of Helen to Paris's death, there was not an interval of time ſufficient for any ſon of theirs to attain an age neceſſary for enabling a man to content a woman; and yet Corythus was killed at years of maturity, as is evident from his father's jealouſy, and his intrigue with Helen. However this be, we here have an account of a moſt horrid inceſtuous commerce (25), in which this renowned beauty was engaged, that is mentioned by few Authors.

(17) Quint. Calab. lib. 10. ver. 306.

(18) Ὁ δ' ἀρ' αἶψα πίσυν παρὰ ποσσὶ γυναικὸς. Ipſe verò ſtatim ad pedes uxoris ſe abjecit. Ibid. ver. 272.

(19) Καί ῥ' ὀλίγου ῥαΐων τοῖον ποτὶ μῦθον ἔειπεν. Atque vix trabens animam hoc tandem ſermone illam affatur. Quintus Calaber, lib. 10. ver. 283.

(20) Meziriac, on Ovid's epiſt. p. 508. citing the Scholiaſt on Lycophron.

(21) On theſe words of Lycophron, ver. 58. Στείλασα χεῖρον τὸν κατήγορον χθονός. Miſſo juvene terræ proditore.

(22) Apud Photium, num. 86. p. 436.

(23) Hellanicus, in Troicis, & Cephalon Gergithius, apud Parthenium, Capite 34.

(24) Nicander, apud Parthenium, ibid.

(25) Upon the ſuppoſition that Corythus was Helen's ſon; for had he been only her ſon-in-law, ſhe would have been preceded by many in her guilt.

☞ OGILBY (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh geographer and coſmographer in the 17th Century, was born in or near Edinburgh in Scotland about the 17th of November 1600. His father, who was of an antient and genteel family, having ſpent his eſtate, and being priſoner in the King's Bench for debt, could give his ſon but little education at ſchool. However, the youth being very induſtrious, obtained ſome knowledge in the Latin Grammar, and afterwards ſo much money, as not only to procure his father's diſcharge from priſon, but alſo to bind himſelf apprentice to Mr. Draper, a dancing-maſter in Gray's-Inn Lane in Holborn London. Soon after, by his dexterity in his profeſſion, and his complaiſant behaviour towards his maſter's cuſtomers, he got ſo much money from them, as to buy out the remaining part of his time, and ſet up for himſelf. But being afterwards appointed to dance in the Duke of Buckingham's great maſk, by a falſe ſtep he ſtrained a vein in the inſide of his leg, which ever after occaſioned him to go lamiſh. He afterwards taught to dance the ſiſters of Sir Ralph Hopton at Wytham in Somerſetſhire; where at leiſure he learned of that gentleman how to handle the pike and muſket. When Thomas Earl of Strafford became Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, he was entertained in his family to teach the art of dancing; and having a good command of his pen, was frequently employed by the Earl to tranſcribe papers for him. In his family it was, that he firſt gave proof of his inclination to poetry, by tranſlating ſome of Æſop's Fables into Engliſh verſe; which afterwards when he came to underſtand Latin better, and had communicated them to ſeveral learned men, he publiſhed, and being then one of the troop of guard belonging to the Earl, compoſed a humorous piece, intitled, The Cha- ratler of a Trooper. About that time he was appointed by his Lordſhip maſter of the Revels in the Kingdom of Ireland, and built a little Theatre for the repreſentation of dramatic entertainments in St. Warburgh's Street in Dublin. But upon the breaking out of the Rebellion, he was ſeveral times in great danger of his life, particularly when he narrowly eſcaped being blown up in the caſtle of Refernam near Dublin. About the time of the concluſion of the war in England, he left Ireland, and being ſhipwrackt came to London in a very neceſſitous condition. Thence, after a ſhort ſtay, he walked to Cambridge, where his great induſtry and greater love to learning being diſcovered, he was encouraged by ſeveral ſcholars there, by whoſe aſſiſtance he became ſo compleat a maſter of the Latin tongue (a), that in 1649 he publiſhed a tranſlation of Virgil [A], and in 1651 a paraphraſe in verſe upon Æſop's Fables [B]. About the year 1654 he learned the Greek language. In 1658 he publiſhed at London in folio a beautiful edition of Virgil, with the ſame cuts, which had adorned the folio edition of his tranſlation of that poet 1654. In 1660 he publiſhed at London in folio a tranſlation of Homer's Iliad, adorned with ſculptures, and illuſtrated with annotations, and dedicated to King Charles II. The ſame year he publiſhed at Cambridge in a large folio the Bible, according to the tranſlation ſet forth by the ſpecial command of King James I. with the Liturgy and Articles of the Church of England, with chorographical ſculpture. In the beginning of the year following he received orders from the commiſſioners for the ſolemnity of his Majeſty's coronation, for the conduct of the poetical part thereof, as the ſpeeches, mottoes, and inſcriptions; upon which he drew up for the preſent, The relation of his Majeſty's entertainment paſſing through the city of London to his coronation; with a deſcription of the triumphal arches and ſolemnity: London 1661 in ten ſheets in folio. But ſoon after, our author, by his Majeſty's command, publiſhed it in a large folio, with ſculptures, and ſpeeches at large. About the year 1662 he went into Ireland, being then by patent made maſter of the Revels there, after Sir William Davenant had in vain ſollicited for that place; and he built at Dublin a theatre, which coſt him about 2000*l*. the former being ruined during the troubles. In 1665 he publiſhed at London in folio a tranſlation of Homer's Odyſſey, adorned with ſculptures, and illuſtrated with annotations. He afterwards wrote two Heroic Poems, one intitled, The Epheſian Matron, the other, The Roman Slave, both dedicated to Thomas Earl of Oſſory. The next work, which he compoſed, was Carolics, an Epic Poem in twelve books, in honour of King Charles I. but this was intirely loſt in the Fire of London in September 1666, when Mr. Ogilby's houſe in White-Fryars was burnt down, and his whole fortune, except to the value of five pounds, deſtroyed. However he ſoon procured his houſe to be rebuilt, ſet up a printing-houſe therein, was appointed his Majeſty's coſmographer and geographic printer, and printed ſeveral great works tranſlated or collected by himſelf and his aſſiſtants [C]. He died Sept. 4, 1676, and was interred in the vault under part of the church of St. Bride's in Fleet-Street. Mr. Edward Philips (b) ſtiles him "one of the prodigies of his age for producing from ſo late "an initiation into literature ſo many large and learned volumes as well in verſe as proſe:" and tells us, that "his Paraphraſe upon Eſop's Fables, for ingenuity and fancy, beſides "the invention of new fables, is generally confeſſed to have exceeded whatever hath "been done before in that kind."

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 378, 379. 2d edit.

(b) Theatrum Poetarum, modern poets, p. 114. edit. Lond. 1675.

[A] In 1649 he publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of Virgil.] It was printed in large 8vo, and dedicated to William Marquiſs of Hereford. He reprinted it at London in 1654 in a royal folio with this title; The Works of Publius Virgilius Maro, tranſlated, and adorned with Sculptures, and illuſtrated with Annotations. Mr. Wood tells us (1), that "this was the faireſt edi- "tion, that till then the Engliſh preſs ever produced."

(1) Athen Oxon. vol. 2. col. 379.

[B] In 1651 a paraphraſe in verſe upon Æſop's Fables.] It was printed in 4to with this title; Fables of Æſop paraphraſed in verſe, and adorned with ſculptures. Sir William Davenant, then in the Tower, and Mr. James Shirley wrote verſes in commendation of this work. In 1665 he publiſhed a ſecond volume of Æſop's Fables paraphraſed, with ſeveral of his own, adorned with ſculptures, and printed at London in folio. In 1673 he publiſhed at London in two volumes 8vo, The Fables of Æſop, paraphraſed in verſe, adorned with ſculptures, and illuſtrated with annotations.

[C] Printed ſeveral great works tranſlated or collected by himſelf and his aſſiſtants.] As 1, An Embaſſy from new Batavia to the Emperor of China, &c. London 1669 in folio, adorned with maps, proſpects, and various ſculptures, as all the following books, which he publiſhed, were. 2. Deſcription of Africa, &c. London 1670 folio. This is the firſt part of his Engliſh Atlas. 3. Deſcription of America, &c. London 1671, folio. This is the ſecond part. 4. Atlas Japanenſis, being remarkable addreſſes by way of Embaſſy from the Eaſt India company of the united Provinces to the Emperor of Japan, &c. London 1670 folio. 5. Atlas Chinenſis: being the ſecond part of a relation of remarkable paſſages in two Embaſſies from the Eaſt India company of the united Provinces to the Vice-Roy of Simmalong, &c. London 1671 folio. 6. Aſia, the firſt part; being an accurate deſcription of Perſia and the ſeveral Provinces thereof, &c. London 1673 folio. Our author did not live to finiſh the ſecond part. However this is looked upon as another part of the Engliſh Atlas. 7. Deſcription of Europe; not finiſhed by our author, who intended it to be the fourth part of the Engliſh Atlas. 8. Britannia: an hiſtorical and geographical deſcription of Britain, &c. The firſt part in folio. All theſe books were printed on imperial paper, adorned with maps and excellent ſculptures, and carried on and ſold by way of lotteries. There goes under our author's name, A pocket-book of roads in England, and a new map of the city of London, as it is now built, &c. printed in one ſheet of large paper. He alſo in conjunction with Mr. William Morgan made a new and accurate map of the city of London diſtinct from Weſtminſter and Southwark, &c. which is ſix feet long and ſix feet deep, with a long narrow book to deſcribe the places therein; as alſo a Map of London, Weſtminſter, and Southwark, and a ſurvey of Eſſex, with the roads therein exactly meaſured, &c. T.

OGINSKI (CHARLES) a gentleman of Lithuania, tranſlated into Latin Faret's Honnête Homme or Gentleman, and publiſhed it at Franeker in 1643 (a). He dedicated it to SAMUEL OGINSKI his father, who had a conſiderable employment in the Palatinate of Trecko

(a) In 12mo. It contains 188 pages.

Trecko in Lithuania. There is no doubt but that Mr. Oginski, who has been ſo often mentioned in the news papers for theſe five or ſix years (b), and who is at the head of the party which oppoſes the houſe of Sapieha, is of the ſame family with him who tranſlated Faret. Had Konig ſeen this verſion, he would not have ſaid that Charles Oginſki invented in 1643 the art of pleaſing at court (c), for the title would have informed him of the contrary (d). One wrote a French ſonnet in praiſe of the tranſlator. This little poem is prefixed to the work, and filled with the moſt abominable faults that can be committed againſt the rules of Proſodia. The author of the Sonnet obſerves, that this book of Faret was already tranſlated into Italian, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and German. The Latin verſion is tolerably well done, but it is pity there are ſo many typographical errors.

(b) I write this in 1703.

(c) Excogitavit artem placendi in aula, an. 1643. Konig. Biblioth. p. 586.

OKOLSI (SIMON) a religious Dominican, lived in the 17th Century. He publiſhed a book entitled Orbis Polonus, which is worthy of peruſal. Le Laboureur has cited it more than once (a).

(a) See La Relation du Voyage de la Reine de Pologne, Part II. p. 50, 58.

☞ OLDENBURG (a) (HENRY), a learned gentleman in the 17th Century, was born in the Dutchy of Breme in Germany, and was Conſul for his countrymen at London in the time of the long Parliament and Cromwell. He afterwards became tutor to the Lord Henry O Bryan, a young Iriſh Nobleman, and in June 1656, entered himſelf a ſtudent in the Univerſity of Oxford by the name of Henricus Oldenburg, Bremenſis, nobilis Saxo (b). He was afterwards tutor to William Lord Cavendiſh, and at length, upon the foundation of the Royal Society, was elected Fellow and Secretary thereof. He was a very intimate friend and conſtant correſpondent of Mr. Robert Boyle [A], ſeveral of whoſe

(a) He ſometimes wrote himſelf Grubendole. Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 114. 2d edition.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] He was a very intimate friend and conſtant correſpondent of Mr. Robert Boyle.] We have read over a great number of original letters of his to that great man, now in the hands of the Reverend Mr. Henry Miles; and ſhall preſent the reader with extracts from ſome of them. In a letter dated at Paris March 20, 1660, he writes thus: " Sir Ken. Digby will him-" ſelf aſſure you by the annexed of his reſpects to " you. We met lately at the houſe of a Chymiſt, " where the queſtion was agitated about the diſſol-" vent of gold, whether the univerſal ſpirit of the " world in its undetermined nature, or as it is ſpeci-" fied and contracted to a mineral, be the menſtruum " of that noble metal? The diſcuſſion hereof being " rather made by authority than reaſon, gave ſmall " ſatisfaction to the auditors; whereof the learned " Knight himſelf being the chief did moderate the " action, but not determine the queſtion, interlac-" ing the diſcourſes of others with ſeveral conſidera-" ble relations, whereof two did raviſh the hearers " to admiration. The one was of a King's houſe in " England, which having ſtood covered with lead " for five or ſix ages, and being ſold after that time, " was found to continue $\frac{1}{4}$ of ſilver in the lead there-" of. The other was of a fixed ſalt, drawn out of a " certain Potter's-earth here in France, at a place " called Arcueil; which ſalt being for ſome time " expoſed to the ſun-beams became ſalt-peter, then " vitriol, then lead, tin, copper, ſilver, and at the " end of fourteen months gold; which he aſſured " to have experienced himſelef, and another able " Naturaliſt beſides him. I muſt confeſſe I would " rather ſee this, than believe it, though the author " be a very authentique gentleman." In a letter dated at London October 20, 1664, he writes thus: " To divert you and myſelf a little, poſt Muſas has " ſeveriores, I ſhall draw to an end with annexing " ſome lines out of the penitential letter of Monſieur " Sorbiere's written to the Biſhop of Laon, to make " him employ my Lord Aubigny for prevailing with " our King, to interpoſe by the King of France, " that Sorbiere may be reſtored from his baniſhment. " As much as he depreſſed the Chancellor (1) in his " printed Pamphlet, ſo much does he now extol him " in this unprinted letter. For he ſaith; Facilè alias " ſubjungerem literas, ſi opus eſſet expugnandæ ſummi " Viri (meaning the Chancellor) indignationi telis & " machinis pluribus, quod de inſigni ipſius clementiâ ſperare " non auſim. Audit enim in patriâ ſuâ hominum mitiſ- " ſimus; & ſanè unus ille homo Anglis cunctando & per- " cendo reſtituit rem. Quam laudem minimè conſecutus " eſſet, niſi à ſapientiſſimo rege primarium regni munis " difficillimis temporibus, exul, cum de ſalute unuſquiſque " deſperaret, nec ambiens, obtinuiſſet. Nimirum ad id " operis aptiſſimum oſtendebant ſuaviſſimi mores, ingenium " perſpicax, inſignis facundia, Eruditio multiplex, & " civilis præſertim doctrinæ uſus & contemplatio. Ad " quæ potiſſimum in illo ſpectanda [ne ſatis attenderem, " leviorum ſtudiorum pulvis & ſortis meæ tenuitas ve- " luti nubem oculis noſtris objecere. Eram enim, ut ve- " rum fatear, totus in admirationem Regiæ Phyſicorum " Londinenſium Academiæ defixus; ſcilicet quod Medi- " corum erat, tractabam Medicus, & fabrilia Faber, in " interiora & ſocietatis ſagaciſſimæ arcana nuper admiſſus; " ad alia autem planè cæcutiebam, & ſiquid in Diario, " quod majoris eſſet ponderis, forte fortuna irrepſit, ab " inquinatis fontibus proculdubio, nec ſatis advertens, " hauriebam. Condonabit itaque Vir in illo honorum fa- " ſtigio poſitus, & cujus fama totum terrarum Orbem " pervolitat, homini in Litterulas ſuas benè affecto, ad " phyſicas tantum auſcultationes idoneo, ſed Ἀνθρωποµεσρίας " & ſublimiorum ſcientiarum ac Politices inprimis rudi " & ignaro, &c. Sir, I want an Amanuenſis ex-" ceedingly; elſe you ſhould have received the whole " letter, which argues as much an abject ſpirit as " can well be; and whereby the writer hath now " made himſelf hateful by all perſons of honor, " whereas by his printed book he appeared only " guilty of imprudence and partiality." In a letter dated at London October 27, 1664, he writes thus: " I muſt not omit acquainting you what Dr. " Charlton affirmed to me of the laſt anatome [at " Greſham-College before the Royal Society, Octob. " 22,] that the veines on the right and left ſide of " the heart were tranſpoſed, ſo that the vena arte- " rioſa was where the arteria venoſa uſeth to be, & " viciſſim; as alſo that Dr. Scarborow had aſſured " him, that in the body diſſected by him at the ſame " time there had been wanting the muſculus pectora- " lis. He added, that when he and Dr. Ent told " Dr. Scarborow of the ſaid tranſpoſition of the " veines, he urged, that the body already buried " might be unburied again to give him the ſight of " ſo unuſuall a ſtructure; which whether it be done " or not, I cannot yet informe you." In his next letter dated at London Nov. 3, 1664, we have the following paſſage: " Dr. Charlton being called to " an account of his laſt diſſection, and particularly " preſſed concerning the tranſpoſition, which I men-" tioned to you in my former from his own mouth in " the preſence of others, who heard him, as well as I, " alledge Dr. Ent for a witneſſe of his aſſertion, was " obliged at our yeſterday's aſſembly at Greſham to " yield, that he was miſtaken, both Dr. Ent, who was " with us, and Dr. Scarborough, having, upon the " unburying of the heart, and a ſtrict ſearch and " examination, found no ſuch tranſpoſition. Which " diſcovery of the Doctor's error ſpread by his " very poſitive affirmation (which made me without " ſcruple deliver it alſo to you) addeth but very little " to his credit. In the meane time the other anato-" micall obſervation concerning the defect of the " Pectoral

(1) Hyde.

whoſe works he tranſlated into Latin. He publiſhed the Philoſophical Tranſactions from N°. I. March 6, 1664, to N°. CXXXVI. June 25, 1677. He died at Charlton near Greenwich in Kent in Auguſt 1678, and was interred there. He married the daughter and only child of the famous John Dury, with whom he had an eſtate of 60 l. per ann. in the Marſhes of Kent; and by her he left iſſue a ſon, named Rupert, who was godſon to Prince Rupert, and a daughter named Sophia (c). While he was engaged in publiſhing the Philoſophical Tranſactions, he held a correſpondence with above ſeventy people in all parts of the world:

(c) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 114. 2d edition.

" Pectoral Muſcle is confirmed, Dr. Ent himſelfe, " upon my particular enquiry, aſſerting it with all " confidence, and that the perſon, while alive, had " not appeared defective in his motions." In his letter dated at London November 19, 1664, he writes thus: " The Queen of France is brought to " bed of a daughter of eight months, which hath " the ſhape of a More, and ſomewhat of that com- " plexion; whereat that King is ſo enraged, that " he hath baniſhed all the Mores, dwarfs, and Mon- " keys from his court, the Queen having a little " More about her, that ſeems to have ſo tainted her " imagination, as to give ſuch a colour and ſuch " features that reſemble him. In the mean time, " the Queen hath been very dangerouſly ill, and " was given over by the Phyſicians; but that Ma- " dame de Fouguet came and preſented a medicine, " which ſhe exalted highly as ſuch a one that would " infallibly cure her, by bringing away the Secun- " dina, which had caſt the Queene into ſuch convul- " ſions, as made her caſe appear deſperate." In his letter dated at London July 4, 1665, he writes thus concerning the plague then in that city. " It is a " great mercy, that Southwark and Redriffe, where " ſeamen are ſo numerous, and other people, that " relate to and work in the Navy, remaine ſo free yet " of the contagion, that there are not above two " houſes ſhutt up in thoſe quarters. If it ſhould " come into this row, where I am, I think, I " ſhould then change my thoughts, and retire into " the country, if I could find a ſojourning corner. " In the meane time I am not a little perplexed con- " cerning the bookes and papers belonging to the " Society, that are all in my cuſtody. All I can " think of to doe in this caſe is to make a liſte of " them all, and to putt them up by themſelves " in a boxe, and ſeale them together with a ſuper- " ſcription; that ſo, in caſe the Lord ſhould viſit " me, as ſoon as I find myſelfe not well, it may be " ready to be immediately ſent away out of mine to " a ſound houſe, & ſic deinceps." In his letter dated at London October 10, 1665, he writes thus: " I " am very glad, that I have not been ſo forward as " ſome of my correſpondents would have had me, " in diffuſing the wonders ſaid to be performed by " Greatrix into all parts of the world, and that " with my owne aſſeverations of the truth thereoff; " for I find their intelligence much differing from " mine; though indeed I heard lately, that this " healer did faile in ſome cures, but that it was " about ſuch perſons, as had their ſinnews quite " whithered, and their vitals totally deſtroyed, and " the balls of their eyes loſt; and that therefore " himſelfe did ſadly complaine over, and much com- " miſerate the ill-adviſed journeys of ſuch perſons, " ſaying, that God had given him the guift of " healing, and not of creating limbs. By the very " laſt I receaved this information, that a childe in " Dr. Beale's neighbourhood is cured of the ſtone or " other ſtoppage of urine, which came all, as he " ſaith, with horrid paine in threads or ropy, but " now, after the touch, is very perfectly naturall, " and without paine. Having related this, he adds, " It cannot be denyed, that innumerable great cures are " done; and 'tis not poſſible, that all expectations ſhould " be ſatisfied, without a general reſtauration equivalent " to a reſurrection. And then he concludes, that the " fame muſt ſuddenly fall, becauſe 'tis odious to many, " and winter hinders the paſſage, and himſelfe is tyred " with the infinite reſorte, and men's expectations . . . . " Monſieur du Son being the other day at my houſe, " where we talkt at randome of many things, told " me among the reſt, that he had knowne the blind " man at Maſtrich, that ſees colors with his fingers " ends; and had converſed with him a good while, " during which he had ſeen him play at cards with " better ſucces than any man he played with; as " alſo, to diſtinguiſh men and women from one " another by feeling their hands or necks, and to " diſcriminate the ſeveral colors of haire; and laſt- " ly, to diſcern the beauty of women by their " voyce." In his letter dated at London March 13th, 166$\frac{4}{5}$, he writes thus: " Greatrix does certainly " ſome cures by his frictions, inſinuating (perhaps) " ſome ſalubrious ſteams or ſpirits of his owne into " ſickly people's bodies. Monſieur de Son hath been " ſtroked by him; and he tells me, that whereas he " hath been for ſeverall years troubled with great " back-aches, (which indeed have been ſometimes " ſuch in my preſence, that he could not ſtirr or " turn himſelf without great paine, which ſometimes " forced him to cry out,) he now finds himſelf, " upon being ſtroked, very well, inſomuch that he " purpoſes, in caſe of continuance, to goe to ſea " with P. Rupert, in whoſe lodgings this cure was " performed, his Highneſſe, as the patient told me, " having urged him to ſuffer the friction." In his letter dated at London Sept. 10th, 1666, we have the following paſſage: " I cannot omit acquainting " you, that never a calamity, and ſuch an one, was " ſo well boarne, as this is, [viz. the Fire of Lon- " don.] 'Tis incredbile how litle the ſufferers, " though great ones, doe complaine of their Loſſes. " I was yeſterday in many meetings of the principal " citizens, whoſe houſes are laid in aſhes, who in- " ſtead of complaining diſcourſed almoſt of nothing " but of a ſurvey of London, and a deſſein for re- " building, and that in ſuch a manner, with bricks " and large ſtreets, leaving great intervals, parti- " tions in ſeveral places, that for the future they may " not be ſo eaſily ſubject to the like deſtruction. I " hope, that ſome of our Society will ſignalize " themſelves in this ſurvey and deſſein; which " when done to the ſatisfaction of the King, may by " his Majeſty be offered and recommended to the " Parliament. I was this very morning with our " Preſident, and ſuggeſted this buſineſs to his Lord- " ſhip, who liked it ſo well, that he intends to " move it to morrow at the Councill of the Society, " which is ſummonned to meet at Greſham in ſome " other room than formerly, our ordinary meeting " places both for the Councill and the Society being, " as I heare, taken up by the Lord Mayor and the " Court of Aldermen, as is the quadrangle for the " meeting of the Merchants, pro tempore. I doubt, " I ſhall find it very difficult to continue the print- " ing of the Tranſactions; Martyn and Alleſtree " being undone, with the reſt of the Stationers at " Paul's Church-yard, and all their books burnt, they " had carried for ſafety into St. Faith's Church, as " they call it: beſides that, the City lying deſolate " now, it will be very hard to vend them at the " preſent. I had hopes to have once waited on you " to diner to Sir William Morrice's, there to have " opened to him my deſires of thinking on me, in " caſe the Latin Secretarie's place ſhould fall vacant; " eſpecially now there is ſmaller hopes than ever of " Benefactors to the ſociety, and the Tranſactions like " to be interrupted; but charges to encreaſe, I ha- " ving been neceſſitated within this 10 dayes to pay " 24 s. to the public for chimneys, taxes, and watch- " ing, which, if it hold long, will force me to " run away. Sir, if you would not think it a " trouble to ſollicite, by a line or two of your owne " hand, my Lord Brounker and Sir Robert Moray, " to recommend me for the ſaid employment, you " would exceedingly oblige me. For though I " think they both have an affection for me, yet I " am aſſured, their care for me in this particular " would be redoubled upon your recommendation." In his letter dated at London, Sept. 18th, 1666, he writes thus: " Your very obliging letter I receaved, " and world: "I aſked him, ſays Dr. Liſter (d), what method he uſed to anſwer ſo great a "variety of ſubjects, and ſuch a quantity of letters as he muſt receive weekly; for I "knew he never failed, becauſe I had the honour of his correſpondence for ten or twelve "years: he told me, he made one letter anſwer another; and that to be always freſh, "he never read a letter before he had pen, ink, and paper, ready to anſwer it forthwith; "ſo that the multitude of his letters cloyed him not, or ever lay upon his hands." Among Milton's Epiſtolæ Familiares there is a letter to our author dated at Weſtminſter July

(d) Journey to Paris in the year 1698. p. 78. 2d edit. London 1699.

" and delivered the annexed to my Lord Brounker, " who preſents his affectionate ſervice to you, and " deſires you would pleaſe to ſend the mentioned ex- " periment to me, and reſt perſuaded, he will doe " what is in his power for the perſon recommended. " And I believe verily, his Lordſhip will not come " ſhort of his words, and, which is more, I am " perſuaded, if he had knowne my condition ſooner, " that is, ſo very low, as indeed it is, whatever " face I have put upon it, he would have ſooner taken " care for me. For he was pleaſed to ſay as much " to me, when upon this occaſion I related to " him, that my dear wife had brought me 400 l. " whereof, upon our agreement of marriage, ſhe cal- " led in 200, laying out 100 upon furniſhing our " houſe, and the other 100, partly upon the fine for " the houſe, partly for other neceſſary occaſions, as " far as it would goe; and before ſhe died, left me " the other 200 l. then in the hands of Sir Brocket " Spencer and Sir John Cotton, from whom I re- " ceaved them, (being neceſſitated to call them in " alſo,) and ſpent them partly for her funerall, and " payment of debts, and partly upon my ſubſiſt- " ence hitherto; that which the Tranſactions have " yielded, being conſumed in my houſe-rent, and " taxes, and duties, thoſe ſummes not amounting al- " ſo by farr to what was at firſt imagined, and be- " ing now like to fall lower yet. Having been " forced to repreſent this to his Lordſhip, and added, " that I had declined ſeverall offers of conducting " young Noblemen abroad, which would at leaſt " have been worth to me 100 l. per ann. if not alſo " ſome annuity ad vitam, after the employment end- " ed; his Lordſhip told me plainly, that if he had " knowne ſo much by times, I ſhould not have ſuf- " fer'd ſo much, expreſſing particularly what ad- " vantagious employment in the navy (but now pro- " vided for) he could have conferred on me, which " he believed I would have performed to more ſa- " tisfaction than he that is now in it. But yet he " would be mindfull of me, and not ſuffer me to " want . . . . Dr. Wren (1) has, ſince my laſt, drawn " a modell for a new citty, and preſented it to the " King, who produced it himſelf before his Coun- " cill, and manifeſted much approbation of it. I " was yeſterday morning with the Doctor, and ſaw " the modell; which, methinks, does ſo well pro- " vide for ſecurity, conveniency, and beauty, that I " can ſee nothing wanting as to thoſe three maine " articles: but whether it has conſulted with the " populouſnes of a great citty, and whether reaſon " of ſtate would have that conſulted with, is a quære " to me. I then told the Doctor, that if I had had " an opportunity to ſpeake with him ſooner, I ſhould " have ſuggeſted to him, that ſuch a modell, con- " trived by him, and reviewed and approved by " the Royal Society, or a committee thereof, before " it had come to the view of his Majeſty, would " have given the Society a name, and made it po- " pular, and availed not a little to ſilence thoſe, " who aſke continually What have they done? He an- " ſwered, that he had been ſo preſſed to haſten it, " before other deſigns came in, that he could not " poſſibly conſult the Society about it. However, " ſince 'tis done without taking in the Society, it " muſt ſuffice, that 'tis a member thereof, that hath " done it; and, by what I ſee, hath done it ſo, " that other models will not equall it. And I hope, " that when it comes to be preſented to the Parlia- " ment, as the Author will be named, ſo his rela- " tion to the Society will not be omitted." In his letter dated at London, Sept. 25th, 1666, he writes thus: " I have good hopes, the generous inclinati- " ons of thoſe two worthy perſons, the Lord Broun- " ker and Sir R. Moray, thus excited by the ready " favour of your recommendation, will prove effec- " tuall for my relief. I am ſure, I am eternally obli- " ged to you for your ſo carefull a concern for me. " Your commands to me for my Lord Brounker, I " hope I ſhall have occaſion to obey to morrow, " when we meet at Greſham; which perhaps will " be the laſt meeting in that place, the Citty ſtriving " hard to get that Colledge totally into their hands " for this time of diſtreſs; which if they obtain, the " Society are provided with another place to meet " in, to wit, in Arundel-houſe, by the generoſity of " Mr. Howard." In his letter dated at London, Octob. 16th, 1666, is the following paſſage: " The " other grand affaire about rebuilding the Citty, is " not neglected neither, ſtrict injunctions being now " iſſued by the Lord Mayor, in the King's name, " to clear the foundations of all burnt houſes of the " rubbiſh, within a fortnight; which done, the " ſurvey and admeaſurement of all ſuch foundations " is to be forthwith taken in hand, and that by the " care and management of Dr. Wren and Mr. Hook; " which ſurvey is to be exactly regiſtred, for the " better ſtating hereafter every one's right and pro- " perty. And then the method of building will be " taken into nearer conſideration, and, 'tis hoped, " within a ſhort time reſolved upon. All which may " be more fully ſeen in the printed paper for that pur- " poſe made public by the Lord Mayor." In his letter dated at London, Sept. 3d, 1667, he writes thus: " I was ſo ſtifled by the priſon-air, that as " ſoon as I had my enlargement from the Tower, " I widen'd it, and took it from London into the " Contry, to fann myſelfe for ſome days in the " good air of Craford in Kent. Being now return- " ed, and having recover'd my ſtomach, which I " had in a manner quite loſt, I intend, if God will, " to fall to my old trade, if I have any ſupport to " follow it. My late misfortune, I feare, will much " prejudice me; many perſons unacquainted with " me, and hearing me to be a ſtranger, being apt to " derive a ſuſpicion upon me. Not a few came to " the Tower, merely to enquire after my crime, " and to ſee the warrant; in which when they " found, that it was for dangerous deſſeins and prac- " tices, they ſpred it over London, and made others " have no good opinion of me. Incærcera audac- " ter, ſemper aliquid hæret. Before I went into the " contry, I waited on my Lord Arlington, kiſſing " the rod. I hope, I ſhall live fully to ſatisfy his " Majeſty, and all honeſt Engliſhmen, of my inte- " grity, and of my reall zeal to ſpend the remainder " of my life in doing faithfull ſervice to the na- " tion, to the very utmoſt of my abilities. I have " learned, during this commitment, to know my " reall friends. God Almighty bleſſe them, and " enable me to convince them all of my gratitude." In his letter dated at London, Sept. 24th, 1667, he writes thus: " Mr. Martyn is now printing the " Tranſactions of this month, which will compriſe " alſo the two next precedent, and containe in the " beginning an animadverſion on the Engliſhed let- " ter of Monſieur Denys, concerning Transfuſion; " which tranſlation I diſowne for mine, inſcribing " this tract with Numb. 27, which the Stationer too " boldly preſumed to give to that tranſlated letter. " I hope my cenſure on the there mentioned ten " years conception before its birth here in England, " will ſatisfy thoſe ingenious Gentlemen of England, " that are concerned in that invention; of which I " alſo diſcourſed lately with Dr. Lower, who gave " me a kind viſit, and took occaſion to ſpeak of " that particular; whom I aſſured, that I had no " hand at all in the tranſlation of that letter, which " I was ſo farr from, that though I had the French " original, before any body had it in England, which " was the ſame day of my confinement, yet would " I not impart it to any perſon, becauſe I fully in-

(1) Afterwards Sir Chriſtopher Wren.

July 6, 1654; another dated there June 25, 1656; another dated there Auguſt 1, 1657; and another dated there Decemb. 20, 1659. He tranſlated into Engliſh, I. The Prodromus to a Diſſertation concerning ſolids naturally contained within ſolids, &c. London 1671, in 8vo, written by Nich. Steno. II. A genuine Explication of the book of Revelations, full of ſundry new Chriſtian Conſiderations, &c. London 1671, in 8vo, written by A. B. Piganius. III. The Life of the Dutcheſs of Mazarine, printed in 8vo, and tranſlated out of the French.

" tended not to publiſh it without ſuch an animad-
" verſion as I now have ſent to the preſſe. Mean " time, Mr. Martyn deals very mercenarily with " me; for knowing, that others will hardly under" take the printing of theſe papers, now ſo many
" of them have been printed by ſeverall, which renders
" it difficult for one to compleat them, without re-
" deeming the intereſt of others; he knowing this,
" I ſay, hath conſtrained me to abate him the rate
" yet lower, ſo that, after the proportion he allows
" now, I ſhall hardly bring it to 30 l. a year. Sir,
" I find the now Biſhop of Saliſbury, Dr. Ward, is " concerned for me; and I know, that he hath oc-
" caſions to advance perſons to beneficiall employ-
" ments, and that frequently there fall places, that " come to his knowledge, and for the ſupply where-
" of his advice is deſired. If it were not, that you
" muſt employ an Amanuenſis, I could preſume to
" intreat your favour of recommending me to him
" and to his remembrance, in caſe any ſuch place
" ſhould fall, that he ſhould heare of, and think
" conſiſtent with my office to the Royal Society."
In his letter dated at London, Decemb. 17th, 1667, he writes thus: " I am ſure, no man imagines
" what ſtore of papers and writings paſſe to and
" from me in a week from time to time, which I
" muſt rid myſelf of, without any aſſiſtance. I have
" no leſſe at preſent, than thirty correſpondents,
" partly domeſtick, partly forrain. Many of them, I " am not only to write to, but alſo to do buſineſs
" for; which requires much time to enquire after
" ſuch particulars, and diſpatch ſuch buſineſſes as
" they deſire, if I mean to be gratified reciprocally
" in ſuch things as I beſpeake of them. Beſides my
" conſtant attendance on the meetings of the Society
" and Council, and preſerving what is ſaid and
" done there, and giving order to have all regiſtred,
" and reviewing all the entries, ſolliciting alſo the " performances of the manifold taſkes, recommended
" and undertaken by the members of the Society,
" and deſtributing and ſending abroad ſuch directi-
" ons and inquiries as are thought conducive to ad" vance our deſſein, &c. I confeſſe, I extend my " patience as far as I can; but I am afraid, I have
" ſtretched it ſo farr already, that it will breake, un-
" leſſe ſomething be done to fortify it in ſome mea-
" ſure, which I find not that any of thoſe, who are
" upon the place, and cannot but ſee my daily labors
" and toyle, are in the leaſt ſollicitous of, though
" ſome of them are forced to acknowledge even in
" my hearing, that no man in England would doe
" what I do, upon the terms I goe away with. Sir,
" pardon me for this ſally; I am confident, you
" doe not much blame me for this complaint, which " I dare lodge in the boſom of ſo good and noble a
" friend, that in great meaſure knows my work and
" my condition, and upon occaſion repreſents it too.
" I have ſome ground to believe, that there are " perſons, who think the Tranſactions bring me in
" a ſufficient revenue; but I will make it out to
" any man, that I never receaved above 40 l. a year
" upon their account, (and that is litle more than my " houſe rent) and now by a new agreement, I have
" been obliged to make, I ſhall not bring it to above
" 36 l. a year at moſt. How ſtrangely therefore
" I muſt needs ſhift for my ſubſiſtence, and with
" what diſtraction I muſt performe my tedious work,
" let any ſober man judge." In his letter dated at London March 10th, $166\frac{7}{8}$, we find this paſſage: " The Biſhop of Saliſbury took occaſion the other " day of his own accord to expreſſe his great earneſt-
" neſſe to ſee me provided for, with a recognition
" for my labours, and concerns for the Society. He " would, he ſaid, have it urged in Councill; and
" was pleaſed to add, that he for his owne part was " aſhamed, that I was ſo long neglected, who had
" ſo many years ſpent all my time and all my pains
" upon the buſineſs of the Society, without any con-
" ſideration for it. I confeſſe, Sir, I make very " hard ſhift to weather it out; and I could be " contented it were inſiſted on in the Councill, but
" that I ſhall want your preſence and favor there, to " repreſent a litle the particulars, that paſſe through
" my hands, and the difficulties I groane under,
" which I cannot ſo well ſpecify to others, as I know
" you will give me leave to do to you." T.

☞ OLDHAM (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh Poet in the 17th Century, was ſon of Mr. John Oldham, a Nonconformiſt Miniſter, and grandſon of Mr. John Oldham, Rector of Nun-Eaton near Tedbury in Glouceſterſhire. He was born at Shipton (where his father had a congregation) near Tedbury, and in the ſame county, on the 9th of Auguſt 1653 (a). He was educated in grammar learning under the care of his father, till he was almoſt fit for the Univerſity; and to be compleatly qualified for that purpoſe he was ſent to Tedbury-ſchool, where he ſpent about two years under the tuition of Mr. Henry Heaven occaſioned by the earneſt requeſt of Alderman Yeat of Briſtol, who having a ſon at the ſame ſchool, was deſirous, that Mr. Oldham ſhould be his companion, which would, as he thought, very much conduce to the advancement of his learning. This ſome time retarded Mr. Oldham in the proſecution of his own ſtudies; but for the time he loſt in forwarding Mr. Yeat's ſon, his father afterwards made him an ample amends. Mr. Oldham being ſent to Edmund-Hall in Oxford was committed to the care of Mr. William Stephens, B. D. of which Hall he became a batler in the beginning of June 1670. He was ſoon obſerved to be a good Latiniſt, and chiefly to addict himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, and other polite acquirements. May 30, 1674, he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts, but left the Univerſity before he compleated that degree by detetmination, being, though very much againſt his inclination, compelled to go home, and live for ſome time with his father. The next year he was very much afflicted for the death of his dear friend and conſtant companion, the Reverend Mr. Charles Morvent, as appears by his ode upon that occaſion. In a ſhort time after he became uſher to the free-chool at Croyden in Surrey. Here it was, that he received a viſit from the Earl of Rocheſter, the Earl of Dorſet, Sir Charles Sedley, and other perſons of diſtinction, merely upon the reputation of ſome verſes, which they had ſeen in manuſcript. The maſter of the ſchool was not a little ſurprized at ſuch a viſit, and would have taken the honour of it to himſelf; but was ſoon convinced, that he had neither wit nor learning enough to make a party in ſuch company. This adventure is ſaid to have been of ſome length, and

(a) Life of Mr. John Oldham, p. 2, prefixed to his works, vol. 1. edit. London 1722. and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 751. 2d edit.

and to have brought him acquainted with ſome perſons of note. For after about three years continuance at Croyden-ſchool, he was recommended by his good friend Harman Atwood, Eſq; [A], Counſellor at Law of Saunderſted in Surrey, to Sir Edward Thurland, a Judge, near Rygate in the ſame county, who appointed him tutor to his two grandſons. He continued in this family till 1681. After this he was ſometime tutor to a ſon of Sir William Hickes, a gentleman living within three or four miles of London, who was intimately acquainted with that excellent Phyſician Dr. Richard Lower, by whoſe peculiar friendſhip and encouragement Mr. Oldham at his leiſure hours ſtudied phyſick for about a year, and made ſome progreſs therein; but the bent of his poetical genius was too ſtrong for him to become a proficient in any ſchool but that of the muſes [B]. When he had diſcharged the truſt repoſed to him of qualifying young Mr. Hickes for foreign travels, not caring, though earneſtly preſſed to go abroad with him, he took leave of the family, and with a ſmall ſum of money, which he had ſaved, haſtened to London, and became a perfect votary to the bottle, being a moſt agreeable companion [C]. He had not been long in London, before he was found out by the Noblemen, who had viſited him at Croyden, and who now brought him acquainted with Mr. Dryden. But amongſt the men of Quality, he was moſt affectionately careſſed by William Earl of Kingſton, who would fain have had him his chaplain; but he declined that employment [D]. He lived with the Earl at Holme-Pierpoint in Nottinghamſhire, where

[A] His good friend Harman Atwood, Eſq;] Mr. Aubrey informs us (1), that "the name and family "of Atwood have been of long duration in the vil-"lage of Saunderſted, in a lineal deſcent; though "the firſt I can find, ſays he, is one buried in the "Church, anno 1520. Of this family was Harman "Atwood, Eſq;. This gentleman was a ſingular bene-"factor to this and other Churches, whereof he was "a patron, by building houſes for the incumbents, "and reſtoring the impropriated tythes, which ſacri-"lege had deſpoiled them of, and for which he de-"ſerves honourable mention; though his reputation "can never die, while any reſpect is due to ſo exem-"plary virtue, or while the celebrated Oldham bears "any vogue in the world."

(1) Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of the County of Surrey, vol. 2. p. 60.

[B] But the bent of his poetical genius was too ſtrong for him to become a proficient in any ſchool but that of the Muſes.] This he freely acknowledges in a letter to a friend in town, written in July 1678, in which he ſpeaks thus (2):

(2) See his works, vol. 1. p. 239. & ſeqq. edit. London, 1728.

While ſilly I all thriving arts refuſe,
And all my hopes and all my vigour loſe
In ſervice of the worſt of jilts, a muſe.
For gainful buſineſs court ignoble eaſe,
And in gay trifles waſte my ill-ſpent days.
. . . . . .
Oft (I remember) did wiſe friends diſſuade,
And bid me quit the trifling barren trade.
Oft have I try'd, Heav'n knew, to mortify
This vile and wicked luſt of poetry;
But ſtill unconquer'd it remains within,
Fix'd as a habit, or ſome darling ſin.
In vain, I better ſtudies there would ſow;
Oft have I try'd, but none will thrive or grow.
All my beſt thoughts, when I'd moſt ſerious be,
Are never from its foul infection free:
Nay (God forgive me) when I ſay my prayers,
I ſcarce can help polluting them with verſe.
That ſab'lous wretch of old reverſ'd I ſeem,
Who turn, whate'er I touch, to droſs and rhime.
. . . . . .
Deaf to all means, which might moſt proper ſeem
Towards my cure, I run ſtark mad in rhime;
A ſad poor haunted wretch, whom nothing leſs
Than prayers of the church can diſpoſſeſs.
. . . . . .
What was't, I raſhly vow'd? Shall ever I
Quit my beloved miſtreſs poetry?
Thou ſweet beguiler of my lonely hours,
Which thus glide unperceiv'd with ſilent courſe:
Thou gentle ſpell, which undiſturb'd doſt keep
My breaſt, and charm intruding care aſleep:
They ſay, thou'rt poor and unendow'd, what tho'?
For thee I this vain worthleſs world forego.
Let wealth and honour be for fortune's ſlaves,
The alms of fools, and prize of crafty knaves.
To me thou art, whate'er th' ambitious crave,
And all that greedy miſers want or have.
In youth or age, in travel or at home,
Here, or in town, at London, or at Rome;
Rich, or a beggar, free, or in the fleet;
Whate'er my fate is, 'tis my fate to write.

[C] Being a moſt agreeable companion.] Mr. Robert Gould, in his verſes to the memory of our Author, thus addreſſes him:

"The company of beauty, wealth, and wine,
"Were not ſo charming, not ſo ſweet as thine:
"They quickly periſh'd; your's was ſtill the ſame,
"A lambent, but an everlaſting flame;
"Which ſomething ſo reſiſtleſs did impart,
"It never paſs'd the ear, but reach'd the heart.
"Unlike the wretch, that ſtrives to get eſteem,
"And thinks it fine and jaunty to blaſpheme,
"Nor can be witty, but when God's the theme:
"Miſtaken men (but ſuch thou didſt deſpiſe,)
"That muſt be wicked to be counted wiſe.
"Thy converſe from this reigning vice was free;
"And yet was truly all that wit could be:
"None had it, but ev'n with a tear does own,
"The ſoul of dear ſociety is gone."

[D] William Earl of Kingſton . . . . would fain have had him his chaplain; but he declined that employment.] The writer of his Life (3) obſerves, that our author, in his Satyr addreſſed to a friend, that is about to leave the Univerſity, and come abroad into the world, lets his friend know, that "he was affrighted "from the thought of ſuch an employment, by the "ſcandalous ſort of treatment, which often accom-"panies it. This uſage deters men of generous minds "from placing themſelves in ſuch a ſtation of life, "and by that means frequently excludes perſons of "quality from the improving and agreeable conver-"ſation of a learned and obſequious friend." In that Satire Mr. Oldham writes thus (4):

(3) p. 10.

(4) Works, vol. 2. p. 125, 126.

Some think themſelves exalted to the ſky,
If they light in ſome noble family.
Diet, and horſe, and thirty pounds a year,
Beſides th' advantage of his Lordſhip's ear;
The credit of the buſineſs and the ſtate,
Are things that in a youngſter's ſenſe ſound great.
Little the unexperienc'd wretch does know,
What ſlavery he oft muſt undergo;
Who tho' in ſilken-ſtuff and caſſock dreſt,
Wears but a gayer livery at beſt.
When dinner calls, the implement muſt wait
With holy words to conſecrate the meat;
But hold it for a favour ſeldom known,
If he be deign'd the honour to ſit down.
Soon as the Tarts appear, Sir Crape withdraw,
Thoſe dainties are not for a ſpiritual maw.
Obſerve your diſtance, and be ſure to ſtand
Hard by the ciſtern with your cap in hand:
There for diverſion you may pick your teeth,
Till the kind voider comes for your relief.
For meer board-wages ſuch their freedom ſell,
Slaves to an hour, and vaſſels to a bell:

where he being ſeized with the ſmall-pox, he died December 9, 1683, in the 30th year of his age, and was interred with the utmoſt decency, his Lordſhip attending as chief mourner, in the church there (b), where the Earl ſoon after erected a monument to his memory [E]. He wrote ſeveral poems [F]. He was tall of ſtature; the make of his body very thin; his face long, his noſe prominent, his aſpect unpromiſing, but ſatire was in his eye. His conſtitution was very tender, and inclined to a conſumption; and it was not a little injured by his ſtudy and application to learned authors, in whom he was greatly converſant, as appears from his Satires againſt the Jeſuiſts, in which there is as much learning as wit diſcovered. Mr. Dryden had a great eſteem for him [G]. In the (b) Life, p. a—14.

And if th' employment of one day be ſtole,
They are but priſ'ners out upon parole:
Always the marks of ſlavery remain,
And they, tho' looſe, ſtill drag about their chain.
And where's the mighty proſpect after all,
A Chaplainſhip ſerv'd up, and ſev'n years thrall?
The menial thing perhaps for a reward
Is to ſome ſlender benefice preferr'd,
With this proviſo bound, that he muſt wed
My Lady's antiquated waiting-maid,
In dreſſing only ſkill'd and marmalade.
Let others, who ſuch meanneſſes can brook,
Strike countenances to ev'ry great man's look:
Let thoſe, that have a mind, turn ſlaves to eat,
And live contented by another's plate:
I rate my freedom higher, nor will I
For food and raiment truck my liberty.
But if I muſt to my laſt ſhifts be put,
To fill a bladder, and twelve yards of gut;
Rather with counterfeited wooden leg,
And my right-arm ty'd up, I'll chooſe to beg.
I'll rather chooſe to ſtarve at large, than be
The gaudieſt vaſſal to dependency.

[E] The Earl ſoon after erected a monument to his memory.] The inſcription on it is as follows. M. S. Joh. Oldhami Poetæ, quo nemo ſacro furore plenior, nemo rebus ſublimior, aut verbis felicius audax; cujus famam omni ævo propria ſatis conſecrabunt carmina. Quem inter primos Honoratiſſimi Gulielmi Comitis de Kingſton Patroni ſui amplexus Variolis correptum, heu nimis immatura mors rapuit, & in cæleſtem tranſtulit Chorum. Natus apud Shipton in Agro Gloceſtrenſi, in Aulâ Sti Edmundi Graduatus. Obiit die Decembris nono, Anno Domini 1683. Ætatis 30.

[F] He wrote ſeveral Poems.] His works were printed at London 1722, in two volumes in 12mo. The firſt volume contains, 1. Four ſatires upon the Jeſuits, written in the year 1679. 2. A Satire againſt Virtue: a Pindaric Ode. Our Author, in his Advertiſement prefixed to his Satires againſt the Jeſuites, tells us, that this Poem, "tho' the world has given it the name of the Satire againſt Virtue, was never deſigned "to that intent, how apt ſoever ſome may be to "wreſt it. And this appears by what is ſaid after "it, and is diſcernable enough to all, that have the "ſenſe to underſtand it. 'Twas meant to abuſe "thoſe, who valued themſelves upon their wit and "parts in praiſing vice; and to ſhew, that others of "ſober principles, if they would take the ſame liberty in poetry, could ſtrain as high rants in profaneneſs as they. At firſt he intended it not for "the public, nor to paſs beyond the privacy of two "or three friends; but ſeeing it had the fate to ſteal "abroad in manuſcript, and afterwards in print, "without his knowledge, he now thinks it a juſtice "due to his own reputation, to have it come forth "without thoſe faults, which it has ſuffered from "tranſcribers and the preſs hitherto, and which "make it a worſe Satire upon himſelf, than upon "what it was deſigned." 3. An Apology for the foregoing Ode, by way of Epilogue. 4. The Paſſion of Byblis, from the ninth Book of Ovid's Metamorphoſis, imitated in Engliſh. 5. Satire upon a Woman, who by her Falſhood and Scorn, was the Death of his Friend. 6. Horace's Art of Poetry, imitated in Engliſh. Addreſſed by way of Letter to a Friend. 7. An Imitation of Horace, Book 1. Satire 9. written in June 1681. 8. Paraphraſe upon Horace, Book 1. Ode 31. 9. Paraphraſe upon Horace, Book 2. Ode 14. 10. The Praiſe of Homer, a Pindaric Ode. 11. Bion; a Paſtoral, in Imitation of the Greek of Moſchus, bewailing the Death of the Earl of Rocheſter. Ann. 1680. 12. The Lamentation for Adonis, imitated out of the Greek of Bion of Smyrna. 13. Paraphraſe on the 137*th Pſalm: a Pindarit Ode.* 14. Paraphraſe upon the Hymn of St. Ambroſe: A Pindaric Ode. 15. A letter from a friend in the country to a friend in town, giving an account of the Author's inclinations to poetry. Written in July 1678. 16. Satire upon a Printer, that expoſed him by printing a piece of his groſly mangled and faulty. The ſecond volume contains, 1. The eighth Satire of Boileau imitated. Written in October 1682. 2. The thirteenth Satire of Juvenal imitated. 3. David's lamentation for the death of Saul and Jonathan. Written in September 1677. 4. An Ode of Ariſtotle in Athenæus upon honour paraphraſed. 5. Upon the works of Ben Johnſon. Written in 1678. 6. The ninth Ode of the third book of Horace imitated. 7. Upon a Lady, overturned in a coach. Out of Voiture. 8. Catullus, Epigram 7. Imitated. 9. Some Elegies out of Ovid's Amours, imitated. 10. A Fragment of Petronius, imitated. 11. An Ode of Anacreon, paraphraſed. 12. An alluſion to Martial, Book 1. Epigr. 118. 13. The Dream. Written March 10, 1677. 14. A Satire touching Nobility. Out of Monſieur Boileau. 15. A Satire addreſſed to a friend, that is about to leave the Univerſity, and come abroad in the world. 16. Some Verſes written in September 1676, preſenting a book to Coſinelia. 17. The Parting. 18. Complaining of Abſence. 19. Promiſing a viſit. 20. The careleſs good Fellow, written March 9, 1680. A Song. 21. A Satire; in which the perſon of Spenſer is brought in diſſuading the author from the ſtudy of poetry, and ſhewing how little it is eſteemed and encouraged in this preſent time. 22. A Satire in imitation of the third Satire of Juvenal. Written May 1682. 23. A Dithyrambick: a drunkard's ſpeech in a maſk. Written in Auguſt 1677. 24. Remains of Mr. Oldham in verſe and proſe, viz. 1. Verſes on his death by Mr. Thomas Hotman, Mr. Nahum Tate, Mr. Durfey, Mr. Thomas Andrews, Mr. Thomas Wood, Mr. Robert Gould, &c. 2. The Counterpart to the Satire againſt Virtue. 3. Virgil's Eclogue 8. tranſlated. 4. Upon the marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Lady Mary. 5. Ode for an anniverſary of muſick on St. Cecilia's day, ſet by Dr. Blow. 6. To Madam L. E. upon her recovery from a late ſickneſs. 7. On the death of Miſs Katherine Kingſtone, a child of excellent parts and piety. 8. To the memory of his dear friend Mr. Charles Morwent. 9. To the memory of that worthy gentleman Mr. Harman Atwood. 10. Character of a certain ugly old Parſon. 11. A Sunday thought in ſickneſs.

[G] Mr. Dryden had a great eſteem for him.] This appears from that Poet's verſes to his memory, which are as follow:

"Farewel, too little, and too lately known,
"Whom I began to think and call my own;
"For ſure our ſouls were near allied, and thine
"Caſt in the ſame poetic mould with mine.
"One common note on either lyre did ſtrike,
"And knaves and fools were both abhorr'd alike.
"To the ſame Goal did both our ſtudies drive;
"The laſt ſet out, the ſooneſt did arrive.
"Thus Niſus * fell upon the ſlippery place,
"While his young friend perform'd and won the race.
"O early ripe! to thy abundant ſtore
"What could advancing age have added more?
"It might, what nature never gives the young,
"Have taught the ſmoothneſs of thy native tongue.
"But ſatire needs not thoſe, and wit will ſhine
"Thro' the harſh cadence of a rugged line:
"A noble error, and but ſeldom made,
"When Poets are by too much force betray'd.
"Thy

* Niſus, famous in Virgil for his friendſhip with Euryalus, with whom he loſt his life.

the ſecond volume of a great hiſtorical, geographical, and poetical Dictionary, he is ſtiled "the darling of the Muſes, a pithy, ſententious, elegant, and ſmooth writer. His "tranſlations exceeded the original, and his invention ſeems matchleſs. His Satire "againſt the Jeſuiſts is of ſpecial note; and he may juſtly be ſaid to have excelled all "the Satiriſts of the age."

"Thy gen'rous fruits, tho' gather'd e'er their prime,
"Still ſhew'd a quickneſs; and maturing time
"But mellows what we write to the dull ſweets of rhime.

"Once more hail and farewel; farewel, thou young,
"But ah! too ſhort, Marcellus of our tongue;
"Thy brow's with ivy and with laurels bound;
"But fate and gloomy night encompaſs thee around."

T.

OLEN, a Greek poet, antienter than to Orpheus (a), was a native of Xanthus a city of Lycia [A]. He compoſed ſeveral hymns which were ſung in the iſland of Delos on ſolemn days, dedicated to religion (b), particularly in honour of the Goddeſs Lucina (c), who he ſaid was Cupid's mother (d). He was the firſt that aſſerted, that Achaia came from the country of the Hyperboreans to the iſland of Delos (e). Others ſay (f), that he was one of the Hyperboreans who founded the oracle of Delphi; and that he was the firſt Prieſt of Apollo there, that is, gave one of the oracular anſwers, which he did in hexameters. Mention is made of him in a paſſage of Pauſanias, which Romulus Amaſeus did not correct [B]. I muſt make ſome remarks on the ſupplement to Moreri [C].

(a) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 302.
(b) Herodot. lib. 4. c. 35.
(c) Pauſan. lib. 1. p. 16.
(d) Pauſan. lib. 9. p. 302.
(e) Idem, lib. 5. p. 154.
(f) Idem. lib. 10. p. 320, 321.

[A] He was a native of Xanthus, a city of Lycia.] Herodotus and Pauſanias inform us that he was a Lycian, but then they do not tell us the city in which he was born. The reader will ſee the name of it, in the two following verſes of Callimachus:

Οἱ μὲν ὑπαείδουσι νόμον Λυκίοιο γέροντος
Ὃν τοι ἀπὸ Ξάνθοιο θεοπρόπος ἤγαγεν Ὠλήν.

(1) Callimachus, Hymno in Delum, ver. 304. p. 132. edit. Græv. 1697.

The Senſe is,

"For theſe repeat the Lycian Sage's ſong,
"Which Olen formerly from Xanthus brought."

[B] A paſſage of Pauſanias, which Romulus Amaſeus did not correct.] 'Tis this: Λύκιος δὲ ὃς ἦν ἀρχαιότερος τὴν ἡλικίαν Δήλιος ὕμνους καὶ ἄλλοις ποιήσας, καὶ ἐν Εἰλειθυίαν τε, ἔυλινόν τε αὐτὴν ἀνακαλεῖ (2). "But Lyceus, "who was much older, a native of Delos, gives her "the name of Eulinon, or ſpinſter, in hymns writ- "ten in honour of other deities, and of Lycina "herſelf." Gregorius Gyraldus conjectures that we ought to read ὠλὴν inſtead of Δήλιος (3); however, the correction ought to be made there, but immediately after Λύκιος δὲ; for, inſtead of ὃς ἦν, we muſt read ὠλὴν; and afterwards, inſtead of Δήλιος, we muſt write Δηλίους. This conjecture occurred to me before I ſaw the new edition of Pauſanias: I have conſulted it ſince, and found a note of Kuhnius, which explains the paſſage after that manner. Here we have one of the cauſes, which have given birth to many chimerical authors; for here we are told of a very antient poet, one Lycius of Delos, who owes his exiſtence entirely to the error of a copiſt.

(2) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 253.

(3) Pro Delion Olena legendum. Lilius Gregor. Gyraldus, de Poët. Hiſt. Dialogo 3. init. p. m. 118.

[C] I muſt make ſome remarks on the ſupplement to Moreri.] I. 'Tis an error to ſay barely, that Olen was of the city of Dyme in Achaia; for though Suidas called him Δυμαῖος (a Dymæan), he yet adds, that it is now juſt to ſuppoſe him a native of Xanthus in Lycia, after Callimachus Polyhiſtor. II. The following paſſage is not very accurate: the hymns of Olen uſed to be ſung, in the iſland of Delos, during the ſolemnities obſerved there for ſick perſons, by throwing upon them duſt taken from the Sepulchre of the goddeſs Opis or Cybele, called by the Greeks Hecaerge. This probably was copied from a work of Gyraldus (4), where we read that the hymns of Olen uſed to be ſung in Delos, whilſt the aſhes, taken from the Sepulchre of Opis ſirnamed Hecaerge, were caſt on a numberleſs multitude of ſick and diſeaſed perſons who ſtood near the altar. For this he cites Herodotus, and adds, that Pauſanias ſaid almoſt the ſame thing: idem fere ſcribit Pauſanias (5); but it is certain that Gyraldus was miſled by Laurentius Valla's tranſlation. This is not the ſenſe of Herodotus's Greek text (6); he is a little confuſed in that place; and may be underſtood in a ſenſe vaſtly oppoſite to that of Valla, as is plain from another verſion printed in the margin. Herodotus does not ſay that Ops or Opis was ſirnamed Hecaerge. He does not ſpeak of Ops mother of the Gods, but of a young woman who came from that country of the Hyperboreans to the iſland of Delos, with another young woman named Arge. Theſe two young women undertook this journey, to offer up Lucina the gifts deſigned for her, in order to obtain a ſpeedy and propitious delivery (7). But as Pauſanias ſcarce mentions any of thoſe particulars; how therefore can it be affirmed, that he relates almoſt the ſame particulars as Herodotus is ſuppoſed to have done? The continuator of Moreri would perhaps be very much puzzled, ſhould he be required to prove that the Goddeſs Cybele was ſirnamed Hecaerge, that is, who poſſeſſes the virtue or power of operating things at a diſtance. But were the ſolemnity he ſpeaks of true, ſhould we not have an Aſhwedneſday in the heathen Syſtem, as well as in the Popiſh religion, and that accompanied with ſome very ſingular characteriſticks of ſuperſtition? Perſons afflicted with diſeaſes of every kind, would have flattered themſelves with the hopes of getting cured, by the virtue of aſhes taken from the Sepulchre of Opis; but then they muſt have been near the altar, and therefore the epithet of Hecaerge does not ſuit on this occaſion. If the reader conſults the learned Mr. Spanheim's notes on Callimachus (8), he will find ſtrong proofs, that Hecaerge was not an epithet of Cybele, or of the Opis who was one of the Hyperborean young women that came to Delos with offerings; but the name of a female companion of Opis in that journey.

(4) Gyraldus, de Poëtar. Hiſt. Dialogo 3. init. p. m. 118.
(5) Idem, ibid.
(6) Theodot. lib. 4. c. 35. p. m. 236.
(7) Ἀντὶ τοῦ ὠκυτόκου, i. e. "To forward "the birth." Theodot. lib. 4. c. 35. p. 235.
(8) Ezech. Spanhemius in Callimachi Hymnum in Delum. p. 503.

OLYMPIAS, the mother of Alexander the Great, made herſelf ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected of adultery by her huſband King Philip of Macedon, that he divorced her [A]. It is even pretended that ſhe confeſſed to him that he was not the father of Alexander, and that ſhe

(1) Cujus (Attali) ſororem nuper expulſo Alexandri matre Olympiade propter ſtupri ſuſpicionem in matrimonium receperat; i. e. "Whoſe (i. e. "Attalus's) ſiſ- "ter he had "lately married, "having divor- "ced Olympias,

[A] She made herſelf ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected of adultery by . . . . King Philip that he divorced her.] Juſtin ſays no more than this in the 5th chapter of his 9th book (1); but in another place he aſſerts, that the matter was brought to a full conviction, which was the reaſon why ſhe was divorced. Namque mater ejus Olympias confeſſa viro ſuo Philippo fuerat, Alexandrum non ex eo ſe, ſed ex ſerpente ingentis magnitudinis concepiſſe. Denique Philippus ultimo prope vitæ ſuæ tempore, filium ſuum non eſſe palam prædicaverat. Qua ex cauſa Olympiadem, velut ſtupri compertam, repudio dimiſerat (2), i. e. "For his mother Olympias had con- "feſſed to King Philip her huſband, that ſhe had not "conceived Alexander by him, but by a ſerpent of "an immenſe bigneſs. And further, Philip had "openly declared towards the latter end of his life, "that

"Alexander's "mother, be- "cauſe he ſuſ- "pected her of "adultery." Juſtin. lib. 9. c. 5.
(2) Idem, lib. 11. c. 11.

ſhe had lain with a ſerpent when ſhe conceived that ſon (a) [B]. She is not the only perſon of whom ſuch ſtories have been related (b). They are miſtaken, who pretend that Nectanebus, who was baniſhed from Egypt, and took ſanctuary at the Court of Macedon, debauched Olympias [C]. She was ſo exaſperated againſt her huſband when he married another wife, that ſhe encouraged Pauſanias to kill him. She was not ſorry that the

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) See the remark [H].

" that Alexander was not his ſon. For which reaſon " he had divorced Olympias as a woman convicted " of adultery." There are ſome diſſolute women who are very civil and complaiſant to their huſbands, which in ſome manner atones for their ſins: but Olympias was croſs and peeviſh (3); ſo that Philip had a very hard taſk upon his hands, being obliged to ſuffer at once both from the ill humour and from the adultery of his wife.

(3) Ἡ τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος χαλεπότης, δυσζηλία καὶ βαρυθυμία γυναικός. " The ill hu- " mour, of O- " lympias, who " was a miſtruſt- " ful and peeviſh " woman." Plutarch in Alexandro, p. 669. A.

[B] She had lai with a ſerpent when ſhe had conceived that ſon.] Beſides Juſtin's authority quoted above, I may alledge what Plutarch relates, namely, that a large ſerpent was ſeen lying upon Olympias whilſt ſhe was aſleep; that the King having ſeen it through the chink of the door, loſt the eye which he put to that chink (4); that he alſo became ſenſible after that time that his love for Olympias grew leſs and leſs; that he lay but ſeldom with her afterwards, either becauſe he feared leſt ſhe ſhould bewitch him, or that ſhe revered the God, who in the ſhape of a ſerpent came to careſs the Queen. Ὤφθη δὲ ποτὲ καὶ δράκων, κοιμωμένης τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος, παρικλιθεὶς αὐτῇ τῷ σώματι. καὶ τοῦτο Φιλίππῳ τὸν ἔρωτα καὶ τὰς φιλοφροσύνας ἀμαυρῶσαι λέγουσιν, ὡς μηδὲ φοιτᾶν ἔτι πολλάκις παρ' αὐτὴν ἀναπαυόμενον. εἴτε δεισιδαίμονας τινὰς μαγείας αὐτῷ καὶ φάρμακα τῆς γυναικὸς, εἴτε τὴν ὁμιλίαν, ὡς κρείττονι συνοῦσαν, ἀφοσιούμενον, i. e. " A ſerpent, or dragon, was ſeen " ſtretched out over Olympias whilſt ſhe was aſleep: " and it is ſaid that this leſſened Philip's love and " fondneſs for her, ſo that he went but ſeldom to " lye with her, either becauſe he feared her charms " and incantations, or did not care to keep company " with a woman who converſed with a greater being " than himſelf (5)." It is alſo aſſerted, that Eratoſthenes related that Olympias imparted that fine ſecret to Alexander only, and not before he ſet out for the war. Behave yourſelf, added ſhe, in a manner ſuitable to your high birth. Ἡ δὲ Ὀλυμπιὰς (ὡς Ἐρατοσθένης φησὶ) προπέμπουσα τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπὶ τὴν στρατείαν, καὶ φράσασα μόνῳ τὸ περὶ τὴν τέκνωσιν ἀπόῤῥητον, ἐκέλευεν ἄξια φρονεῖν τῆς γενέσεως, i. e. " When Alexan- " der was ſetting out for the war, Olympias (as Era- " toſthenes relates) told him privately the ſecret of " his birth, exhorting him at the ſame time to be- " have himſelf ſuitably to his high deſcent (6)." Obſerve that according to Juſtin, Olympias's lying with a ſerpent happened only in a dream. That Queen dreamed that a large ſerpent enjoyed her the night ſhe conceived Alexander (7). One of our beſt criticks obſerves upon this paſſage, that there were ſerpents in Macedonia, which were ſo eaſily tamed that the women uſed to put them round their arms, and round their necks, like bracelets or necklaces, either to play with them, or to cool themſelves; whereupon he quotes Lucian's authority. Hoc autem non abs re fuerit meminiſſe, (nam ex nihilo, ut ajunt, nihil) reperiri in Macedonia ſerpentes, qui tam facile manſuefieri poſſint, ut ex iis olim & puellæ & matronæ ſibi armillas, ſibi monilia facerent, vel ut animulas ſuas oblectarent, vel ad corpuſculum frigerandum. Hujus rei auctorem ciere poſſum Lucianum in Alexandro, ſive Pſeudomanti (8). Lucian does not mention thoſe bracelets, nor thoſe Necklaces; but he relates ſome particulars, which are not leſs ſurpriſing. He aſſerts that the women at Pella uſed to feed large ſerpents, who were ſo well tamed that they ſucked them, and ſuffered them to lye with their children. He is apt to think that the tradition, which was ſpread abroad concerning Olympias, came originally from thence. Ἐλαῦνα ἰδόντες δράκοντας τεραμναγίους, ἡμέρους πάνυ, καὶ τιθασσοὺς, ὡς καὶ ὑπὸ γυναικῶν τρέφεσθαι καὶ παιδίοις συγκαθεύδειν, καὶ πικρμένους ἀνέχεσθαι, καὶ θηλαζομένους μὴ ἀγανακτεῖν, καὶ γάλα πίνειν ἀπὸ θηλῆς καὶ ταῦτα τοῖς βρέφεσι, πολλοὶ δὲ γίνεσθαι τοιοῦτοι παρ' αὐτοῖς, ὥστε καὶ τὸν περὶ τῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος μῦθον διαφοιτῆσαι πάλαι ἴσως, ὁπόταν ἴδωσι τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον, δράκοντός τινος οἶμαι τοιούτου συγκαθεύδοντος αὐτῇ, δυσὶ λαβοῦσαι ταῖν ἰρπίσιν ἐν τὸ κάλλιστον, ὀλίγων δεομένοις, i. e. " They ſaw there ſome ſerpents immenſely large, " but ſo tame and mild, that they were fed by wo- " men, and lay with children: they ſuffered them- " ſelves to be trod upon, nor would they be angry " when they were ſqueeſed; they even ſucked the " milk out of the women's breaſts, like children. " (There are many of theſe ſerpents in thoſe parts; " whence it is probable that the ſtory of Olympias " was owing to her lying with ſuch a ſerpent, when ſhe " conceived Alexander) one of the moſt beautiful of " thoſe ſerpents is ſold for a trifle (9)." According to Plutarch (10) the women of that country made uſe of thoſe ſerpents during the Feſtival of Bacchus; for they took a pride in celebrating it with all the ſigns of the moſt furious fanaticiſm. They took care to make thoſe ſerpents creep upon the ſpears * which they carried in their hands, and upon the crowns which they wore on their heads, thinking the more to frighten the men thereby. Plutarch obſerves that Olympias affected to be more tranſported with fury at thoſe ſolemnities, than the other women. Ἡ δὲ Ὀλυμπιὰς μᾶλλον ἐτέρων ζηλώσασα τὰς καλοχὰς, καὶ τοὺς ἐνθουσιασμοὺς ἐξάγουσα βαρβαρικώτερον, ὄφεις μιγάλους χειροήθεις ἐφιλκίλο τοῖς θιάσοις, i. e. " Olympias, who " affected more than the other women, to be tranſ- " ported with fury, and to celebrate that enthuſiaſtical " ſolemnity after a more fierce manner, uſed to lead " huge ſerpents, which were tamed, in her dances (11)."

(4) Ἀποβαλεῖν δὲ τῶν ὄψεων αὐτὸν τὴν ἑτέραν, ἣν τῷ τῆς θύρας ἀρμῷ προσβαλὼν, κατώπτευσεν ἐν μορφῇ δράκοντος συνευναζόμενον τῇ γυναικὶ τὸν Θεόν, i. e. " That he " loſt one of his " eyes, which " he applied to " the chink of " the door to ſee " the God, who " in the ſhape of " a ſnake lay " with his " wife." Plut. in Alex. init. p. m. 665.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Qua nocte eum mater Olympias concepit, viſa per quietem ab cum ingenti ſerpente volutari (others read voluptari.) Juſtin. lib. 12. c. 16.

(8) Tanaquillus Faber, in Juſtin. p. 291. edit. Græv. 1683.

(9) Lucianus, in Pſeudomanti, p. 863. Tom. 1. edit. Salmurienſis, 1619.

(10) Plutarch, in Alexandro, p. 665.

* In Latin Thyrſi, ſpears wrapt about with Ivy, or Bay-leaves.

[C] They are miſtaken, who pretend that Nectanebus .. debauched Olympias.] Plutarch (12) tells us, that Nectanebus or Nectanabus, forſaking Tachus, a relation of his, who had made him General of his army, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King of Egypt (13), and that Ageſilaus followed his party. The Perſians vanquiſhed him, and drove him out of Egypt. Some pretend that he took ſanctuary in Æthiopia; but others aſſert that he went to the Court of Macedon, becauſe he imagined that King Philip would aſſiſt him powerfully againſt the Perſians. But, ſay ſome, he was ſo unthankful for the kind reception he met with from that Prince, that he made uſe of all poſſible means to enjoy Olympias, having recourſe even to the magical Art; in which he was a great proficient (14). By that means he made the Queen yield to his wiſhes, ſo that ſhe conceived Alexander by him. It is added that King Philip diſcovered ſomething of this, and that after that time he ſuſpected his wife of adultery, which was the true reaſon why he divorced her. This is a mere ſtory. It appears from Chronology that Alexander was ſix years old when Nectanebus was driven from his Kingdom. I owe this obſervation to the learned Freinſhemius, and leave the whole glory of it to him. Nec deſunt, ſays he, qui fabuloſum id quidem; non tamen adulterium matris falſo jactatum aſſerant. Quippe pulſum Ægypti regno Nectanebum, non, ut vulgo arbitrantur, in Æthiopias conceſſiſſe; ſed quum adverſus vim Perſicam in Philippo maxime præſidium ſperaret, in Macedoniam vectum, magicis præſtigiis inluſiſſe Olympiadi, torumque hoſpitis temeraviſſe. Suſpectam quidem exinde Philippo, neque aliam tam intimam divortii quod inter eos ſequutum eſt, cauſſam, pro comperto poſtea fuiſſe .... (16) Cæterum Nectanebi fuga temporibus hiſce non congruit; ſexennis enim jam erat Alexander, quum ille ab Ocho victus, avitis opibus excideret, i. e. " There are ſome authors who pretend " that this ſtory is falſe, though they acknowledge " that Alexander's mother was not unjuſtly charged " with adultery. The ſtory is as follows. Nectane- " bus being driven out of his Kingdom of Egypt, " went not into Æthiopia, as it is commonly thought, " but into Macedon, being in hopes that King Philip " would aſſiſt him againſt the Perſians. That he abuſed " Olympias by the means of his magical arts, and " defiled the bed of his Hoſt. That Philip ſuſpected " Olympias after that time, which was the chief " reaſon why he divorced her afterwards .... But " Nectanebus's flight cannot be referred to that time; " for Alexander was ſix years old when Nectanebus " was vanquiſhed by Ochus, and obliged to abdicate " the Kingdom of his anceſtors."

(11) Plutarch, in Alexand. p. 665.

(12) Idem, in Ageſilao, p. 617.

(13) See the article TACHUS.

(14) We read of a certain magician called Nectanabus, that he made a number of ſhips and gallies of wax; and as he ſunk them in a large baſon of water, the ſhips of his enemies ran the ſame danger. Vigenere ſur la Statue d'Eſculape de Philoſtrate, folio 157, Tom. 2. edit. in 4to.

(15) Freinſhemius, Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. 1. c. 1. num. 15.

(16) Idem, ibid. num. 19.

world

world ſhould know ſhe was concerned in that murder [D]. At firſt ſhe was glad men ſhould think that ſhe got Alexander by Jupiter (c); but afterwards ſhe ridiculed that opinion, as appears from a letter ſhe wrote to that Prince [E], when ſhe knew that he proclaimed himſelf loudly the ſon of Jupiter, and would be worſhipped as a God [F], Antipater was almoſt perpetually at variance with her during Alexander's abſence; and it was indeed very difficult for a woman ſo ſuſpicious and ſo ill humoured as ſhe was (d) to agree with the perſon who commanded in Macedon. For that was the poſt which Alexander conferred on Antipater, when he ſet out to conquer Aſia. After that Conqueror's death his mother was obliged to retire into Epirus, whence Polyperchon called her back ſix years after. Arideus and his wife Eurydice, who reigned in Macedon, attempted to prevent her return, but their endeavours proved ineffectual; the Macedonians declared for her, and by her command they diſpatched both Eurydice and her huſband (e). She put Nicanor Caſſander's brother to death; and having pitched upon an hundred illuſtrious Macedonians, friends to the ſame Caſſander, ſhe cauſed them to be all murdered. That cruel behaviour made her ſoon loſe the love of her ſubjects; they all called then to mind Antipater's laſt words; and the advice he gave them on his death-bed never to ſuffer that a woman

(c) See the remarks [A] and [B].

(d) See the remark [A] quot. 3.

(e) See above, the article of EURYDICE, the daughter of Amyntas, in the Text.

[D] She was not ſorry that the world ſhould know, ſhe was concerned in that murder.] The diſgrace occaſioned by her divorce, and her huſband's new marriage (17), exaſperated her to ſuch a degree, that he endeavoured to perſuade her brother the King of Epirus to make war againſt Philip; ſhe would have ſucceeded in that deſign, had not Philip prevented it by marrying his daughter to that King (18). She prevailed upon Pauſanias to murder her huſband; ſhe cauſed horſes to be kept ready to carry the murderer off; and the very night ſhe arrived in Macedon to aſſiſt at that Prince's funeral, ſhe cauſed a crown to be put on Pauſanias's head, whoſe body was hanged on a croſs. A few days after ſhe had his funeral celebrated; ſhe raiſed a monument to him; and inſpired the people's breaſts with ſuch a ſuperſtition, as to make them celebrate annually a ſolemn Feſtival to the honour of that murderer. Afterwards ſhe cauſed the daughter to be killed, whom her huſband had got by Cleopatra; ſhe had her killed, I ſay, in her mother's lap, and then ſhe cauſed the mother to be hanged before her eyes (19). Laſtly ſhe conſecrated to Apollo the dagger, with which Pauſanias had killed Philip, and would have that dagger called by the name (of Myrtalis) by which ſhe went when ſhe was a child. She did all theſe things ſo publickly, that one would have thought ſhe feared, leſt people ſhould not have ſufficient proofs to be ſatisfied that all this was done by herſelf. See whether I have miſtaken Juſtin's ſenſe (20). His ſtimulis irarum utrique (21) Pauſaniam, de impunitate ſtupri ſui querentem, ad tantum facinus impuliſſe creduntur. Olympias certe fugienti percuſſori equos quoque præparatos habuit. Ipſa deinde, audita regis nece, cum titulo officii ad exequias cucurriſſet, in cruce pendentis Pauſaniæ capiti, eadem nocte qua venit, coronam auream impoſuit: quod nemo alius audere, niſi hæc, ſuperſtite Philippi filio, potuiſſet. Paucos deinde poſt dies, refixum corpus interfectoris ſuper reliquias mariti cremavit, & tumulum ei eodem fecit in loco, parentarique eidem quotannis, incuſſa populo ſuperſtitione, curavit. Poſt hæc Cleopatram, a qua pulſa Philippi matrimonio fuerat, in gremio ejus prius filia interfecta, finire vitam ſuſpendio coëgit, ſpectaculoque pendentis ultionem potita eſt, ad quam per parricidium feſtinaverat. Noviſſime gladium, quo rex percuſſus eſt, Apollini ſub nomine Myrtalis conſecravit: hoc enim ante Olympiadis parvulæ fuit. Quæ omnia ita palam facta ſunt, ut timuiſſe videatur, ne facinus ab ea commiſſum non probaretur.

(17) He married Cleopatra, Attalus's daughter, according to Juſtin, lib. 9. c. 5. or his niece, according to Plutarch. in Alexandro, and to Diodorus Siculus, lib. 16. c. 94.

(18) Extracted from Juſtin, lib. 9. c. 7

(19) Juſtin's words may be underſtood in that ſenſe; but they may alſo ſignify, that Olympias went to ſee Cleopatra only after ſhe was hanged.

(20) Juſtinus, ibid. p. m. 204, 205.

(21) That is to ſay, Olympias, and her ſon Alexander.

[E] This appears from a letter ſhe wrote to that Prince.] When he wrote to his mother, he ſtiled himſelf ſon of Jupiter Hammon. Whereupon ſhe made him the following anſwer. Pray, ſon, keep yourſelf quiet; do not ſet up for my accuſer before Juno; for ſhe will do me ſome great miſchief, ſince in your letters you confeſs me her rival. We know this particular only from Aulus Gellius; for Varro's work, from which he tranſcribed it, and ſeveral other Authors, who mentioned it alſo, are not extant now. Here follow the words of Aulus Gellius (22): In pleriſque monumentis rerum ab Alexandro geſtarum, & paulo antè in libro M. Varronis, qui inſcriptus eſt Oreſtes vel de inſania, Olympiadem Philippi uxorem feſtiviſſimè reſcripſiſſe legimus Alexandro filio. Nam quum is ad matrem ita ſcripſiſſet; Rex Alexander Jovis Hammonis filius Olympiadi matri ſalutem dicit. Olympias reſcripſit ad hanc ſententiam: Amabo, inquit, mi fili, quieſcas: neque deferas me neque criminere adverſum Junonem. Malum mihi prorſum illa magnum dabit, quum tu me litteris tuis pellicem illi eſſe confiteris. Freinſhemius is miſtaken, when he aſſerts that Olympias wrote to Alexander, that ſhe had not deſerved to be expoſed to Juno's reſentment. Miſſaque epiſtola petiviſſe, ne ſe nihil tale commeritam odiis Junonis objectare pergeret (23). Moreri, who never conſulted originals, has given us the ſubſtance of that letter erroneouſly, becauſe he relied on the tranſlation (24) of Freinſhemius. I do not deny but Olympias's words ſeem to be a mere raillery; but upon the whole, if one would lay a ſtreſs on the literal ſenſe of her expreſſions, one might aſſert, that this Princeſs does not deny ſhe converſed with Jupiter formerly, but that ſhe only wiſhes her ſon would not boaſt of it, leſt Juno, who would otherwiſe be perhaps ignorant of it, or who would not mind it, as long as it was not boaſted of, ſhould revive all the fury of her ancient jealouſy, upon ſeeing that new baſtard of her huſband, proclaim to all the world, the favours Olympias had granted him. Since therefore this is all that can be inferred from the literal ſenſe of Aulus Gellius's words, they ought not to have been quoted in Italicks, as though it were there poſitively aſſerted, that Olympias proteſted ſhe was innocent. The expreſſions (25), which Plutarch uſed (26), ſignify only, that Olympias would have her ſon keep his tongue: Now there is a great difference between ſaying, I will not be accuſed to Juno, and ſaying, I have done nothing, at which Juno can be offended. Ælian relates a particular, which ſhews that this Queen made once a very pious reflection on the weakneſs which Alexander betray'd, when he would paſs for a God. Olympias hearing that he had been dead ſome days, without being yet buried (27), cried out, Oh! my poor ſon, you have done all your endeavours to have a place amongſt the Gods, and you have not even obtained yet what is common to all mortal men, the honour of a burial. Ἀλλὰ σὺ μὲν ἁρπαῦ μαθασχεῖν βυλόμενος, καὶ τῦτα σπεύδων, νῦν οὐδὲ τῶν κοινῶν ὄλπυ, καὶ ἴσων πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις μαθασχεῖν ἔχεις, γῆς τε ἅμα, καὶ ταφῆς; i. e. "You would be placed amongſt the "Celeſtial Beings, you ſtudied it with all your endeavours, and you have not been able to procure "even that which is the common right of all mankind, a piece of ground for a burial place (28)." This calls to my mind a joke of the ſophiſt Theocritus (29), who hearing of Alexander's death, ſaid to his countrymen, have a good courage, Gentlemen, ſince you ſee the Gods die before the men.

(22) Aulus Gellius, lib. 13. c. 4.

(23) Freinſhemius, Supplem. lib. 1. c. 1. num. 20. He quotes Agell. 13. 4.

(24) Made by Du Rier, and added to Vaugelas's French tranſlation of Quintus Curtius.

(25) That is to ſay, thoſe which he aſcribes directly to Olympias.

(26) Ἔτεροι δέ φασιν αὐτὴν ἀφεσιῶσθαι καὶ λέγειν, Οὐ πεποίηταί με δυσελπλων Ἀλέξανδρος πρὸς τὴν Ἥραν. "Others ſay, "ſhe did not "like it, and "ſaid, Shall A- "lexander never "ceaſe accuſing "me to Juno?" Plutarch, in Alexandro.

(27) See Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. c. 64.

(28) Ælian. Ibid. lib. 13. c. 30.

(29) Clem. Alexandr. Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 61.

[F] Alexander proclaimed himſelf the ſon of Jupiter, and would be worſhipped as a God.] By uſurping thus divine honours, he had ſeveral views, and particularly that of clearing the reputation of Olympias, who was thought to have acted againſt the rules of chaſtity. I ſhall quote my voucher for this, who will tell us at the ſame time how venal the heathen Oracles were become. We ſhall ſee, that Alexander cauſed the Prieſts of Jupiter Hammon to be bribed, that they might be prevailed upon to anſwer according to his deſire, about Jupiter's being his father. Igitur Alexander cupiens originem divinitatis acquirere, ſimul & matrem infamia liberare, per præmiſſos ſubornat antiſtites, quid a woman ſhould aſcend the throne [G] was looked upon as an Oracle. Olympias therefore, diſtruſting the people's good will towards her, went and ſhut herſelf up at Pydra, as ſoon as ſhe heard of Caſſander's arrival; ſhe was beſieged there, and obliged to capitulate for want of proviſions. Caſſander promiſed to grant her her life, but he did not perform that article of the capitulation. He called the people together, and aſked them what they would have him do with that Princeſs: whereupon they, whom he had bribed, and who were nearly related to the perſons whom Olympias had put to death, required that ſhe might be puniſhed for all her cruelties. Their complaints were favourably heard, and quid ſibi reſponderi velit. Ingredientem templum ſtatim antiſtites ut Hammonis filium ſalutant. Ille lætus dei adoptione hoc ſe patre cenſeri jubet. Rogat deinde, an omnes interfectores parentis ſui ſit ultus; reſpondetur, patrem ejus nec poſſe interfici, nec mori; regis Philippi peractam plene ultionem eſſe (30), i. e. "Alexander therefore wiſhing to be of a divine deſcent, and alſo to "clear his mother's reputation from infamy, ſent "meſſengers before him to bribe the Prieſts, that "they might anſwer according to his wiſh. The "moment he entered the Temple, the Prieſts wor"ſhipped him as Jupiter Hammon's ſon. He being "overjoy'd at the God's adoption, ordered, that for "the future Jupiter ſhould be conſidered as his father. "He aſked afterwards, whether he had puniſhed all "his father's murtherers: the anſwer was, that his "father could not be murthered, and could not die; "but as to King Philip, that his death had been ful"ly revenged." I have obſerved in another place (31), that a refined piece of policy was the reaſon why he would paſs for a God: he confeſſes it to his father in one of Lucian's dialogues (32). I have alſo obſerved, that he behaved with more reſerve upon that point among the Greeks, than among the Barbarians: but I muſt add here, that at laſt he left off that kind of diſcretion: for he would have all the Greek Cities to make decrees concerning his Godhead. They differed in the reſolutions, to which they came upon that ſubject. The decree of the Lacedemonians was ſet down in theſe words; Since Alexander will be a God, let him be one: Ἄλλοι μὲν ἄλλα ἐψηφίσαντο. Λακεδαιμόνιοι δὲ ἐκεῖνα, ἐπειδὴ Ἀλέξανδρος βούλεται θεὸς εἶναι, ἔστω θεός (33). The Author, I quote, did not know all that the Athenians did: he mentions only their oppoſition, to the decree, which Demades propoſed to them, namely, that, for the future, Alexander be reckoned the thirteenth of the great Gods (34). He was fined for propoſing ſuch an impious decree. This is all that Ælian knew: but it is very probable, that Demades did not deſiſt from his attempt, and that the decree paſſed at laſt (35). He repreſented to the Athenians, that they ſhould take care not to loſe the earth, by pretending too zealouſly to preſerve the heavens. Eraſmus did not underſtand that Orator's meaning. Quum Athenienſes, ſays he (36), vellent Alexandro divinos honores decernere, videte, inquit (Demades) ne dum cœlum cuſtoditis, terram amittatis. Alexander enim ambiebat Monarchiam. Abſurdum autem erat eos ſic alium donare cœlo, ut ipſi terra ſua pellerentur, i. e. "When the Athenians were going to decree divine "honours to Alexander, Demades told them, take "care leſt you loſe the earth, whilſt you are about "to preſerve the heaven. For Alexander aimed "at univerſal monarchy: now it was abſurd for "them to place another in heaven, ſo as to run the "danger of being themſelves driven from their na"tive ſoil." Eraſmus ſuppoſes, that Demades was againſt beſtowing divine honours upon Alexander, and he makes him reaſon in a confuſed manner. Theſe are two faults. The truth of the matter is, that Demades adviſed the deification, and the ground of his advice was, that it was to be feared, leſt Alexander ſhould conquer the country of the Athenians, to puniſh them for refuſing him a place in heaven. See Diogenes Laertius, book the 4th, page 345; you will find there that the Athenians decreed the Godhead of Bacchus to Alexander. Ψηφισαμένων Ἀθηναίων Ἀλέξανδρον Διόνυσον, καίμοὶ, ἔφη, Σάραπιν ποίησατε: i. e. "When the Athenians had "decreed that Alexander was Bacchus, make me "then Serapis, ſays Diogenes." I have obſerved in the remark [F] of that conqueror's article, that it is very little probable that he himſelf was firmly perſuaded of his pretended divine nature; for he confeſſed that there were two things, which chiefly made him ſenſible of his mortality; he lay with women, and he ſlept: he imagined theſe were two frailties, inconſiſtent with a divine nature. But how could he then imagine that Jupiter begat him? A wound he received made him ſenſible he was a man, and gave him an opportunity to banter a little thoſe flatterers, who ſtiled him a God.

This is true blood, and not the noble ſtream,
Which from th' immortal Gods is us'd to flow,

ſaid he to them, ſhewing them what iſſued out of his wound. Τοξεύματι δὲ πληγεὶς εἰς τὸ σκέλος, ὡς πολλοὶ συνέδραμον τῶν πολλάκις εἰωθότων αὐτὸν Θεὸν προσαγορεύειν, διαχυθεὶς τῷ προσώπῳ, Τυτὶ μὲν, αἷμα, εἶπεν, ὡς ὁρᾶτε, ἧ οὐκ ἰχὼρ, - - - οἷός πέρ τε ῥεῖ μακάρεσσι θεοῖσιν (37), i. e. "Being wounded in his leg with a dart, as a "great many of thoſe, who were uſed to worſhip "him as a God, came round him, he told them "with a ſmile, This is mere blood, and not ſuch a li"quor as flows from the bleſſed Gods." Some ſay it was not he, but Calliſthenes, that employ'd that joke. See upon all this Freinſhemius's Commentary on the 7th chapter of the 4th book of Quintus Curtius. The particular, which Zonaras mentions, namely, that this Prince, finding he was going to die, would throw himſelf into the Euphrates, is not at all improbable: for what artifices had he not made uſe of to perſuade the world, that he was a God, and to eſtabliſh the worſhip of his pretended divinity? Jamque omnibus præparatis quod olim prava mente conceperat tunc eſſe maturum, quonam modo cœleſtes honores uſurparet, cepit agitare. Jovis filium non dici tantum ſe, ſed etiam credi volebat, tanquam perinde animis imperare poſſet ac linguis. Itaque more Perſarum Macedonas venerabundos ipſum ſalutare proſternentes humi corpora, &c. (38), i. e. "All things being prepared, and "ripe for the deſign he had framed in his wicked "mind, he began to conſider how he might uſurp "divine honours. He would not only be ſtiled, "but even be thought the ſon of Jupiter, as though "he could govern men's thoughts as well as their "tongues. He commanded therefore that the Ma"cedonians, ſhould adore him after the manner of "the Perſians, that is to ſay, by falling down to the "ground before him."

The Sieur Naudé affords me here an opportunity to criticiſe upon him. Alexander, ſays he (39), would make men believe, that when he came into the world, the Goddeſs Diana was ſo buſy at Olympias's lying in, that ſhe did not think of going to the relief of her temple at Epheſus, which during that time was accidentally (40) conſumed by the flames. Some ſlaves having acquainted him with a remedy againſt the poiſoned darts of the Indians, before he would make uſe of it, he made the world believe, that God had revealed that ſecret to him in a dream. But his inſatiable ambition having carried him ſo far as to claim a divine worſhip, he found at laſt by Calliſthenes's remonſtrances, by the obſtinacy of the Lacedæmonians, and by the wounds he received daily in his battles, that he ſhould never have power enough to eſtabliſh that new Apotheoſis, and that a man muſt have much greater luck to get a little place in Heaven, than to conquer the whole earth, and to rule over it. It is not true, that Alexander made the world believe, that Diana was ſo buſy about Olympias's lying in, that ſhe ſuffered the temple of Epheſus to be burnt. It was a thought of an hiſtorian, whom Plutarch ridicules (41): but no body aſcribed it to Alexander. Did the Lacedemonians oppoſe his deification? Did they not make a decree for it (42)? And though they gave it a malicious turn, yet it cannot be ſaid that they thwarted his deſign.

[G] The advice Antipater gave them on his death bed, never to ſuffer that a woman ſhould aſcend the throne.]

(30) Juſtin. lib. 11. c. 11. p. m. 241, 242. See alſo Oroſius, lib. 3. c. 16.

(31) In the article MACEDON, remark [F].

(32) Lucian, Tom. 1. p. m. 256.

(33) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. c. 19.

(34) Idem, lib. 5. c. 12. See alſo Athenæus, lib. 6. p. 251.

(35) See Plutarch. in Vita Lycurgi Oratoris, p. 842. Clement. Alexandrin. Admonit. ad Gentes, p. 61. S. Chryſoſtom. Homil. 26. in poſter. ad Corint. (where by miſtake he aſcribes to the Romans, what ſhould have been ſaid of the Athenians, as Salmaſius obſerves in Lamprid. Alexandr. Sever. c. 63.) S. Cyrill. in Julian. lib. 6.

(36) Eraſm. Apophthegm. lib. 6. p. m. 499.

(37) Plutarch. in Apophtheg. p. 180. D.

(38) Q. Curtius, lib. 8. c. 5.

(39) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, c. 3. p. m. 318.

(40) It was not accidentally, ſince a wicked wretch confeſſed he ſet fire to that Temple, in order to make himſelf famous.

(41) See the article FONTARABIA, quotation (9).

(42) See above, Ælian. quotat. (33).

and ſhe was condemned to death (f). She ſuffered it with courage, and gave even then particular proofs of modeſty [H]. I read no where but in a modern writer, that the ſerpent throne.] This is a particular, which Diodorus Siculus has tranſmitted to us (43). Lambinus tranſcribed in one of his books the whole chapter, in which that antient hiſtorian diſplays Olympias's cruelties; and he did it unqueſtionably with a deſign to give more weight to his concluſion. Talibus, & tam atrocibus, atque injuſtis facinoribus iram ſuam explens (Olympias) citò hoc efficit, ut Macedones ejus crudelitatem abominarentur. Omnes enim Antipatri verba memoria repetebant, qui tanquam oracula fundens, & vaticinans, Macedones moriens hortatus eſt, UT NE UNQUAM MULIEREM SINERENT REGNI CLAVUM TENERE. Hactenus Diodorus. i. e. "Olympias proſecuting her re- "venge, by ſuch wicked and barbarous attempts, "ſoon made the Macedonians deteſt her cruelty: "for they all called to mind the words of Antipater, "who being on his death-bed, as though he had "been propheſying, and delivering Oracles, adviſed "the Macedonians, never to ſuffer that a woman ſhould "ſway the ſcepter. Thus far Diodorus Siculus." In order to vindicate Antipater's advice, Lambinus adds the following reflection: Præclarè verò Antipater. Nam ſi mulieres omnes jure civili propter infirmitatem conſilii in tutorum ſunt poteſtate, neque ſuarum rerum gerendarum ſunt dominæ aut arbitræ, & quod mulier ſine tutore promiſerit, id ratum non eſt neque debetur, quanto minus debet mulieri reipub. procuratio, & regni adminiſtrandi poteſtas permitti, aut committi? & ſi viri interdum, quorum maximè propria eſt fortitudo, quique ſapientiores & cordatiores ſolent eſſe natura, imperium adepti, tamen licentia corrumpuntur, ac depravantur: quid à mulieribus, quibus nihil natura finxit mollius, neque mobilius, neque infirmius, expectandum (44)? i. e. "This "is admirably well obſerved by Antipater. For if "by the civil law, all the women, on account of their "weakneſs of mind, are under the care of guardi- "ans, and have not the power and authority to ma- "nage their own affairs, and if what a woman pro- "miſes without the conſent of her guardian, be "void and of no effect, how much leſs ought a wo- "man to be truſted with the adminiſtration of a "Kingdom or State? And if even the men, to whom "ſtrength of mind belongs in a more particular man- "ner, and who uſe to be more wiſe and prudent, "are depraved and corrupted by an unlimited power, "what can be expected from the women, than "whom there is nothing in nature more tender, "weak, and inconſtant?" Is it not poſſible to condemn more ſtrongly the conduct of thoſe nations, who truſt women with the ſovereign power; and yet Lambinus publiſhed his book at Paris, with the King's licence, and even dedicated it to Charles the IXth, at a time when Catharine de Medicis had the whole royal authority in her own hands. We ought not to wonder that he had then ſuch thoughts: that Queen's bad adminiſtration would have raiſed them in the mind even of thoſe, who had been the leaſt prepoſſeſſed in favour of the Salic Law: but we may be ſurpriſed that he had courage to publiſh his thoughts, and that he did not pay dear for his boldneſs. People did not take notice of his reflection; which is the reaſon why Francis Hotman (45) aſked his adverſaries, why they made ſuch an outcry againſt his Francogallia (46), printed beyond the Alps, whereas they ſaid nothing againſt Lambinus, whoſe work was printed even at Paris.

[H] She ſuffered death with courage, and gave even then particular proofs of modeſty.] So true is it, that the moſt abandoned wretches will ſooner forſake virtue itſelf, than the appearance of virtue. We have here a woman, who had been divorced for her adultery, and who was alſo guilty of the moſt enormous crimes, and who yet employs her laſt cares, that when ſhe ſhould come to fall, her cloaths ſhould be ſo diſpoſed, as to hide from men's ſight all that modeſty forbids to ſhew. Inſuper exſpirans capillis os, veſte crura contexiſſe fertur, ne quid poſſet in corpore ejus indecorum videri (47), i. e. "It is alſo ſaid, that when ſhe expi- "red, ſhe covered her face with her hair, and her "thighs with her gown, that nothing indecent might "be ſeen in her body." Such a care is leſs to be wondered at in Polyxena, who was a young virgin, and very virtuous: Euripides did not forget to obſerve, that ſhe took all poſſible care not to fall indecently (48).

Ἡ δὲ, κἂν θνήσκουσ', ὅμως
Πολλὴν πρόνοιαν εἶχεν εὐσχήμονως πεσεῖν, Κρύπτειν θ', ἃ κρύπτειν ὄμμαθ' ἁρσένων χρεών (49.

i. e. "When ſhe died, ſhe took care to fall decently, "and to hide what it is proper to conceal from the "eyes of men."

Pliny the younger obſerves the ſame thing, concerning the great veſtal, whom Domitian condemned to be buried alive. Quinetiam quum in illud ſubterraneum cubiculum demitteretur, hæſiſſetque deſcendenti ſtola, vertit ſe, ac recollegit. Cumque ei carnifex manum daret, adverſata eſt, & reſiluit: fœdumque contactum quaſi planè à caſto puroque corpore noviſſima ſanctitate rejecit: omnibuſque numeris pudoris, πολλὴν πρόνοιαν εἶχεν εὐσχήμονως πεσεῖν (50); i. e. "When they let her down into "that ſubterraneous chamber, her gown ſtuck at ſome- "thing, whereupon ſhe turned back to put it down. "And when the executioner offered her his hand, "ſhe refuſed it, and ſtarted back, and would not "ſuffer the filthy touch on her pure and chaſte "body, which was a new inſtance of ſanctity: and "ſhe was in every reſpect ſo modeſt, that ſhe took all "poſſible care to fall decently." I ſay nothing of the Amazon Penthaſilea; for the Poet who obſerves, that when ſhe expired, ſhe fell from her horſe without ſhewing any thing, gives us room to think it happened ſo by mere chance.

Ἥ δ' ὦκα μίγη κονίῃ, κὐ ὀλίθρῳ,
Εὐσταλέως ἐπέπεσε κατ' ὄθλους· οὐδέ οἱ αἰδὼς
Ἤσχυνεν δίμνας· ἧΰ τάδη δ' ἐπὶ νηδύα μακρὴ (51.)

i. e. "She is ſoon mingled with duſt, and dies: ſhe "fell decently upon the ground; nor did any thing "diſgrace her beautiful body; for ſhe lay all along "on her belly."

But what ſhall we ſay of Cæſar, the moſt immodeſt of all men, who yet took a precaution like that of Polyxena? Utque animadvertit undique ſe ſtrictis pugionibus peti, toga caput obvolvit: ſimul ſiniſtra manu ſinum ad ima crura deduxit quo honeſtius caderet, etiam inferiore corporis parte velata (52), i. e. "Obſerving that he "was ſurrounded with drawn daggers, all levelled "at him, he covered his head with his gown, and "with his left hand he let it down alſo over his "thighs, that the loweſt parts of his body being all "covered, he might fall more decently." We muſt ſay, not only that laſciviouſneſs is kept within certain bounds, even in thoſe perſons, in whom it reigns; but alſo that there are ſome men, who being moſt diſſolute in their actions, do yet moſt ſtrictly obſerve all the rules of decency in their words, and outward behaviour (53). Here follows a beautiful deſcription of the courage, which Olympias ſhewed the laſt day of her life. Sed Olympias ubi obſtinatos venire ad ſe armatos vidit, veſte regali, duabus ancillis innixa ultro obviam procedit. Qua viſa, percuſſores attoniti fortuna majeſtatis prioris, & tot in ea memoriæ occurrentibus regum ſuorum nominibus, ſubſtiterunt; donec à Caſſandro miſſi ſunt, qui eam confoderent, non refugientem gladium, nec vulnera, aut muliebriter vociferantem, ſed virorum more fortium, pro gloria veteris proſapiæ, morti ſuccumbentem, ut Alexandrum poſſes etiam in moriente matre cognoſcere (54), i. e. "But when Olym- "pias beheld a number of armed men coming di- "rectly to her with a deſign to kill her, ſhe went re- "ſolutely to meet them, being dreſſed in her royal "garment, and leaning on two of her women. The "murtherers were ſtruck with awe, at the ſight of "her ancient majeſty, which called to their mind the "names of ſo many of their Kings, whom they beheld "in her perſon; they did not perform their deſign; "but Caſſander ſent ſome other perſons who ſtabbed "the Queen. She did not endeavour to ward off the "blow, nor to avoid the wound; ſhe did not cry or "lament like a woman, but ſhe fell like the braveſt "men, in a manner becoming the glory of her an- "ceſtors;

(43) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 19. c. 9.

(44) Dionyſ. Lambin. in Cornel. Nepot. p. 345. edit. Pariſ. 1569.

(45) See Matagonis de Matagonibus adverſus Italogalliam ſive Antifrancogalliam Antonii Matharelli, p. 245, 246.

(46) It is a work in which he condemns the reign of the women. See above, the article of HOTMAN, quotation (19), and remark [I], at the break.

(47) Juſtin. lib. 14. ſub finem.

(48) She had alſo the courage to behold the ſtroke that was given her. See Monſieur Drelincourt, p. 126, of his Achilleus Index, where you will meet with very good and learned obſervations concerning Polyxena.

(49) Euripides in Hecuba, ver. 568. p. m. 35. See alſo Ovid's Metam. lib. 13. where he ſays of Polyxena,
Tunc quoque cura fuit partes velare tegendas
Cum caderet, caſtique decus ſervare pudoris. i. e.
"And as ſhe
"fell, ſhe ſtrove
"with decent
"pride
"To hide, what
"ſuits a virgin's
"care to hide."

(50) Plinius, Epiſt. 11. lib. 4. p. m. 240.

(51) Quintus Calaber, in Supplem. Homeri, lib. 1. ver. 619. p. m. 168.

(52) Sueton. in Cæſare, c. 82.

(53) Compare this with the article NAPLES (Alfonſus) remark [H].

(54) Juſtin. lib. 14. c. 6. p. m. 328, 329.

ſerpent which lay with her, left ſpots upon her body, which never wore away [I]. This has

" ceſtors ; ſo that one might know Alexander again, " even in the perſon of his expiring mother." This ſhews that they, who aſſert, that cruelty is a ſign of a baſe mind, and that nothing is ſo mean and cringing, as a barbarous and guilty ſoul, when it is deſtitute of all hopes, may be refuted by great and remarkable inſtances.

[I] I read no where, but in a modern writer, that the ſerpent, which lay with her, left ſpots upon her body which never wore away.] Savaro is the modern writer I mean : I ſhall tranſcribe his words, after quoting the text of Sidonius Apollinaris, which he comments.

Magnus Alexander, nec non Auguſtus, habentur
Concepti ſerpente Deo : Phœbumque, Jovemque
Diviſere ſibi : namque horum quæſiit unus
Cynthia ſub Scyrte patrem maculis genitricis.
Alter Phœbigenam ſeſe gaudebat haberi,
Pæonii jactans Epidauria ſigna draconis (55).

(55) Sidon. Apollinaris, carm. 2. ver. 121.

i. e. " Alexander the Great, and Auguſtus, are ſaid " to have been conceived by a God in the ſhape of a " ſerpent ; they have divided Jupiter and Apollo " between them. The former would reſtore his mo- " ther's reputation, by looking for his father in the " temple of Jupiter Hammon : the latter boaſted to " be thought the ſon of Apollo, and took a pride in " the marks, which the Epidaurian ſerpent left on " his mother's body."

Savaro's note on the fourth of theſe ſix lines, is as follows : Hæc de Alexandro dicta ſunt, non de Auguſto, ut vir doctus (56) ſcribit, qui quidem Alexander quærebat patrem ſuum inſignitum ſerpentis maculis, quibus inſignita erat Olympias mater, qua cum Jupiter Hammon ſub ſpecie ſerpentis concubuerat, & ſerpentinas maculas inuſſerat ſui concubitus teſtes. Idem, de Accia Auguſti matre, Sueton. cap. 94. i. e. " This is ſaid of Alex- " ander, and not of Auguſtus, as a learned man (Caſau- " bon) writes : Alexander looked for his father, who " was to be remarkable by the ſpots of a ſerpent, " with which his mother Olympias was marked : " Jupiter Hammon having lain with her in the ſhape " of a ſerpent, and having marked her with his ſpots, " as ſo many proofs of his lying with her. The ſame " is obſerved of Accia, Auguſtus's mother. Sueto- " nius in Auguſt. chap. 94." He is in the right to aſſert, that that line relates to Alexander, and not to Auguſtus. But where did he read that Olympias had on her body the marks of the animal, whoſe ſhape Jupiter borrowed ? It is not mentioned by any writer : I imagine therefore, that the ſpots, the Poet ſpeaks of, are thoſe of that Queen's reputation : he means, no doubt, that Alexander looked for his father in the temple of Jupiter Hammon, in order to blot out thoſe ſpots, that is to ſay, to reſtore his mother's reputation. The words which I have quoted from Juſtin (57), lead us to that ſenſe. I had made this obſervation, before I conſulted Freinſhemius's Commentary, where I met with the ſame criticiſm on Savaro's opinion. Neſcio num ita potius accipendus ſit Sidonius Carm. 2. 124. ubi dicit quæſiſſe Alexandrum Cynthia ſub Syrte patrem maculis genitricis : quam, ut explicat Vir doctiſſimus, de maculis à concubitu draconis, in matris corpore relictis, ut nimirum Sidonius velit, eum per infamiam matris, quam eo modo adulterii ream agebat, Hammonem ſibi patrem quæſiviſſe. Certe enim de maculis ejus generis ſerpentinis nihil recordor legiſſe, quod ad Olympiadem pertineat (58). If Atia, the mother of Auguſtus, was meant here, we ſhould be obliged to ſpeak otherwiſe : for we read in Suetonius, that the marks ſhe had on her body, after a ſerpent had lain with her, prevented her ever after, during her whole life, from going to the bath, becauſe ſhe did not care to ſhew her ſpotted body. This ſtory is ſo ſtrong and wonderful, that if it were true, it would put all the Free-thinkers to a non-plus. Let me beg leave to tranſcribe it here. In Aſclepiadis Mendetis Θεολογουμένων libris lego, Atiam, cum ad ſolenne Apollinis ſacrum media nocte veniſſet, poſita in templo lectica, dum cæteræ matronæ dormirent, obdormiſſe, draconemque repente irrepſiſſe ad eam, paulloque poſt egreſſum, illamque expergefactam quaſi à concubitu mariti purificaſſe ſe, & ſtatim in corpore ejus extitiſſe maculam, velut depicti draconis, nec potuiſſe unquam exigi, adeo ut mox publicis balneis perpetuo abſtinuerit (59), i. e. " I have read in the " books of Aſclepiades of Mendes concerning things " divine, that Atia came once at midnight to a ſo- " lemn feſtival of Apollo, and having cauſed her ſe- " dan to be put in the temple, whilſt the other ma- " trons were aſleep, ſhe fell aſleep alſo ; a ſerpent " ruſhed all of a ſudden upon her, and went away " ſoon after ; Atia being awake, waſhed herſelf, as " though ſhe had lain with her huſband ; but there " appeared immediately a large mark on her body, " as it were the picture of a ſerpent, which could " never be worn out, ſo that ſhe was obliged for " ever to leave off going to publick baths." If ſuch a ſtory had been related but once, and only in a philoſophical age, one ſhould more ſcruple to laugh at it ; but when one conſiders, that ſuch ſtories were firſt publiſhed in the fabulous times, and revived in ſeveral ages, one may ſafely aſſert, that poetical fictions firſt raiſed them, and that flattery ſoon multiplied them, ſometimes in behalf of one great man, and other times in favour of another. The Meſſenians related, that Ariſtomenes was born of a God transformed into a ſerpent. The Sicyonians publiſhed the ſame of Ariſtodamas (60). The Romans were glad that their Scipio ſhould have the ſame advantage with Alexander, and afterwards ſome flatterers conferred the ſame honour on Auguſtus. Such a birth was looked upon as ſo honourable, that the Emperor Galerius, who was the ſon of a country fellow (61), aſcribed it to himſelf (62), in order to raiſe his reputation. Obſerve, that Scipio was pleaſed that people ſhould believe that ſtory of his mother ; and I am much miſtaken, if the crafty Romans did not labour to ſupport that opinion. For conſidering the ſad condition to which Hannibal had reduced Rome, it was to be wiſhed that popular errors might raiſe the people's expectations, and make Scipio be look'd upon as a man deſigned by the Gods for ſome great actions. Here follows a noble paſſage from Livy. Fuit enim Scipio, non veris tantum virtutibus mirabilis, ſed arte quoque quadam ab juventa in oſtentationem earum compoſitus : pleraque apud multitudinem aut per nocturnas viſa ſpecies, aut velut divinitus mente monita, agens : ſive & ipſe capti quadam ſuperſtitione animi, ſive ut imperia conſiliaque velut ſorte oraculi miſſa, ſine cunctatione aſſequeretur. Ad hoc jam inde ab initio præparans animos, ex quo togam virilem ſumpſit, nullo die prius ullam publicam privatamque rem egit, quam in Capitolium iret, ingreſſuſque ædem conſideret : & plerumque tempus ſolus in ſecreto ibi tereret. Hic mos, qui per omnem vitam ſervabatur, ſeu conſulto, ſeu temere, vulgatæ opinioni finem apud quoſdam fecit, ſtirpis eum divinæ virum eſſe ; retulitque famam, in Alexandro Magno prius vulgatam, & vanitate & fabula parem, anguis immanis concubitu conceptum, & in cubiculo matris ejus perſæpe viſam prodigii ejus ſpeciem, interventuque hominum evolutam repente, atque ex oculis elapſam. His miraculis numquam ab ipſo eluſa fides eſt : quin potius aucta arte quadam, nec abnuendi tale quicquam, nec palam affirmandi, Multa alia ejuſdem generis, alia vera, alia aſſimulata, admirationis humanæ in eo juvene exceſſerant modum : quibus freta tunc civitas, ætati haudquaquam maturæ tantam molem rerum tantumque imperium permiſit (63, i. e. " Scipio was not only admi- " rable by his real virtues, but alſo by a certain art, " which he had from his youth, to ſhew them to the " beſt advantage. He made the world believe, that " he was directed by dreams, or by a kind of divine " inſpiration ; either being himſelf a little inclined " to ſuperſtition, or that he might the eaſier get cre- " dit and power, as it were by the means of an oracle. " He had prepared mens mind to this from his " youth ; for he never tranſacted the leaſt public or " private buſineſs, before he had been up to the Ca- " pitol, where he ſat himſelf down in the Temple, " uſing often to ſpend there ſome time alone in a re- " tired place. The cuſtom which he continued all " his life, either with or without a particular de- " ſign, made ſome people believe the common opi- " nion, that he was deſcended from ſome God ; the " ſame idle and fabulous ſtory, which was formerly " told of Alexander the Great, was alſo told of him ; " namely, that he was begotten by an huge ſer- " pent, (56) That is to ſay, Caſaubon, in Sueton. Auguſt. c. 94.

(57) In the remark [F], quotation (30).

(58) Freinſhemius, in Q. Curtium, lib. 4. c. 7. num. 25.

(59) Sueton. in Auguſto. c. 94.

(60) Velandæ ignominiæ repetitum ex antiquis fabulis de dracone commentum : idem enim olim de Ariſtomene Meſſeniis, de Ariſtodama Sicyonios jactaviſſe. Freinſh. Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. 1. c. 1. num. 17.

(61) Aurel. Victor, in Epitome, p. m. 222.

(62) Is inſolenter affirmare auſus eſt matrem more Olympiadis Alexandri Magni creatricis compreſſam dracone ſemet conceptiſſe. Idem, ibid.

(63) T. Livius, lib. 26. p. m. 442. See alſo A. Gellius, lib. 7. c. 1.

has been ſaid of Auguſtus's mother.

" pent, whoſe figure was often ſeen in his mother's " bed-chamber; but upon any perſon's coming in, it " retired and diſappeared of a ſudden. He never " endeavoured to diſcredit theſe miracles; he uſed " rather a certain artifice, which was never to deny " them, but alſo not to affirm them openly. There " were in that young man many other things, either " true or affected, which raiſed him far above human " admiration. The City truſting to all this at that time, " committed the moſt weighty and important affairs " to his care, though he was ſtill under age." There are conſiderable families in Europe, which pretend to be deſcended from the converſation of a woman with ſome ſpirit. Marſhal de Baſſompiere relates it of the founder of his family. See his Memoirs, and the Comte de Gabalis. See alſo the article PLATO *.

* Mr. Bayle has not given that article.

☞ OMAR EBN AL KHATTAB, the ſecond Khâlif of the Moſlems or Mohammedans after Mohammed, began his reign in the 13th year of the Hejra, or the year of our Lord 634 (a). He at firſt was a violent oppoſer of Mohammed (b) [A]; and many years after, was one of the Candidates for the Khalîfat, after the death of that falſe Prophet, who having left no poſitive directions concerning a ſucceſſor, ſuch a conteſt enſued, as would very probably have been the utter ruin of the Mohammedan religion and polity, had not Omar and Abu Becr timely interpoſed. The conteſt lay between the inhabitants of Mecca and thoſe of Medina; and they were going to nominate two Khalîfs, when Omar, ſeeing the diviſion increaſe, gave Abu Becr his hand, when all the reſt followed his example, and accordingly the latter was ſaluted Khalîf; acknowledged the rightful ſucceſſor of Mohammed; and, in conſequence thereof, became abſolute judge of all cauſes both ſacred and civil (c). Omar was afterwards greatly diſguſted at this relation, and expreſſed his diſſatisfaction on that account in the ſtrongeſt terms (d). Multitudes were alſo diſpleaſed at this choice: one party maintaining that Ali the ſon of Abu Tâleb was the true heir; and the other, that the right of ſucceſſion belonged to Abu Becr, Omar, &c. Of the latter opinion are the Turks, and of the former the Perſians, who ſtill treat one another as hereticks upon that account (e). Abu Becr acted with more prudence than Mohammed; he not leaving the ſucceſſion at random, but appointing Omar by his will to ſucceed him [B]. It is ſaid that Omar ſhewed ſome reluctance to accept of the Khalîfat (f): and it does not appear that Ali or his party made any oppoſition. Omar was the firſt Khâlif on whom the title of Amirol Mumenina, or Emperor of

(a) D'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, under the article Omar Ebn al Khattab, and Ockley's Conqueſts by the Saracens, p. 121. London 1708. 8vo.

(b) Preliminary Diſcourſe, p. 45, to Sale's Korân. London 1734.

(c) Ockley's Conqueſts of the Saracens, p. 2. & ſeqq.

(d) Ibid. p. 6.

(e) Ibid. p. 7.

(f) Ibid. p. 116.

[A] He at firſt was a violent oppoſer of Mohammed.] According to ſome authors, after the converſion of Hamza, Mohammed's uncle, the Koreiſh, the moſt noble tribe among all the Arabians, reſolved, in their aſſembly, to murder the Prophet (1). The buſineſs was to find a perſon intrepid enough to perpetrate ſuch an action: upon which Omar preſented himſelf, and offered to ſtrike the blow; ſaying which, he left the aſſembly, having his ſword girded on. He was going upon his expedition, when meeting with Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, they quarrelled, and drew their ſwords. But Saad, to pacify Omar, ſaid to him, Why doſt thou quarrel with me? Surely thou oughteſt rather to wreak thy anger on thy ſiſter Amena, and on Saïd her huſband. Omar aſking; how! do they both profeſs Iſlâm (2)? Yes, indeed do they, replied Saad. Omar leaving him, ran to the houſe of Amena his ſiſter, and ruſhing into it, fell upon Saïd his brother-in-law; when throwing him down, he ſet his foot on his neck, and was going to ſtab him. In vain his ſiſter flew to his aſſiſtance, and endeavoured to reſcue her huſband; Omar gave her a furious blow on the face, at which ſhe cried (the blood trickling down her face) O enemy of God! doſt thou ſtrike me in this manner, becauſe I profeſs the unity of God! but yet I will be a Moſlem in ſpite of thee. At the ſame time ſhe repeated aloud the double profeſſion of Faith: There is no other God but God, and Mohammed is his Prophet. She added, Finiſh, O Omar, the work which thou haſt begun. Theſe words ſtruck Omar, who began to repent of his raſh treatment. And now, pacifying Amena, and perſuading her and her huſband to ſhow him a roll of paper (paper of the Korân) which they held in their hands; they at laſt were prevailed upon, (after he had waſhed and purified himſelf) to ſhow it him. He then read the following words in it: " In the name of God moſt merciful. We " did not ſend the Korân from Heaven to make thee " miſerable; but to make it ſerve as a memorial " with regard to him who fears God, &c. (3). I " am certainly God. There is no God but me. " Serve me therefore, and offer up thy prayers in " remembrance of me only." Omar hearing theſe words cried: He who ſpeaks in this manner, ought to be ſerved only. How beautiful are theſe words! how greatly do I revere them! I want to profeſs ſuch a religion. Omar then enquired where Mohammed was, and was conducted to the houſe, where he found him with above forty perſons, among whom were Hamza, Abu Becr and Ali. Omar's ſword was ſtill by his ſide, when knocking at the door, moſt of thoſe in the houſe were running to hide themſelves; but the Prophet not only ordered his people to let them in, but went himſelf to meet Omar as far as the porch; when taking the lappet of his gown with one hand, and ſeizing the hilt of his ſword with the other, he drew him into the houſe, ſaying at the ſame time, Son of al Khattab, come in. Why doſt thou ſtay there? Art thou not afraid, ſhouldſt thou continue any longer there, that the porch will fall upon thee? Omar was going to kneel before him; but the Prophet would not permit him to do it. He then ſaid; I am come to believe in God and in his Apoſtle; immediately after which he repeated the double profeſſion of Faith, at which the whole aſſembly ſhouted ſo loud for joy, that the noiſe was heard even by thoſe who were praying in the Moſque. Omar then intreated that they might all go thither, to return thanks to God; at which the Prophet ſaid, that God had a little before revealed to him in prayer, all that then happened; upon which they all ſet out for the Moſque, Mohammed being between Hamza and Omar, and entered it with great ſolemnity. The Koreiſh ſeeing this pompous proceſſion were terrified; Omar and Hamza appearing with the menacing air of two Lionneſſes, who had been robbed of their young (4).

(1) Mohammed, who is called the Prophet, by way of eminence, by the eaſtern writers.

(2) The Mohammedan religion.

(3) As far as the 14th verſe.

(4) La Vie de Mahomet, par Mr. Gagnier. Tom. I. p. 125. Amſterdam, 1732, 12mo.

[B] He appointed Omar to ſucceed him.] Abu Becr finding his time approaching, ſent his Secretary, and commanded him to write as follows:

In the name of the moſt merciful God.

This is the teſtament of Abu Becr Ebn Abi Kohâfa, which he made at that time when he was going out of this world, and entering into the other; a time in which the Infidel ſhall believe, and the wicked perſon be aſſured (5), and the liar ſhall ſpeak truth. I appoint Omar Ebno'l Chitâb (6), my ſucceſſor over you; therefore hearken to him, and obey him. If he does that which is right and juſt, 'tis what I think and know of him. If he does otherwiſe, every man muſt be rewarded according to his works. I intend to do for the beſt, but I do not know hidden things: but thoſe who do evil ſhall find the conſequences

(5) i. e. The infidel and wicked ſhall then be aſſured of the reality of theſe things relating to a future ſtate, which they diſbelieved and ridiculed in their life-time.

(6) 'Tis the ſame with Ebn al Khattab.

of the Believers, was beſtowed (g). At his acceſſion to the throne, he was not deſirous of any thing more than to make ſome conqueſts in Irak (b) [C]. At the time of Abu Becr's death, the Arabians, under the command of Khaled and Abu Obeidah, were laying ſiege to Damaſcus, which belonged to the Grecian Emperor Heraclius. 'Tis well known that ſeveral bloody battles were fought on this occaſion; that a great number of Chriſtians loſt their lives, and that Damaſcus was at laſt taken by the Arabians, under the Khalifat of Omar. A remarkable ſtory is told of Jonas a Chriſtian Nobleman of Damaſcus [D], and an apoſtate to the Mohammedan Faith. After the taking of Damaſcus, Omar

(g) Ockley's Conqueſts of the Saracens, p. 121.

(b) The country called Babylonia by Ptolemy.

conſequences of it. Fare ye well, and the mercy and bleſſing of God be upon you (7). How inconſiſtent are theſe expreſſions of goodneſs and piety with the wild havock which the Saracens made in their conqueſts?

(7) Ockley's Conqueſts of the Saracens, p. 116.

[C] To make ſome conqueſts in Irak.] For this purpoſe he ſent an army under the command of Abu Obeidah, joining to him Al Mothanna, Amrû and Salit, who marched their forces till they came to Thaalabiyah, where they pitched their tents juſt by the river. The Perſian army being very numerous, Salit, and the other commanders, adviſed Abu Obeidah not to croſs the river and engage the enemy; but the latter was deaf to their counſel; and engaging with the Perſians, the Moſlems were routed. Omar the Kalîf afterwards ſending a reinforcement, under Jarîr Ebn Abd'llah, the Moſlems made frequent excurſions; deſtroying that part of Irak which lies next the Euphrates. Arzemidocht, Queen of the Perſians, thinking it high time to look to herſelf, ſent an army, under Mahran, to repreſs the inſolence of the Arabians. The two armies engaging, a bloody battle enſued, Mothama and Mahran fought very furiouſly hand to hand; but the latter being killed, the Perſians were diſarmed and fled. The Perſians being diſguſted at their Queen for the loſs of this battle, though not through her fault, depoſed her; and placed on her throne Yazdejerd, a young man of the Royal Family, deſcended from Khoſrû the ſon of Hormuz or Hormiſdas. That Monarch immediately raiſed two armies to oppoſe the Arabians; however the Perſians, as if the period of their Empire was at hand, could have no ſucceſs; but were forced to ſubmit to the riſing greatneſs of the ſaracenical Empire. Both the Perſian Generals loſt their lives, and both armies were entirely routed and defeated. Yazdeſerd was the laſt idolatrous King of Perſia (8). Mr. Ockley is of opinion that Abu'lpharagius is miſtaken as to the time in which thoſe battles were fought (9).

(8) Abu'lpharagius, quoted in ibid. p. 122 & ſeq. See alſo d'Herbelot, p. 687. col. 2.

(9) Ockley, p. 122.

[D] A remarkable ſtory is told of Jonas, a Chriſtian nobleman of Damaſcus.] Whilſt the Arabians were beſieging this city, ſome of their ſcouts who were upon duty, heard the neighing of a horſe which was coming out of one of the gates. The ſcouts halted, and ſaid nothing till he came up cloſe to them, and then took the rider priſoner. Immediately after, there came out of the ſame gate, another perſon on horſeback, who called the man that was taken priſoner by his name. The Saracens commanded him to anſwer him, that he might come up, and be taken alſo: but inſtead of this, the captive cried aloud in the Greek tongue, the bird is taken. The perſon he ſpoke to, underſtood his meaning perfectly, and returned to the city. The Saracens or Arabians could not tell what he ſaid; but then they knew that they had loſt a priſoner by his means. This made them conclude to put him to death; however, after conſidering this matter, they reſolved to carry him to Khaled the General, that he might diſpoſe of him as he pleaſed. Khaled aſking him who he was? I am, replied he, a Nobleman; and I married a young Lady who was dear to me as my life: but when I ſent for her home, her parents made a ſlighting anſwer, and ſaid they had other buſineſs to mind. Upon this, I found an opportunity to get to the ſpeech of her, when we agreed to leave the city in the evening; and, for that purpoſe, to give a conſiderable ſum of money to the perſon who ſhould be on guard that night. I leaving the city firſt, was ſurpriſed by that man; and to prevent my beloved wife from falling into their hands, I cried aloud, the bird is taken. The dear creature underſtanding my meaning, returned, with her two ſervants, into the city; and now, who can blame me for ſhewing this tenderneſs . . . . ſays Khaled; what have you to ſay to the Mohammedan religion? "If you think proper "to embrace it, your wife ſhall be reſtored to you as "ſoon as we take the city; if not, you are a dead "man." The poor wretch being ſtruck with terror, renounced the Chriſtian Religion, and made confeſſion of that of Mohammed in theſe words: I teſtify that there is but one God; he has no partner, and Mohammed is the Apoſtle of God. He then devoted himſelf entirely to them, and fought with great bravery againſt the Chriſtians. Damaſcus being ſurrendered, Jonas ran in ſearch of his beloved; and upon enquiry, was told that ſhe had immured herſelf in a nunnery. As Jonas was fallen into the hands of the Arabians, ſhe never expected to ſet eyes on him more; and ſince the only object ſhe prized in this world was gone, ſhe had reſolved to ſpend the remainder of her days in the contemplation of a better. And when Jonas went to the Church where ſhe was, expecting to be received with the utmoſt joy, he was very much miſtaken; for aſking the motives which had prompted her to take the veil, and ſhe telling it him; he no ſooner diſcovered himſelf, and informed her that he had changed his religion, but ſhe treated him with the utmoſt contempt and averſion. She juſtly concluded, that it was her duty to renounce him, as he had firſt renounced the Chriſtian Faith: ſo that, neither the remembrance of former love, nor the conſideration of the ſad extremity which had made him become an apoſtate, could once move the diſconſolate Lady, nor prevail with her to entertain one charitable thought in his favour. For this reaſon, ſhe ſtill reſolved to bid adieu to all terreſtrial enjoyments, and never converſe with him more: and therefore, when Thomas and Herbis (10), with the reſt of the miſerable Damaſcenes left the city, ſhe went along with them. Jonas's heart was wounded at her departure: and therefore he ſtrongly urged Khaled to detain her by force; but the latter anſwered; "that this could "not be done, ſince they had ſurrendered them-"ſelves; and that all of them muſt be allowed free "liberty to go whitherſoever they pleaſe." . . . After that Damaſcus was taken, and the inhabitans had left it, and were upon their march (which the Saracens agreed they ſhould continue unmoleſted) Khaled treacherouſly reſolved to purſue them, and ſeize upon the rich effects they had been allowed to carry away. Jonas hearing Khaled's deſign, ſtrongly ſollicited him to purſue it, and offered to be his guide. His thoughts were ſtill fixed on his wife, and nothing could ſatisfy him but the poſſeſſion of her: ſo that he was for ever teizing Khaled to ſet out upon the purſuit of the Chriſtians, which he at laſt agreed to. Khaled and Jonas left the city, at the head of four thouſand horſe, who were all diſguiſed in the habit of Chriſtian Arabs. Theſe, after a moſt troubleſome march, came up at laſt with the Chriſtians, who were repoſing themſelves in a delightful meadow. Immediately Khaled and his Arabians fell on the Chriſtians who were headed by Thomas and Herbis. A ſharp conteſt enſuing, Thomas was killed, and his forces put to flight. Jonas, during the battle, was got among the women, in ſearch of his wife. Raphi Ebn Omeirah coming up that way, ſaw him fighting with his Lady, whom he at laſt threw with violence on the ground, and took her priſoner. A little after, Raphi ſeized upon the Emperor Heraclius's daughter, Thomas's wife, a young Lady of exquiſite beauty. Raphi having diſpoſed of his fair captive, came to the place where Jonas was, and found him bathed in tears, and his wife weltring in blood. Raphi aſking the ſad occaſion of this; Jonas wrung his hands and cried. Alas! I am the moſt miſerable man upon earth! I came to this woman, whom I prized above all things in life, and would fain have perſuaded her to return with me. However, ſhe was deaf to my intreaties, becauſe I had changed

(10) Two Chriſtians who commanded in the town; the former ſon-in-law to Heraclius.

Omar appointed Abu Obeidah commander over the Moſlems in Syria, and depoſed Khaled, whom he hated. However, Khaled was afterwards ſent by Abu Obeidah upon an expedition againſt the Chriſtians, who were defeated by him (i). Abu Obeidah ſet out from Damaſcus at the head of an army, (he having ſent Khaled before) and marched toward Hems (k), the inhabitants of which city conſented to make a truce with him for one whole year (l). Abu Obeidah exerciſing great lenity, many of the Syrians ſubmitted to him (m). He then proceeded towards Alhâdir and Kinniſrîn, with whoſe inhabitants he alſo concluded a truce (n), which pacifick conduct diſpleaſed Omar. An odd accident had like to have created a miſunderſtanding between the Chriſtians and Saracens of

(i) p. 157 & ſeq.

(k) Emiſſa.

(l) Ockley, p. 177, 178.

(m) Ibid. p. 179.

(n) Ibid. p. 184.

changed my religion; and vowing ſhe would go to Conſtantinople, and there end her days in a Cloiſter, I reſolved, if I could not perſuade her by gentle means, to employ force; and accordingly threw her down, and took her priſoner. Seeing herſelf in my power, ſhe ſat quietly a little while; but drawing out a knife ſecretly, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf in the breaſt before I was aware, and fell dead at my feet. Raphi could not refrain from tears at this mournful relation, and ſaid thus to him: "Heaven did not intend that you ſhould live with "her, and therefore has provided better for you." What do you mean? Said Jonas: Ill ſhew you, replied Raphi, a captive I have taken; a Lady of wonderful beauty, and in the richeſt attire. I will make you a preſent of her, to compenſate your loſs. Jonas being brought to the Princeſs they talked together in Greek, and Raphi gave her freely to him. Khaled made a horrid ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, and being returned from it, aſked Jonas what was become of his wife? Who gave him the ſad relation abovementioned. Khaled hearing that the Princeſs was taken priſoner, commanded her to be brought into his preſence; when ſeeing her rare beauty, graceful proportion, and charming mein, he turned his head aſide, and ſaid: Glory be to thee, O God, who doſt make whatever ſeems fitting to thee! He then told Jonas, that ſhe ſhould be his, in caſe the Emperor did not redeem her; and Jonas accepted his preſent very thankfully, after which they ſet out for Damaſcus. In the way, a meſſenger came from the Emperor, with a deſire that his daughter might be diſmiſſed. Khaled having conſulted with Jonas about it, agreed to releaſe the Princeſs; but ſaid to the meſſenger; "Tell your maſter that there will never "be any peace between us, till I have ſeized upon "every foot of land poſſeſſed by him; and though "I have now ſent him his daughter, I hope to get "him one day inſtead of her." The Arabians being returned to Damaſcus, were amply rewarded for their valour. Abu Obeidah gave Jonas a conſiderable ſum of money for him to purchaſe another wife: but Jonas anſwered in a very melancholy tone of voice, that he would never entertain any ſuch thoughts whilſt in this world; and that his next wife ſhould be one of thoſe black-ey'd beauties mentioned in the Korân. He continued among the Saracens, and did them great ſervice; till at laſt, being ſhot in the breaſt at the battle of Yermûk, he breathed his laſt (11).

(11) Ockley's Conqueſts of the Saracens, from p. 136 to 153.

The late ingenious Mr. John Hughes made this ſtory the ſubject of his Tragedy of the Siege of Damaſcus. The Poet, according to the liberty which many criticks allow tragick writers, has diſguiſed the name of ſome of the characters in his Drama, he changing the name of Jonas into that of Phocyas, &c. and has alſo made a great many alterations in the incidents, particularly in the cloſe of this ſtory, he repreſenting Phocyas dying in the moſt gallant manner; previous to which he ſuppoſes a reconciliation between him and his beloved Eudocia, as he calls her. Mr. Hughes has drawn the paſſion between theſe two lovers in the ſtrongeſt light, and finely heightened the diſtreſs. How tender are the lines, where Eudocia agrees to leave Damaſcus ſecretly with Phocyas, who addreſſes her thus.

Phocyas. Fear not;——thy innocence will be our guard.
I've thought already how to ſhape our courſe.
Some pitying Angel will attend thy ſteps,
Guide thee unſeen, and charm the ſleeping foe,
Till thou art ſafe!——O I have ſuffered nothing;
Thus gaining thee, and this great generous proof,
How bleſt am I in my Eudocia's love!
My only joy farewel!——

Eudocia. I've now no friend but thee——yet thee I'll call
Friend, father, lover, guardian!——Thou art all (12).

(12) The ſiege of Damaſcus, end of act 2.

How pleaſing is Eudocia's ſoliloquy in the garden, at the opening of the Scene whence the Verſes above are taken.

Eudocia. Why muſt we meet by ſtealth, like guilty lovers!
But 'twill not long be ſo——what joy 'twill be
To own my hero in his ripen'd honours,
And hear applauding crowds pronounce me bleſt!
Sure he'll be here——ſee! the fair riſing moon,
E're day's remaining twilight ſcarce is ſpent,
Hangs up her ready lamp, and with mild luſtre
Drives back the hovering ſhades! Come Phocyas, come,
This gentle ſeaſon is a friend to love,
And now methinks I cou'd, with equal paſſion
Meet thine, and tell thee all my ſecret ſoul (13).

(13) Ibid.

How fine are Phocyas's reflections upon death, after Khaled has threatned to take away his life.

Phocyas.

. . . . . .
What art thou, O thou great myſterious terror!
The way to thee we know; diſeaſes, famine,
Sword, fire, and all thy ever——open gates
That day and night ſtand ready to receive us.
But what's beyond them?——Who will draw that veil?
Yet death's not there——No; 'tis a point of time,
The verge 'twixt mortal and immortal Being.
It mocks our thought! on this ſide all is life;
And when we've reach'd it, in that very inſtant
'Tis paſt the thinking of! O if it be
The pangs, the throes, the agonizing ſtruggle
When ſoul and body part, ſure I have felt it,
And there's no more to fear (14).

(14) Ibid. act 3.

How movingly has the Poet deſcribed in Act IV. Scene II. the interview between Phocyas and Eudocia, in the convent, after Damaſcus was taken: as alſo their laſt interview, at the concluſion of the Tragedy, when the lovers are reconciled, and Phocyas dies. . . . With how much tenderneſs does Phocyas addreſs his mournful fair-one, after ſhe had bid him riſe.

Phocyas. Never---No, here I'll lay my burthen down;
I've try'd its weight, nor can ſupport it longer.
Take thy laſt look; if yet thy eyes can bear
To look upon a wretch accurſt, caſt off
By Heav'n and thee——A little longer yet
And I am mingled with my kindred duſt,
By thee forgotten and the world——

How beautiful are the lines in which he craves her to pardon him.

Phocyas. Say only thou forgiv'ſt me——O Eudocia!
No longer now my dazzled eyes behold thee
Thro' paſſions miſts; my ſoul now gazes on thee,
And ſees thee lovelier in unfading charms,
Bright as the ſhining Angel Hoſt that ſtood!
Whilſt I——but there, it ſmarts——

And how mournful are the lines, when Phocyas draws out, in Eudocia's preſence, the arrow from his breaſt, and dies.

Phocyas. Then all is done——.

of Kinnisrîn [E]. Abu Obeidah besieged and took Baalbek (o), of which Herbis was Governor, who afterwards growing insatiably covetous, was killed by his own people (p), who invited Raphi Ebn Abdo'llah the Saracen, on account of his great moderation, to be their Governor, and he accepted of their offer (q). Abu Obeidah now sat down before Hems, which was forced to surrender to him (r). During this interval, the Saracen took the town of Arrestân by stratagem [F], and afterwards Shaizar opened its gates to him (s). In the siege of Hems, I'krimah, Khaled's cousin, thirsting after the imaginary joys of Mohammed's fool's Paradise, broke into the enthusiastic words following: Methinks I see the black-ey'd girls gazing at me. Should one of these appear in this world, all mankind would die for the love of her. I see in one of their hands a handkerchief of green silk, and a cap made of precious stones; and she beckons me, and calls out, come hither quickly, for I love thee; saying which words, he made great havock among the Christians, till at last he was killed with a javelin (t). The Emperor Heraclius, grieved at the rapid successes of the Saracens, raised several armies; and gave the command of the main body, which was designed to fight the whole forces of the Saracens to Mahân an Armenian (u). The christian army in their march committed as many outrages as the Arabians, who were intimidated at their approach; notwithstanding which the Christians made overtures of peace, but they were haughtily rejected. Khaled engaging Jabalah Ebno'l Ayham, who headed the Christian Arabs, put them into vast disorder, and killed great numbers of them. Omar being informed of the then situation of affairs, sent his blessing to Abu Obeidah and his army, and a reinforcement of eight thousand men. After this there was an interview between Mahân and Khaled, in order for the ransoming of some prisoners, on which occasion much blood had like to have been spilt (w) [G]. Not long after, the Christians and Saracens fought with great fury for several days near Yarmûk, a place in Syria, Abu Obeidah resigning the command to Khaled, who told his men, that Paradise was before them, and the Devil and Hell-fire behind them. The Saracen women exerted themselves with great vigour on these engagements. The ruin of the Christians was hastened, by the inhumanity at Yarmûk

(o) 'Tis thought to be that which was anciently called Heliopolis.

(p) p. 191 & seq.

(q) p. 209.

(r) p. 210 & seq.

(s) p. 215.

(t) Ibid. p. 219.

(u) Ibid. p. 221. Mr. Ockley takes this to be the same whom the Greek Historians call Manuel.

(w) Ibid. p. 224 & seq.

'Twas the last pang——at length
I've given up thee, and the world now is--nothing (15).

(15) Ibid. scene the last.

The catastrophe in the Tragedy is quite different from what we find it in the true history; the former supposing that Phocyas dies bravely in the defence of his countrymen: but that Eudocia lives, and vows to keep the remainder of her days in a convent at Constantinople.

[E] A misunderstanding between the Christians and Saracens of Kinnisrîn.] At the concluding of the truce, the Greeks had erected a pillar, on the top of which, Heraclius sitting on his throne was carved. This pillar was set up as a sign for the Saracens, that whenever any of them saw it, they might not forage in the country about Kinnisrîn. Now it happened upon a time, that some of the Saracen horse passing that way, admired the curious workmanship of the pillar in question. They spent some time in viewing it; riding backward and forward, and exercising themselves round about it. At last, one of them passing by it, in full career, with his javelin in his hand; the iron fastned to the lower end of the javelin, struck out, by accident, one of the eyes in the Emperor's statue. This taking air, the Greeks misconstrued it as a most vile indignity offered to the Emperor in effigy, and a manifest breach of the truce. Immediately messengers were dispatched to Abu Obeidah; expostulating with clamour, about the injury done, and insisted upon satisfaction. The Saracen commander declared, that he intended to keep his word inviolably; that he was assured, whoever did it, no ways intended to shew the least disrepect to the Emperor; and, to prove the sincerity of his intentions, offered any reasonable satisfaction. However, nothing could satisfy them but retaliation; and they insisted upon having the affront offered the Emperor returned upon the Khalif. The person who said these words expressing himself unwarily, and talking about putting out one of Omar's eyes; the rude Saracens thinking he meant literally as he spoke, were so inflamed, that had not Abu Obeidah restrained them, by saying that those people wanted sense, and must be borne with, they would have killed them on the spot. Abu Obeidah told the Greeks, that they might set up his statue if they thought proper, and treat it as they pleased. However, nothing would serve but the Khalif's statue, to carve which, being wearied with their importunity, Abu Obeidah at last consented. Having made a statue representing Omar, and put two glass eyes into the head of it, they commanded a Greek soldier to strike out one of them with a lance, which was accordingly performed. Thus having received sufficient reparation for the injury, they were very well satisfied (16). How much soever the zeal of the Christians might be applauded on this occasion, few people, I believe, would say that they acted very wisely.

(16) Ockley's Conquests of the Saracens, p. 185, 186.

[F] Took the Town of Arrestân by surprize.] This was a strong place, well watered, and had a good garrison. Abu Obeidah's summons being rejected, he desired the Governor of the castle to let him leave some old lumber, which would otherwise encumber him in his speedy march. This request was soon granted, the Christians being desirous of their absence upon any terms. Upon this, the Saracen takes twenty chests, and inclosing twenty chosen men in them, to prevent all suspicion, he puts locks on the outside of them; the bottom of the chests being so contrived, as to slip backward or forward, as those within them pleased. These being received into the castle, the Saracens marched away; only Khaled was left with some forces, by way of ambuscade, to assist those in the chests. The Saracens being gone, the Christians went to Church, to offer up thanks to Heaven for the departure of their enemies, and were heard singing psalms by Derar, Abdo'rrhamân, and Abdo'llah in the chests, who taking this opportunity, came out of them, and having seized the Governor's lady, demanded the keys of the gates, and went from thence to the church, where they easily overpowered the unarmed multitude. Then Abdlo'lah Ebn Jaafar, who commanded them, sent five of them with the keys to open the gates, and cry out, Allâh Acbar (17), which Khaled, who was within, hearing, came up, and Arrestân was taken without opposition (18). Had Homer's Iliad been translated into Arabic at that time, one would have concluded, that the Saracens borrowed this stratagem from that of the Trojan horse.

(17) i. e. God is most mighty.

(18) Ockley, pp 213, 214.

[G] Much blood had like to have been spilt in this interview.] Khaled being come with an hundred of the best soldiers in the army, they were ordered, by the out-guards, to stay till the General's pleasure should be known. Mahân would have had Khaled come singly to him, which the latter refusing, they were commanded, upon their drawing near, to alight from their horses, and deliver up their swords; which the Saracens refusing, they at last were permitted to enter as they pleased. They found Mahân seated on a throne;

mûk [H]. In theſe battles fought at Yarmûk, which were all in November, Anno Dom. 636, the Chriſtians had the worſt; till at laſt Mahân's army being quite ſhattered, he was forced to fly, and leave the Saracens maſter of the field, now quite freed from thoſe dreadful apprehenſions, which the news of this preparation made by the Chriſtians had at firſt filled them with; and this determined the fate of Syria. According to a letter which Abu Obeidah ſent to Omar, to acquaint him with the news of this great victory, about an hundred and forty thouſand Chriſtians loſt their lives, and forty thouſand were taken priſoners; and of the Moſlems, only four thouſand and thirty loſt their lives, Mahân being afterwards killed in Damaſcus by Namân Ebn Alkamah (x). And now Abu Obeidah marched to beſiege Jeruſalem, which the Saracens were extremely deſirous of taking, becauſe it was the ſeat and burying place of many of the antient Prophets, in whom they thought themſelves more intereſted than any other people. The Ieroſolymites ſuſtained the ſiege with prodigious bravery for four months, it being the winter ſeaſon. Omar, to encourage his Moſlems, came thither in perſon, and lived with ſurpriſing frugality during his whole march [I]. Being come near Jeruſalem, he was met by Abu Obeidah, and conducted to the Saracen camp with abundance of joy. The Ieroſolymites being intimidated by the preſence of Omar, capitulated and opened their gates to him (y). The articles of ſurrender, which are curious enough, may be ſeen in Ockley (z). The Chriſtians were allowed liberty of conſcience, upon condition of paying a certain tribute. However this city, once the glory of the Eaſt, was forced to ſubmit to a heavier yoke (as it afterwards proved) than ever it had done before (aa). The Khalîf entering the city, the Patriarch attended him to ſeveral places in it, and talked familiarly with him [K]. Omar, after ſtaying about ten days in Jeruſalem, to ſettle the affairs of Syria, returned to Medina, whoſe inhabitants received him with the higheſt demonſtration of joy (bb). The ſame year in which Jeruſalem was taken, Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, one of Omar's Generals, made great havock in Perſia [L]. The Khalîf, before he left Jeruſalem, divided Syria into two parts; and committed the Government of all that lies between

(x) Ibid. p. 241, 242.

(y) Ibid. p. 255 & ſeq.

(z) Ibid. p. 257.

(aa) Ibid. p. 259.

(bb) Ibid. p. 265 and 268.

a throne; and ſeats were prepared for them, but they refuſed to make uſe of them, and ſat upon the ground. Mahân then expoſtulated with Khaled, concerning their coming into Syria, and the hoſtilities they had committed there. . . . Sometimes they argued very cooly, and then flew into a violent paſſion, till at laſt, Khaled told Mahân, that he ſhould one day ſee him led, with a rope about his neck, to Omar, to be beheaded. Mahân anſwered, that the received laws of all nations ſecured Embaſſadors from violence, which, he ſuppoſed, had encouraged him to take that indecent freedom; however, he was reſolved to chaſtize his inſolence in the perſon of his five friends, the five priſoners, for whoſe liberty he was come to ſue, who ſhould inſtantly be beheaded. Khaled ſwore by God, by Mohammed, and the holy Temple of Mecca, that if he killed them, he ſhould die by their hands; and every Saracen preſent ſhould kill his man, whatever might be the conſequence. The reſt of the Saracens did the like. But Mahân ſaying, that he would not do him any hurt, for the reaſon abovementioned, they ſheathed their ſwords, and talked calmly again; after which Mahân made Khaled a preſent of the priſoners, and the former received from Khaled the ſcarlet tent which he had pitched hard by (19). This ſeems to be a ſtrange ſort of interview, and no ways in the manner of the Europeans.

(19) Ibid. p. 232 & ſeq.

[H] By the inhumanity of the Chriſtians at Yarmûk.] There was, in this place, a Gentleman of a very plentiful fortune, who removed thither, from Hems, for the benefit of the air. When Mahân's army came thither, this Gentleman uſed to treat the officers, and entertain them very nobly. In return for his courteſy, whilſt they were revelling at his houſe, they bid him bring out his wife to them, which he refuſing, they took her by force, and abuſed her all night; and, to heighten his affliction, they took a little ſon of his, and cut off his head. The poor Lady took her ſon's head, and carried it to Mahân; when giving him an account of the outrages committed by his officers, ſhe demanded ſatisfaction. He took but little notice of her complaint, and put her off with a ſlight anſwer. This exaſperated her huſband, who now reſolved to take the firſt opportunity of being revenged, went over, privately, to the Saracens, and acquainted them with his deſign. Returning back to the Greeks, he told them, it was now in his power to do them ſingular ſervice. Accordingly he takes a great number of them, and brings them to a great water, very deep, and fordable only at one place. Five hundred Saracen horſe, inſtructed by him, came over where the water was ſhallow, and attacked the Greeks; but ſoon returned orderly the ſame way they came. The injured Gentleman then called out, and encouraged the Greeks to purſue; who plunging into the water confuſedly, and being not at all acquainted with the place, periſhed in great numbers (20). How inconſiſtent was this ſhocking behaviour of the Grecian ſoldiers, with the religion they pretended to profeſs, and for the protection of which they fought?

(20) Ibid. p. 239.

[I] He lived with ſurprizing frugality during his whole march.] He rode upon a red camel, with a couple of ſacks, in one of which he carried the proviſions, called Sawîk, viz. barley, rice, or wheat, ſodden and unhuſked; and the other was filled with fruits. Before him he carried a very great leather bottle for water, and behind him a large wooden platter. . . After ſaying his prayers every morning . . . and filling his platter with Sawîk, he entertained very liberally his fellow travellers, who all eat with him, without diſtinction, out of the ſame diſh (21).

(21) Ibid. p. 250, 251.

[K] The Patriarch attended the Khalîf to ſeveral places in the city.] There goes a ſtory, that the Khalîf deſiring the Patriarch to aſſign him a place to build a moſque; the Patriarch ſhewed him the ſpot where Jacob's ſtone lay, on which he ſlept when he ſaw the viſion. The ſtone being quite covered with dirt, the Kalîf took up as much as he could of it in his veſt, and removed it. The Moſlems aſſiſted the Khalîf very readily; ſome filling their bucklers, ſome their veſts, and others baſkets; ſo that they very ſoon removed all the rubbiſh and dirt, and cleared the ſtone (22). Another learned Writer obſerves, that the Chriſtians had thrown filth on this place, out of hatred to the Jews (23). Omar leaving the Churches to the Chriſtians, built a new Temple, in the place where Solomon's formerly ſtood, and conſecrated it to the Mahommedan ſuperſtition: after this he went to Bethlehem, and entring the Church, prayed there (24).

(22) Ibid. p. 263.

(23) d'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 687. col. 2.

(24) p. 263 & ſeq.

[L] Saad . . . made great havock in Perſia.] He marched to Madayen, formerly the treaſury and magazine of Khoſrû, King of Perſia, and there the Saracens found prodigious treaſures, and furniture, to an immenſe value. Another (25) relates, that they took there no leſs than three thouſand millions of ducats, beſides Khoſrû's crown, and his exceeding rich ward-robe; all his clothes being adorned with gold and jewels of great value. They next opened the roof of Khoſrû's porch, and found another conſiderable ſum. They alſo plundered his armory, which was well ſtored with weapons of every kind (26). The Arabians found ſuch immenſe riches in Madayen, (25) Elmacin.

(26) Ockley, p. 264.

tween Haurân and Aleppo to Abu Obeidah, with orders to carry on the war till he had conquered it. He gave to Yezid Ebn Abi Sofyan the command of all Paleſtine and the Sea-ſhore; and ſent Amrû Ebno'l Aâs to invade Egypt, a very conſiderable part of the Emperor's dominions, which now mouldered away continually (cc). The people of Aleppo ſubmitted to Abu Obeidah; but Yûkinna, who commanded in the caſtle, made a very long and vigorous reſiſtance, till at laſt it was taken by ſtratagem [M]; as alſo Aazâz, a place of great importance. The Governor's ſon of the caſtle committed an action of a moſt barbarous nature [N]. Yûkinna inſidiouſly went over to the Emperor Heraclius, who was ſo far impoſed upon by his ſpecious proteſtations, that he made him Captain over a band of men who were to conduct a daughter of his from a certain place to Antioch; which being afterwards beſieged by Abu Obeidah, was taken chiefly by Yûkinna's treachery. Heraclius continued for ſome time in Antioch, after it was attacked by the Saracens; but being diſheartned by an uninterrupted ſeries of ill ſucceſs; and terrified with a dream he had, of a perſon thruſting him out of his throne, and his crown falling from his head, he took ſome of his Domeſticks, and eſcaping privately to the ſea-ſhore, embarked for Conſtantinople. Thus fell the Metropolis of Syria, the year of the Hegira 17, and Annô Dom. 638 (dd). Advice being ſent of this to the Khalîf, he ordered Abu Obeidah to purſue the enemy, and enter into the mountainous part of the country (ee); who accordingly ſent ſome forces thither, when Abd'ollah Ebn Hodâpha was taken priſoner [O]. Khaled alſo was very ſucceſsful, he having marched through the country as far as the Euphrates, taken Menbigz upon ſurrender, and ſome other neighbouring towns, as Berâa and Balés (ff). We obſerved above, that the Khalîf had commanded Amrû Ebno'l Aâs to go into Egypt; but before he ſet out upon his march, he continued ſome time in Paleſtine, to take certain places that ſtill held out (gg). Conſtantine, Heraclius's ſon, guarded that part of the country where Amrû lay, with a conſiderable army. The armies drawing near, and the Greeks deſiring to have a conference with the Saracens, Amrû had an interview with Conſtantine, but to no purpoſe. Both armies being come in ſight of one another, a Chriſtian officer fought ſingly with ſome Saracens [P]. At laſt, Conſtantine being diſcouraged, and having no hopes of victory; took (dd) Ibid. p. 296 & ſeq. and p. 312.

(cc) Ibid. p. 267.

(ee) Ibid. p. 317.

(ff) Ibid. p. 317, 318.

(gg) Ibid. p. 324.

(bb) Ibid. p. 325 & ſeq.

Madayen, at that time the capital of Perſia, that they began to deſpiſe their ancient poverty (27). In the ſame year, the Saracens defeated the Perſians in a great battle near Jalûlah. Yazdejerd perceiving that things grew worſe daily, retired to Ferganah, a city in Perſia (28).

(27) D'Herbelot, p. 687. c. 2.

(28) Ockley, ib.

[M] Aleppo at laſt was taken by ſtratagem.] Among the reinforcements which Omar ſent to the Saracen camp before Aleppo, was a very remarkable man, named Dames, of a gigantic ſize, and an admirable ſoldier. Dames deſired Abu Obeidah to give him the command of thirty men, aſſuring him that he would exert all his abilities; and then prevailed with the latter to remove his army about a league from the caſtle. In the dead of the night, Dames went under it, and ſeized a man who dropt from the wall; and was by him informed of the ſtate of the garriſon. Then covering himſelf with a goat's ſkin, and taking a dry cruſt in his hand, he crept on all four as near to the caſtle as he could; and, to prevent being diſcovered, made ſuch a noiſe with his cruſt, as a dog does when gnawing a bone. The reſt of his companions ſtole after him. Then Dames ſitting down on the ground, ordered another man to ſit upon his ſhoulders, and ſo five more, one above the other; when the uppermoſt reaching to the top of the wall, they all cried, O Apoſtle of God, help and deliver us! He that was uppermoſt, after ſtabbing, and throwing down among the Saracens, three watchmen whom he found drunk and aſleep, let down his turbant, and drew up the ſecond, after which all the reſt were drawn up. Dames enjoining them ſilence, went and peeped into a place, where he ſaw Yûkinna the Governor, richly dreſſed, ſitting on a tapeſtry of ſcarlet ſilk flowered with gold, and a large company with him, eating and drinking, and very merry. However, Dames did not think it adviſable to fall upon them; but waiting till day-break, he ſet open the gates, and Khaled coming with a party of ſoldiers, the garriſon ſurrendred. Yûkinna was the firſt who turned Mahommedan here, and became a moſt inveterate enemy to the Chriſtian intereſt (29).

(29) Ibid. p. 282 & ſeq.

[N] . . . committed an action of a moſt barbarous nature.] The Governor of Aazâz was named Theodorus, couſin-german to Yûkinna, whom he had taken, with an hundred diſguiſed Saracens, and brought priſoners to his caſtle. It happened that Theodorus had a ſon named Leon, whom he uſed to ſend, now and then, for a month or two, to be with his uncle Yûkinna at the caſtle of Aleppo, where Leon fell in love with his uncle's daughter, a very beautiful young lady. Being one day returned from thence, he informed his mother of his paſſion; and ſhe, out of tenderneſs for her ſon, was willing to contribute any thing that might be the means of procuring a proper remedy. Theodorus had put Yûkinna and his hundred diſguiſed Saracens into Leon's apartment. He, overjoyed at this opportunity of ingratiating himſelf with his uncle, told him, that he was deſirous of releaſing him and his friends. Yûkinna told him, that if he had an inclination to turn Mohammedan, he ought not to do it upon any proſpect of worldly advantage. The young villain, fired with luſt, anſwered, "That his family and relations were "dear to him; but the faith was dearer." In a word, he ſet them all at liberty, gave them their arms, and bad them go in God's name; ſaying that he would go and get his father, whom he was ſure to find drunk and aſleep, murdered; and accordingly the unhappy Governor was killed by Luke, Leon's brother (30). A horrid inſtance of barbarity, and very ſeldom found among the Greeks.

(30) Ibid. p. 290 & ſeq.

[O] Abdollâh Ebn Hodâpha was taken priſoner.] He was a Saracen of great note, Mohammed's couſin-german, and much beloved by the Khalîf. Being come to Conſtantinople, and brought into Heraclius's preſence, that Emperor made him very advantageous proffers, upon condition that he ſhould renounce the Mohammedan faith, but all in vain; nor were his threats more effectual than his promiſes. He offered him his liberty, provided he would make one ſingle adoration before a crucifix. Heraclius would have perſuaded him to drink wine and eat hog's fleſh; which he refuſing, was ſhut up in a room where there was nothing elſe. Abdollâh being viſited the fourth day, all was found untouched. The Emperor aſking what hindered him from eating and drinking? he replied, "The fear of God and his Apoſtle: however, (add-"ed he) I might have lawfully eat, after three days "abſtinence, yet I abſtained, becauſe I would not "be reproached by the Moſlems (31)." Afterwards Heraclius, at Omar's requeſt, diſmiſſed this priſoner very honourably.

(31) Ibid. p. 320 & ſeq.

[P] A Chriſtian officer fought ſingly with ſome Saracens.]

took an opportunity, in a ſtormy night, to march away, leaving his camp to the Saracens (ii). Much about this time Tripoli was ſurprized by the treachery of Yûkinna, and Tyre inveſted and taken by Yezid Ebn Abi Sophyan, when the greateſt part of the inhabitants turned Mahommedans. Conſtantine hearing that Tripoli and Tyre were loſt, was ſo much caſt down, that he embarked with his family and wealth, and ſailed for Conſtantinople. News of this coming to Cæſarea, which Amrû Ebno'l then beſieged, the inhabitants unanimouſly ſurrendered to him. This was the year of the Hegira 17, and Anno Dom. 639; after which all the towns in Syria ſurrendered, ſo that the Saracens made an entire conqueſt of it (ll). Abu Obeidah, and a great many thouſand Saracens were, ſoon after, ſwept away by a plague, and Khaled ſurvived them but three years (mm). Amrû Ebno'l Aâs prepared for his expedition into Egpyt; and coming before Miſrah, formerly called Memphis, and now grand Cairo, laid cloſe ſiege to it. He employed ſeven months in it to no purpoſe, at the end of which the Khalîf ſent him a reinforcement of four thouſand men, by which means he poſſeſſed himſelf of that important city [Q]. Amrû, after fighting ſome ſucceſsful battles in his march towards Alexandria, laid cloſe ſiege to it. Thoſe Greeks who had eſcaped from the ſlaughter made by the Saracens, retired to Alexandria; where they made all the preparations they could for a ſiege; and made a gallant reſiſtance, during fourteen months, but at laſt were forced to open the gates to the triumphant Saracens [R]. Alexandria being taken, all Egypt followed the fortune of its Metropolis, and the inhabitants compounded for their lives, fortunes, &c. A tribute being fixed on every Egyptian, there aroſe from thence a prodigious revenue to the Khalîf. This, joined to their frugal way of life, greatly contributed to the extending their power and conqueſts (nn). At this time the Alexandrian library was deſtroyed [S]. Amrû began now to turn his eyes to the Weſtern part of Africa; and in a ſhort time made himſelf maſter of the country lying between Barca and Zeweila, and ſoon after of Tripoli. The victorious arms of the Saracens made no leſs progreſs Eaſtward; and the Mahommedan creſcent began

(ii) Ibid. p. 336.

(kk) Ibid. p. 338.

(ll) Ibid. p. 337, to p. 342. The greateſt part of the particulars related (by Ockley,) concerning the conqueſt of Syria by the Saracens, is extracted from an Arabian Author called Alwâkidi. The future particulars mentioned by Ockley, are taken from Eutychius, Elmacin, and Abûlpharagius.

(mm) Ibid. p. 344.

(nn) Ibid. p. 357 & ſeq.

cens.] This officer came from Conſtantine's army, and being very richly dreſſed, ſeveral of the Saracens were deſirous to fight him, in hopes of carrying off his ſpoils... There came forth to this officer a beardleſs ſtripling, whoſe forward zeal had prompted him to leave Arabia Fælix, and venture himſelf in the wars; and his mother and ſiſter had hitherto accompanied him. This youth uſed to ſay, That he had not been invited, by the delicacies of Syria, to go thither, (as the delights of this world are fading, and thoſe of the other durable;) but that it was his deſire to fight for the ſervice of God, ſeeking his favour, and that of his Apoſtle: becauſe he had heard one ſay, that the martyrs (32) ſhall be maintained with their Lord.... How can that be, anſwered his ſiſter; how can they be maintained when dead? He replied, That he had heard one, who was acquainted with the Apoſtle of God, ſay, that the ſpirits of the Martyrs ſhall be put into the crops of green birds that live in paradiſe; which birds ſhall eat the fruits of paradiſe, and drink the rivers; ſuch is the maintenance which God has provided for them. Saying this, he went out to fight the Chriſtian, after taking leave of his mother and ſiſter; and told them, that they ſhould meet again at that large water in paradiſe, which belongs to the Apoſtle of God. The Chriſtian officer not only killed him, but two or three more, and was himſelf ſlain ſoon after (33).

(32) By this name the Mohammedans call all thoſe who loſe their lives in the wars undertaken for the propagation of their religion.

(33) Ockley, p. 331 & ſeq.

[Q] He poſſeſſed himſelf of that important City.] The Lieutenant who held it for Heraclius was one Mokaukas, of the ſect of the Jacobites (34), and a mortal enemy to the Greeks. He had no deſign to ſerve the Emperor, but to provide for himſelf; having behaved ſo ill, that he durſt not come into Heraclius's preſence, for he had taken into his own hands the whole tribute of Egypt. In Miſrah was an ancient caſtle of great ſtrength. Mokaukas's chief care was to ſecure himſelf and his treaſures, without valuing what became of all the Greeks and orthodox Chriſtians. In the river, between the beſieged caſtle and the oppoſite bank, was a little iſland, into which Mokaukas treacherouſly prevailed with the Greeks to go, after abandoning the caſtle. He then made overtures to Amrû; and the caſtle being taken, Mokaukas ſurrendred upon certain conditions (35).

(34) Theſe were ancient hereticks, ſprung from the Eutychians, and called from one James or Jacobus of Syria.

(35) Ockley, p. 347 & ſeq.

[R] ... at laſt were forced to open the gates of Alexandria to the triumphant Saracens.] The Greeks made frequent ſallies, ſo that great numbers were killed on both ſides. The Saracens making a vigorous attack on one of the towns, and entering it, were repulſed from it; on which occaſion Amrû the General, Muſlemah Ebno'l Mochalled, and Werdan, Amrû's ſlave, were taken priſoners. Being brought before the Governor, he aſked them what they meant by running about the country in the manner they did, and infeſting their neighbours? Amrû anſwered according to the uſual form, and told him, that they intended to make them either Moſlems or Tributaries before they had done. This reſolute anſwer had like to have coſt him his life; for the Governor having taken notice of his behaviour, concluded that he was no vulgar perſon; and ſpoke to ſome who were near him to ſtrike off his head. Werdan, his ſlave, underſtanding Greek; the inſtant he heard what the Governor ſaid, took his maſter Amrû by the collar, and gave him a box on the ear, ſaying, "That "he was ever putting himſelf forward, and prating, "when 'twould better become him to hold his "tongue: That he was a mean, contemptible fel"low; and that he would adviſe him to learn more "manners, and let his betters ſpeak before him." By this time Muſlemah Ebno'l Mochalled had bethought himſelf, and told the Governor, That their General intended to raiſe the ſiege: that Omar the Khalif had wrote to him concerning it, and intended to ſend an honourable embaſſy, conſiſting of ſeveral diſtinguiſhed perſons, and men of note, to treat with him; and if he pleaſed to let them go, they would acquaint their General how courteouſly he had uſed them, and employ their utmoſt endeavours to procure an accommodation. He added, That he did not in the leaſt queſtion, when the Khalif's Embaſſadors had treated with him, but that affairs would be made eaſy on both ſides, and the ſiege raiſed very ſpeedily. The impolitic Governor diſmiſſed theſe three or four vulgar men, as he ſuppoſed them to be, in hopes of ſeizing upon ſome of the chiefs of the Arabs, whom he imagined ſhould be ſent to treat with him. Not long after, the city was taken; but whilſt Amrû marched farther up into the country, the Greeks, who had gone on board their ſhips, and whoſe return was not in the leaſt ſuſpected, came back, ſurprized the city, and killed all the Saracens in it. However, Amrû returning ſpeedily, the Greeks who had retaken the caſtle, defended it with great bravery, but were at laſt repulſed, and as many as could, returned back to their ſhips (36).

(36) Ibid. p. 353 & ſeq.

[S] The Alexandrian library was deſtroyed.] Hitherto the Arabians had applied themſelves to no other ſtudy but that of poetry in their own language. Amrû, though no ſcholar, was yet fond of the converſation of learned men; and, among others, was particularly delighted with that of one John of Alexandria, ſurnamed began to ſhed its malignant influence over as large and conſiderable dominions as the Roman Eagle had ever flown over. About the year of the Hegira 21, and Anno Dom. 641, the Saracens poſſeſſed themſelves of Aderbijân, Ainwerdah, Harrân, Roha, Rakkah, Niſibin, Ehwaz, Siwas, and Choraſan (oo). About two years after, Omar the Khalif was killed by a ſlave [T], the twenty third year of the Hejra, Anno Dom. 643: after having reigned ten years, ſix months and eight days, being ſixty three years of age (pp). Omar had the ſirname Al Farûk beſtowed upon him [U]. The countries won by the Saracens, only in this Khalif's reign, were ſo conſiderable, that they alone would have made a very formidable Empire. He drove all the Jews and Chriſtians out of Arabia; ſubdued Syria, Egypt and other territories in Africa; beſides the greateſt part of Perſia. Khondemir obſerves, that the Saracens, under Omar, poſſeſſed themſelves of thirty ſix thouſand towns, fortreſſes or caſtles; deſtroyed four thouſand temples or churches belonging to the Chriſtians, Idolaters, or Perſees; and built fourteen hundred Moſques. But theſe mighty atchievements gained by the Khalif, had no effect upon his manner of living, he ſtill continuing his former way of life; nor did the increaſe of his riches ever appear by his retinue or expences. He built a wall about Cuſa, and repaired, or rather rebuilt, the temples of Jeruſalem and Medina. He was the firſt of the Saracens who made rolls to enter the names of all that were in military ſervice, or received any ſtipend from the publick. He firſt made uſe of the date of the Hejra (qq), the occaſion of which may be ſeen in Dr. Prideaux (rr). An Arabian author beſtows the higheſt encomiums on Omar [W]. Mohammed had married Omar's daughter Haphſa (ss), and our Khalif fought with great bravery under the falſe Prophet (tt). A ſtory is related concerning the converſion of a Perſian Lord to the Mohammedan Religion [X]. We are told of a famous

(oo) Ibid. p. 361 & ſeq. and d'Herbelot, Bibliotheque Orientale, p. 687. col. 2.

(pp) Ibid. p. 634. and d'Herbelot, ibid.

(qq) Ockley, p. 367.

(rr) Life of Mahomet, p. 59.

(ss) Prideaux's Life of Mahomet, p. 41.

(tt) Ibid. p. 82.

ſurnamed the Grammarian, a man eminent for learning. John one day obſerving that Amrû, in taking an inventory of the valuable things in the city, took no notice of the books, petitioned to have them. Amrû wrote to the Khalif for that purpoſe, who ſent an order to have them deſtroyed; upon which Amrû, in obedience to the Khalif's command, diſtributed the books throughout all the city, among thoſe who kept warm baths (of which there were then no leſs than four thouſand in Alexandria) to heat the baths with. And notwithſtanding the great havock that muſt needs be made of them at this rate, yet former Princes had been ſo induſtrious in collecting ſuch numbers, that it was ſix months before they were conſumed. A loſs that could never be compenſated to the learned world (37).

(37) Ibid. p. 359 & ſeq.

[T] Omar the Khalif was killed by a ſlave.] His name was Firûz, who one day came and complained to Omar, that his maſter inſiſted upon his giving him two pieces of ſilver every day, which, he ſaid, was often all he could earn by a day's work. Omar having aſked him how many trades he was ſkilled in? and finding that he was an architect, a carpenter, and ſculptor, he replied, that this was no great ſum, but that his maſter might oblige him to give him three pieces of ſilver, ſince he was ſkilled in three trades; and afterwards ſaid, that he would employ him in building windmills, to grind the corn for the public granaries. Firûz exaſperated at the Khalif's anſwer, and ſhuddering with rage, ſaid, I will make you ſuch a mill, as ſhall be ſpoken of ſo long as the wheel of that of heaven ſhall turn over the heads of men. Omar hearing theſe words, ſaid, methinks this fellow threatens me; and his ſuſpicion was juſt; for Firûz, took his opportunity ſo well, that he ſtabbed him ſome days after, with a knife or dagger, in the belly, of which wound he died three days after. Immediately the Saracens about Omar fell on the aſſaſſin; but he defended himſelf with ſo much bravery, that he wounded the greateſt part of them with the ſame dagger, and afterwards killed himſelf (38).

(38) D'Herbelot, p. 688. col. 2. and Okley, p. 363, who relates it with a little variation from this.

[U] Omar had the ſurname al Farûk beſtowed upon him.] This alludes to Omar's diſtinguiſhing between truth and falſhood, and to his ſeparating a knave's head from his body; the ſtory of which is as follows. "A certain Jew having a diſpute with a wicked "Mohammedan, the latter appealed to the judgment "of Caab Ebn al Aſhraf, a principal Jew, and the "former to Mohammed. But at length they agreed "to refer the matter to the prophet ſingly, who giv-"ing it in favour of the Jew, the Mohammedan re-"fuſed to acquieſce in his ſentence, but would needs "have it re-heard by Omar, afterwards Khalif. "When they came to him, the Jew told him that "Mohammed had already decided the affair in his "favour, but that the other would not ſubmit to his "determination; and the Mohammedan confeſſing "this to be true, Omar bid them ſtay a little, and "fetching his ſword, ſtruck off the obſtinate Moſ-"lem's head, ſaying aloud, This is the reward of him "who refuſeth to ſubmit to the judgment of God and his "Apoſtle. And from this action, Omar had the ſur-name of al Farûk (39).

(39) Sale's Koran, p. 69. London, 1734, 4to. and d'Herbelot, p. 688. col. 2.

[W] An Arabian Author beſtows the higheſt encomiums on Omar.] "This Khalif, ſays he (40), fed others "deliciouſly, and at the ſame time lived very abſte-"miouſly himſelf. He beſtowed rich garments on "others, whilſt himſelf went very meanly clad. He "paid his creditors very punctually, and generally re-"turned them more than the debt. Having pro-"miſed a perſon to give him four thouſand pieces of "ſilver, he ordered him ſix thouſand; when a per-"ſon obſerving that he gave away his ſubſtance in "this manner, and obſerving to him, that he ſeemed, "by this action, to have more affection for a ſtranger "than for his own ſon, ſince he thus diſpoſſeſſed "him of money that ought one day to be his; Omar "replied, my ſon has a father who provides for his "daily wants, but this ſtranger has none (41)." A noble anſwer, but not very well ſuited to a man who had plundered ſo many countries, and deſtroyed ſuch multitudes of people.

(40) D'Herbelot, p. 689. col. 1.

(41) Idem, ibid.

[X] . . . The converſion of a Perſian Lord to the Mohammedan religion.] The 17th year of the Hegira, a Perſian Lord named Hormozan, a Governor of Khûziſtan, &c. under the Perſian Monarch, having been obliged to ſurrender, in one of his caſtles, was ſent to Medina where Omar reſided. Hormozan being immediately conducted to the moſque where Omar was; found him, to his great ſurprize, ſleeping on the ſteps among the poor. Omar waking ſoon after, and ſeeing this ſtranger, roſe from the place where he was, and went and ſeated himſelf in the gallery of the moſque, which ſerved him for a throne. He there received the Perſian very honourably and affectionately; praiſing God for the ſucceſs he indulged the Moſlem arms, and for ſending him perſons of ſuch high quality; and after giving him a rich robe, he diſcourſed him, for a conſiderable time, on different matters. The converſation being ended, Hormozan deſired ſome drink; when Omar aſking if he was a-thirſt, and Hormozan anſwering no; but that the ſole reaſon of his deſiring to drink, in his preſence was, to ſecure his life; Omar replied, that he was ſafe. So that Hormozan abſtained from drinking on his word; and inſtantly renouncing the idolatrous worſhip of fire, profeſſed Iſlâm (42). We alſo are told another ſtory of Giabala, an Arabian Prince, who came to Omar, to recognize him in quality of Khalif, and to embrace his religion. Omar received him very graciouſly, and took him to Mecca, whither famous ſentence pronounced by Omar [Y]. Abu Becr and Omar, the firſt and ſecond Khalifs of the Saracens, were ſo like in their manners and behaviour, that the Moſlems call them by one common name, viz. the two Omars (uu); and yet they differed in one particular [Z]. A miraculous eſcape of Omar related [AA]. Among other particulars, in which the Perſians ſhew their deteſtation of Omar, &c. is the whimſical one hereunder [BB]. Omar uſed to ſay, that the Empire of the Arabs will come to an end, when the Prince who governs it ſhall not practiſe the piety of the Moſlems, nor exert the liberality of the Gentiles (ww). Omar made no will, but appointed ſix Commiſſioners; and allowed them three days time to conſult about the ſucceſſion after his death, who accordingly raiſed Othman Ebn Affân to the Khalifât (xx).

(42) D'Herbelot, p. 688. col. 1.

(uu) D'Herbelot, p. 689. col. 1.

(ww) Ibid. p. 689. col. 1.

(xx) Ockley p. 369 & ſeq.

ther he was going in pilgrimage. As Giabala was performing the duties required on that occaſion, and going round the temple of Mecca, a mean man, pulling him by the ſleeve, drew him out of his place. Giabala offended at this man's rudeneſs, gave him a box o'the ear; and afterwards reproached him, in the moſt injurious terms, for his ſhocking incivility to a perſon of his quality. Omar hearing this Prince continue to threaten and abuſe the man who had drawn him from his place, ſaid to him, hold your peace for otherwiſe, that man ſhall return you the box o'the ear: for know, that the religion of the Moſlems has put you both upon a level, the prince and the ſlave, with regard to the exerciſe and practice of the duties of piety and religion, and particularly with reſpect to thoſe of the pilgrimage. Giabala was ſo highly exaſperated at the Khalîf's words, that he left him; went to Conſtantinople, and there turned Chriſtian (43).

(43) Ebn Shohriah.

[Y] We are told of a famous ſentence pronounced by Omar.] The Governor of his new city of Baſſora, at the mouth of the Tigris, having been accuſed of adultery by four witneſſes, inhabitants of that city; Omar ſent for the witneſſes before him, when three of them made oath, that they had ſeen the action thro' one of the windows of the ſame room; but the fourth witneſs who was a perſon of gravity and authority, ſaid, that he had ſeen only ſome circumſtances which might ſerve as an indication of the crime. Omar being urgent with him, aſked, whether he had ſeen him put the needle into the box of Surmeh, which is a powder of Antimony, uſed by the Eaſterns as an eye-ſalve. This witneſs knowing that Omar by this decent form of expreſſion, hinted at the crime of adultery, anſwered, that he had not ſeen it; Omar thereupon cleared the Governor, and ſentenced the three abovementioned as falſe witneſſes (44).

(44) Ibid.

[Z] They differ in one particular.] This was in the beſtowing their favours. For Abu Becr, on thoſe occaſions, had regard only to the merit of perſons; whereas Omar conſidered nothing but their neceſſities, ſaying, that virtue is a ſufficient reward in the world to come; but that the good things of this world were given by the Almighty, chiefly to relieve the neceſſities incident to this life (45).

(45) D'Herbelot, p. 689. col. 1 and 2. and Ockley, p. 368.

[AA] A miraculous eſcape of Omar is related.] Whilſt Antioch was beſieging by the Saracens, and upon the point of being taken, the Emperor aſſembled the Biſhops, &c. when Jabala, General of the Chriſtian Arabs, told Heraclius, that if the Khalîf was killed, the affairs of the Saracens would be embroiled; and this action would greatly contribute to the recovery of what the Chriſtians had loſt. Upon this Jabala prevailed with the Emperor, to let him ſend one of his Chriſtian Arabs, Wathek Ebn Moſâpher by name, a reſolute young man, with orders to take a convenient time to kill the Khalîf. Omar, after prayers, went out of the city, to take a walk, according to his uſual cuſtom. Wathek went before him, and got upon a tree, where he hid himſelf; till at laſt he obſerved Omar lie down to ſleep, very near him. Having this fair opportunity, he drew his dagger, and was juſt coming down; when caſting his eyes about, he ſaw a lion walking round Omar, and licking his feet, who guarded him till he awoke, and then went away. Surprized at this, and ſtruck with a profound reverence for the Khalîf, whom he now conſidered as the peculiar gift of heaven, he came down and kiſſed his hand; and telling him his errand, immediately made profeſſion of the Mahommedan religion, being ſtrangely affected with this wonderful deliverance (36). This ſtory ſeems contrived by the Arabian Author, to draw the greater veneration on Omar.

(46) Ockley, p. 308, 309.

[BB] The Perſians ſhew their deteſtation.] Of the three great Doctors of the Mohammedan law, viz. Abu Becr, Oſman and Omar. 'Tis this. The Perſians have a cuſtom at their marriages, to ſet up the images of thoſe three Doctors in paſte or ſugar, at the entrance of the bridal chamber, on which the gueſts firſt caſting their looks, leave the impreſſion of any ſecret magic which may iſſue from their eyes, to the prejudice or misfortune of the married couple; for in the Eaſtern parts of the world, they hold that there is a ſtrange faſcination innate in the eyes of ſome people, who looking attentively on others, as commonly they do on the bride and bridegroom at marriage, produce macerations and imbecillity in the body, and have a peculiar quality contrary to procreation; and therefore when the gueſts are entered, having the malignity of their eyes fixed on thoſe ſtatues, they afterwards cut them down and diſſolve them (47).

(47) Ricaut's Hiſtory of the preſent ſtate of the Ottoman Empire, p. 226. Lond. 1682. 8vo.

I.

OMNIBONUS, in Italian Omnibuono, was one of the beſt Grammarians in the 15th Century. He took the ſirname of Leonicenus becauſe he was born at Lunigo (a) in Latin Leonicum, in the Vicentino. He ſtudied under Victorinus of Feltri, one of the firſt reſtorers of the antient Latin ſtile (b). He applied himſelf to the Greek tongue at Venice under Emanuel Chryſoloras (c). He wrote commentaries on Lucan, Salluſt, Valerius Maximus, on Tully's Offices, on his treatiſe De Oratore, &c. He tranſlated into Latin ſome of Æſop's Fables, Xenophon's treatiſe De Venatione, that of St. Athanaſius, Contra Gentes et Hæreticos (d). But theſe are only part of his works.

(a) Leandro Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta Italia, folio 470. edit. of Venice 1561, in 4to.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Geſnerus, in Biblioth. folio 527.

(d) Epitome in Biblioth. Geſneri, p. 641.

OREGIUS (AUGUSTINE) a great Philoſopher, was charged by Cardinal Barberini (a) Legate of Bologna, to examine whether Ariſtotle taught the mortality of the Soul. The Legate's deſign was to perſuade the Popes to prohibit the Lectures upon Ariſtotle with regard to that ſubject, in caſe he were found guilty of that impiety. But Oregius cleared him of the charges. See his Book De Immortalitate Animæ (b). He wrote one De Angelis, and another De Operibus ſex Dierum, i. e. "Of the works created ſix "days:" they were printed at Rome in the year 1632.

(a) Who was afterwards Pope, under the name of Urban VIII.

(b) Chapt. the Vth. Conſult Fromondus, Philoſ. Chriſt. de Anima, p. 761.

ORICELLARIUS (BERNARD) a native of Florence, and a relation to the Medicis (a), was raiſed to the moſt noble employments in his own country (b). He flouriſhed towards the end of the 15th Century. The paſſages we ſhall quote in the remarks prove that (a) See the remark [B].

(b) Vir conſularis graviſſimus. Poggiantius, de Scriptor. Florent. p. 32.

that his works were written in a very good ſtile. He wrote with great partiality of Charles VIII.'s expedition in Italy (c). I do not think he is to be diſtinguiſhed from Bernard OCARICULARIUS (d), of whom Eraſmus relates a particular which deſerves to be known [A]. Pierius Valerianus has mentioned our Bernard [B], and Peter Crinitus ſpeaks

(c) Qua in Hiſtoria moderatio ſcriptori probo conveniens, & alienus à ſtudiis partium animus deſiderantur. i. e. " In which " hiſtory the " moderation " proper to a " good writer, " and a mind free " from a ſpirit of " party are " wanting." Mabill. Muſæi Ital. Tom. 1. p. 169.

(d) Konig makes two Authors of this one.

[A] Eraſmus relates a particular of him which deſerves to be known.] He could never perſuade him to ſpeak Latin: it was not becauſe Ocricularius did not underſtand it; but becauſe as he had ſtudied the beauties and delicacies of that language, he was afraid to ſpeak barbarouſly, if he ſhould venture to ſpeak it ex tempore. Eraſmus tells us this with reſpect to an apophthegm of Pollio. That Orator acknowledged, that by pleading well, he had acquired a great readineſs of pleading; and that by pleading often he had made himſelf leſs capable to plead well. The ſame thing happens to thoſe, who ſpeak often Latin; they get an habit to ſpeak it eaſily, but loſe the uſe of ſpeaking it correctly and with politeneſs. Pollio dicebat, Commode agendo factum eſt, ut ſæpe agerem: ſed ſæpe agendo factum eſt ut minus commode, quia ſcilicet aſſiduitate nimia facilitas magis quam facultas, nec fiducia ſed temeritas paratur. Quod accurate factum velimus, raro faciendum eſt. Hac ratione duci videntur Itali quidam eruditi, qui licet pulchre calleant Latine, tamen vix unquam adduci poſſunt ut in familiari congreſſu Latine loquantur. At ſi quando compellit neceſſitas, dicunt exacte, quaſique de ſcripto. Novi Venetiæ Bernardum Ocricularium civem Florentinum, cujus hiſtorias ſi legiſſes, dixiſſes alterum Salluſtium, aut certe Salluſtii temporibus ſcriptas (1). Nunquam tamen ab homine impetrare licuit, ut mecum Latine loqueretur: ſubinde interpellabam, ſurdo loqueris, vir præclare, vulgaris linguæ veſtratis tam ſum ignarus quam Indicæ. Verbum Latinum nunquam quivi ab eo extundere (2), i. e. " Pollio uſed to ſay: from pleading well, I came to " plead often; but by doing it often I did not do it ſo " well; becauſe by too great an aſſiduity one acquires a " readineſs rather than a good faculty of pleading; a " temerity and not a boldneſs. We ſhould do ſeldom " what we would do accurately. This ſeems to be " the reaſon why ſome learned Italians, though " they underſtand the Latin tongue perfectly well, " can yet hardly be prevailed upon to ſpeak it in a " familiar converſation. But if ſometimes they are " under a neceſſity to do it, they ſpeak it properly " as it were from a book. I was acquainted " at Venice with Bernard Ocricularius, a citizen of " Florence; if you had read his hiſtory, you would " think it was written by another Saluſt, or at leaſt " that it was compoſed in Saluſt's time. And yet I " could never perſuade him to ſpeak Latin with me: " I uſed to tell him ſometimes: you ſpeak to a deaf " man; I am as unacquainted with your mother-" tongue, as with the language of the Indians: I " could never draw one ſingle Latin word from his " mouth." That precaution of the Italians laſted a great while: for Scioppius tells us, that Paul Manutius could not but with the utmoſt difficulty be prevailed upon to ſpeak three or four Latin words: which was the reaſon why the Germans, who went to viſit him, eſteemed themſelves more learned than him; becauſe they ſpoke Latin more readily, whence they inferred that he did not come up to them. Father Maffeus would not venture to keep up a converſation with the ſame Scioppius, becauſe he would have been obliged to anſwer in Latin. Though theſe Gentlemen did not care to ſpeak that language, it was not ſo much becauſe they could not ſpeak it readily, as becauſe they feared leſt they ſhould uſe themſelves to barbarous expreſſions, which are almoſt unavoidable to thoſe who ſpeak Latin in converſation. I imagine the reader will not be diſpleaſed to meet here with the paſſage from Scioppius, after ſeeing the words of Eraſmus. The affinity, which theſe ſubjects have to each other, is a ſufficient reaſon for tranſcribing Scioppius's words. Nihil non faciunt (Itali) ut evitent omnia, unde aliquid infuſcandæ & contaminandæ orationis periculi oſtenditur. Latine igitur nunquam loquuntur, quod fieri vix poſſe perſuaſum habeant, quin quotidianus ejus linguæ uſus, ad inſtar torrentis lutulentus fluat, & cujuſquemodi verborum ſordes ſecum rapiat, quæ poſtea quodam familiaritatis jure, ſic ſe ſcribentibus ingerant, ut etiam diligentiſſimos fallant, & haud dubie pro Latinis habeantur. Hoc eorum conſilium cum haud intelligant Tranſalpini, id eorum inſcitiæ perperam adſignant. Sic recte Paulo Manutio uſu venit, ut quoniam vix tria verba Latina in familiari ſermone proferre poterat, eum Germani complures, qui loquentem audituri ad eum venerant, vehementer præ ſe contemnerent. Huic tamen nemo, qui ſanus ſit, ad puritatis & elegantiæ Latinæ ſummam quicquid defuiſſe dixerit. (3). . . . Mihi quoque Petrus Maffeus Jeſuita nomini atque famæ parum reſpondere viſus eſt, cum ad eum Romæ undeviginti abhinc annis ſalutatum veniſſem. Neque enim inducere animum poterat, ut Latine mihi reſpondendi aleam ſubiret. Poſtea vero lecta, relectaque ejus hiſtoria, quam de rebus per Luſitanos in India geſtis condidit, conſilium hominis ſibi parum fidentis, labemque nomini ſuo metuentis intelligere mihi viſus ſum, quod etiam facere non potui, quin prudentiſſimum judicarem (4), i. e. " The Italians uſe all " poſſible means to avoid every thing that might " ſpoil their Latin ſtyle. They never ſpeak Latin, " becauſe they are perſuaded it is almoſt impoſſible " but a daily uſe of that language muſt in time be-" come flowing like a torrent, and carry all " ſorts of improper expreſſions with it: which being " thus becoming familiar, will eaſily creep even into " one's writings, ſo that the moſt careful writer will " not be able to take notice of them, and will un-" queſtionably imagine them good Latin. The fo-" reigners not being acquainted with this reaſon of " the Italians, aſcribe it erroneouſly to their igno-" rance. Thus it happened to Paul Manutius; as " he could hardly ſpeak three words in Latin, in " familiar diſcourſe, a great many Germans, who " came to hear him ſpeak, deſpiſed him prodigiouſly " in compariſon to themſelves; and yet no man in " his ſenſes will pretend that he did not arrive at the " higheſt degree of politeneſs and eloquence in the " Latin ſtyle. . . . Peter Maffeus a Jeſuit did not " ſeem to me to anſwer his great reputation, when I " went to viſit him at Rome nineteen years ago; " for he could never be reſolved to run the riſk of " anſwering me in Latin. But afterwards when I " read over and over again the hiſtory he wrote of " what the Portugueſe did in the Indies, I found out " that he did not dare to ſpeak Latin, becauſe he " miſtruſted his own abilities, and would not expoſe " his reputation; which in my opinion was very " prudently done." I may aſſert, I think, that Thuanus followed the example of thoſe over nice Italians, for I met with the following paſſage in a modern writer. *The Jeſuit Maffeus . . . . uſed to repeat his breviary in Greek, leſt the ſoleciſms and the low and mean expreſſions, in which the holy Bible is written, as Origen obſerves, * ſhould ſpoil the elegance and beauty of that ſtile, which we admire in his works. And for the ſame reaſon Thuanus, who ſpoke Latin with the fluency and majeſty of Livy, never anſwered the orations and compliments that were made him in that tongue, but by an interpreter* (5).

(1) See what Poccianti, p. 33. de Scriptor. Florentinis, obſerves of Bernard Oricellarius. Dictitavit quinetiam Florentinas hiſtorias, quas adeo phraſi extulit eloquentiſſima, quod (teſte Michaele Urbinate) ipſum Saluſtium ſuperaſſe videatur; i. e. " He " wrote the Hiſtory of Florence, in ſuch " a polite and elegant ſtile, " that (according to Michael " Urbinas) he " ſeemed to have " excelled even " Saluſt himſelf."

(2) Eraſm. Apophth. lib. 8. p. 634. edit. 1556.

(3) Scioppius, in Judicio de Stilo Hiſtorico, p. m. 57.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 58.

* Περὶ σολικισμῶ, καὶ τούτοις φράσεως τῆς γραφῆς.

(5) Girac, Réponſe à la Défenſe des Oeuvres de Voiture, ſect. 18. p. 120.

WHY ſome learned men will not ſpeak Latin.

[B] Pierius Valerianus has mentioned our Bernard.] It is where he ſpeaks of the deceitful hopes of John Oricellarius, Bernard's ſon. He aſpired to get a Cardinal's hat under Leo X. and more ſtill under Clement VI. but after ſeveral delays, which vexed him without tiring his patience, death came at laſt and diſappointed all his hopes of preſent (16) and future preferments. Eodem in albo reponendus Joannes Oricellarius ſummæ vir integritatis, quique litterarum ſtudia vel à teneris unguiculis ſectari cœperat, & apud Bernardum patrem eruditiſſimum virum, & apud Mediceos hujuſmodi ſtudiis in ea domo florentibus educatus fuerat. Erat is Leoni Decimo Pont. Max. amitinus frater, neque ullus erat, qui tum morum, tum litteraturæ, nobilitatis, & conſanguinitatis gratia non eum ſperaret ad Cardinalatus apicem in horas evehendum. Sed fortuna illi quoſdam oppoſuerat (7). . . . Adridere mox Joanni viſa ſors melior.. Hic igitur Oricellarius, dum ſe totum litterarum ſtudiis reſtituit, & fortunæ demum fallacias declinaſſe haud temerè ſibi perſuadet, dumque Clemens de more quodam ſuo contator ordinandi hominis diem de die ducit; ille in rapidiſſimam

(6) He was Governor of the caſtle of St. Angelo, under Clement VII. Pier. Valerian. de Literator. Infelicitate, lib. p. m. 74.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 73.

ſpeaks alſo of him [C]. John de la Caſa had a ſiſter who was married with one Oricellarius. The ſons of this ſiſter took care of their uncle's burying, and of his works. I relate this only that I may have an opportunity to correct a miſtake relating to Naogeorgus [D].

Thuanus mentions one HORACE ORICELLARIUS of Florence, who got a prodigious eſtate by being concerned in the Exciſe upon Salt in France, and who finding he had made himſelf odious by his immenſe gain, returned into his own country. In the year 1588 the great Duke of Tuſcany ſent him Embaſſador to treat of his marriage with a daughter of the Duke of Lorrain (e). There was at the ſame time one CHARLES ORICELLARIUS belonging to the Univerſity of Florence, and Canon of the Metropolitan Church of that city; he was very much eſteemed by Peter Victorius, who beſtowed great elogies upon him in the Preface to his Commentary on the third book of Ariſtotle's Ethicks (f). Obſerve that the common name of that family is Rucellai. I ſhall give proofs of it, not ſo much with a deſign to clear up a doubtful fact, for this is not in the leaſt doubtful, as that I may have an opportunity to mention ſome perſons of that name [E].

I add,

(e) Thuan. lib. 92. p. 230.

(f) See p. 247, of the Notizie Letterarie ed Iſtoriche intorno agli huomini illuſtri dell' Accademia. This work, written by Jacobo Rilli, was printed at Florence in 4to, in the year 1700.

pidiſſimam illapſus febrem magnæ doctorum hominum ſpei præreptus eſt (8), i. e. "We muſt alſo reckon amongſt "them John Oricellarius, a man of the utmoſt ho- "neſty; who from his moſt tender years applied "himſelf to the ſtudy of Literature; having been "educated by his father Bernard a very learned man, "and at the houſe of the Medici's, where thoſe ſtu- "dies flouriſhed exceedingly. He was a Couſin- "German to Pope Leo X. and there was no man "who, it was hoped, would ſooner be raiſed to the "dignity of a Cardinal, conſidering his morals, his "learning, his noble deſcent, and his being the "Pope's relation. But fortune put ſome other perſons "in his way. . . . Soon after a happier fate ſeemed "to ſmile upon him. . . . Oricellarius therefore ap- "plied himſelf again to his ſtudies, thinking he had "at laſt overcome the deceitful inconſtancy of for- "tune: but whilſt Pope Clement, who was naturally "a delayer of time, put off his ordination from day "to day, he fell ſick of a moſt violent fever, which "ſnatched him away very quickly, whereby the "great hopes, which the learned had conceived of "him, were all diſappointed."

(8) Ibid. p. 74.

[C] Peter Crinitus ſpeaks alſo of him.] Poccianti having obſerved that Marcilius Ficinus and Peter Crinitus gave in their letter a great character of Bernard Oricellarius's learning and wit, adds this: Poſteritati tranſmiſit (teſte eodem Chrinito) in primis libros quos de urbe Roma intitulaverat, in quibus admodum elaboravit in illuſtrandis atque obſervandis antiquorum monumentis (9), i. e. He left to poſterity (according to the "ſame Crinitus) particularly ſome books, which he "entitled, Of the City of Rome, in which he took "much pains to illuſtrate and explain the monuments "of the antients."

(9) Pocciant. de Scriptor. Florentinis, p. 32.

[D] A miſtake relating to Naogeorgus.] It appears by the inſcription on John de la Caſa's (10) tomb, that HORACE ORICELLARIUS took care to erect that monument to his uncle by the mother's ſide. Horatius Oricellarius avunculo optime merito P. A German author obſerves, that the Latin verſes which were written by John de la Caſa, againſt thoſe who charged him with having commended ſodomy, are not to be met with in the collection of his works, entitled Joannis Caſæ Latina Monumenta. He imagines that Alexander Strozza, Inquiſitor of the Faith, cauſed thoſe lines to be omitted in that collection. He gives us the licence for printing it, which was granted by that Inquiſitor June 7, 1564; and he obſerves that Hannibal Oricellarius collected thoſe remains of John de la Caſa (11). He gives us the Poem that had been omitted, and he imagines that the author wrote it in anſwer to the Satyr, which Naogeorgus had added to the ſecond edition of the Regnum Papiſticum (12). He is miſtaken; for John de la Caſa wrote that Poem only to remove the bad impreſſions which Vergerio gave the Germans of him, by charging him with writing the praiſe of ſodomy. Here follows a paſſage, by which it appears unqueſtionably, that he does not complain of a ſatyr publiſhed by a German; but of the reports ſpread by a fugitive.

(10) See Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtor. p. 28. Ghilini Theatr. part. 1. p. 79.

Quare habere tranſfugæ
De me fidem nolite perditiſſimo:
Sed enecate eum indies magis ſiti,
Pedoribuſque & eſuritionibus:
Quod belle adhuc feciſſe vos exiſtimo,
Virtute natio & fide atque induſtria
Et literis clara, ingeniique gloria (13).

(11) Daniel Francus, Diſquiſit. Academ. de Pap. ſtarum Indicibus Librorum prohibitorum, p. 3.

(12) Scripſerat ani ſtum Caſæ juvenilem, ut ipſe quidem excuſat, librum Thomas Naogeorgus, ſatyram regno papiſtico ſecundæ editionis quæ Baſileæ 1559 prodiit, adjectam. In hunc ergo Caſa ſequenti, quod ſubjiciemus carmine inſurrexit. Idem, ibid. p. 109.

(13) Theſe lines are the concluſion of the poem tranſcribed by Daniel Francus. It is to be met with in the 1ſt vol. of the Delitiarum Poetarum Italorum, p. 702.

i. e. "Give no credit to a moſt abandoned fugitive's "report againſt me: but kill him daily more and "more with hunger, thirſt, and naſtyneſs, as I fan- "cy you have done well enough to this time: you "who are a nation eminent by your virtue, honeſ- "ty, induſtry, wit and learning." Paul Vergerio is the fugitive mentioned here. See at the end of the Anti-Baillet, the diſcourſe which John de la Caſa wrote againſt him in proſe.

[E] The common name of that family is Rucellai. I ſhall give proofs of it . . . that I may have an opportunity to mention ſome perſons of that name.] Signor Rilli, in his hiſtory of the Academicians of Florence, calls the ſame learned man Carlo Rucellai, whom Peter Victorius calls Carolus Oricellarius. You have heard in the foregoing remark of Horace Oricellarius, and of Hannibal Oricellarius, who were the ſons of one of John de la Caſa's ſiſters. They are called Rucellai in Cardinal d'Oſſat's letters (14): "The ſecond thing, with "which . . Cardinal Aldobrandini charged us by the "Pope's order, was to recommend the Biſhop of "Carcaſſonne to the King, that he might enjoy the "revenues both of the ſaid Biſhoprick, and of an "abbey (15) he has in Champagne. The Cardinal "added, that his Holineſs acknowledged that the "ſaid Biſhop, and his brother Signor Horace Rucel- "lai, were his friends, and had always been friends "to his family, and were well affected towards "France." Mr. Amelot de la Houſſaye obſerves, in his remarks upon this paſſage (16); 1. That that Biſhop of Carcaſſonne was Hannibal Rucellai, a Gentleman of Florence, who had been formerly Governor of Rome, and who was known at the court of France, by means of the negotiations in which he had been employed by the Popes Paul IV. and Pius V. That in the year 1567, he was ſent to Venice by Charles IX, to aſk the Senate for a ſupply in money, but he could not obtain any thing, becauſe of the war with the Turks, with which the Republic was threatened at that time. 2. That Horatio Rucellai was firſt Steward to Ferdinand, Great Duke of Tuſcany. 3. That the Aldobrandini's and the Rucellai's had always been of that party, which is called at Florence THE LIBERTINES (17), that is to ſay, the good Republicans, and the Anti-Medicis, who would preſerve the liberty of their country. Hence came the great love, which Clement VIII had for theſe two brothers, whoſe father, as well as his own, had ſuffered very much under the Popes Leo X, and Clement VII, by whoſe means the houſe of Medicis had acquired Sovereign Power. That Biſhop of Carcaſſonne, died January the 28th, 1601 (18). His brother Horatio Rucellai, one of the moſt able men in the world (19), ſent immediately an expreſs into France (20). Catel obſerves, that Hannibal Oricellai was Biſhop of Carcaſſonne, in the year 1569 (21). The Abbot Rucellai, who made himſelf ſo much talked of in France, in the reign of Lewis XIII, was no doubt ſon to this Horatio, for he was John de la Caſa's grand-nephew (22), and (23) born of a father who was grown rich (24) by his correſpondence with Zamet, Bandini, Cenamy, and the other Italians, who at that time had farmed the Duties in France. You will find in the

(14) Lettre 34 d'Oſſat, p. 176, of the 1ſt vol. of the Paris edit. 1698. That letter is dated the 25th, 1595.

(15) It was that of Jard, near Melun. Amelot de Houſſaie, ubi infra.

(16) Amelot de la Houſſaie, notes upon that paſſage of Cardinal d'Oſſat.

(17) You may ſupport this by a paſſage cited above, quotation (12) of the article MACHIAVEL, concerning COSIMIN RUCELLAI.

(18) D'Oſſat, Letter 257. p. 299 of the 2d vol.

(19) Ibid. Lettres 267, p. 341.

(20) Ibid. Lettre 257.

(21) Catel, Memoires de l'Hiſt. du Languedoc, p. 1009.

(22) See Vigneul Marville, in the 1ſt vol. of his Melanges, p. 173 of the 1ſt edit. of Rouen.

(23) Ibid. p. 271 of the 2d vol. Dutch edit.

(24) He carried off with him from the duties upon ſalt in France, 17 hundred thouſand livres. Scaligerana, under the word Rucellai.

I add, that "Catharine de Medicis took with her into France the firſt perſon of that "family, who ſettled there; and that it is not long ſince an Envoy of Florence (g) ... "ſet up his claim to ſome eſtate, which he pretended was deſcended to him from his "anceſtors, who had ſettled in that Kingdom." ... That this Queen had a very kind affection for all the perſons of that family, and that ſhe looked upon them as being in ſome manner her relations, for they deſcended from the Viſcounti's by the women, and were by that ſide related to the houſe of Medicis.

(g) He was of the family of the Rucellai's.

(b) Mercure Galant, for February, 1703, p. 318, &c.

(25) Vign. Marville, p. 173 of the 1ſt vol. edit. of Roan, and p. 271 of the 2d vol. Dutch edit.

Melanges of Vigneul Marville (25) the moſt curious particulars, which Monſieur de Baſſompierre, and the Author of the Duke of Epernon's life, have obſerved concerning that Abbot. Here follows a paſſage, which relates to another perſon of that family. "They promiſe us from Florence a work, in which "the Author, named Rucellai, has collected all that "the antients wrote upon that Science; from all "which he has drawn up as many different ſyſtems "of natural philoſophy, as amount up to the number "of thirty-ſix. As that work, which he wrote in "Italian, and which contains twelve volumes, could "not be printed before his death, there are reaſons "to fear, left it will not be publiſhed ſo ſoon, con-"ſidering the loſs, which the Republic of Letters "has ſuſtain'd by the death of Cardinal de Medicis, "who alone could forward the impreſſion (26)." The book from which I extracted this paſſage, was printed in the year 1676. I do not queſtion, but that paſſage relates to the ſame Horatio Rucellai, whom Signor de Creſcimbeni mentions in theſe words. Il Sonetto moderno lo torremo dal ſecolo del ſecento ora corrente, e da uno de' più illuſtri Letterati, ch'egli abbia annoverato, cioè dalle Rime ſcritte a mano appreſſo di me del leggiadro Poëta, a profondo Filoſofo Orazio Rucellai Fiorentino Cavaliere, e Priore di ſua Patria, il quale à fiorito à noſtri tempi, ed à laſciato all'eruditiſſimo Signor Prior Luigi ſuo figlivolo un'opera nobiliſſima di Dialoghi filoſofici, la quale ſe un giorno vedrà la luce, conoſceranno i Poſteri quanto per sì chiaro intelletto queſto ſecolo fia degno d'invidia (27). i. e. "That modern ſon-"net, which we took to be of the ſeventeenth centu-"ry, is of one of the moſt learned men that lived in "this age; it is a piece which I have by me in "manuſcript, written by that witty poet, and pro-"found philoſopher, Horatio Rucellai, a Gentleman "of Florence, and a Prior in his native country, "who flouriſhed in our time: he left to his moſt "learned ſon Lewis, a noble work, containing philo-"ſophical dialogues; by which, if it be ever printed, "poſterity will judge how much our age deſerves to "be envied, ſince it was poſſeſſed of a man, whoſe "underſtanding was ſo great and clear." The ſame Author tells us, that Giovanni Rucellai, compoſed at Rome, in the year 1524, a poem, entitled, le Api, (the Bees), which was printed in the year 1539, and afterwards at Florence, for Philip Giunti, in the year 1590, with Robert Titius's Notes, and with Lewis Alamannis Coltivazione (28). He does not mention the edition printed at Paris, 1546, for Robert Stephens. It is mentioned in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (29). This John Rucellai was of Florence (30), and we ought not to queſtion but he was of the family of the Oricellarii. See the article RUCELLAI.

(27) Giovanne Mario de' Creſcimbeni, l'Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, p. 35, of the edition publiſhed at Rome, 1698, in 8vo.

(26) Rapin, Reflections ſur la Phyſique, num. 7. p. 418 of the Dutch edition.

(28) Idem, ibid. p. 327.

(29) In page 339 of the 2d part of that catalogue.

(30) Creſcimbeni, Iſtoria della volgar Poeſia, p. 272.

ORICHOVIUS, or ORECHOVIUS (STANISLAUS) a Gentleman of Poland, was born in the Dioceſs of Premiſlaw in Ruſſia, towards the beginning of the 16th Century. He was called the Demoſthenes of Poland on account of the great freedom and ſtrength of his eloquence. He ſtudied at Wittemberg under Luther and under Melanchthon, and afterwards at Venice under John Baptiſt Egnatius. Being returned into his own country, he dedicated himſelf to the Eccleſiaſtical State, and was made Canon of Premiſlaw. He ſhewed ſome inclination for Luther's opinions, and was often cenſured upon that account by his Biſhop in a full chapter: but he deſpiſed thoſe cenſures, reſigned his living, and married. He was anathematiſed by his Biſhop, and cared ſo little for it, that he not only wrote againſt the Clergy, but alſo vexed them in the poſſeſſion of their eſtates, and put himſelf at the head of their enemies: and by the readineſs of his wit, and his flowing tongue, he raiſed great diſorders. He altered his courſe a few years after, and returned again into the Pale of the Catholick Church at the Synod held at Warſaw in the year 1561. Some time after he made publickly his confeſſion of faith at the Synod of Petricow, and had it printed; and from that time he ſhewed great zeal againſt the Sectaries, both in his books, and in verbal diſputes. He diſputed with Andrew Fricius before the Archbiſhop of Gneſna, and then with Stancarus in the King of Poland's preſence, and afterward on ſeveral other occaſions, and always in a triumphant manner (a), if we may believe the author from whom I have borrowed theſe particulars. I have obſerved in another place (b), that Orichovius would hint that when he married whilſt he was a Prieſt, he did not thereby break off with his Church, ſince he ſubmitted to the penalty ſhe requires, which is the forbearing all ſacerdotal functions: but he contradicted himſelf moſt groſly; for he had prefixed to his book a plain confeſſion of his adhering to the Lutheran Party [A]. I ſhall quote ſomething from a Treatiſe, which he wrote to endeavour

(a) Extracted from Starovolſcius, in Elogiis centum Polonorum, num. 58. p. m. 78, 79.

(b) In the remark [M] of the article STANCARUS.

[A] He prefixed to his book, a plain confeſſion of his adhering formerly to the Lutheran party.] The book I mention, is entitled, Chimera, ſive de Stancari funeſta Regno Poloniæ Secta, i. e. "The Chimera; or of Stan-"carus's ſect fatal to the kingdom of Poland." It was printed at Cologne, for Maternus Cholinus, in the year 1563, 8vo. There is prefixed to it a declaration of the Author, in which he ſubmits both his perſon and his writings to the moſt holy Council of Trent. He compares himſelf to the prodigal ſon, who returns to his father's houſe. It will be ſufficient to tranſcribe only ſome of his expreſſions. En ego a finibus terræ ad vos clamo, dum anxiatur cor meum ... ſupplex manus tendo cum principe publicanorum illa, in conſpectu conſeſſuque veſtro fraudata compenſans quadruplo. Namque ego honorem debitum non homini, ſed ordini veſtro ſæpe detraxi; atque commune veſtrum patrimonium vexavi, dicendo in vos quæ non oportuit: ſcribendo de vobis, quæ non licuit; agendo contra vos, quæ non decuit agere, dicere ſcribere. Defraudavi igitur vos, cum hereticis dum conjuro, dicto, ſcripto, facto. In quibus tot ac tantis damnis, detrimentiſque veſtris, ex auctoritate veſtra reſarciendis, nolite, pro indulgentia veſtra, aliud a me expectare velle, præter illud quadruplum, Pater peccavi in Cœlum coram te (1); i. e. "I call upon you from "the extremity of the earth, whilſt my heart is hea-"vily oppreſſed. ... I ſtretch out my hands to you, "like the chief of the Publicans, deſigning to make "you amends four-fold in your preſence, and in "your aſſembly, for what I have done amiſs. For "I have deavour to obtain for the Prieſts the liberty of marrying [B]. I ſhall alſo ſet down the titles of his works [C].

(1) Orichovii Chimæra, folio 2 verſo.

" I have deprived you of that honour, which is due, " not to a man, but to your Order. I have diſtreſ- " ſed you in your common inheritance, by ſaying " againſt you what ſhould not have been ſaid; by " writing of you, what it was not lawful to write, " by acting againſt you, as it did not become me to " act, to ſpeak, or to write. I have therefore in- " jured you, whilſt I conſpired with the Hereticks, " by my words, writings, and actions. But to make " you a full reparation for theſe many and great " injuries, be pleaſed, according to your indulgence, " not to expect more from me, than the four-fold I " have mentioned: Father, I have ſinned againſt " heaven, and before thee."

[B] I ſhall quote ſomething from a treatiſe, which he wrote, to endeavour to obtain for the Prieſts the liberty of marrying.] " Staniſlaus Orichovius, Biſhop of Ruſſia, " preſented a petition, in the year 1551, to Pope " Julius III. praying that he might have leave to " marry; and repreſenting to him the injuſtice of " Syricius's law, which were againſt the laws of God: " he alledged at the ſame time, that Pope Paul II. " had condemned it amongſt his friends, being ſor- " ry that he was obliged to conſider a daughter of " his as a baſtard, whom by the law of God he " might keep as a lawful child. He would even have " acted againſt that unjuſt law, had not death pre- " vented him. Orichovius alſo objected to him the " children of Paul III, who deſerved, ſaid he, to " have been born in lawful wedlock; nor did he " ſpare him, with regard to his own diſſoluteneſs " (2)." Theſe are Du Pleſſis Mornai's words. I do not think the title of Biſhop belongs to Orichovius, and after all, his biſhoprick ſhould have been referred to ſome particular See, and not mentioned thus under the general name of a country: for a man would expreſs himſelf very ill, who ſhould ſay, ſuch an one is Biſhop of Italy or of France. Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai publiſhed another book ten or twelve years after the former, in which he had an opportunity to mention the natural daughter of Paul II. He quoted two lines of Pannonius, adding theſe words; and indeed Stephen Orichovius, Biſhop of Ruſſia, tells us, that as all the world knew ſhe was his daughter, he did ſometimes ſpeak with deteſtation of celibacy, which obliged him to look with ſhame on a child, which he might have lawfully begotten (3). Bullenger and Fronto-Ducæus, who examined carefully all the blunders which crept into the former book of that learned Proteſtant, and Coeffeteau, who anſwered the laſt book, did not make the leaſt remark on the pretended epiſcopacy of Orichovius. But Gretſer, in his Examination of the Myſtery of Iniquity (4), cenſures Du Pleſſis for transforming the perſon whom Bale names Staniſlaus Ruthenus, into Stephanus Orichovius (5), Biſhop of Ruſſia. The Author of the State of the Church relates (6), that it is aſſerted in Staniſlaus Ruthen's book, that Paul II. having read ſome poems written againſt him, and againſt his daughter, fell a crying, and complained to his friend againſt the ſevere laws of his predeceſſors, &c. Whence I infer, that that Author tranſcribed the paſſage from Bale, more accurately than Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai had done. Obſerve, that Rivetus imagined Orichovius was Biſhop of Ruſſia, and that his chriſtian name was Stephen (7).

(7) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Tom. 2. p. 618.

[C] The titles of his works.] Let us tranſcribe Staro-volſcius's own words. Scripſit multa & in re civili, & in noſtrum hominum laudibus, ſed præcipue tamen in oſores Religionis Catholicæ; ut puta Quicuncem Latine & Polonicè. Apologiam Quincuncis. Fidei Confeſſionem. Hymeram. Hanc Concilio Tridentino dicavit; Mediatorem. Fricium. Dialogos Latinè & Polonicè. Fidelem Subditum: Orationes de Notis Eccleſiæ: Exequias Tarnovii. Geſta ſui temporis; id eſt regnantibus apud nos Sigiſmundo Seniore & Auguſto F. ſuo. Panegyrim nuptiarum ejuſdem Regis Auguſti. Panegyrim Nuptiarum Jo. Tarnovii, Exercituum Generalis. Orationem pro Dignitate Sacerdotali. De Præſtantia Legum Polonicarum. In obitum Sigiſmundi Senioris. Turcicas ad Regem, Senatum & Equites. Pro & contra Celibatum. Pro Eccleſia Chriſti, contra M. Lutherum Præceptorem ſuum. Inſtitutionem Principis. Apocalypſin ſuam, ſeu faciem pertubatæ & afflictæ Reipublicæ, ejuſque reſtaurandæ rationem, quæ nuper anno 1625 prodiit, edita in Lucem a Nicolao Orichovio Nepote ſuo. Epiſtolas familiares quoque ſcripſit; ſed harum pars maxima adhuc in obſcuro eſt, ut & liber de ſumma Regni. Audio & alia quædam de Repub. Autographa ipſius a quibuſdam privatis, cum nominis ejus forſan, certe cum publicæ utilitatis jactura detineri (8); i. e. " He wrote a great deal upon politi- " cal ſubjects, and in praiſe of our countrymen; but " yet chiefly againſt the enemies of the Chriſtian re- " ligion: as for inſtance, the Quincunx, or Five Parts, " in Latin and Poliſh. A Vindication of the Quincunx. " A Confeſſion of Faith. The Hymera, (or Chimera) " which he dedicated to the Council of Trent. The " Mediator. Fricius. A Dialogue in Latin and Poliſh. " The Loyal Subject. Orations concerning the Marks " of the true Church. The Funeral of Tarnovius. The " Hiſtory of his own Time, that is to ſay, during the " reign of Sigiſmund the elder, and his ſon Auguſtus. " A Panegyrick on the Nuptials of the ſame Au- " guſtus. Another on the marriage of John Tarno- " vius, General of the Armies. An Oration on the " Dignity of the Prieſthood. Of the Excellency of " the Poliſh Laws. On the death of Sigiſmund the " elder. Letters to the King, the Senate and the " Knights, concerning the Turks. For and againſt Ce- " libacy. In defence of the Church of Chriſt, againſt " M. Luther, his Maſter. The Education of a Prince. " His Apocalyps, or Revelation; or the diſturb- " ed and afflicted condition of the Commonwealth, " and the means to retrieve it, which had been printed " lately in the year 1625, being publiſhed by his nephew " Nicholas Orichovius. He wrote alſo familiar letters, " the greateſt part of which are ſtill unpubliſhed, as well " as his book concerning the Sovereign Power in the " Kingdom. I hear that there are ſome Manuſcripts " of his upon poetical ſubjects, which are kept by ſome " private perſons, which is a great injury, perhaps, to " his Reputation, or at leaſt certainly to the Public."

(8) Simon Starovolſcius, in Elogiis centum Polonorum, p. 76. I ſuſpect, that the ſtops are not accurately put every where in that paſſage; and, I believe, that inſtead of Hymeram, we ſhould read Chymæram.

(2) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Inſtitut. de S. Euchariſt. Liv. 2. c. 10. p. m. 322. He quotes, Orich. de Lege Syricii, ad Jul. 3. Orich. Epiſc. Ruſſien. de Celibat.

(3) Du Pleſſis, Myſtére d'Iniquité, p. 544.

(4) p. 536.

(5) They have perhaps printed Orichovius in the Latin editions, which Gretſer anſwered; but it is Orichovius in the French edition.

(6) p. m. 484. under the year 1465.

ORIGEN, one of the moſt fruitful writers, and of the moſt eminent wits that ever flouriſhed in the Primitive Church, lived in the third Century. As there is a very large account of him in Moreri's Dictionary, where a great many authors are referred to (a) who may very eaſily be met with, and who contain the hiſtory of his life, I ſhall give but a ſhort article of him. I confine myſelf to theſe four heads. I. I point out two French writers (b) who acquaint us fully with all Origen's actions and opinions. II. I obſerve in the ſecond place, that a remark of Monſieur Daillé on Monſieur Cottibi's quoting Saint Origen, has been attended with ſome conſequences, which deſerve to be known [A]. III. That

(a) Eſpecially in the Dutch edit.

(b) La Motte, Vie de Tertullien & d'Origene, printed at Paris in the year 1675, in 8vo. Du Pin, Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques, Tom. 1. p. 121, &c. of the Dutch edit. 1690, in 4to. Theſe two Authors are not mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary, printed in Holland.

[A] A remark of Monſieur Dailléen . . Saint Origen, has been attended with ſome conſequences, which deſerve to be known.] Monſieur Cottibi a Miniſter of Poitiers, having changed his religion in the year 1660, wrote a letter to his conſiſtory, in which he gave ſome reaſons for his conduct. Monſieur Daillé was deſired to anſwer him, and did it in the moſt accurate manner. His anſwer was printed with the Ex-Miniſter's letter in the year 1660 with this title. Lettre eſcrite à M. le Coq Sieur de la Talonniere ſur le changement de Religion de Monſieur Cottiby, i. e. " A " letter written to Monſieur le Coq Sieur de la Talon- " niere, concerning Monſieur Cottibi's changing of " his religion." Monſieur Daillé obſerved, among other things, that the new convert, who pretended to ſpeak of the fathers, and to cry up the Primitive Church, was very little acquainted with thoſe matters. He convicted him of ignorance by ſeveral arguments,

III. That a Miniſter in Holland made lately a very juſt obſervation concerning one of Origen's guments, the ſecond of which was grounded on the title of Saint which he gave to Origen. That way of ſpeaking betrays him, and ſhews that he is a perfect ſtranger, both in the republick of the Antiquarians, who are not uſed to ſpeak thus of a man condemned by a general council; and chiefly, to the records of the Popes, where poor Origen was ſo far from obtaining the title of Saint, that on the contrary he was ſtiled a ſchiſmatick as early as the year 494, and all his books, except very few, were condemned, by Pope Gelaſius *. It is not quite two hundred years ſince John Picus, Count of Mirandola, having publiſhed at Rome among his nine hundred propoſitions, that it is more reaſonable to believe Origen is ſaved, than to think him damned; the maſters in divinity cenſured him for it, aſſerting, that his propoſition was raſh, blameable, ſavouring of Hereſy, and contrary to the determination of the Catholick Church; as he himſelf relates it in his Apology †. What would they not have done, if he had placed Origen amongſt the Saints, as Monſieur Cottibi has done? Since they would not even ſuffer that a man ſhould queſtion his damnation, or judge that it was more reaſonable to think him ſaved, than to think him damned (1)? This is what we may ſafely call a conquering cenſure; and though we had no other proofs that the Miniſter of Poitiers knew nothing of the fathers, but what he learnt by reading ſome writings upon controverted ſubjects, this obſervation of Monſieur Daillé would be ſufficient fully to convince us of Cottibi's ignorance. Let us continue the hiſtory of this cenſure; it will teach us, that an author, who is found guilty of a miſtake, and plainly convinced of his blunders, has no other courſe to take, but fairly to acknowledge his fault, or at leaſt not to ſay one word in his defence: for it happens generally that a man's endeavours to vindicate himſelf in ſuch a caſe prove ſilly and impertinent. Monſieur Cottibi anſwered, that the title of Saint was not perhaps in the original draught of his letter, or that it dropt from his pen by placing Origen amongſt the great number of fathers, to whom the title of Saint does not truly belong (2). Theſe are mere evaſions, which were unanſwerably refuted. It was maintained that the words Saint Origen, were in the original, written in the author's own hand, and it was proved that they could not come there by a mere overſight. Who will believe, ſaid Monſieur Daillé (3), that he did not tranſcribe, and read over and over, more than once, a letter, which he wrote to a Conſiſtory, whoſe religion he forſaked, and amongſt whom he refuſed to perform his paſtoral functions for the future? A letter, in which he endeavoured to perſuade his flock to follow his example; and which he knew could not but fill their hearts with grief and indignation? A letter therefore, which he could not but know would be narrowly examined by perſons who were angry and extremely exaſperated againſt him? Indeed, he muſt want common ſenſe, if he did not reviſe and poliſh that letter, if he did not over and over examine the firſt copy of it before he ſent it, that he might have nothing in it, that might afford an handle for raillery to thoſe who did not love him, or give a diſguſt to them that loved him. And yet notwithſtanding all this, the words Saint Origen remained in the letter as he has ſent to us, and as we have ſeen it. It is therefore certain, that the author did not know that the title of Saint does not lawfully belong to Origen. If he had known it, he would have left it out of his letter. And if he did not know a ſecret, which is known to all thoſe who are any ways acquainted with antiquity, I do not ſee how I can truſt to the promiſes he makes me, &c. The following part of Cottibi's Apology is worſe ſtill; for he expatiates on the common topic of the Miniſters hatred againſt the Saints; and he ſays a thouſand things that are not at all to the purpoſe, as you ſhall ſee now. "But, as it ſeems the Miniſters "are paid to wage war againſt the Saints, you imagined it was your duty to attack this, though he "had but the ſhew and outward appearance of a "Saint: for if one does but appear under that habit, "and takes that name, he is no longer ſecure againſt "your ſtrokes. If you diſpute that glorious title as to "thoſe, who have loudly deſerved it, and whoſe "praiſes the Church ſings daily, it is no wonder, "you could not ſuffer in a man, on whom it was "never conferred. I am therefore very far from "being ſurpriſed at your proceeding, and I find "indeed that it is very much your intereſt, not to "ſuffer the number of Saints to encreaſe; for the "more Saints there will be in Heaven, the more "enemies your party, and the more interceſſors the "Church will have there. I wiſhed only that men, "who made St. Paul ſay, that the children of the "faithful are holy, or Saints from their mother's womb *, "would not deny that elogy to him, who was the "ſon of a father and a mother, who not only were "faithful, but alſo Martyrs; to him, who having "himſelf in his moſt tender youth ſuffered perſecu-"tions for Jeſus Chriſt's name, ſhewed afterwards that "he wiſhed with the utmoſt zeal and piety to crown "his former labours with the glory of Martyrdom. "That man of wit *, whoſe authority you uſe to "quote with commendations, had ſo much eſteem "for the wiſdom of Socrates, that whenever he "thought of that great man, he could hardly for-"bear crying out aſtoniſhed, Saint Socrates, pray for "us. It would not therefore be an unpardonable "crime in me, if my ſoul had been ſtruck with "ſome veneration for the virtues of a Chriſtian, "which the Goſpel renders valuable, ſince the eyes "of your friend were dazzled by the actions of an "Heathen, which after all were only ſhining ſins †. "If ſome perſons have obſerved ſpots in the ſun, I "do not wonder that this Doctor had ſome ble-"miſhes; and I ſhall not pretend to vindicate him "after the Councils have condemned him. How-"ever I muſt obſerve with that noble writer ‖, who "at the age of twenty four offered publickly to "maintain at Rome, that Origen was above ſixty "before he determined himſelf to any particular "opinion in his writings, and that he may have de-"fended erroneous doctrines, without being an He-"retick, ſince he never perſiſted in them with obſti-"nacy, nor defended them with rebellion; ſince "they were not condemned till after his death, "and ſince he did even penance for them dur-"ing his life. It is therefore in vain that you en-"deavour to raiſe againſt me all the Maſters in Di-"vinity; that young Count encourages me, who "tells me, he had the Pope on his ſide §, with a "great number of thoſe who made up the Apoſtolick "Senate, whilſt ſome envious men murmured againſt "his propoſitions. After all, if by your credit and "ſollicitations I was to fall under the diſpleaſure of "the ſacred Conclave, I would rather chooſe it were "for putting innocently one Doctor more into the "catalogue of the Saints, without approbation and "conſent, than for oppoſing, like you, the glory "and fame of thoſe whom the Church has canonized, "and endeavouring by the moſt ſacrilegious of all at-"tempts, to eraſe their names, both out of the "Church Calendar, and out of the memory of "men (4)." All this deſerved no other anſwer but the following. Learn (5) the difference there is, in the ſtile of the Court and Church of Rome, between a Conſiſtory and a Conclave. This blunder is pardonable in a young beginner. The misfortune is, that in all theſe excurſions, in which he ſuffered himſelf to be carried away far beyond the ſcope of this controverſy, he could not meet with the leaſt thing proper to ſhew, that it is agreeable to the ſtile of men verſed in antiquity, to ſay Saint Origen.

Father Adam would alſo meddle with Cottibi's apology upon this article; but he acquitted himſelf ſo ill of his taſk, that ſuch wretched and impertinent ſophiſtry is perhaps no where elſe to be met with. The paſſage which I ſhall tranſcribe is ſomewhat long; but as it contains ſeveral particulars relating to Origen's hiſtory, and as it may alſo ſerve to cure thoſe writers, who uſe to ramble in wild excurſions, I did not think proper to leave one word out of it. See then here how Monſieur Daillé ſpeaks to the Jeſuit John Adam (6). "Finding yourſelf there-"fore in an uneaſy ſituation (7), you are not ſo ſilly "as to pretend to ſtand your ground there: and as "you are as bold and reſolute as a man of your "cloth

* Cont. Rom. Gelaſ. Tom. 3. Concil. p. 662. col. B, C.

† Joan. Pic. Apol. c. 7. p. 199.

(1) Daillé, Lettre à M. le Cog. p. 70, 71.

(2) Cottibi, Replique à Mr. Daille, p. 221, 222.

(3) Daillé, Replique à Adam & à Cottibi, part 3. c. 9. p. 190.

* In the form for adminiſtring baptiſm.

* Eraſmus.

† St. Auguſt. ſplendida peccata.

‖ Joh. Picus Mirandulæ Comes, in Apolog. concl. 7.

§ Summi Pontificis & ex Apoſtolico Senatu complurium judicio contentus, videbar facile & odium poſſe negligere, & convicia hominum improborum. In Præfat. Apol.

(4) Cottibi, Replique à Mr. Daille, p. 222, &c.

(5) Daillé, directing his diſcourſe to F. Adam. Replique à Adam & à Cottibi, part 3. c. 9. p. 191.

(6) Daillé, ibid.

(7) That is to ſay, the ſuppoſition of Cottibi's having been guilty only of an equivocation.

Origen's tenets [B]. If the author of the Janua Cœlorum reſerata had made uſe of that obſervation

" cloth can be, leaving that uneaſy poſt, you fall
" upon me with opprobrious language as it is cuſto-• Ad. p. 267. " mary with you •, charging me with ignorance,
" and with a magiſterial audaciouſneſs, which is only a
" ſwelling, and not a true and well digeſted learning.
† p. 268. " And then †, having deſired me duly to weigh
" what you are going to tell me, you give me a
" Lecture on the difference there is between perſons
" who err, and the errors themſelves, wherein you
" blend together St. Auguſtine and St. Jerom, " Janſenius and St. Cyran, and their opinions.
" Thence you come to Origen, and to the errors of " which he has been ſuſpected, particularly Aria-
" niſm, of which you ſay St. Athanaſius cleared
§ p. 269. " him. Afterwards § you commend the incompara-
" ble innocence of his youth, his chaſtity, his zeal:
‖ p. 270. " you ſay ‖ that if I have read hiſtory, I know very " well that Origen ſeeing ſome Martyrs going to the " place of execution, went out of his houſe, and " falling on his knees before the executioners, he
" entreated them to cut his head off at the ſame time as
" they cut off that of the other Chriſtians. You ſay
" again, that I know very well he has filled the " earth with his works, and that his father and mo" ther were Martyrs, and that his mother uſed
" often to draw the curtain of his bed, when he was
" aſleep, and to kiſs her ſon's breaſt, ſaying theſe words;
" I kiſs the temple of the holy Ghoſt. You name St.
" Gregory of Neocæſarea, Chryſoſtom, and Baſil,
" who had a great eſteem for him: (to ſhew you
" that I am not ſo much out of humour as you would " make the world believe, I ſhall not quarrel with
" you for placing Chryſoſtom before Baſil, though
" the latter be more ancient) you aſk me what ar-
" guments I have to prove that that great man died
" without repentance, and you alledge to me an old
" ſtory to refute that opinion. This is the ſubſtance
" of your diſpute concerning Origen. Whereupon I
" ſhall obſerve to you in the firſt place, that you
" wrong me when you charge me with knowing that
" he entreated the executioners to cut his head off.
" I did not know that particular, having read no-• Euſ. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 2. p. 203. A. " thing of it in Euſebius •, who gives a large ac" count of Origen in his 6th book. You charge me
" alſo, but not more juſtly, with knowing that his " mother kiſſed his breaſt, when he was aſleep. I " have read indeed in Euſebius, that his father Leo-
" nidas careſſed him thus ſometimes when he was a
" child, kiſſing his breaſt reſpectfully as a Sanctuary,
" within which the holy Ghoſt was conſecrated, and
" that he proclaimed himſelf happy for having ſo
" admirable a child. I do not queſtion but you met
" with thoſe ſtories, as you relate them, in the ſame
" author who told you that Athanaſius had been for" merly very much commended and eſteemed by the " Arians. But the moſt cruel injury you do me is
" this; that you may have an opportunity to expa-
" tiate on thoſe common place topicks, and to relate † Ad. p. 267. " thoſe ſtories, you charge me † with believing, and
" aſſerting as a matter of fact, that Origen is damn-§ Ad. p. 269. " ed. You make his very perſon (ſay you § to me) an-
" ſwerable for the errors of his opinions, ſpeaking even of
" his damnation, as though you had been already before-
" hand in hell, and had met with Origen there; and ‖ p. 271. " two pages lower ‖, I cannot bear, ſay you, that
" you ſhould ſide with thoſe, who aſſert that Origen is
" damned; and towards the end of the chapter;
" you have admitted, ſay you, the Opinion of thoſe,
" who hold that Origen is damned. . . . . . But laying
" aſide thoſe extravagances of your paſſion, who told
" you that I maintain Origen is damned? Where have
" I declared this to be my opinion? God forbid
" that ſuch a preſumptuous and impious thought
" ſhould ever enter into my head. I leave the " ſecrets of the Lord to himſelf; and am not ſo
" bold as to determine what no man living can " know with any certainty. But upon the whole,
" if we may judge from outward appearances, I be" lieve of Origen what I hope of him, that God,
" whoſe mercy is infinite, has forgiven him his er-
" rors, and would not ſuffer a veſſel to periſh with
" the unbelievers, which he had adorned with ſo
" many admirable gifts, and whoſe genuine works,
" as many as there are extant, do all breathe nothing
" but a ſingular faith and piety; and wherein the " very errors, with which they are ſometimes tainted
" (as it cannot be denied) are always attended with a
" raviſhing modeſty and humanity: not to mention
" his virtues and his holy life. Such is my opinion;
" I never had any other; they who have been par" ticularly acquainted with me know how much I " always admired that great and incomparable ge" nius, and what I have wrote of him in ſome places
" my inconſiderable works may witneſs it. If I " have quoted • what the Count of Mirandula writes, • L. à M. de la Tal. p. 70, 71.
" that the Roman Divines could not bear he ſhould
" call Origen's damnation into queſtion, I did it, as " appears, only to ſhew how much theſe maſter
" Doctors, whoſe religion Monſieur Cottibi has em-
" braced, are far from uſing that ſtile, in which " the title of Saint is given to Origen; but not that " I in the leaſt approve their inhuman preſumption.
" If I cenſured the title of Saint, which Monſieur
" Cottibi beſtowed upon him, I cenſured it as a proof
" of his ignorance in matters of antiquity, and in the
" ſtile uſed by thoſe who are acquainted with thoſe
" matters. I did not charge him with committing
" herein a ſin againſt faith or morality. The being
" unacquainted with antiquity is not inconſiſtent
" with either: I give him leave with all my heart
" to think as favourably of Origen as he pleaſes.
" But as the laws of your Church, the rules of her
" ſtile, the common and publick practice of all the " learned, that is to ſay, the ſupreme law of their " language, do not ſuffer him to ſay Saint Origen,
" whatever opinion he has of his perſon, he could " not ſpeak thus without betraying the ignorance I
" have charged him with."

We meet with a thouſand inſtances of that kind in the polemical writings; and, as I have already more than once obſerved, it would be proper to make a collection of them. This would be of ſome uſe to reſtrain the unbounded liberty, which ſome authors take to deviate far and wide from the queſtion. I queſtion whether the other inſtances would come up to this with reſpect to the many obſervations foreign to the purpoſe.

[B] A Miniſter . . . . made lately a very juſt obſervation concerning one of Origen's tenets.] Before I tranſcribe that Miniſter's words, I ſhall ſet down thoſe of his adverſary, which occaſioned his reflection. It is a very conſiderable miſtake, to compare Origen's opinion of the hell-torments not being eternal, with the doctrine of the Socinians upon the ſame ſubject. Origen did not deny the immortality of the ſoul; and he never taught that the wicked periſhed ſoul and body together. Origen's opinion is indeed dangerous, but then it is not at all impious; whereas the Socinian opinion is the very ſame with the Epicurean impiety (8). Here follows the criticiſm upon that paſſage. " (9) It is more dangerous with regard " to morality, to aſſert that the reprobates will be one
" day ſaved, than to ſay, that they will be annihilated.
" Origen put the devils and the damned almoſt in
" the ſame rank, in which the Papiſts place the faith" ful and the believers, who die loaded with a great " number of venial ſins, and who have not wherewith-
" al to get maſſes ſaid to ſhorten or leſſen their ſuffer-
" ings in purgatory, the fire of which does not differ
" from that of hell, but in the duration. So that " the wicked, who continue in their wickedneſs and
" ſins till they die, may, according to Origen's doc-
" trine, entertain almoſt the ſame fears, and the ſame
" hopes, which the beſt Roman Catholicks have ac" cording to the doctrine of their Prieſts and Monks.
" Time is nothing, in compariſon to eternity.
" A temporal Hell cannot be compared with an e" ternal Paradiſe. It is true, that the preſent evils
" eraſe out of the mind of the worldlings, the no-
" tion of a future bliſs: and that the ſenſe of a pre-
" ſent happineſs is, generally ſpeaking more lively
" and ſtrong, than the deſire and hope of that which " is to come. But this is owing only to the folly
" and corruption of men, and not to the nature of " the objects themſelves. Further, it muſt be ob-
" ſerved, that a future evil is not much more con-
" ſidered than a future good: I mean, that ſilly and

(8) Jurieu, quoted by Saurin, Examin de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu. p. 688.

(9) Saurin, ibidem.

obſervation [C], he would have added new ſtrength to one of his objections. IV. That there

" inconſiderate men are not much affected with ei" ther. But wiſe and conſiderate perſons care" fully reflect on the pains and pleaſures of another
" life, and form to themſelves a true notion of them.
" Whence it follows, that they of the firſt kind will " not be more afraid of the Hell, or of the Purgato-
" ry, with which Origen threatens them, than they " will be encouraged and comforted by the end of " their ſufferings, and by the enjoyment of an ever" laſting happineſs, which this Doctor gives them
" room to hope for: on the contrary, they who re" flect more ſeriouſly, and with more attention, will " judge of the future goods and evils by their du" ration, and will eaſily be determined to paſs thro'
" ſome ages of wretched days, if they be but certain,
" at the end, they will meet with an eternal happi-
" neſs, and infinite joy. As for the doctrine of the " Socinians, it affords the obdurate ſinners no other " comfort, but their annihilation. Now ſuch is the " frame of men's nature, that they chooſe rather to be " happy and miſerable ſucceſſively, than not to be at " all. And according to right reaſon, it is infinite-
" ly more advantageous to be for ever perfectly hap" py, after one has ſuffered for ſome time, than to " return into nothing, and to find one's ſelf thus
" eternally deprived of an infinite bleſſing, the poſ-
" ſeſſion of which one might have ſecured, and
" which one loſes only through one's own negli" gence . . . (10). Origen's error may make ſome
" perſons neglect and deſpiſe repentance; and that
" of Socinus may keep ſome men in their wicked
" courſes. Yet they are both moſt pernicious; and " it is having a double weight and a double mea-
" ſure, it is a too viſible reſpect of perſons, to ſay,
" that Origen's error, though dangerous, is not at all
" impious, but that the Socinian opinion is the " very Epicurean impiety. If Origen had ſuppoſed
" that the reprobates will be annihilated, after ha" ving ſuffered a long time in purgatory, his doctrine
" would be leſs favourable to the impenitent ſinners,
" than that of the Socinians, who annihilate them,
" without making them ſuffer any conſiderable pain
" (11). But the Paradiſe he promiſes them at the " end of their Hell, and which is to make them for " ever like to the Apoſtles, to the Martyrs, and to
" the greateſt Saints, conſiderably leſſens the ter-
" ror of a Puniſhment, which is to make room
" for an everlaſting joy and happineſs."

(10) Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 696.

(11) One would think Monſieur Saurin grants here his antagoniſt's aſſertion, namely, that the Socinians maintain, the ſoul of the wicked is annihilated the moment they die. The opinion of that Sect is not thus ſet down here under quotation (18). But the truth is, Monſieur Saurin expreſſes himſelf ſo, as that his words may hint, he does not charge that Sect with that error.

If you have a mind to know the cauſe of that reſpect of perſons, do but read the following paſſage from the ſame Author (12). The charity men have for thoſe, who have been dead ſeveral ages ago, does not coſt much, becauſe their merit does not raiſe our jealouſy nor our envy, and we do not look upon them as our competitors. But in order to judge charitably of our adverſary, who ſpeaks and writes againſt us, whoſe reputation drowns our own fame, we muſt a little mortify our pride, and conquer our ſelf-love; which is not an eaſy ſacrifice. As Monſieur Jurieu had no quarrel with Origen, and has no perſonal enemies but amongſt the Socinians, and in their party, it is no wonder that he can eaſier bear with the former than with the latter. This thought has been often made uſe of, in order to account for the conduct of thoſe, who have aſſerted, that Sophocles, Euripides, Ariſtophanes, Ariſtotle, &c. as much ſuperior to Corneille, Racine, Moliere, Des Cartes, &c.

(12) Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 688.

[C] If the Author of the Janua cœlorum reſerata had made uſe of that obſervation.] That Author * ſhews by ſeveral arguments, that Monſieur Jurieu, if he argues coherently, muſt maintain, that the Socinian hereſies will not damn the profeſſors of them. One of his arguments is taken from that Miniſter's confeſſing, that the Arians did once belong to the church, in which ſalvation may be had. That argument would be but weak, if the Doctrines peculiar to the Socinians, and which have not been taught by the Arians, were deadly errors. Wherefore the Author of the Janua cœlorum propoſes that objection to himſelf, and he ſhews, that in caſe the doctrines common both to the Arians and to the Socinians be not deadly, it cannot be reaſonably maintained, that the doctrines peculiar to the Socinians deſerve eternal damnation. Taking a view of all thoſe peculiar hereſies, he begins with their rejecting the eternity of Hell torments, and he ſets it down as a matter of fact, that no man would dare to damn Origen or Arnobius, only and directly for that error. Quis auderet, ſays he (13), morti æternæ addicere Origenem, ideò præcisè quod de divina miſericordia magnificentiùs ſentire volens, crediderit tandem fore ut omnes mali, ne Diabolis quidem exceptis, ſatis pœnarum Deo dederint, & Deum placatum experiantur? At hoc multo plus videtur nocere juſtitiæ divinæ quàm dogma Socinianum de annihilatione reproborum poſt longas pœnas, nam deſtructio illa ſi minùs pœnæ genus eſt gravius, ut quidam exiſtimant, quàm æternitas infœlix, rationem tamen habet pœnæ, ideoque non officit juribus ſeveri & juſti Legiſlatoris. Quidquid id eſt nemo præjudiciis exutus, & ad rectæ rationis amuſſim rem expendens, doctrinam mortalem judicabit, ſi quis veritus lædere divinas perfectiones, malit ſibi Deum repræſentare ut judicem ultimo ſupplicio reos afficientem, quàm ut judicem vitæ reorum parcentem quò per multos annos exquiſitis cruciatibus & perpetuis eos torquendo, longiore alieni doloris ſpectaculo fruatur: nemo, inquam, ſolidè raciocinatus talem opinionem mortalem crediderit, qui ſemel agnoverit Arrianam hæreſim non eſſe mortalem. Quis auderet Arnobium in Inferis collocare, quia crediderit animas reproborum flammis ultricibus tandem penitùs conſumi? He obſerves, as you ſee, that the doctrine of Origen puts narrower bounds to the divine juſtice, than the doctrine of the Socinians: for the latter ſuppoſe the puniſhment to end with an act of ſeverity, namely, the ſinner's annihilation; whereas Origen ſuppoſes it to end with an act of the greateſt mercy; namely, the tranſporting of the damned ſpirits into a place of infinite bliſs: you ſee, I ſay, that he takes notice of that difference; but he does not explain it ſo clearly and accurately as Monſieur Saurin does. Further, he ſtarts an objection, which he might have ſolved by Monſieur Saurin's remark, and yet he makes quite another anſwer. He ſuppoſes (14), it will be objected to him, that the denying of the Trinity is not ſo dangerous to the ſtate, as the denying of the eternity of Hell torments; and he anſwers only, that we muſt not judge by that rule, whether an hereſy is fundamental or not; otherwiſe we ſhould be obliged to aſſert, that ſome moſt groſs and ſhameful errors are mere trifles, ſince they are very proper to keep the ſubjects in awe (15). This is the whole ſubſtance of his anſwer. He omitted the moſt effectual anſwer, that could be made to that objection. He did not obſerve that Origen's opinion is more pernicious to the Commonwealth, than of that the Socinians; the opinion of Origen, I ſay, which Monſieur Jurieu looks upon as an excuſable error (16). If Larebonius had made Monſieur Saurin's reflection, he would have given his adverſary an home thruſt. Let us quote another paſſage from the Paſtor of Utrecht. " Monſieur Jurieu is willing to excuſe Ori-
" gen's errors, on account of his great zeal; but if any " one of us ſhould at this time venture to aſſert the whims
" of that Ancient, Monſieur Jurieu would not think
" himſelf under any obligation to have the leaſt toleration
" for him. If theſe whims be mere hereſies and im-
" pieties, which change Hell into a Purgatory, and " remove thus the dread of eternal ſufferings, and
" the fear of God, why muſt they be tolerated in " Origen? Where is this Doctor's great zeal, if he " was an heretick, and a teacher of hereſies? If
" theſe errors were not fundamental in Origen, and
" in the third century, by what means are they be" come fundamental in the ſeventeenth century, and " in the modern Doctors? We ſhall ſee by and by,
" that there is a great difference between Origen's
" opinion, and that of the Socinians, concerning
" Hell torments; and that this difference, of which " Monſieur Jurieu pretends to take an advantage in
" Origen's favour, is entirely againſt him (17)."

If the Author of the Janua cœlorum did not exert his whole ſtrength, as he might have done, Monſieur Saurin on the other hand, overlooked two conſiderable blunders of his adverſary; the one, in his charging the Socinians with teaching, that the ſoul dies with the body; the other, his aſſerting that their opinion, concerning the deſtruction of the ſoul, is the Epicurean

* Who is Mr. BAYLE himſelf.

(13) Carus Larebonius, in Janua cœlorum reſerata, p. 96, 97.

(14) Idem, ibid.

(15) Alioquin mutatis vicibus pro innocuis deberemus habere errores non paucos craſſiſſimos atque fœdiſſimos, unde multum emolumenti capit Reſpublica, in multas perturbationes caſura per introductionem quarumdam veritatum. Ibidem.

(16) See Saurin, Exam. de la Doctrine de Mr. Jurieu, p. 682.

(17) Saurin, ibid. P. 683, 684.

there are a great many Divines in the Church of Rome, who believe that this father is in Hell [D].

Since the first edition of this Dictionary there have been published two works, which give me an opportunity to make some additions to this article. The one intitled Parrhasiana, rean impiety. The 1st of these blunders is an untruth, or rather a calumny (18) : the second is an inexcusable ignorance. The Socinians do not assert, that the wicked will suffer nothing after this life ; they maintain only, that their misery will cease at last by the annihilation of their soul. And though there were a Socinian Writer or two (19), who should maintain that their soul is annihilated the moment it leaves the body, his opinion would not be the same with that of Epicurus : for that Philosopher taught on the one hand, that the Gods do not in the least concern themselves about the life or death of men ; and on the other, that the soul dies with the body, because the soul consists only in a certain mixture of atoms. On the contrary, the Socinian we speak of would maintain, that the souls of the wicked are of such a nature, as to continue for ever after this life, and that they cease to be, only because God annihilates them, to punish their crimes. The Divines, who are the most orthodox, with regard to the nature of the soul, agree that God can annihilate it whenever he pleases. Observe, that nothing can exempt us from following that rule of natural equity, not to charge an whole sect with the opinions of some private persons who belong to it.

(18) That Author had notice of it given him in the year 1690, in the Avis sur la Tableau du Socinianisme, p. 44.

(19) There are indeed some.

[D] There are a great many Divines in the Church of Rome, who believe that this Father is in Hell.] We have seen already the complaints that were made against Picus of Mirandula, who held the contrary opinion : the Jesuit Stephen Binet, who published a book at Paris, in the year 1629, concerning Origen's salvation, did not dare to take the affirmative side of the question, but with fear. He wrote his work in the form of a trial ; he introduced witnesses, who deposed ; he had the cause pleaded pro and con ; he brings in the Attorney and Sollicitor-Generals of Heaven to give in their opinions ; and lastly, he got the following sentence passed. CONSIDERING all that has been said on both sides, and the opinions of the Attorney and Sollicitor-Generals of Heaven, it has been ordered, that the cause shall be referred to the secret Council of God, to be finally determined by him alone : nevertheless, it is provisionally resolved, in behalf of Origen, that all things being duly weighed, and considered, the proofs for his salvation, are stronger than those for his damnation ; and therefore it is more reasonable to think him saved than damned (20). The witnesses he brings in for Origen, are James Merlin (21) and Erasmus (22). The Lawyers he makes to plead for the same father, are Genebrard (23), and John Picus of Mirandula (24). After this, the great Cardinal Baronius (25), in the name of Cardinal Bellarmine, and of all those who are against Origen, makes a speech to demand the condemnation of the accused, on whose heresies and crimes he expatiates. Here follow some of the heresies : 1. That the souls had sinned before they came into the bodies (26). 2. That after the resurrection, the bodies of the saints will be round and bright like the sun (27). 3. That the sun, moon, and stars have life in them. 4. That on the day of judgment the Guardian Angels will be chastised, if they have not well acquitted themselves of their duty, in guarding the men committed to their charitable cares (28). 5. That there have been several other worlds before the creation of this, and that when this shall be reduced to ashes, there will be many others created successively (29). 6. That the stars are books which contain men's destiny ; that the Angels draw up from thence mens horoscopes, and learn their good fortune ; and that they have taught men part of this judicial astrology, that they might cast up a man's nativity, without destroying his liberty, or forcing his will (30). 7. That the earth is a large animal capable of good and evil (31), and afterwards worthy of reward and punishment ; and hence it is, that God blesses or curses it, according as it behaves well or ill, as it renders itself worthy of either (32). 8. " That after the day of judgment, the " women will be transformed into men, and the hu- " man bodies into most pure souls ; so that there " will no longer be men made up of glorious flesh " and bones ; but that all will be nothing but mere " and pure spirits, like the Angels in Heaven." The chief argument Baronius insists upon is this : " (33) The general Council was not content to con- " demn only his doctrine, as it is usual, but went " even so far as to condemn his very person ; and " thundered out an Excommunication against him " personally, and condemned him in his own " proper name * : here follow the words of the " holy Council. The Emperor having required, that with the errors, the Author himself, Origen, be also condemned, ut cum erroribus suis autor ipse Origenes damnaretur. The holy Council † having mature- " ly considered the affair, and called upon the Holy " Ghost for his assistance, pronounced at last these " words, or rather hurled these thunder-bolts. In " the first place then, the Council  pronounced ten " anathema's against the envenomed doctrine of Ori- " gen ; then going farther, Anathema etiam ipsi Origeni qui dicitur Adamantius, they anathematized " Origen himself, who is called Adamantius. This " last name was added on purpose, that people " might not think the other Origen was meant, " but that they should know the true Origen was " anathematized, as a man ruined, sentenced " and damned." Let us give an instance of the eloquence of that time. Binet supposes, that Baronius taking an advantage of a vision, which is related in the Pratum Spirituale, or, The Spiritual Meadow, spoke after this manner (34) ; *Must I at last be reduced to such an extremity, as to be obliged to open the gates of Hell, in order to shew that Origen is there ? otherwise men will not believe it. Would it not be enough to have laid before you his crime, his unfortunate end, the sentence of his condemnation delivered by the Emperors, by the Popes, by the Saints, and by the fifth general Council, (not to mention the others) almost by the mouth of God himself ? But since there is no other method left but descending into Hell, and shewing there that reprobate, that damned Origen, come, Gentlemen, I am determined to do it, in order to carry this matter to the highest degree of evidence : let us, in God's name, go down into Hell, to see whether he be there or not, and to decide the question at once. The seventh general Council * has quoted a book, and by quoting it, has declared it to be of a sufficient authority, to furnish us with good and lawful proofs, to support the determination of the Council, with regard to images. Why should we not, after the example of that Council, make use of the same book to determine this controversy, which besides is already but too much cleared up and decided ? It is said there, that a man being in a great perplexity about the salvation of Origen's soul, after the fervent prayers of an holy old man, saw plainly as it were a kind of Hell open ; there he observed the heresiarchs, who were all named to him, one after another, by their own names, and in the midst of them, he saw Origen, who was there damned among the others, being loaded with horror, flames and confusion.* Let us relate some part of the answer, that was made to the objection we have just now described. " Does the " Church ground her Canons on the visions of an " hermit, she who teaches that no man is ever under " an obligation to believe the vision of a private per- " son, and since no article of faith is ever grounded " on such a vision. Granting, therefore, that it is report- " ed in the Spiritual Meadow, that an honest Abbot " saw Origen in Hell, is he the first that has been mis- " taken ? And of which Origen does he speak, of ours, " or of him who was infamous ? And of what au- " thority in that book of the Spiritual Meadow ? " Suppose the seventh general Council quoted it " for something, as for instance, with regard to " images, does it follow from thence, that the " Council pretended to canonize that book in every " respect ? How many silly and idle things does not " that little book contain, which the wise can hard- " ly believe (35) ?" One little passage more and I have done. They object to us the vision of a simple Abbot, and I shall quote to you, the vision of a great Saint, named Mechtilda , to whom God revealed, that he would

(20) Etienne Binet, du Salut d'Origene, p. 468.

(21) Præfat. ad Origenem, ann. 1512.

(22) In Vita Origenis.

(23) In Origen.

(24) Apolog. Q. VII. de Salute Origenis.

(25) Binet, p. 155, quotes him, Annal. Tom. 3. ann. 533, &c.

(26) Binet, p. 158. ex S. Leone, Epist. decret. 11.

(27) Ibid. p. 160, &c. ex Nicepb. l. 17. c. 27. in Conc. 5. Constantinop.

(28) Orig. Hom. 20. in Num. apud Binet, p. 166.

(29) Orig. in c. 1. Eccl. ex Methodio & Genebr. apud Binet, p. 168.

(30) Orig. in Genes. Philocal. c. 25. apud Binet, p. 168.

(31) Compare this with what is observed above, remark [D] of the article KEPLER.

(32) Orig. Hom. 4. in Ezech. apud Binet, ibid.

(33) Binet, p. 191.

* Baron. ann. 400. ann. 538. ann. 553.

† 5. Synod.

 Nicepb. lib. 17. c. 27, 28. Sur. 11. Janu. Cedren. in Annal. Cassiod. 1. div. inst. Prat. spirit. c. 26. Baron. ann. 532.

(34) Binet, p. 195, &c.

* Baron. ann. 532. Mosch. in Prat. c. 26.

(35) Binet, p. 129.

* Lib. vitæ S. Mech. edit. ann. 1627.

† The celebrated Monſieur Le Clerc. See his article.

rhaſiana, was publiſhed at Amſterdam in the year 1699 by a learned man †, who concealed his own name under that of Theodore Parrhaſe. The other was printed at Paris in the year 1700, and is intitled, Hiſtoire des Mouvemens arrivez dans l'Egliſe au ſujet d'Origene & de ſa Doctrine, i. e. "An account of the troubles, which have happened in the "Church about Origen and his opinions." Father Doucin a Jeſuit is the author of this laſt work. We meet in the Parrhaſiana with ſome reflections upon the controverſy between the Manicheans and the orthodox. There is prefixed to them as fair an obſervation as could be expected from a very honeſt man (c). There is, I ſay, prefixed to them an obſervation in every reſpect agreeable to the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice, truth, and reaſon, concerning the views I had, when I took the liberty to urge the objections of the Manicheans, and to acknowledge that natural reaſon does not afford the Chriſtians ſufficient arguments to ſolve thoſe objections, whether they follow St. Auguſtin's ſyſtem, or that of Molina, and of the Remonſtrants, or even that of the Socinians. Theodore Parrhaſe maintains the contrary, and pretends (d) that an Origeniſt can ſilence the Manicheans. . . . . And if ſuch a man, continues he, can put a Manichean to a nonplus, what would not thoſe do who ſhould argue infinitely better than Origen's followers do? We ſhall examine hereunder what he ſuppoſes an Origeniſt might ſay, after having read all the objections of the Manicheans [E]. As for father Doucin's work, I ſhall only obſerve that it contains a large, curious, would not have men know the fate of Sampſon, Solomon, and Origen, to ſtrike the mightieſt, the wiſeſt, and the moſt learned of this world with terror, and keep them in ſuſpenſe by that uncertainty (36).

(1) Parrhaſiana, p. 302.

(d) Ibid. p. 304.

(36) Binet, p. 219.

Obſerve that Robert de Corceone an Engliſh Cardinal, who flouriſhed in the beginning of the 13th Century wrote a book on this queſtion, Whether or not Origen be damned? Bale mentions it.

[E] We ſhall examine . . . . what he ſuppoſes an Origeniſt might ſay after reading all the objections of the Manicheans.] Though he makes his Origeniſt argue in a very cloſe and conciſe manner, yet I think I ſhall be able to preſerve the whole ſtrength of his arguments by reducing them to theſe three propoſitions. I. "God made us free, that there "might be room for virtue and vice, commendati-"ons and blame, rewards and puniſhments (37)." II. He damns no man merely for his ſins, but for his want of repentance (38). III. The nature and moral evils, which mankind is liable to, are of ſo ſmall a continuance if compared with eternity, that notwithſtanding theſe evils God cannot but be eſteemed a benevolent Being and a lover of virtue (39). In this laſt propoſition lies the whole ſtrength of the Origeniſt; the reaſon of it is, that he ſuppoſes that hell torments will not continue for ever, and that when God ſhall have judged that his free creatures have ſuffered enough, he ſhall make them eternally bleſſed (40). The everlaſting happineſs, which they ſhall be made to enjoy, fully anſwers the notion of an infinite mercy, though it had been preceded by many ages of pain. For many ages are nothing when compared with an infinite duration, and there is an infinitely leſs proportion between the time this earth is to continue and eternity, than there is between one minute and an hundred millions of years (41). . . . "Amongſt men, they who have a child under their "own care, and preſcribe it ſome bitter medicine, "only laugh at the child's complaints againſt that "bitterneſs, becauſe they know very well that the "taſte of it will be ſoon forgot, and that the medi-"cine will do him good. There is an infinitely "greater diſproportion between God, and the moſt "underſtanding men, than there is between them "and the moſt ſimple children. We cannot there-"fore reaſonably wonder, that God ſhould look "upon the evils we ſuffer as mere trifles, he who "alone has an adequate idea of eternity, and who "looks upon the beginning and end of our ſuffer-"ings as being infinitely nearer to each other, than "the beginning and end of a minute are. The "ſame argument holds good as to vices, and wicked "actions, which with regard to God do not laſt "long, and which after all make not the leaſt alte-"ration in the univerſe. If a clock-maker ſhould "make a clock, which being once wound up, con-"tinued going very regularly for an whole year to-"gether, except only that two or three ſeconds were "not equal juſt when it began to go, could any man "ſay, that the workman had no value for the repu-"tation of an able artiſt, and did not care to make "his works exact? Thus if God reforms one day, "for ever, the diſorders which a bad uſe of free-"will occaſioned among men, ſhall we have reaſon "to wonder that he did not put a ſtop to them, dur-"ing that ſhort moment we continued upon this "earth (42)?"

(37) Parrhaſiana, p. 306.

(38) Ibid. p. 307.

(39) Ibid. p. 308.

(40) Ibid. p. 312.

(41) Ibid. p. 309.

(42) Ibid. p. 310, 311.

Let us ſee what a Manichean might anſwer to that diſcourſe of an Origeniſt.

I. The firſt thing he might ſay, is, that we do not find in our mind the ideas of two kinds of goodneſs, the one conſiſting in making a preſent, the bad conſequences of which are foreſeen, without being prevented, though it could be done; the other, in doing a favour, ſo circumſtantiated, as always to turn to the advantage of him to whom it is granted. I need not obſerve, that by the idea of goodneſs is not meant here an imperfect goodneſs, ſuch as it is to be met with in the hearts of ſinful men, but ſuch a goodneſs as by logical abſtractions is conceived to be free from all defects. This ideal goodneſs is not a genus, under which are the two kinds I have deſcribed. His eſſential and diſtinctive attribute is the diſpoſing the ſubject, in which it reſides, to beſtow ſuch favours, as by the ſhorteſt way and moſt effectual means render the condition of him, on whom they are beſtowed, happy. This ideal notion of goodneſs does eſſentially and unavoidably exclude all that can belong to a malevolent Being. Now it is certain that a malevolent Being would eaſily be determined to beſtow favours, the uſe of which he knew would prove fatal to thoſe who received them. They mention a certain Roman, who made preſents of fine cloth to thoſe, to whom he bore them ill will.

Eutrapelus, cuicunque nocere volebat,
Veſtimenta dabat pretioſa: beatus enim jam
Cum pulchris tunicis ſumet nova conſilia & ſpes:
Dormiet in lucem: ſcorto poſtponet honeſtum
Officium: nummos alienos paſcet: ad imum
Thrax erit, aut olitoris aget mercede caballum (43).

(43) Horat. Epiſtola 18. lib. 1. verſ. 31.

i. e. "The man, Eutrapelus would have undone
"He ſtreight preſented with a gaudy gown,
"That he, grown happy in his fine attire,
"Might take new hopes, and raiſe his wiſhes higher,
"Forego his honeſt trade for eaſy vice,
"Sleep on till noon, and follow whores and dice,
"Take money up, till he has ſpent his all,
"And drives a cart for bread, or rots in jail (44)."

CREECH.

(44) Mr. Bayle quotes Monſieur Dacier's French tranſlation.

Bad Princes, who would find means artfully to gratify their paſſion of ruining a great Lord, would with all their heart make him Governor of a Province, if they knew that by abuſing his authority in that poſt, he would make himſelf the moſt odious of all men, and worthy an exemplary puniſhment. But the hero of a romance framed to be a pattern of all royal perfections; and a Prince, I ſay, drawn after the very notions of the mind more exactly than the curious, and particular account relating to the ſubjects mentioned in the title, and beſides this, a compendious life of Origen. One cannot read it without lamenting the ſad fate of human underſtanding. Origen was without blemiſh with regard to his morals; he had a very great zeal for the Goſpel; he ruined his conſtitution by his frequent faſtings, and unin-

the Cyrus of Xenophon (45), will never make a ſnare of his favours. When he deſigns to give an employment, he chooſes that which is the moſt proper for the perſon he has a mind to gratify; and does not give him that, which he judges he would acquit himſelf very ill of. He gives quickly; for this is a character of goodneſs which multiplies the favour (46). He does not oblige the petitioner to long and tedious ſollicitations; this deſtroys the merit of the favour (47), and becomes only an indifferent goodneſs, which does hardly deſerve to be diſtinguiſhed from hardneſs of heart. They who have given us the character of Cardinal Mazarin obſerve as a great fault in him the habit he had contracted of making people wait ſo long for the effect of his promiſes, that all the pleaſure of it was ſpent in expectations, and that all his favours were ſpoiled by the pains it coſt to force them from him. Promiſſis largus, quibus multoties non ſtetit; aut ſi implevit, faſtidio & mora diu libratum beneficium improbe extortum elumbavit, longo voto conſumens gaudia (48). If a man had had a mind to make a panegyrick upon him, and by adulation to extol his perfect liberality, he would have ſaid, that by obliging people readily he even prevented their petitions, and ſpared his friends the ſhame of a requeſt. Illud atque in vulgus, Principem obiiſſe . . . . liberalem in primis, & qui raro exemplo hujus ævi preces anteverteret, ut conſuleret accipientium pudori (49), i. e. "It was alſo the publick "opinion, that the Prince who died . . . was above "all things generous, and, which is very uncom-"mon at this time, prevented men's petitions, out of "a regard for their baſhfulneſs." A Panegyriſt who would conſult the abſtract idea of perfection, in order to aſcribe it to his hero, would not fail to ſuppoſe in the deſcription he ſhould make of his generoſity, an indiſſoluble connection between giving the power of making a good uſe of a preſent, and the preſent itſelf.

Hence you may ſee, what are the properties of the ideal or abſtract goodneſs, what is eſſential to, and what is conſiſtent with it. Now if we conſult that notion of goodneſs, we do not find that God, who muſt be a Being infinitely good, could delay the happineſs of his creatures, till after ſeveral ages of miſery (50), nor give them a free-will, of which it was certain they would make ſuch an uſe as would ruin them. If they had aſked him ſuch a preſent, he could not have granted it, without acting againſt his own nature. Much leſs could he give it them without being aſked for it. Would they have taken it, if they had been aſked their advice? And if they had known the fatal conſequences of it, would they not rather have cried out (51),

Let ſuch a preſent be my en'my's lot!

But ſuppoſe it were conſiſtent with the infinite goodneſs of the Creator, to give his creatures a liberty, of which they could as well make a bad as a good uſe, it muſt be ſaid at leaſt, that his goodneſs would engage him to watch their conduct ſo narrowly, as not to ſuffer them to ſin actually. His infinite love for virtue, his infinite abhorrence of vice, in a word, his Holineſs would connect his own intereſt with what his goodneſs required of him, and by the concurrence of theſe two divine Attributes, the bad uſe of free-will would be prevented as often as it was ready to be made. A father, who cannot refuſe his child the liberty to walk alone, or to mount a ladder, or to go on horſe-back, though it be plain he will fall, if he be not well minded, will give ſuch orders, that on which ſide ſoever the child happens to ſtagger, he may meet with ſomething to ſupport him. If the limited goodneſs of a man, who cannot by inviſible means proportionate his aſſiſtance to the ſtrength or weakneſs of his child, engages him always, when it is in his power, to prevent him from falling, or cutting himſelf with a knife, which he was obliged to give him, in order to pacify him; how much more ſhould we be perſuaded, that God would have prevented the ill uſe of free-will; ſince he is immenſely good, of infinite holineſs, and can infallibly incline his creature towards what is good, without infringing in the leaſt the privileges of free-will (52)? Thus a Manichean might anſwer an Origeniſt, on the firſt of the three propoſitions ſet down above. I need not obſerve, that he would ſometimes make uſe of thoſe arguments, which are called ad hominem.

As for the reaſon alledged by the Origeniſt, that it was neceſſary to give the creature Free-will, that there might be room for virtue and vice, for commendation and blame, for rewards and puniſhments, it can be very eaſily and effectually anſwered. Let it only be obſerved, that it is ſo far from being true, that ſuch a reaſon ought to have determined a Being of infinite holineſs, and immenſely good, to give his creatures a free-will, that it ought rather to have determined him not to give it them. Vice and blame ought not to take place in the works of a cauſe infinitely holy; they muſt find all the inlets into it ſhut; every thing muſt be praiſe-worthy there; virtue muſt fill up every poſt, ſo that there be not the leaſt hole for vice to creep in. And as all muſt be happy under the government of a Being, whoſe goodneſs is infinite, and power boundleſs, ſo there muſt be no room for puniſhments. If one travels over that immenſe empire, one muſt not meet any where with a vale of tears, nor with a gate, or entry like that, which a great Poet deſcribes thus:

Veſtibulum ante ipſum, primiſque in faucibus Orci,
Luctus, & ultrices poſuere cubilia curæ:
Pallenteſque habitant morbi, triſtiſque ſenectus:
Et Metus, & maleſuada Fames, & turpis Egeſtas, (Terribiles viſu formæ) Lethumque, Laborque;
Tum conſanguineus Lethi Sopor: & mala mentis
Gaudia, mortiferumque adverſo in limine Bellum:
Ferreique Eumenidum thalami; & Diſcordia demens,
Vipereum crinem vittis innexa cruentis (53).

i. e. "Juſt in the gate, and in the jaws of hell,
"Revengeful cares, and ſullen ſorrows dwell;
"And pale diſeaſes, and repining age;
"Want, fear, and famine's unreſiſted rage;
"Here toils, and death, and death's half-brother
"ſleep,
"(Forms terrible to view) their country keep:
"With anxious pleaſures of a guilty mind,
"Deep frauds before, and open force behind:
"The furies iron beds, and ſtrife that ſhakes
"Her hiſſing treſſes, and unfolds her ſnakes.

DRYDEN.

Without going through places full of horror, one ought to meet immediately the ſeats of happineſs and bliſs.

Devenêre locos lætos, & amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum, ſedeſque beatas.
Largior hîc campos æther, & lumine veſtit
Purpureo: ſolemque ſuum, ſidera norunt (54).

i. e. ——————— "They took their way,
"Where long extended plains of pleaſure lay.
"The verdant fields with thoſe of heav'n may vie;
"With Æther veſted, and a purple ſky:
"The bliſsful ſeats of happy ſouls below:
"Stars of their own, and their own ſuns they "know.

DRYDEN.

Virtue, praiſe, favours may very well exiſt, though vice, blame and puniſhments have no other exiſtence, but what is called ideal and objective. The Origeniſt cannot deny it, ſince he ſuppoſes that an everlaſting happineſs of all the free Beings is to ſucceed after ſome ages of ſufferings. Virtue, praiſe and favours, will take place in an infinite duration of happineſs; but vice, blame and puniſhments, will then have no real

(45) Cyrus ille a Xenophonte non ad biſtoriæ fidem ſcriptus, ſed ad effigiem juſti imperii; i. e. "The Cyrus of "Xenophon is "not written "according to "the truth of "hiſtory, but "after the no-"tion of a juſt "government." Cicero, ad Q. Fratrem, Epiſt. 1. lib. 1. folio m. 98. D.

(46) Bis dat qui cito dat. He who gives quickly, gives twice.

(47) Gratia quæ tarda eſt, ingrata eſt, gratia namque
Cum fieri properat, gratia grata magis. Auſonius, Epigr. 82. "A "favour long "expected is an "unkindneſs; "the quicker it "is granted, the "more accepta-"ble it is." See alſo the Epigr. 83, and the Authors quoted in the Commentary on Auſonius, of the Amſterdam edition, 1671.

(48) Priolus de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 11. ſub fin. p. m. 392.

(49) Famian. Strada, Proluſ. 2. lib. 3. p. m. 255. He ſpeaks of Pope Leo X.

(50) We ſhall ſpeak of this in the 4th paragraph.

(51) Hoſtibus eveniant talia dona meis.

(52) See above, remark [G] of the article MANICHEANS.

(53) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. verſ. 273.

(54) Idem, ibid. ver. 638.

(e) See above, remark [A], at the firſt break.

uninterrupted lucubrations: longing after the Martyrdom (e) he underwent with an incredible

exiſtence out of the mind. If the Origeniſt ſhould anſwer that that happineſs would not be a reward, in caſe the creatures had not been endowed with liberty, we ſhould reply, that there is not the leaſt proportion between an everlaſting happineſs, and the good uſe man makes of his free-will; and therefore the everlaſting happineſs, which God beſtows on an honeſt man, cannot, with any propriety of ſpeech, be conſidered as a reward, it is a favour, it is a free-gift. One cannot therefore pretend, taking the words in their ſtrict ſenſe, that men ought to have been endowed with free-will, to make them capable of deſerving heaven, that they might obtain it as a reward. That ſtile might be equally uſed, though there were only a mere ſubordination between virtue and an eternal happineſs; that is to ſay, a neceſſary connection of virtuous thoughts, in which virtue would precede, and happineſs follow conſequentially. One might even aſſert, that the more the everlaſting happineſs were remote from the notion of a reward, the more it would be a proof of an infinite goodneſs.

II. The anſwer to the ſecond propoſition will not keep us long. The Manichean would be ſure to obſerve, that impenitence being nothing but an ill uſe of liberty, it comes all to the ſame, whether we ſay, that God damns men only becauſe they do not repent, or whether we aſſert, that he damns them merely becauſe they have ſinned. I confeſs, that generally ſpeaking, the being diſpoſed to acquit thoſe from puniſhment who repent of their ſins, is a proof of mercy; but when a Being promiſes to pardon a ſinner, on condition that he will repent, though he be ſure that that ſinner will not repent, he promiſes nothing, properly ſpeaking, and he is as fully determined to puniſh that ſinner, as though he had made him no offers of mercy: if you deſigned in earneſt to free him from puniſhment, you would prevent his being impenitent; which is an eaſy matter for him who is maſter of men's hearts. Theſe are again arguments ad hominem.

III. With regard to the third propoſition, and the proofs of it, the Manichean might aſk immediately, whether the Origeniſt ſhould dare to determine the duration of thoſe ſufferings, which are to precede an everlaſting happineſs. No man would dare to determine it; not only becauſe it is unknown, but alſo becauſe he would fear to make it either too ſhort, or too long. If he made it too ſhort, as for inſtance, of an hundred years, he would be afraid of being charged with indulging the ſinners in their wickedneſs; and if he ſuppoſed it of a million of years, he would fear leſt this ſhould not give a true notion of God's mercy, nor remove all the offence that is taken at the pretended cruelty of the doctrine of hell. Whence it appears, that men do not lay much ſtreſs on that ſuppoſition, that there is no proportion between the duration of a million of ages, and an infinite duration; nor do I ſee that the difficulty is ſolved by obſerving, that there is an infinitely leſs proportion between the duration of the earth, and eternity, than there is between one minute, and an hundred millions of years. The ſame may alſo be aſſerted of as many millions of ages, as there are drops of water in the ſea. That number of ages, though never ſo much multiplied, is finite, and there is no manner of proportion between what is finite, and infinite; there is therefore none between any number of ages whatſoever, and eternity: and yet no man can help judging, that the juſtice of God would be leſs ſevere, if he cauſed the ſufferings of the reprobates to ceaſe after an hundred years, bringing them then into paradiſe, than if he made that change in their condition only after an hundred thouſand ages. Let us endeavour never ſo much to ſtrain our wits, we ſhall never give a ſatisfactory account of this matter, by ſaying, that God will indeed be reconciled at laſt; but that it will be only after the hell torments, ſuch as they are uſually deſcribed, ſhall have laſted as many millions of years, as there are drops of water in the ſea. That number of years, which is nothing, if compared with eternity, ſeems yet extremely large, when it is conſidered in itſelf, and with regard to the perſon that ſuffers. Whether it be that our reaſon is too ſtrong to be impoſed upon, or that there is really ſomething that miſleads, as in our notion of time and duration: whatever it be, I ſay, it is certain, that you cannot put it out of a Philoſopher's head, arguing as a Philoſopher, that the puniſhment of a creature being continued for an hundred thouſand millions of ages ſucceſſively, is inconſiſtent with the infinite goodneſs of the Creator. It muſt be ſuppoſed, that the Origeniſt is ſenſible of this, and that this is the reaſon why he dares not to maintain that the purgatory of the damned will continue ſo long. Now a Manichean might argue thus. You would judge ſo long a puniſhment to be cruel: take then but half the duration, and if you pretend to find any thing elſe therein, but a diminution of ſeverity, you are much miſtaken; for fifty-thouſand millions of years differ from an hundred-thouſand millions, only as more differs from leſs; and it is impoſſible to paſs from cruelty to the utmoſt goodneſs, only by a bare diminution of cruelty. The qualities in ſummo gradu (55) in the higheſt degree, exclude all the contraries: heat, for inſtance, excludes abſolutely all the degrees of cold; whence it follows, that goodneſs in ſummo gradu excludes all the degrees whatſoever of the oppoſite quality. You cannot therefore arrive at the perfect goodneſs of God, but by ſuppreſſing even the very firſt minute of hell torments. For what God can be one moment, that he can be two hours, and two ages, and during the whole eternity; but what would be inconſiſtent with his nature eternally, muſt be ſo in every moment of the duration of things. The qualities of the creatures are capable of more or leſs, and are never perfect; but we ſtile them perfect, when what they want is hardly perceivable. We commend the ability of a Clock-maker, when his clock gets or loſes but two or three ſeconds in an whole year. But the ability of an infinitely perfect artificer, excludes abſolutely every defect. His holineſs, wiſdom, &c. are abſolutely ſimple, without the leaſt mixture of the oppoſite qualities; I ſay, without the ſmalleſt mixture conceiveable, or that can be in the nature of things.

(55) I ſhall ſpeak again of this here under num. (60).

IV. The idea of that goodneſs excludes all the defects that are almoſt always obſervable in the manner in which men do good to each other. Some take a pleaſure in delays (56); others cannot make themſelves uſeful, but by ſide-ways, and are forced, even againſt their will; to make them paſs through evils, whom they would lead to happineſs. Fathers, who cannot reform the wicked inclinations of their children but by blows, are forced to whip them: but they would be ſure not to do it, if they were perſuaded that a boundleſs complaiſance would more effectually reclaim them. A father forces his child to ſwallow a medicine, which will give him the gripes, and the bitterneſs of which will be inſufferable to him; but he would not act thus, if he knew of another method to cure him. He would give him ſugar-plumbs, and all that the child likes beſt, if he imagined it were a better remedy for him. As he cannot avoid giving him a diſagreeable potion, he ſweetens the bitterneſs of it as well as he can by all the little artifices he can invent (57); and though he looks upon the child's complaints of the ill taſte of the phyſick, as a ridiculous weakneſs, being perſuaded that in a little time he will loſe the taſte of it, and that the medicine will prove uſeful to him; notwithſtanding all this, I ſay, he would with all his heart ſpare him that trouble, and cure him by the moſt palatable liquors in the world, if it were in his power. One need not be a father to experience ſuch a diſpoſition in one's breaſt. There is no phyſician nor apothecary but will beg a patient's pardon for preſcribing him ſuch bitter remedies, and proteſt that if it were poſſible to give them the taſte of the moſt excellent ſauces the beſt cooks can make, they would not ſpare their ſkill and induſtry; but a neceſſity, which all the art of men cannot overcome, obliges them to preſcribe ſuch diſagreeable medicines. Such a diſcourſe comes certainly from the heart, even when it is uſed to a patient one never ſaw before. Aſk a Chirurgeon, who ſets an arm for an unknown perſon, if you could perform that operation without making the patient ſuffer, would you not do it? he will anſwer that ſuch a queſtion is uſeleſs; and that

(56) See above, quotation (48). Theſe delays are ſometimes ſo tireſome, that at laſt one begs for a quick refuſal as a favour. Jam, ſatis eſt, ſinem ô Cæſar pro munere poſco
Remque meam ſeu das, perfice, ſive negas.
See Balzac, Entret. 27. p. m. 276.

(57) Pueris abſinthia tetra medentes
Cùm dare conantur, prius oras pocula circùm
Contingunt, mellis dulci flavoque liquore,
Ut puerorum ætas improvida ludificetur
Labrorum tenùs, interea perpotet amarum
Abſinthi laticem, deceptaque non capiatur;
Sed potiùs tali facto recreata valeſcat. Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 953, and lib. 4. ver. 11.

dible conſtancy the torments, which the perſecutors of the Chriſtian Faith made him ſuffer [F] ; torments ſo much the more inſufferable as they were continued and prolonged that it muſt be taken for an unqueſtionable truth, that a man of his profeſſion, who ſhould know two different ways of dreſſing a wound, both equally good, but the one painful and the other delightful, and who preferred the former before the latter, muſt be a monſter in cruelty, a tyger, a canibal, who ought to be immediately broke on the wheel (58). Schoolmaſters do not generally abound with good ſenſe, and good humour ; yet I queſtion whether there be any of ſuch a ſavage temper, as to chooſe to make uſe of blows rather than of fair words, even if they knew that their ſcholar would improve as much by a mild and complaiſant treatment, as by chaſtiſements. Do not they uſe to give dainties to little ſchoolboys in order to conquer their reluctancy (59) ? To chide and beat without neceſſity, I mean when careſſes and preſents would be as uſeful, is brutiſh.

(58) Compare this with what I quote from Seneca, in the art. CALLISTRATUS, quotation (7) and (8).

(59) Ut pueris olim dant cruſtula blandi Doctores, elementa velint ut diſcere prima. Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 1.

One might enlarge this Induction much farther ; and from thence would follow a conſequence, which would extremely puzzle an Origeniſt : for one might infer from thence, that the notions grounded on experience, and the metaphyſical or abſtract ideas concur in teaching us, that to make a perſon ſuffer, even though it be only for a little while, and with a view to procure him a great good, is a thing inconſiſtent with goodneſs, unleſs it be impoſſible to find a ſtrait way, by which that perſon may be led directly from good to good conſtantly and unchangeably. In vain then it is ſaid, that after the ſufferings of the damned ſhall have laſted ſome time, which will be very ſhort if compared with eternity ; they will be ſucçeeded by an happineſs, which will never end ; this appears yet ſo much the more inconſiſtent with the goodneſs of God, as it is an infinite goodneſs, and abſolutely perfect, which cannot ſuffer the leaſt diminution nor the leaſt interruption without ceaſing to be perfect. Let us call to mind the doctrine of the ſchoolmen concerning the nature of the firſt qualities. Heat in ſummo gradu (60) in the higheſt degree, ut octo, as eight (for thus they expreſs themſelves) is no longer a firſt, ſimple and perfect quality, as ſoon as it mixed with the leaſt degree of cold, that is poſſible to exiſt : from that moment it becomes one of the ſecond or mixed qualities ; eſſences conſiſt in indiviſible, in an indiviſible point : if you take but the leaſt thing from them, you deſtroy them entirely. All or nothing : ſo that how ſmall ſoever a potion of the malevolent quality be mixed with goodneſs, the latter loſes the eſſence of a perfect goodneſs ; it changes its kind, and happens to belong to the kind of imperfect qualities. I put in the margin the philoſophical Axiom which proves this (61). If therefore the Origeniſts have a mind to diſentangle themſelves, they muſt add a new hereſy to their former ones ; they muſt aſſert that it was impoſſible for God to lead free creatures to an everlaſting happineſs, without making them ſuffer beforeh and the miſeries of this life, and afterwards hell torments for a certain time. They might urge, that as fiſhes cannot live in the air, nor men under water, ſo ſpirits cannot live in paradiſe, as long as they are loaded with the ruſt which they contract by their union with the elementary matter ; that they muſt be purified of it in the infernal furnace, after which they are in a condition to live happy in the moſt celeſtial abodes. According to this ſuppoſition, the goodneſs of God is perfectly conſiſtent with the ſufferings of his creatures, juſt as a Chirurgeon's friendſhip for the perſon he cuts for the ſtone continues entire, though he makes that perſon ſuffer the moſt cruel pains, which it is not in his power to prevent. But if we had recourſe to that hypotheſis, it would be only admitting a part of the errors of the Manicheans ; it would be declaring the goodneſs of God at the expence of his power : it would be admitting matter as an uncreated principle, and ſo eſſentially evil, that God himſelf could not rectify the defects of it : which therefore would not be anſwering the Manicheans, but making them triumph. The obſervation we have made on natural evil with regard to the goodneſs of God, may be eaſily applied to moral evil, with regard to his holineſs.

(60) Compare this with what is obſerved above, num. (55).

(61) Bonum ex integra cauſa, malum ex quocunque defectu, i. e. "Good is from "a perfect cauſe, "evil from any "defect whatſoever."

V. It muſt be obſerved, that ſuppoſing Origen could anſwer the objections of the Manicheans, it does not follow from thence, that therefore they could much eaſier be ſolved, by principles much more reaſonable and orthodox, than his were. For all the advantage that is to be got in this controverſy is owing to the errors which are peculiar to him, who on the one hand gives a free ſcope to the power of free will ; and on the other, ſuppoſes an everlaſting happineſs in the room of an eternal miſery, which he explodes. The ſtrongeſt argument of the Manicheans is grounded upon this ſuppoſition, that all men except a few will be damned for ever.

VI. There is no ſect now-a-days leſs expoſed to the attacks of the Manicheans, than the Socinians : but it is only becauſe they receded farther than the others from the ſyſtem of the Particulariſts (62). Now as long as they ſhall not go farther ſtill, they will not ſucceed better in this controverſy than the Origeniſt : they will certainly have the worſt in this conteſt, if they do not add to all their other impieties, that of ſaying, that matter is a principle of which God cannot diſpoſe but to a certain degree, beyond which he is forced to yield to its reſiſtance, and make the beſt of the incorrigible defects he meets with in it. If the Socinians do not take upon them to aſſert this new blaſphemy, they will ſoon find themſelves reduced to abſurdities ; I mean, to deny truths grounded on experience. They deny the eternity of hell torments, becauſe they do not comprehend how it agrees with the infinite goodneſs of God : they do not conceive how that goodneſs can be conſiſtent with an hell, that ſhould continue an hundred times an hundred thouſand millions of years : ſo many ages of miſery ſeem to them a moſt horrid cruelty. But as that cruelty will never become an infinite goodneſs, by cutting off a thouſand ages of pain ; and then a thouſand again, &c. as long as there remain ſome years of pain (63), they will be obliged to ſay, if they will avoid all incoherencies, that there can be no hell under a God immenſely good. This proves too much ; and ſuch a theſis being once ſet down, one does not conceive how theſe can be diſeaſes and vexations among men. You therefore ſet down ſuch principles, from whence it follows that ſuch things are falſe and even impoſſible, which really exiſt, and the exiſtence of which we are but too ſenſible of from a ſad experience. If you ſay, that under the beſt Kings there are priſons, racks, gallows, and executioners ? it will be replied, that none of theſe things would exiſt, if theſe Kings had the power to inſpire all the world with a firm reſolution to behave as they ought. How will you extricate yourſelves out of this Labyrinth, if God diſpoſes of matter as he thinks fit, and if he is the free author of thoſe laws, which ſubject men to diſeaſes and vexations ? To vindicate him therefore, you will be obliged to ſay, that he does not do all that he would, and that matter contains in it the ſeeds of evil, which ſpring out one way or another, whether he will or not, and whatſoever combination or contexture of corpuſcles he may contrive.

(62) They who urge moſt ſtrictly the literal ſenſe of St. Paul's words concerning the doctrines of abſolute predeſtination, of the neceſſity of grace, and of the loſs of free-will.

VII. Thus we muſt teach thoſe their duty, who would pretend to ſubject divinity to philoſophy. They muſt be ſhewed the abſurd conſequences of their method, that they may be thus brought back to this maxim of Chriſtian Humility, namely, that the metaphyſical notions ought not to be our rule to judge God's conduct by ; but that we muſt regulate ourſelves according to the oracles of Scripture. As for thoſe, who might fear ſome danger to the true faith, from our ſhewing that by natural reaſon and philoſophical maxims we cannot ſtand the objections of the Manicheans, I refer them to the explanation, which I am to add at the end of this work.

[F] The torments which the perſecutors of the Chriſtian Faith made him ſuffer.] Of all the illuſtrious Martyrs who periſhed in the ſeventh perſecution (64). *None were attacked with more obſtinacy than Origen . . . He was caſt into a dark dungeon * being tied by the neck with a large iron collar, ſtretched for ſeveral days following on a kind of a wooden horſe, which by forcing his*

(63) See the proofs of it above, remark [E], paragr. 3.

(64) That of the Emperor Decius, in the year 204.

* Euſeb. lib. 6. c. 39. Niceph. lib. 5 c. 32.

longed a great while ; for a particular care was taken that he might not expire in the midſt of his ſufferings (f). His genius was great and elevated, and his wit ſublime ; his learning and reading were immenſe ; and yet he fell into a prodigious number of Hereſies, of which there was not one but was monſtrous (g). It is probable that he fell only, becauſe he had endeavoured to ſecure the truths of the Chriſtian Religion againſt the objections of the Heathens, and even to render them more credible to the Philoſophers ; this was his moſt ardent wiſh ; for he did not queſtion, but if he had once the philoſophers on his ſide, he ſhould eaſily by their means convert the whole world (h). So many virtues, ſo many noble talents, ſuch worthy and zealous motives, all this put together could not prevent him from dying an Heretick, nor his memory from being odious and abominable to an infinite number of Chriſtians. There are few perſons in the Church of Rome, who dare to doubt of his eternal damnation. Now how many Doctors are there, who are voluptuous, worldly-minded, lazy, and loaded with vices, but at the ſame time moſt orthodox, who receive daily a thouſand bleſſings for their unſhaken conſtancy in the true Faith ? So unfathomable are the judgments of God ! Men do not imagine generally that Origen's errors are any ways connected together ; they ſeem to be the product of a wild and unſettled mind : but we ſhould rather ſay that they all flow from the ſame ſpring [G], that they are ſyſtematical falſities, which all together form a connected chain of conſequences. Some of his legs aſunder, did ſo diſlocate his members, that he lived the remainder of his days in continual pains. He was at that time threeſcore and ſeven years old . . . . Every day they invented a new kind of cruelty ; which he himſelf has given an account of in his letters, to which the antients refer us, but which are loſt ſince. They often threatened to burn him little by little, and at ſeveral times : and during that long and cruel martyrdom, which as far as we can gueſs laſted till the death of Decius, he never ſaid or did the leaſt thing unbecoming a ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt. Happy had it been for him, if giving up the ghoſt in ſo glorious a ſtrife, he might have waſhed away with his own blood the errors of his doctrine. But God would not permit it. He ſuffered very much, ſays St. Epiphanius †, and yet he did not arrive at the end to which a martyrdom leads. He touched the Crown with his hand, without being able to put it on his head, and he, who to be a Martyr wanted nothing but to expire in the midſt of thoſe torments, the marks of which he bore till his death, is an hereſiarch, expelled and abhorred by the Church, becauſe he did not believe as ſhe does. But we ought not to wonder at it ; when we read in the acts of the holy Prieſt Pionius, who ſuffered about that time at Smyrna, that next to him was burnt a Marcionite, whoſe ſect, though it inſpired its followers with a deſire for martyrdom, was nevertheleſs heretical for it, becauſe theſe falſe Martyrs died being addicted to their errors. It was not the ſufferings, ſays admirably well St. Auguſtin, that make a martyr, but the faith which makes a man undergo thoſe ſufferings. Now there is no longer any faith in him who riſes up againſt the doctrine of the Church. Where are thoſe of that character, whom ſome men would paſs upon us for ſaints, though one cannot perceive the leaſt thing in their lives that is any ways like the virtues or the ſufferings of the Martyrs, but only a mere obſtinacy much leſs doubtful than that of the antient Hereſiarchs (65).

(f) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, p. 81.

(g) Ibid. p. 36.

(h) Ibid. p. 37.

† L. de Ponderib. & Menſuris.

(65) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, p. 81, &c.

I have tranſcribed that long paſſage from father Doucin, without omitting his reflection ; for I imagined it might ſerve as a ſupplement to what I have related above (66), concerning the objections that were raiſed againſt Monſieur Maimbourg with regard to the Marcionites. I conſidered alſo that this would afford me an opportunity to obſerve, that the moſt eaſy methods to find out the right cauſe fail us ſoon or late. It would be much better ſuited to the mean capacity of the multitude, if they could diſtinguiſh by ſome exterior but infallible marks, which is the true religion, rather than be obliged to enter into a ſtrict examination of the doctrine itſelf. Now among all the exterior marks, the conſtancy of the martyrs is the moſt proper to make a deep impreſſion on the mind ; it was of an infinite ſervice for the propagation of the Chriſtian Faith : their aſhes were the ſeed of the faithful, and raiſed numberleſs Diſciples to the Goſpel. But that proof became equivocal after Chriſtianity was divided into ſeveral communions : they had all their Martyrs, ſo that to avoid being miſled, a man was obliged to examine the doctrine itſelf, and to give up that ſhort method of diſcovering the truth ; ſuch a communion has Martyrs, therefore truth is on its ſide.

(66) In the remark [E] of the article MARCIONITES.

[G] We ſhould rather ſay that all Origen's errors flow from the ſame ſpring.] He has explained and eſtabliſhed them in his three books of Principles (67), where he has ſo well connected them together, that you ſee them all follow from one ſingle principle (68). " It " is eaſy to demonſtrate ; firſt, that what is heretical " and cenſurable in the books of principles, is not " one or two ſingle propoſitions, foreign to the ſub- " ject matter ; it is the whole body of the doctrine, " the very ſubſtance of the whole work : they are " fundamental propoſitions on which the whole ſyſ- " tem is built, and which cannot be removed with- " out overthrowing the noble edifice. It can be de- " monſtrated in the ſecond place, that the ſame er- " rors, which infect the books of principles, run " through all the other works of the ſame author : " ſo that the ſame genius prevails every where, the " ſame ideas appear throughout the whole. To re- " move his errors you muſt deſtroy the very firſt ele- " ments of his doctrine (69). . . . . Such is the fate " of whoever dares to walk in a new road in mat- " ters of religion. Innumerable abyſſes and fright- " ful precipices open on every ſide before him. The " more wit he has, the more abſurdities will his en- " deavours to argue coherently make him ſwallow : " and what at firſt ſeemed only an inconſiderable " piece of ſingularity, hardly worth notice, proves " at laſt the general overthrow of all the orthodox doc- " trines. So fatal is it to invent, when we ſhould " only believe (70)." The author from whom I have borrowed theſe words has the following paſſages in another place. " What deſerves chiefly to be " taken notice of is the imperceptible, but nevertheleſs " real connection there is between all his errors, the " one of which led its author to another, and oblig- " ed him at the ſame time to invent that frightful " multitude of novelties, of which his ſyſtem is " made up. For, as St. Jerom very well obſerves " where he treats of this ſubject, we muſt not imagine " that Origen was a madman or a weak genius § : " moſt of thoſe who read his works would not meet " in them with thoſe frequent contradictions they " charge him with, if they had taken more pains " to ſtudy him. It is true that the book of princi- " ples, ſuch as we have it at preſent, does not al- " ways agree with the reſt of his works : but he is " not anſwerable for it : * all the world knows what " pains Rufinus took to alter or ſuppreſs in his tranſ- " lation all that he thought might make the book be " condemned in the Weſt. Thus and thus only it " is that Origen ſometimes refutes in Latin the ſame " errors, which he aſſerts in Greek in his other " works. But upon the whole, you will not find " him inconſiſtent with himſelf, if you but fetch his " notions from their very ſpring, and if you endea- " vour to find out, as it were, the key to his works : " for there muſt certainly be one ; and we ought " not to imagine that ſo many different hereſies " were any thing elſe but the conſequences of a firſt " error, which it does not appear the learned have " yet ſufficiently endeavoured to find out (71.)" Father Doucin propoſes afterwards his conjectures, and how

(67) He compoſed them in the year 217. See Father Doucin, ubi infra.

(68) Doucin, Hiſtoire d' l'Origeniſme, p. 31.

(69) Ibid. p. 36.

(70) Ibid. p. 37.

§ Non eſt fatuus Origenes. Et ego novi. Contraria ſibi loqui non poteſt. Hier. Apol. l. 2.

* Quæ cùm legiſſem contuliſſemque cum Græco, illico animadverti quæ Origenes de Patre & Filio & Spiritu ſancto impie dixerat, & quæ Romanæ aures ferre non poterant, in meliorem partem ab interprete commutata. Hier. Apol. l. 1. Si ideo interpretaris ut eum hæreticum arguas, nihil de Græco mutes. Ibid. lib. 2.

(71) Doucin, Hiſt. de l'Origeniſme, p. 323, &c.

of his followers carried them ſo far as to indulge themſelves in thoſe ſenſual pleaſures, which have been ſince taken notice of amongſt the Moliniſts * [H]; but that carnal Origeniſm did not continue long, and could be much eaſier deſtroyed than the ſpiritual Origeniſm, which was a kind of Quietiſm [I]. We muſt not forget to obſerve, that one of the reaſons, which chiefly promoted the ſucceſs of Origen's Sect, was that his errors ſeemed proper to refute the Manicheans [K], who very much perplexed the Orthodox with their objections. One of this author's beſt works is his anſwer to the Philoſopher Celſus:

* The followers of Molinos.

how he conceives the opinions of Origen were connected together. This deſerves to be read in the original.

[H] Some of his followers carried them ſo far as to indulge themſelves in thoſe ſenſual pleaſures, which have been ſince taken notice of amongſt the Moliniſts.] I ſhall tranſcribe again father Doucin's own words: they hint a great many reflections to us, and give us to underſtand what uſe might be made of them with regard to this preſent time. "Whilſt the unlearned "contemplatives inconſiderably admitted all Ori-"gen's fancies, others more knowing, but alſo more "corrupted, took notice that one might draw from "thence ſome conſequences very favourable to this "diſſoluteneſs: and as the fleſh was now looked "upon only as the priſon of the ſpirit, and not at "all as a part of ourſelves, which was ſanctified by "its union with Jeſus Chriſt, and appointed to reign "with him in his glory; they inferred from thence "that the uncleanneſs of the fleſh was not capable "to defile the Spirit, nor to make it loſe the grace "of its Creator. It is eaſy to gueſs to what abomi-"nations that horrid principle leads; it raiſed in "the Eaſt a new Sect of Origeniſts, ſo odious on ac-"count of their diſorders, that they were ſurnamed "the infamous, and the diſſolute *. That twofold "Origeniſm, the one carnal, the other ſpiritual, "has for its voucher St. Epiphanius. It will not "therefore be taken for a mere invention of an hiſ-"torian, who dives into the moſt remoteſt ages to "find out deſcriptions anſwerable to what happens in "our days. Much leſs ought it to be conſidered as an "opportunity, which is taken hold of on purpoſe to "debate one's mind on the affairs of this time. . . . "If the execrable Molinos, how much ſoever his "character differed from that of the chaſte Origen, "did yet become like him the author of a ſpiritual "hereſy, and of a carnal hereſy, we ought not to "wonder at it †. The moſt ſpiritual Hereſy, if it be "ever ſo little connected with morality, and the rules "of men's conduct, will lead them to the moſt "monſtrous diſſoluteneſs. This man ſighs, and ac-"cuſes himſelf, after he has committed a wicked "action, which however, ſays he, I could not avoid, "ſince God refuſed me grace. Another infers, that "an action cannot be criminal, ſince God put it out "of his power to avoid it, and ſo he commits it "without bluſhing. There is often no other diffe-"rence between them both but only in the manner "of expreſſing themſelves. The latter ſpeaks as he "thinks; the former as he would have others think "of him (72)."

* Hæreſ. 63, 64. Horum vero bæreſis ad Epiphanis dogma conformata videtur de quo in Gnoſticorum ſecta ſermonem antea fecimus . . nuptias repudiant neque tamen obſcœnis libidinibus modum ullis adhibent, adeoque omni genere ſpurcitiæ & corpus ſuum, & mentem animumque contaminant. Ibid.

† See what Huetius obſerves, in order to prove, that there has been but one Origen.

(72) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, p. 139.

[I] That carnal Origeniſm . . . . could be much eaſier deſtroyed, than the ſpiritual Origeniſm, which was a kind of Quietiſm.] "What will be thought incredi-"ble, and yet is worthy to be carefully obſerved is, "that a carnal Hereſy is leſs dangerous to the "Church (73), than thoſe Hereſies, which are not "attended with the leaſt immorality. We want no "other proof of this, but the twofold Origeniſm. "The carnal Origeniſm laſted but a very little time, "and was abhorred by all the world: even they, "who were tainted with it, did not dare to expoſe "ſuch an execrable doctrine to open view; whereas "the ſpiritual Origeniſm, the followers of which, "according to St. Epiphanius § himſelf, were un-"blameable with regard to their innocence, could "not be extinguiſhed till after two centuries and "more: ſo much obſtinacy and pride did the profeſ-"ſors of it conceal under the fair ſhew of an exem-"plary piety (74)."

(73) See the Penſees diverſes ſur les Cometes, ſect. 89, 90.

§ Nam licet nullum ſectatoribus ſuis uſum turpitudinis imponat. Hæreſ. 64.

(74) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, 141.

I muſt alſo quote the following paſſage from father Doucin. Evagrius . . . . . Deacon of the Church of Conſtantinople . . . was gone to Jeruſalem, and from thence into Egypt, in order to retire into a ſolitary place . . . . he thought of nothing but Origeniſm. . . . He was hardly ſettled in his deſart, but the Origeniſt Monks, being acquainted with his merit, put him at their head, which is the reaſon why the Church has ſince condemned him as one of the ringleaders of that ſect. He ſpent his time in writing ſpiritual books, which were greatly eſteemed, and of which the fragments, that are ſtill extant, are indeed very beautiful. By that means the erroneous doctrine was wonderfully propagated. St. Epiphanius ſoon took notice of it; and St. Jerom on his part, warned the faithful to be upon their guard. "Evagrius, ſaid he, that man who came from the "North, who from his retirement writes letters to the "whole world, who ſends inſtructions to the Virgins, "inſtructions to the Monks, inſtructions to her, whoſe very "name ſeems to expreſs the darkneſs and blackneſs of "*Hereſy (he means Melania ) put it into his head, to "publiſh a book of maxims, by which he pretends to di-veſt "man of all paſſions." This is exactly the pretended perfection of the Quietiſt. "That is to ſay, adds St. "Jerom, that of his perfect man Evagrius will make "either a God or a ſtone (75)."

* Μέλας (melas) in Greec, ſignifies black.

(75) Ibid. p. 177, &c.

[K] Origen's errors ſeemed proper to refute the Manicheans.] It is chiefly here that I muſt borrow another writer's words. Palladius was Evagrius's pupil in the monaſtick life. He knew how to ſucceed as well at leaſt as his maſter, in the ſupporting and improving of a Sect. "The women, and chiefly they who had ſome read-"ing, loved to diſcourſe with him, and reſiſted leſs "than others his artful language. He uſed to "begin with raiſing ſuſpicions in their minds againſt "the Orthodox Faith, by repreſenting it as abound-"ing with abſurdities, which could not be avoided "but by following Origen's principles. He aſked "them, for inſtance;  what ill has ſuch a child "done, which you ſee is tormented and poſſeſſed by "the Devil? At what age ſhall we riſe from the "dead? Will it be with the ſame body with which "we dye (76)? . . . . Thus Palladius gave people a "taſte for Origeniſm, by repreſenting it as a ſyſtem "neceſſary to explain in an eaſy and clear manner "thoſe articles, which till then had been looked upon "as the rock on which our Religion was loſt. Was "it poſſible that a doctrine thus explained by the "moſt eminent men of that time, ſhould not have "great ſucceſs, eſpecially conſidering the diſpoſi-"tion of mind in which people were then in? They "endeavoured only to anſwer the Manicheans, whoſe "Sect was become more large and flouriſhing, than "it had ever been before. If there be but one God, "ſaid thoſe Hereticks, who is infinitely powerful "and good, how can he ſuffer that flood of evils "which happen in the world? How can he permit, "that ſo many perſons ſhould be oppreſſed by them "from their infancy, whilſt others are born in proſpe-"rity, and in a plenty of all manner of bleſſings? "How abſurd ſoever the doctrine of two principles "appeared, the one good, the other bad, both equally "powerful, and independent of each other, yet it "had a numberleſs multitude of followers, who ima-"gined that it was not poſſible to account otherwiſe "for the evils which happen in this life. It is well "known how much St. Auguſtin laboured to ſatisfy "them upon that ſubject. It is known alſo that "Pelagius, who came afterwards, and whoſe ſyſ-"tem was at firſt very well liked, endeavoured "particularly to remove that Stumbling-block, and "to anſwer that queſtion ſo often diſputed upon at "that time: Whence comes evil? What is the origin "of it? Now none gave a more probable account "of that origin of our ſufferings, and of the diffe-"rent ſhare of them allotted to each of us, than "the Origeniſts (77)."

 Hier. Ep. 27.

(76) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origeniſme, p. 180.

(77) Doucin, Ibid. p. 182.

Obſerve that the Origeniſt in the Parrhaſiana ſuppoſes that an everlaſting happineſs is to ſucceed the ſufferings which the damned are to undergo during ſome ages (78). This removes the moſt terrible difficulty of the Manicheans, namely, the eternity of moral and natural evil in Hell. But father Dou-"cin repreſents us Origen's doctrine otherwiſe: he does (78) See the remark [E] quotation ().

Celſus : it has been publiſhed in French in the year 1700 [L]. I have mentioned ſome other editions in the remark [A] of the article Perſona. See the margin (i).

(i) His treatiſe on Prayer, which had never been publiſhed, was printed at Oxford in Greek and Latin, in the year 1686. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1686, article 8. It is aſſerted there, from the preface, that Iſaac Voſſius had bought the manuſcript of it at Stockholm : but the truth of the matter is, as I have learnt ſince that time from a Letter of Mr. Huet, which was ſhewed me, that Voſſius carried it to Stockholm, having bought it about the year 1636 of Mr. Rums, Phyſician to the Queen of Bohemia, who had bought it of the ſoldiers who plundered the Library of Worms. That manuſcript having paſſed from Iſaac Voſſius's hands, into thoſe of Herbert Thorndike's, came at laſt into Dr. Gale's hands, who put it in the Library of Trinity College at Cambridge. See Dr. Cave, de ſcript. eccleſ. part. 2. p. 30. edit. Genev. 1699.

does not ſuppoſe it ſo proper to anſwer thoſe Hereticks ; for he aſſerts that the Origeniſts denied alſo the eternity of happineſs. Beſides that, " Origen " judged it was cruel to make the ſufferings of the " damned laſt for ever ; the eternity of torments " ſeemed to him inconſiſtent with the eſſential pro- " priety of all that is created, namely, inſtability. He " aſſerted therefore, that as much as God is uncapa- " ble of any change, ſo the creature muſt be unca- " pable of being fixed to any permanent and eter- " nal State, either with regard to good or evil. He " maintained therefore, that when all the ſpirits, " being purified of their ſpots, ſhould have been again " united to the divine nature ††, of which they are " emanations, according to him, they would again " be ſeparated from it, like ſparks of fire which fly " from a furnace ; and as a puniſhment for this in- " conſtancy §§ . . . . they would be condemned to " enter into new bodies ; for which purpoſe it would " be neceſſary to create new worlds, and that thus " there would be during the whole eternity con- " tinual and periodical revolutions like that of the " ſeaſons (79)." Father Doucin's marginal note deſerves to be tranſcribed : for it acquaints us that there was a branch of Spinoziſm in the ſyſtem of Origen, " namely, the identity of all the ſpirits with the " divine nature, that is to ſay, that all the ſpirits " are the ſame with God." Here follows then what that author obſerves, after quoting St. Jerom's words. " Obſerve that Rufinus has omitted that " paſſage in his tranſlation. Read the laſt chapter " of the third book, where theſe words, Et erit " Deus in omnibus, God will be all in all, are explain- " ed at length. St. Jerom continues thus : Ne par- " vam eſſe putaremus impietatem eorum quæ promiſerat " in ejuſdem voluminis (quarti) fine conjungit omnes ra- " tionabiles naturas, id eſt, Patrem & Filium & Spiri- " tum Sanctum, Angelos, Dominationes, cæteraſque Vir- " tutes, ipſum quoque ſecundum animæ dignitatem unius " eſſe ſubſtantiæ . . . . Et qui in alio loco Filium & Spi- " ritum non vult de Patris eſſe ſubſtantia, ne divinita- " tem in partes ſecare videatur, naturam omnipotentis " Dei Angelis hominibuſque largitur. Ex quo concludi- " tur (inquit) Deum & hæc quodammodo unius eſſe ſub- " ſtantiæ. Unum addit verbum, quodammodo, ut tanti " ſacrilegii crimen effugeret." See l. 3. c. 16. (10), i. e. " That we might not think that what he had " obſerved before, is but little impious, at the end " of that ſame (fourth) volume, he joins together in " one all the reaſonable natures, that is to ſay, (he " aſſerts) that the Father, the Son, and the Holy " Ghoſt, the Angels, the Dominions,, and the " other Powers, and even man himſelf with reſpect " to the dignity of his Soul, are of one and the " ſame ſubſtance. . . . . He who in another place " will not acknowledge that the Son and the Holy " Ghoſt are of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, " leſt he ſhould ſeparate the divine nature into parts, " gives here the nature of God Almighty to the " Angels, and to the men. Whence it muſt be in- " ferred, ſays he, that God and theſe are in ſome " manner, only to clear himſelf of the crime of ſo " great an impiety."

†† In libro quoque tertio περὶ ἀρχῶν & poſt diſputationem longiſſimam ad extremum intulit, & Deus omnia in omnibus, ut univerſa natura corporea in eam redigatur ſubſtantiam quæ omnibus melior eſt, in divinam ſcilicet, quâ nulla eſt melior. Origen. apud Hier. Ep. ad Avit.

§§ Hier. ep. ad Avitum, & Apol. 2.

(79) Doucin, Hiſtoire de l'Origenijme, p. 338.

* I ſuppoſe the word hominem is here omitted by miſtake.

(80) Doucin, ib. p. 339.

[L] Origen's anſwer to Celſus has been publiſhed in French.] Monſieur Bohéreau (81), who is ſo well known by the learned letters which Monſieur le Févre of Saumur wrote to him, is the author of that tranſlation. Our Journaliſts (82) having ſufficiently acquainted the publick with the merit of that work, I need not give an account of it. I ſhall only ſay one thing which will confirm an obſervation I have made ſeveral times, and which is, that we muſt not give much credit to what is ſaid in converſation. I had heard many perſons aſſert, that ſome men of weight in the Reformed Church of Paris, and particularly Monſieur Claude, had endeavoured to diſſuade Monſieur Bohéreau from tranſlating that book into French, becauſe it was not proper all the world ſhould ſee the objections of the Heathen Philoſopher, and compare them with Origen's anſwers. But Monſieur Bohéreau does not ſpeak of it thus : He obſerves (83) that ſome perſons of an eminent merit, and amongſt others the celebrated Monſieur Claude, imagined (84) it was dangerous to put Origen into the hands of all the Chriſtians, becauſe of ſome erroneous opinions peculiar to him, with which he has always been charged. There is, you ſee, a great difference, between what I had heard ſo often, and what Monſieur Bohéreau tells us, who was better acquainted with the truth of the matter than any man elſe. But though he does not mention that pretended reaſon urged by Monſieur Claude, it is nevertheleſs certain that our Journaliſts have mentioned it, and condemned it (85). They had, no doubt, been told the ſame thing with me. I had alſo been told that the tranſlator was of opinion, the whole book of Celſus might be reſtored, if all the paſſages of it, quoted by Origen, were connected together. But ſince he obſerves nothing like this, neither in his Preface, nor in the Remarks, I muſt miſtruſt thoſe who told me that ſtory. There could not be a ſtronger proof than that of Origen's fair dealing ; why then was he not commended upon that account in the Preface to the tranſlation ?

(81) He is of Rochelle ; he is called Elias Bohereilus, in the Letters of Tanaquil le Fevre, (Tanaquillus Faber.)

(82) See Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, for December 1699. p. 519, and the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for Jan. 1700. p. 3.

(83) In his Pref.

(84) See what has been obſerved againſt ſuch a thought, in the Nouv. de la Rep des Lettres, for June 1686. p. 691.

(85) Hiſt. des Ouvr. des Savans, for Dec. 1699, p. 522, and Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for Jan. 1700, p. 11.

OROBIO (ISAAC), a Jewiſh Phyſician, died at Amſterdam in the year 1687. See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (a).

(a) Tom. 7. p. 289, &c.

OROSIUS (PAUL) a Spaniſh Prieſt, flouriſhed in the beginning of the 6th Century. Conſult Moreri ; for as I do not deſign to repeat what he has obſerved, I ſhall give no account of that author : I ſhall only correct ſome miſtakes which relate to him. They who ſuppoſed he was a Monk, and who placed his death under the year 471 [A], were ſtill

[A] They who ſuppoſed he was a Monk, and who place his death under the year 471.] You will meet with their names in Philip Elſſius, whoſe credulity well deſerved the following cenſure from father Labbe : Ut omittam fabuloſos quoſdam Hiſpanos ſcriptores, quos citat ſequiturque Philippus Elſſius, qui Auguſtinianis ſuis Eremitis accenſet, vitamque ejus prorogat uſque ad annum 471, quo centenario majorem in Carthagine Spartaria in Hiſpaniis obiiſſe contendit, atque inde Romam aſportatum & in Eccleſia S. Euſebii, ubi patruus ejus jacebat, ſepultum. Sed hæc penitus incerta dubiæque fidei. Quid quod & nonnulli Legionenſem Epiſcopum fuiſſe putent (1) ? i. e. " Not to mention ſome fabulous Spaniſh wri- " ters, whom Philip Elſſius quotes and follows ; who " reckons Oroſius amongſt his Auſtin-Friars, and " makes him live till the year 471, when he aſſerts, " that he died, being above an hundred years old, " at Cartagena, in Spain, whence he was, accord- " ing to him, carried to Rome, and buried in the " church of St. Euſebius, where his uncle lay. But " all this is uncertain and dubious. But what ſhall " we ſay of ſome, who imagine that he was Biſhop " of Leon ? "

(1) Philippus Labbe, Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 175.

[B] They

ſtill more miſtaken than they who made him a Heathen [B], and as much as thoſe who ſuppoſe he was a Biſhop. It is not true that St. Auguſtin deſired him to write the hiſtory of the moſt conſiderable events which happened ſince JESUS CHRIST [C]; and that Oroſius which [B] They who made him a heathen.] Father Garaſſe has been guilty of that blunder, and even in a work in which he endeavours to convince the Atheiſts by the teſtimony of the unbelievers. The ſecond wonder of this nature, ſays he (2), which I bring in as a teſtimony, are the aſhy apples of Gomorrha, and the pillar of ſalt, two authentick monuments, which have for their vouchers, not only the ſacred hiſtorians, and the fathers who wrote upon the 19th chapter of Geneſis, but alſo all the prophane hiſtorians, who mention the Lake Aſphaltites, as Joſephus, Solinus, Oroſius, Pliny and Tacitus. Obſerve another blunder of Garaſſe; he aſſerts falſely, that Solinus, Pliny and Tacitus have mentioned the pillar of ſalt.

(2) Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, p. 192.

[C] It is not true, that St. Auguſtin deſired him to write the hiſtory of the moſt conſiderable events . . . . ſince JESUS CHRIST.] "The city of Rome being "taken in the year 410 by Alaric King of the Goths, "the Heathens, with a deſign to render the Chriſtians odious, charged them with being the cauſe "of that misfortune, and of all the other calamities, "under which the Roman Empire groaned. In order to clear the Chriſtians of that imputation Oroſius undertook, at St. Auguſtin's requeſt, to write "the hiſtory of the moſt conſiderable events, which "happened ſince JESUS CHRIST to his own time, in "order to ſhew that there had always happened from "time to time great misfortunes in the world, and that "the Roman Empire had never been more free from "them than the birth of JESUS CHRIST (3)." I have tranſcribed at length Monſieur Du Pin's words, becauſe they are proper to acquaint the reader with the occaſion and deſign of that work of Oroſius: but I muſt beg leave to obſerve, that St. Auguſtin in his requeſt did not confine himſelf to the events which happened after the birth of CHRIST: he aſked for a general collection of the greateſt misfortunes, the memory of which was preſerved in hiſtory. Præceperas mihi, ſays Oroſius to him (4), *uti adverſus vaniloquam pravitatem eorum, qui alieni à civitate dei, ex locorum agreſtium compitis & pagis pagani vocantur, ſive gentiles, quia terrena ſapiunt: qui cum futura non quærant, præterita autem aut obliviſcantur, aut neſciant, præſentia tantum tempora veluti malis extra ſolitum infeſtiſſima, ob hoc ſolum, quòd creditur CHRISTUS, & colitur deus, idola autem minus coluntur, infamant: præceperas ergo, ut ex omnibus, qui haberi ad præſens poſſunt, hiſtoriarum atque annalium factis, quæcunque aut bellis gravia, aut corrupta morbis, aut * ſanè triſtia, aut terrarum motibus terribilia, aut inundationibus aquarum inſolita, aut eruptionibus ignium metuenda, aut ictibus fulminum plagiſque grandinum ſæva, vel etiam parricidiis flagitiiſque miſera, per tranſacta retrò ſæcula reperiſſem, ordinato breviter voluminis textu explicarem*, i. e. "You deſired me to anſwer the vain and idle "objections of thoſe who are called Pagans from "their living in villages †, or Gentiles, becauſe "they mind only earthly § things; men who do "not reflect on futurity, who forget or do not know "what is paſt, and cry down the preſent time as being more unhappy than the former ages, becauſe ', men believe in Chriſt, worſhip God, and neglect "the idols: you deſired me therefore to collect from "all the hiſtories and annals that can be found as "preſent, the account of wars, plagues, earthquakes, "floods, conflagrations, thunder and lightning, "murders, and other crimes, which have rendered "former ages unfortunate, and to write an abridgment "of all this in a ſmall volume." Of the ſeven books which make up Oroſius's work, the laſt only treats of the events which happened after Jeſus Chriſt. Farther, I am not fully perſuaded that the author undertook to ſhew, that the Roman Empire was never more free from great misfortunes than ſince the eſtabliſhment of the Chriſtian Religion. He would have had a hard taſk upon his hands. I think that Gennadius gives us a better account of the hiſtorian's deſign. He ſhews, ſays he, it is owing to the Chriſtian Religion, that the Roman Commonwealth, which did not deſerve to continue, is nevertheleſs ſtill ſubſiſting (5). I know that Oroſius challenges the unbelievers to ſhew that at any time the State had proſpered ſo wonderfully as it did under Honorius; but this does not prove the truth of the aſſertion which I pretend to find fault with here. Ex quo utcunque conceſſerim, ut licenter Chriſtiana tempora reprehendantur, ſi quid à conditione mundi uſque ad nunc ſimili factum felicitate doceatur. Manifeſtavimus, ut arbitror, atque oſtendimus non magis verbo pene quàm digito innumera bella ſopita, plurimos extinctos tyrannos, compreſſas, coanguſtatas, addictas, exinanitaſque immaniſſimas gentes minimo ſanguine, nullo certamine, ac pene ſine cæde (6), i. e. "I will allow theſe reproaches, "which are ſo freely caſt upon the times of Chriſtianity, if it can be proved from the creation of "the world to this time there ever was ſo happy a "ſucceſs as this. We have ſhewed, I think, and "proved, that by the lifting up of a finger only, "rather than by a word of command, numberleſs "wars have been ended, tyrants extinct, whole nations quieted, ſubdued, and weakened with a very "little effuſion of blood, without a battle, and al"moſt without ſlaughter." Monſieur Du Pin, when he mentioned Oroſius's ſcheme, remembered perhaps a paſſage from another Father, but not ſo diſtinctly as not to imagine it was from Oroſius. It is ſet down as a matter of fact in that paſſage, that the Goſpel had very much abated the fury of the wars, which had occaſioned ſo much havock in the world before the time of the Apoſtles. Quanquam iſta quæ dicitis bella Religionis noſtræ ob invidiam commoveri, non ſit difficile comprobare, poſt auditum Chriſtum in mundo non tantum non aucta, verum etiam majore ex parte furiarum compreſſionibus imminuta. Nam cum hominum vis tantæ magiſteriis ejus acceperimus legibus, malum malo rependi non oportere; injuriam perpeti quam irrogare eſſe præſtantius; ſuum potius fundere, quam alieno polluere manus & conſcientiam cruore: habet à Chriſto beneficium jamdudum orbis ingratus, per quem feritatis mollita eſt rabies, atque hoſtiles manus cohibere à ſanguine cognati animantis occæpit (7), i. e. "Though it be not difficult to prove, "that thoſe very wars, which you ſay are raiſed "out of hatred againſt our religion, are not only "not encreaſed ſince the coming of Chriſt; but are "even carried on with much leſs fury than before. "For ſince ſuch a vaſt number of men, as we are, "have learnt from Chriſt's laws, that we muſt not "return evil for evil; that it is more noble to ſuffer "an injury, than to do one; that we ought rather to "ſpill our own blood, than to defile our hands and "conſciences with the blood of another: the ungrateful world has now long ago enjoyed that bleſſing "from Chriſt, by which men's rage is mollified, and "by which they have learnt to abſtain from ſhedding "with an hoſtile hand the blood of their fellow"creatures." This argument of Arnobius comes to this. They who have embraced the Goſpel have learnt to ſuffer injuries, and not to repel force by force; they have diveſted themſelves of all reſentment, they are become meek and peaceful: ſo that ſince the propagation of the Goſpel, the ſhedding of human blood, and the furies of the wars are become ſo much the leſs, as a great number of perſons have embraced the Chriſtian Faith. Arnobius adds, that if the wars are not entirely ſuppreſſed, it is becauſe all men have not followed the laws of Chriſt. Quod ſi omnes omnino, qui homines ſe eſſe non ſpecie corporum, ſed rationis intelligunt poteſtate, ſalutaribus ejus pacificiſque decretis aurem vellent commodare pauliſper, & non faſtu & ſupercilio luminis, ſuis potius ſenſibus, quam illius commonitionibus crederent: univerſus jam dudum orbis mitiora in opera converſis uſibus ferri, tranquillitate in molliſſima degeret, & in concordiam ſalutarum incorruptis fœderum ſanctionibus conveniret (8), i. e. "If all "they, who underſtand they are men, not by the "outward ſhape of their body, but by their reaſon, "and mind, would a little hearken to his wholeſome and peaceable laws, and inſtead of being "ſwayed by the haughty opinion of their own "wiſdom, and following their own ſenſes, if they "would be adviſed by him; the whole world, having turned iron to ſome more profitable and gentle

(3) Du Pin, Nouv. Bibliotb. Tom. 3. p. 156, of the Amſterdam edition.

(4) In Proœmio lib. 1. See alſo the concluſion of the work.

* It ſhould perhaps be fame.

† Called Pagi in Latin.

§ Oroſius ſeems to have thought that Gens, from which comes Gentiles, is derived from the Greek word γῆ, the earth.

(5) Oſtendit magis Chriſtianæ obſervantiæ eſſe quod contra meritum ſuum Reſp. Romana adhuc duraret, & pace culturæ Dei pacatum retineret imperium. Gennadius in Vita Oroſii.

(6) Oroſius, lib. 6.

(7) Arnobius, lib. 1. p. 5.

(8) Ibid. p. 6.

wrote that hiſtory after St. Auguſtin's death [D]. One cannot reaſonably cenſure Iſaac Caſaubon for his contempt for that work [E]; which is nevertheleſs pretty uſeful, and of which there are ſeveral editions [F]. I make uſe of the Cologne edition 1572, which does not contain ſo many notes of Francis Fabricius as I could wiſh.

It is thought Oroſius intitled his work De Miſeria Humana, of the miſery of men. It was a very proper title, which well becomes hiſtory in general, as a judicious author has very

" uſe, would live in a delicious tranquillity, and a" gree a bleſſed union eſtabliſhed by the moſt ho-
" ly and inviolable covenant." An author, miſta-king here one writer for another, I mean, who ſhould aſcribe to Oroſius, what belongs to Arnobius, might very eaſily aſſert that Oroſius ſhews, the Roman Empire was never more free from great misfortunes, than ſince the birth of Jesus Christ. But it is proper to obſerve, that Arnobius does by no means prove this: for beſides that, a bare argument, without any enumeration of facts, is not ſufficient to anſwer the complaints which the Heathens made at that time, it muſt be confeſſed, that Arnobius gives us here a very ſlight proof. Suppoſe that ſome of the inhabitants of a great empire give up all revenge, and carefully cheriſh the meek ſpirit of the Goſpel; can this prevent ſtrangers from laying waſte that Empire, and from bringing into it diſorders and misfortunes, which were not felt before? Now this was the complaint which Arnobius pretends to anſwer (9). He urges other arguments very concluſive againſt that ſame charge of the Heathens, and againſt that which they grounded on the plagues and famines, to which the Roman Empire was expoſed: but let us alſo confeſs, that he urges ſome arguments ſo ſcandalous, that I do not believe Epicurus or Lucretius could have attacked Providence ſo ſtrongly as he does, or more ſmartly bantered thoſe, who aſcribe to God's anger, the misfortunes of mankind.

(9) Nam quod nobis objectare conſueſtis bellorum frequentium cauſas, waſtationes urbium, Germanorum & Scythicas irruptiones, cum pace hoc veſtra, & cum bona venia dixerim, quale ſit iſtud quod dicitur, calumniarum libidine non videtis. Idem, ibid. p. 5.

(10) Bibliotheca Hiſpan. p. 206.

[D] . . . . and that Oroſius wrote that hiſtory after St. Auguſtin's death.] The Jeſuit, Andrew Schot, has been guilty of that miſtake. Defuncto, ſays he (10), hac mortali vita S. Auguſtino Romæ degebat, ubi ſeptem contra Gentes Libris res Græcorum Romanorumque domi militiæque geſtas fideliter eo potiſſimum conſilio contexuit, quo ethnicorum calumniam, quæ Chriſtianis mala calamitateſque temere imputabat, refelleret . . . . floruit autem anno a nato Chriſto 440. i. e. " After St. Auſtin's " death, Oroſius lived at Rome, where he wrote his " ſeven books againſt the Heathens, which contain " the hiſtory of the Greeks and the Romans: he com-" poſed it with a deſign to refute the calumny of the " Heathens, who unfairly imputed to the Chriſtians " all the evils and misfortunes which befel the Em-" pire. . . . He flouriſhed in the year 440, ſince " the birth of Chriſt." St. Auguſtin died in the year 430. Now it is certain, that Oroſius put the finiſhing hand to his work (11), when Vallia, King of the Goths, was juſt going to make a treaty of peace with the Emperor Honorius, that is to ſay, in the year 416. The laſt words of his hiſtory are directed to St. Auguſtin, as to a man then ſtill living; and we learn from another paſſage (12), that St. Auguſtin had publiſhed only the ten firſt books of the City of God, when Oroſius was about compoſing his work according to the ſcheme, which that Saint had furniſhed him with.

(11) See the concluſion of his hiſtory.

(12) Oroſius, in Proœmio Hiſtor.

[E] Caſaubon's contempt for that work.] He ſhewed his contempt in very civil expreſſions, and with many commendations of Oroſius's zeal. Oroſium, ex quo multa in hoc ſermone deſcribit, ſcriptorem alioquin optimum & zelo domus Dei plenum, ſi nimiæ facilitatis in talibus credendis poſtulaverimus, non deerunt viri præſtantiſſimi, quorum exemplo factum tueamur: non rationes validiſſimæ, quibus ſanctum virum ταχυπειθίας, & nimiæ credulitatis, reum peragamus. Taceo rerum Romanarum ignorationem aliquando mirificam: etiam Baronio teſte non ſemel (13). i. e. " If I have charged Oroſius, from " whom he has tranſcribed many things in this diſ-" courſe, and who was otherwiſe a very good man, " and very zealous for the houſe of God, if I have " charged him, I ſay, with too eaſy a belief in " theſe matters, I may quote many eminent " men, whoſe example juſtifies me; and I have ve-" ry ſtrong arguments to prove that holy man guilty " of too eaſy a belief, and too great a credulity: not " to mention his ignorance in the Roman Hiſtory, " which Baronius himſelf more than once confeſſes." Lipſius had not the ſame regard for Oroſius; for having obſerved, that that Author imagined Tiberius put Druſus in priſon, he adds, At me non valde movent ejuſmodi ſcriptores, legitimæ hiſtoriæ (dicam iratis quorundam auribus) dehoneſtamenta (14), i. e. " But " I do not much mind ſuch writers, whoſe works " (I muſt ſay it, though ſome men will be angry at it) " are a diſgrace to true hiſtory." In another place, after lamenting the loſs of ſome books of Tacitus, he cries out to him, Adeo bonis illis patribus cura otiumque fuit deſcribere Oroſios & Vopiſcos & hujuſmodi quiſquilias præ tuo auro (15), i. e. " Thus theſe good Fa-" thers choſe to employ their pains and leiſure in " tranſcribing ſuch writers as Oroſius, Vopiſcus, and " ſuch other traſh, rather than your gold." I do not like this flight of Lipſius, ſo well as I do the moderate cenſure of Caſaubon and Voſſius. The latter tells us only, that Oroſius was unacquainted with the Greek tongue, that he blunders often againſt chronology, and that he gives too much credit to common reports. Eſt Oroſius ſcriptor planè utilis; ſed qui ſcriptores Græcos non legerit: imo Græcarum literarum expers fuerit. In temporibus etiam crebrò fallitur. Ut vel illa oſtendunt, quæ in eo caſtigavit Scaliger in Animadverſionibus Euſebianis. Sæpius etiam vulgares ſectatur opiniones, quam hiſtoricum (16). Perquirat, cujus eſt omnia ad veritatis trutinam expendere (17).

(13) Caſaubon. Exercitat. 1. in Baronium, num. 12. p. m. 85.

(14) Lipſ. in Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. p. m. 193.

(15) Idem, in lib. 5. Annal. Tacit. p. 232.

(16) There is here an enormous error of the preſs. Voſſius wrote, no doubt, quam Hiſtorici officium requirat, or ſomething like it. A little lower there is another error of the ſame kind. Haut inutilis Oroſius. Sed Tranquillus ad Tacitum?

[F] . . . There are ſeveral editions of it.] Paul Oroſius's hiſtory was printed at Paris in the year 1506 for Petit; Monſieur Du Pin aſſerts it (18). Geſner (19) does not mention that edition; the moſt antient he ſpeaks of is that of Paris, 1524, apud Joan. Parvum aut Petrum Vidovæum in folio. I add, that they printed a more correct edition of it at Cologne, in the year 1536, apud Cervicornum, in 8vo, and afterwards another in the ſame city, in the year 1542, apud Jaſparem Genepæum, in 8vo. I have ſeen this laſt edition: John Cæſarius wrote the dedication of it; and corrected ſome paſſages in the Text. Francis Fabricius, of Duren, who publiſhed that book at Cologne in the year 1561, apud Maternum Cholinum, in 8vo, mentions two former editions, which were full of errors: one of theſe two editions muſt be that of the year 1526 (20); for Fabricius ſpeaks thus (21): Hoc dico, dolendum fuiſſe, tanti viri tam fructuoſam Hiſtoriam adeo mendoſe hactenus in manibus verſari. Contulerat eam cum aliquot manuſcriptis exemplaribus ante annos 25 Gerardus Bolſuinge: laboravit deinde in eadem emendanda doctiſſ. vir Johannes Cæſarius: ſed profecto neceſſe eſt, ut vel eorum exemplaria non fuerint diligenter ſatis deſcripta, vel ipſi parum accurate opus perſpexerint. Tot menda relicta ab illis deprehendi, poſtquam eorum libros cum tribus manuſcriptis conferre cœpi; i. e. " It was a pity, that the uſeful hiſtory of ſo " great a man continued ſo long full of errors. Ge-" rard Bolſwing compared it 25 years ago with ſome " Manuſcripts; afterwards, the learned John Cæſa-" rius laboured to correct it: but, either their work " was not correctly printed from their manuſcripts, " or they did not examine it accurately; conſidering " the many errors I found they left in it, when I " came to compare their editions with three manu-" ſcripts." The edition Fabricius gave, was reprinted at Cologne, in the year 1572, in 8vo, by the ſame printer, who added to it the Apology de Arbitrii libertate (22). Father Labbe (23) mentions this laſt edition, as though it had been publiſhed in the year 1574. I have a copy which bears that date. Monſieur Du Pin (24) places it under the year 1582. Father Labbe (25) mentions an edition of Paris 1526, and another of Mentz 1615, cum notis Latii & Schotte (26), quam nondum vidi, (which I have not yet ſeen) adds he. I am apt to think that there are ſome errors in the numbers, whence it comes to paſs, that inſtead of one edition, they mention two or

(17) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 217.

(18) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheq. Tom. 3. p. 156.

(19) In Biblioth. folio 539 verſo.

(20) It is that indeed, for I have ſeen it. It is printed at Cologne, apud Eucherium Cervicornum, in folio.

(21) Franciſcus Fabricius Marcoduranus, in Epiſtola nuncupatoria Oſorii.

(22) See Voſſius de Hiſt. Latin. p. 218.

(23) De Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 2. p. 176.

(24) Nouv. Bibl. Tom. 3. p. 156.

(25) De Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 2. p. 175.

(26) He ought to have ſaid Ludovici Lautii & Andreæ Schotti.

very well obſerved [G].

or three to us. For inſtance, Monſieur du Pin's edition of 1506, and that of Father Labbe, of 1526, ſeem to me to differ only through an error of the preſs. I leave the judgment of it to thoſe, who can meet with all ſorts of editions, and compare them together.

Mr. Van Dale, a Phyſician of Haerlem, and famous for his treatiſe de Oraculis, has been ſo kind as to let me know, there is an edition of Oroſius printed at Venice opera & expenſis Bernardini Veneti de Vitalibus anno ab incarnatione Domini MD, die 12 menſis Octobris regnante Domino Auguſtino Barbadico.

[G] De miſeria humana . . . . was a very proper title, which well becomes hiſtory in general, as a judicious author has very well obſerved.] That author is James Bongars: ſee the preface he put to the edition he publiſhed of ſeveral hiſtorians of the holy wars. He warns his Readers, that none but impious and wicked men can urge the ſuperſtitions, wickedneſſes, and profanations, which are to be met with in theſe writers, as ſo many arguments againſt virtue. For, adds he, the hiſtorians do not relate what men ſhould do, but what they actually have done. Annalium conſcriptores, ſays one of them (27), non qualia optant ipſi, ſed qualia miniſtrant tempora, mandare ſolent literis ex officio. Hiſtory is a repreſentation of human life. Now ſuch being the condition of human life, that the number of the wicked and of the impious, as well as of the ſilly, is infinite, hiſtory can be nothing elſe but a deſcription of man's miſery. Eſt humanæ vitæ ſpeculum, hiſtoria: humanæ verò vitæ ea ratio, ut non ſtultorum tantum, ſed improborum etiam atque impiorum infinitus ſit numerus. Itaque rectè omninò ſuam Paulus Oroſius de miſeria hominum inſcripſit *. Etenim quid aliud hiſtoria? cujus in ipſo limine, primi parentis ſtultum cupidinem, impium animum horreas: mox madefactam ſanguine fraterno magnam Matrem: inde in omne ſcelus præcipitatum genus humanum. . . . Itaque, ex uſu & multitudine qui patrocinium vitiis quærit, is omnium ætatum, omniumque gentium hiſtoriographos, is hodie hominum univerſitatem, à ſe habeat. Idem verò ſciat: cum de Veritate: cum de Virtute quæritur, illud diſceſſionum locum non habere: Hæc pars major eſſe videtur; ideo enim pejor, qui major (28); i. e. " . . . With very much " reaſon therefore did Paul Oroſius give his hiſtory this " title, Of the Miſery of Men †: for what elſe is hiſto- " ry? the very beginning of which, ſhews us the " fooliſh deſires and wicked heart of our firſt parents: " next we ſee the mother-earth wet with the " blood of a brother ſlain by his brother; then the " whole race of men abandoned to all manner of " crimes. . . . He therefore who would juſtify his vi- " ces by the common practice of the multitude, may " have the hiſtorians of all ages and nations, and " now-a-days the whole world on his ſide. But let " him know, that when the queſtion is about truth, " and about virtue, it is not to be determined " by a majority. The majority ſeems to be on that " ſide: for that very reaſon it is the worſt, becauſe " the majority is on that ſide." Take notice of what Bongars obſerves: in the very entrance of hiſtory, we meet with the folly and wickedneſs of the firſt man: this is the very firſt ſtep the Reader makes; next he walks on an earth tainted with the blood which a brother makes to flow with life itſelf from the body of his brother. How like is the foundation of the univerſe to the building of Rome (29)! I have given in another place (30) Malherbe's reflection on Cain's action.

(27) William of Tyre.

* Ita in antiquiſſimo libro inſcriptam Oroſii hiſtoriam vidimus.

(28) Bongarſius, Præfatione ad Geſta Dei per Francos, in fine.

† Thus it is intitled in a very ancient Manuſcript.

(29) Fraterno primi maduerunt ſanguine muri. Lucanum Pharſ. lib. 1. ver. 95. i. e. " Were not " our walls firſt " built in bro- " ther's blood?" Rowe.

(30) In the remark [E] of the article CAIN.

☞ OSBORN (FRANCIS), an eminent Engliſh writer in the 17th Century, was youngeſt ſon of Sir John Oſborn of Chickſand near Shefford in Bedfordſhire, and brother of Sir Peter Oſborn; and was born about the year 1590. He was educated in a private manner, without ever having the advantage of being brought up in an Univerſity [A]; and at ripe years frequented the court, and was retained in the ſervice of the Pembroke family, and was at length maſter of the horſe to William Earl of Pembroke. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars he adhered to the Parliament party, and had ſeveral publick employments then and under Cromwell conferred upon him. In the latter part of his life he lived at Oxford, in order to print ſeveral books, which he had written [B], and to have an eye upon his ſon, whom he procured by the favour of the Parliament-Viſitors to be appointed Fellow of All-Souls College in 1648. His Advice to a Son, ſoon after the publication of it, being publickly complained of to Dr. John Conant, Vice-

[A] He was educated in a private manner, without ever having the advantage of being brought up in an univerſity.] In the firſt part of his Advice to a Son (1), he writes thus: " Tho' I can never pay enough to " your grandfather's memory, for his tender care of " my education; yet I muſt obſerve in it this miſ- " take, that by keeping me at home, where I was " one of my young maſters, I loſt the advantage of my " moſt docile time. For not to undergo the ſame " diſcipline, I muſt needs come ſhort of their expe- " rience, that are bred in free-ſchools, who by plot- " ting to rob an orchard, &c. run thro' all the ſub- " tilties required in taking of a town; being made " by uſe familiar to ſecrecy and compliance with op- " portunity, qualities never after to be attained at " cheaper rates than the hazard of all. Whereas " theſe ſee the danger of truſting others, and the " rocks they fall upon by a too obſtinate adhering to " their own imprudent reſolutions; and all this un- " der no higher a penalty than a whipping. And " 'tis poſſible this indulgence of my father might be " the cauſe I afforded him ſo poor a return for all " his coſt."

(1) Sect. 1. No. 1.

[B] Several books, which he had written.] They are as follow: 1. A ſeaſonable expoſtulation with the Netherlands, declaring their ingratitude to, and the neceſſity of their agreement with, the Commonwealth of England, Oxford 1652, in two ſheets and an half in 4to. 2. Perſuaſive to mutual compliance under the preſent Government, Oxford, 1652, in two ſheets in 4to. 3. Plea for a Free State, compared with a Monarchy; printed with the preceding, in four ſheets in 4to. 4. The private Chriſtian's non ultra: Or, a Plea for the Layman's interpreting the Scriptures, Oxford 1656, in three ſheets and an half in 4to. There is no name to this; but it is ſuppoſed to be written by our Author. 5. Advice to a Son, in two parts. The firſt part was printed at Oxford 1656, in 8vo, and within two years after, were five more impreſſions of it. The ſecond part was printed at Oxford, in 1658. 6. Political Reflections upon the Government of the Turks. 7. A Diſcourſe upon Nicholas Machiavel: Or, an impartial Examination of the juſtneſs of the Cenſure commonly laid upon him. 8. Obſervations upon the King of Sweden's Deſcent into Germany. 9. A Diſcourſe upon Piſo and Vindex, who both conſpired the death of Nero, though with a contrary ſucceſs. 10. A Diſcourſe upon the Greatneſs and Corruption of the Court of Rome. 11. A Diſcourſe upon the Election of Pope Leo XI. 12. Political Occaſions of the Defection from the Church of Rome. 13. A Diſcourſe in Vindication of Martin Luther. Theſe eight laſt pieces were printed together ſeveral times at Oxford in 8vo. 14. Traditional Memorials of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, London 1658, in 8vo. 15. Traditional Memoirs on the Reign of King James, London 1658, in 8vo. 16. A Miſcellany of ſundry Eſſays, Paradoxes, and problematical Diſcourſes, Letters and Characters, London 1659, in 8vo. 17. Deductions from the Hiſtory of the Earl of Eſſex, who was executed for Treaſon under the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, London 1659, in 8vo. There is a Dialogue of Polygamy tranſlated from Italian into Engliſh by a Perſon

Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, as of irreligious tendency [C]; there was a propoſal made to have it publickly burnt; but that taking no effect, it was ordered July 27, 1658, that no bookſellers nor any other perſons ſhould ſell it. He died February 11, 1659, aged about 70, at Nether-worton near Dodington in Oxfordſhire, in the houſe of William Draper, Eſq; whoſe ſiſter he had married, and was interred in the church there, where a monument was erected to his memory (a). Mr. Edmund Sawyer in his Preface to Sir Ralph Winwood's Memorials of Affairs of State (b), quoting a paſſage out of Mr. Oſborne concerning the Earl of Saliſbury, Lord Treaſurer in the reign of King James I. ſtiles him an Author of more Malice than Learning.

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 308, 309. 2d edit.

(b) Edit. Lond. 1725, in folio, three Volumes.

ſon of Quality, and dedicated to the Author of that well known Treatiſe, called, Advice to a Son. Mr. Wood tells us (2), that Dr. Barlow ſaid, "That it "was ſuſpected, that Francis Oſborn, Author of "Advice to a Son, an old atheiſtical Courtier then "(1657) living in Oxford, did tranſlate the ſaid book "into Engliſh, and dedicate it to himſelf." This tranſlation was publiſhed at Oxford, 1657, in 8vo. After our Author's death, there was printed a book, intitled, A Modeſt Plea for an equal Commonwealth againſt Monarchy, &c. with other things added to it, as An Apology for younger Brothers, and A Lift at Tithes, &c. all which were printed twice in 1659, in 4to and 8vo. "Theſe three Treatiſes, ſays Mr. Wood "(3), tho' they were publiſhed by another perſon as "his, yet ſome ſcholars, more envious than prudent, "did not ſtick to ſay, that the Publiſher found them "among the papers of Fr. Oſborn (with whom he had "intimate acquaintance) after his death, and diſ-"guiſing the language, or making ſome alterations "in it, publiſhed them as his own. However, all "that knew him well, and were intimate with him "(as the Writer of theſe matters was) knew him to "be able to write ſuch a book as that was."

(2) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 309.

(3) Ibid.

[C] His Advice to a Son, ſoon after the publication of it, being complained of . . . . as of irreligious tendency.] Mr. Wood tells us (4), that it was then noted among the godly Miniſters that this piece did inſtil principles of atheiſm into Students at Oxford. But this imputation of Atheiſm, ſeems to be extremely groundleſs, and is abſolutely contradicted by the concluſion of the Second Part of the Advice to a Son, in which our author explodes Atheiſm, writing as follows: "I hold in charity no leſs than commerce "with all ſorts of people, that do acknowledge a "divine and univerſal providence; but abominate "thoſe, that have the impudence no leſs than "the indiſcretion to deny it openly in their words "or tacitly in their actions, as ſuch cannot but be "thought to do, that deſtroy others under a pretence "of ſanctity, merely to enrich themſelves; who "deny God no leſs in his juſtice than the other in "his power, ſince without a creator, man muſt be "the product of a contingency, together with all "things extant, if not the maker of himſelf; or, "which is as prodigious an abſurdity, nothing out "of its own ſtrength muſt have produced all things. "Nor could ſo many deſcend into this low and "damnable error, were they not led by that com-"mon calculation incident to the creature, through "which each in its reſpective gradation is rendered "out of ignorance unable, or out of pride unwil-"ling to find a ſublimer excellency than his own; "the cauſe, not only that the virtues, but the Gods "themſelves were by the Heathens repreſented in "human ſhapes, and their inclinations confined to "the ſame ſins and paſſions Mortals are found "ſubject to: it exceeding the largeſt extent in na-"ture to comprehend a higher wiſdom than his "own, or to aſſign it to a more noble aſpect, or fur-"niſh it with richer endowments, than her ſenſes "and experience hath adorned fancy withal; the "Devil being painted as white among the Negroes, "as he is black here. Wherefore knowledge being "at a non-plus (a thing ſhe doth naturally abhor) "many, becauſe they cannot decipher a reaſon, "why providence in this world appears ſo oft in "the favour (to our ſeeming) of wicked and unjuſt "deſigns, and ſo far diſcourages the good, as to "leave them in the hands of their oppreſſors; they, "like inconſiderate ſeamen, cut the cable of "hope, and forſaking the anchor of providence, "reſign the conduct of all things to fortune, who "is yet ſo conſtant in her viciſſitudes (familiar to "gameſters) that in a ſhort time ſhe doth not only "take away, but returns to every man his money "again. And if the world hath, for ought we "know to the contrary, been till this age igno-"rant in the circulation of the blood, though the "principal engine of life, and ſuch a neceſſary one, "as every creature moves not without; why ſhould "we rob ourſelves of the comfort, and God of the "honour of managing whatſoever happens, though "yet ignorant of the manner and reaſon of his do-"ing it, which hereafter we ſhall ſee revealed; the "age of man being too ſhort to diſcover every ſpoke "in this wheel, that may within a ſpan or two be "twiſting the deſtruction of thoſe that are now at "the top? Nor can any man gueſs how another "fares by an outward aſpect taken from his move-"able; but muſt ſleep with him, and enter into "his boſom, which God doth, and can no doubt "by ſlacking of grief in one, and winding up "tears and jealouſies in another, make the world "even; it being the ſpring and intrinſic part of the "watch, that the workman looks after, and not the "caſe, though it may poſſibly be gold, or ſome "richer materials, which the rabble do uſually caſt "their eyes upon, as children do on the Lord "Mayor's Pageants, admiring the ſplendor of thoſe, "that ride in them, who conſidered in their own "nature are but mean men's iſſue, and thus adorned "at the city coſt, yet their external varniſh doth ſo "obſtruct the organs of ſenſe, as they do not per-"ceive the pooreſt of the people, that bear them "up, no more than how long they may be able or "found willing to do it." And if men cannot, by a ſerious reflection upon their own affairs, diſtinguiſh the operations of providence from thoſe of contingency; yet ſince it is the moſt univerſal opinion, and for ought ever I could hear objected to the contrary, the leaſt obſtructed from reaſon or conſent, that every creature holds its production no leſs than preſervation at the will of an Omnipotency, by us ſtiled God, though the ways how he operates be beyond our fathom and paſt finding out; why ſhould not credulity reſt at the brink of this abyſs (by all acknowledged the leaſt dangerous) rather than hazard all hope of future beatitude in the uncomfortable gulf of a wretchleſs atheiſm; there remaining as little viſible loſs to ſuch as award all honour to our Maker, as gain for thoſe that deny him quite? Nor are we bereaved totally of the ſhadow of Omniſcience, ſince from a far lower ſituation than Heaven we are able at one glance to overlook a whole city, and by a ſingle trumpet to alarum an army. Yet our ſenſes are capable to receive no ſmall augmentation from the aſſiſtance of art; an infallible argument, that the perfection of theſe qualities doth not determine in the perſon of any creature, but ſomething paramount to all that hath yet riſen within the compaſs of our experience, it being impoſſible but a ſuperlative perfection ſhould reſt ſomewhere. Nor can we be competent judges of the motions of God, that have nothing to meaſure by but ſenſe, much too weak to diſcern the motion of a ſhadow, or the growth of a plant, till time hath rendered them apparent; wherefore far unable to comprehend the lines of providence, imperceptible to every intelligence but his, who hath the ſole diſpoſure of all things; it not being probable man ſhould comprehend the out-goings of God, whilſt he is not able to give any reaſon for his own. T.

(4) Col. 308.

OSMAN, Emperor of the Turks, was not ſuffered to ſucceed his father Achmet, becauſe he was under age: but as his uncle Muſtapha, who was raiſed to the throne after Sultan

Sultan Achmet's death, in November 1617 (a), ſoon ſhewed himſelf unworthy of that high rank, he was ſoon put again into his cell, and Oſman was choſen in his ſtead. He would make his reign famous by a conſiderable expedition againſt Poland, but he met with a very unfortunate ſucceſs. This gave him an averſion for the Janizaries, and it is thought that under colour of a pilgrimage, he endeavoured to find an opportunity to diſband that Militia. They prevented him: for they roſe againſt him with ſo much fury in the year 1622, that they dethroned him [A], Non ſine Theſeo, I mean that religion was made one of the ſecret ſprings of his downfal (b). Muſtapha, who was reſtored, put him to death, and governed with ſo much weakneſs, that he was a ſecond time depoſed (c). This

(a) See the Mercure Francois, Tom. 5. p. m. 185, for the year 1617, and p. 211, for the year 1618.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) Obſerve, that at his firſt depoſition, they forced him to declare, that he willingly reſigned the crown. Oſman ſays, in the letter which he wrote to Lewis XIII, that Muſtapha had, of his own accord, diveſted himſelf of his dignity, and deſpiſed it. That letter is inſerted in the Mercure Francois, under the year 1618, p. 208, 209.

[A] The Janizaries . . . . roſe againſt him with ſo much fury, that they dethroned him.] The particular account we meet with of this affair in the Cavalier Nani, is not too prolix to be inſerted here. "The "Turks know of no moderation, no medium in their "paſſions; they either adore their Princes like Gods, "or put them to death like Tyrants. The Emperor "Oſman, who reigned over ſuch an immenſe tract "of land, was in the prime of his age: he did not "meet in Poland with the happy ſucceſs he expected, "nor with the glory his army was made to hope "for: as he hated the Janizaries exceedingly, he "aſcribed his ill ſucceſs to them, and charged "them with being as timorous in the camp, as "they were haughty at Conſtantinople. After he "had concluded a treaty of peace upon diſadvanta-"geous terms, he declared, that from a principle of "devotion, he would take a journey to Mecca: "ſome looked upon it as a frivolous diſcourſe, and "as mere pretence to continue longer in idleneſs in "the Seraglio: others imagined that he deſigned "thereby to conceal the deſign he had to re-"move the Janizaries far from Conſtantinople, to "lead them into Aſia, and to deliver them up in-"to the hands of the Spahis, who are their compe-"titors and their enemies, to diſband them, and to "form a new militia. Men began already to em-"bark the luggage on board the gallies; already "they carried thither tents and pavilions, with large "treaſures to ſerve during that voyage, and to adorn "with rich preſents their Prophet's tomb; when "the Janizaries began to repreſent to one another "in their conferences the inconveniencies of ſuch a "voyage, and the conveniencies which they would "leave behind. What exaſperated them moſt was, "that they imagined, that being thus at a great diſ-"tance of the capital city, they ſhould be ſo much "the more expoſed to the hatred and cruelty of Oſ-"man. In their quarters they came in a moment "from complaints to an open ſedition. Few began, "but all followed. They aſſembled to the number "of thirty-thouſand, in the ſquare called the Hippo-"dromus. Thence ſome went to the houſe of the "Coza, (thus the Sultan's Tutor is called) whom "they imagined to be the inſtigator of that voyage: "and as they did not meet him at home, they vented "their anger on his houſe, which they plundered. "Others making great ſhouts, went to the Seraglio, "and demanded the heads of the Viſir, of the Chiſ-"lar Aga, and of the Coza. They who were in "the Seraglio, were not only deſtitute of forces, "but alſo of council, and advice; and they, who "by their authority might have headed the rebels, "were the objects of their fury, and the ſame whom "they demanded to tear them in pieces. The Em-"peror, to appeaſe them, ſent them word that he "deſiſted from his intended journey: but this would "not have been ſufficient to diſperſe the rebel Jani-"zaries, who are not uſed to be appeaſed even when "thoſe things are granted them, which they make "the pretence of their mutiny; had it not been for "a heavy rain which fell on a ſudden, and which "that ſuperſtitious nation took for an ill omen. "That ſedition would perhaps have vaniſhed away "towards night, had not ſome interpreters of the "law, who are extremely revered by the ignorant "multitude, ſtirred up again the Janizaries, and de-"clared that Oſman had forfeited his Crown, becauſe "he had tranſgreſſed the Alcoran by ſacrilegious "actions. The Janizaries hearing this loſt all man-"ner of reſpect for their Prince, threw ſtones at "their Aga, who called to mind their oath of alle-"giance; they refuſed three hundred thouſand Ze-"chins, which Cuſſain Baſſa offered them, if they "would be quiet. Though the Seraglio had been "very much fortified in the night time, yet they "maſtered it. They killed firſt ſome Eunuchs with "their leader Chiſlar Aga; they ſearched after-"wards for Muſtapha, who formerly had been rather "like the ſhadow of a Prince, than the true head of "the Empire; they cut off the heads of all thoſe "who did not tell them where he was, without "minding whether they knew it, or not. Laſtly, "having conjectured by ſome hints, that he might "be in a ſubterraneous cave, they went to look for "him there; they found him half dead, for it was "two days ſince he had received any nouriſhment; "when they acquainted him, that they came to make "him Emperor, he aſked that firſt of all they would "give him a few drops of water: but he was hardly "ſeated on the throne, but he ſhewed that his thirſt "was not entirely quenched, and that it could not "be quenched but with his Nephew's blood. Oſman "hid himſelf: but being found out towards even-"ing, he was guarded by the Baſtingi Baſſa, and "brought to the houſe of the Aga of the Janizaries. "Pity began to take the place of anger in the hearts "of ſome, they beheld that young Prince, who "from the higheſt dignity was fallen to the loweſt "degree of misfortune. Oſman, deſigning to win "them entirely, offered fifty Zechins to every "Janizary. Several of them conſented to that pro-"poſal, and their chiefs were already conſulting "together by what means they could ſave him, and "raiſe him again to the throne, when a raging "multitude ſnatched him out of their hands, and "preſented him to Muſtapha. Oſman, with tears "in his eyes, begged hard for his life, repreſenting "to Muſtapha with what kindneſs he had treated "him, having ſpared his life, and preſerved him "for the throne, againſt the cuſtom of the Ottomans. "But as it is uſual with the Barbarians to make fate "the author of all their crimes, Muſtapha would "not be perſuaded: he ſaid he knew very well that "Oſman had ſeveral times given orders to put him "to death; but that God had never ſuffered his "orders to be obeyed. Thus Oſman was delivered "up to the Janizaries, and carried to the ſeven "towers amidſt the execrations of the people, who "having felt under his reign the dreadful effects "of the famine, the plague, and the war, ab-"horred him as the cauſe of all thoſe evils. No "ſooner was he arrived at that priſon, but they cut "off his head (1)." We meet in the Mercure Francois (2) with an account of Oſman's death, which is much fuller than this, and which does not agree in every reſpect with the Cavalier Nani's. I ſhall extract but two particulars from it: the one is, that the interpreters of the law and the militia let Oſman know, that he could not go to Mecca without tranſgreſſing the law of Mahomet (3). They had prevailed upon the Mufti to give them that declaration in writing: Oſman had no regard for it, and tore the paper in pieces. The other, that after Muſtapha's election, ſome perſons cried through the city, Long live Muſtapha, Sultan of the Turks, and read from a ſheet of paper the cauſes of Sultan Oſman's deprivation, ſaying it was done becauſe he was an infidel, and becauſe he deſigned to deliver up the Empire of the Turks into the hands of thoſe dogs the Chriſtians; al

(1) Nani, Hiſt. de Venice, Liv. 4. p. 126, of the 2d vol. of the Dutch edition, according to Tallemant's French tranſlation.

(2) Tom. 8. p. 357, &c. under the year 1622.

(3) Mercure Francois, Tom. 8. p. 360.

This ſecond depoſition muſt be placed to the Alcoran's account [B], for it was brought about by virtue of a decree of the Pope of the Turks: for thus we may juſtly ſtile their Mufti.

all this they ſaid with a deſign to render him more odious to the people (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 366.

[B] To the Alcoran's account.] Muſtapha was a ſilly Prince. The Prime Viſier and the other favourites gave a very beautiful name to that weakneſs: they called it holineſs, devotion, reſignation to the will of God. They obliged Muſtapha to lift up his eyes towards Heaven when he appeared in publick, and they ſuppoſed miracles. But the Mufti was not to be impoſed upon. He had it publiſhed abroad that the Alcoran forbad to obey a madman, and that under the reign of ſuch a Prince, all the prayers proved unſucceſsful, and all marriages were null and void. They were therefore obliged to dethrone Muſtapha; and Amurath, Oſman's brother, was put in his ſtead. Il qual (Muſtafa) era huomo ſtolido, e la ſtolidezza di lui ſi ſpacciava per ſantità, e raſſegnatione in Dio da Daret Primo Viſir, e da gli altri corteggiani, facendolo ſemper guardar in cielo, quando uſciva in publico, e fingendo miracoli: fu depoſto, havendo il Mufti promulgato, che l'Alcorano vietava l'obbedienza ad un Re inſenſato, durante il quale erano inefficaci l'orationi, e invalidi i matrimonii (5). There is no nation upon Earth that ſpeaks more advantageouſly of their Monarchs, and of the obedience which is due to them, than the Turks: they are unacquainted with all the great controverſies of the Politicians in the Weſt concerning the origin of ſovereign power; they knew nothing of the original contract between the King and the people: they do not examine whether the right of commanding proceeds from the people or not, nor how far it is communicated. According to them the beſt form of government is the abſolute and deſpotick power of the Prince; to die in obedience to the Sultan is a ſtep to arrive at the higheſt dignities in Heaven (6). Who would not believe then, that the Grand Seignior's throne is eſtabliſhed on the moſt ſtrong and laſting foundations? And yet if we conſult hiſtory, we ſhall find, that there is no Monarch in the world, whoſe authority is more weak and uncertain than that of the Ottoman Emperors. Their ſubjects do not only riſe againſt them, they not only dethrone and ſtrangle them before the ſedition be ſuppreſſed; but they alſo know perfectly well how to depoſe them by judicial proceedings: they conſult peaceably and gravely about their fate; they gather the votes, and condemn them to a perpetual impriſonment. Thus they uſed Mahomet IV. in the year 1687, and we have ſeen that in the year 1622 they came to the ſame reſolution againſt Muſtapha. The Alcoran is conſulted on theſe occaſions, as the books of the Sibyls were formerly at Rome: and if one party can get the Chief Prieſt on their ſide, they may be ſure to ſucceed. If the Mufti declares that the law of God does not ſuffer them to acknowledge for their lawful Sovereign a Prince, who is ſickly, ſilly, unfortunate, or in Priſon (7), it is as much, or even more, than if the Pope had excommunicated a Chriſtian Prince.

(5) Giornale de Letterati, for January the 28th, 1675, p. 3. In the extract from the Memorie de Iſtoriche Monarchi Ottomani di Giovanni Sagredo Cavaliere, printed at Venice in the year 1673, in 4to.

(6) See Sir Paul Ricaut's Preſent State of the Ottoman Empire, book 1. chap. 1 and 2.

(7) Ne' libri di Mahometto ſi vieta l'obbedienza à Re fatti prigioni per obligarli à difenderſi. Giornale de Letterati, for January the 28th, 1675. p. 4.

OSORIO or OSORIUS (JEROM) . . . . . .

. . . . . .

His Treatiſes De Gloria, and De Nobilitate Civili et Chriſtiana are eſteemed [A].

[A] His treatiſes de Gloria, and de Nobilitate Civili & Chriſtiana, are eſteemed.] Each is divided into five books, and have borne ſeveral impreſſions In the Cologn edition of 1577, is a dedication of Bartholomew Bodegemius, to Matalius Metellus Sequanus, wherein mention is made of a Florence edition, and another of Germany. This dedication is inſerted in the Baſil edition, ex officina Pernea, 1584, in 8vo, but not in the Antwerp edition, apud Henricum Aertſſens, 1635, 12mo; but on the other hand, there is inſerted in the latter the life of Jerom Oſorio, written by his nephew (1).

(1) See the remark [G], which belongs to this article.

☞ Bayle knowing little or nothing of this author, here follows a very neceſſary Supplement.

OSORIO (JEROM) was born in Liſbon in 1506 [A]. From his childhood he diſcovered a ſingular propenſion for learning, and applied himſelf to it with prodigious ſucceſs. At thirteen years of age he was ſent to the univerſity of Salamanca, where he acquired the Latin and Greek tongues, and there applied himſelf ſome time to the ſtudy of the law. At nineteen he came to Paris to learn Ariſtotle's philoſophy, which only was taught in that age: after ſtaying ſome time in that city, he went to Bologna in Italy, where he devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſacred writings of the Hebrew tongue. At his return to Portugal, he taught, by order of King John, the Scriptures in Coimbra [B]. He afterwards was made Pariſh-Prieſt of Tavara [C], then Deacon [D], and at laſt Biſhop of Sylves [E]. He did all that lay in his power to diſſuade King Sebaſtian from going into Africa [F]. He went to Rome, where Pope Gregory XIII. gave him many teſtimonies of his eſteem. But the King recalling him, in a year, he was obliged to return to Portugal, a little after which advice was brought of the fatal death of Don Sebaſtian, Auguſt 4, 1578, in the battle of Alcazer fought againſt the Moors. His principal care, after this ſaid event, was to employ his utmoſt credit with the people of his Dioceſe, to prevent their joining in the tumults which at that time divided the Kingdom. But the grief he himſelf was ſeized with on that occaſion, brought him inſenſibly to his grave. He died at Tavila, in his Dioceſe, Auguſt 1580 (a), aged 74 years. His piety and charity are greatly applauded: he entertaining, in his palace, ſeveral learned and virtuous men.

(a) 'Tis 1680 (an error in the preſs) in Tom. 11. p. 204. of Father Niceron's Hommes Illuſtres, Paris 1730. 12mo.

[A] In 1506.] He was ſon of John Oſorio de Fonſeca, and of Frances Gil de Govea, both of an illuſtrious family (1),

(1) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 11. p. 202. Paris 1730, 12mo.

]B] He taught the ſcriptures in Coimbra.] He there explained, with great applauſe, the prophet Iſaiah and St. Paul's epiſtle to the Romans (2).

(2) Ibid. p 203.

[C] Was made pariſh-prieſt of Tavara.] He was preſented to this benefice, as ſoon as he was ordained prieſt, by Don Lewis, Infanta of Portugal, but he did not long continue in it, as may be ſeen in the next remark (3).

(3) Idem, ibid.

[D] . . . then Arch-deacon.] Cardinal Henry, brother of King John, and Arch-biſhop of Evora, eſteeming his virtue and capacity, appointed him Arch-deacon of his church a little after (4).

(4) Idem, ibid.

[E] . . . Biſhop of Sylves.] He was nominated to it by Catherine of Auſtria, widow of King John III. ſhe being Regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Sebaſtian her grandſon (5).

(5) Idem, ibid.

[F] He did all that lay in his power to diſſuade King Sebaſtian men. At meals, ſome parts from St. Bernard were always read to him, and when the reader had done, he allowed any of the auditors to ſtart whatſoever difficulties might have occurred to him in what had been read. His works were printed in a body, by the direction of Jerom Oſorio, his Nephew, at Rome, Anno 1592, in four volumes in folio, the contents of which we ſhall give hereunder [G]. Here follows his character according to Dupin [H]. We muſt take ſome notice of Jerom Oſorio, Nephew to him whoſe article we have here given [I] (b). I.

(b) Ibid. p. 202 & ſeq.

Sebaſtian from going into Africa.] Oſorio foreſeeing the fatal conſequences with which his enterprize might be attended, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to divert him from it; but finding all his exhortations to no purpoſe, he was reſolved, if poſſible, not to be an eye-witneſs of the calamities he dreaded, and therefore went to Rome upon various pretences (6).

(6) Idem, p. 203, 204.

[G] The contents of his works.] The 1ſt volume contains; 1. De Nobilitate Civili, Libri II, & de Nobilitate Chriſtiana, Libri III. Olyſſipone 1542, 4to. Item, Florentiæ 1552, 4to, with the treatiſe de Gloria, with which this work has been frequently printed ſince. 2. De Gloria, Libri V, with the foregoing work, Florentiæ 1552, 4to. To this work, which is eſteemed, as alſo that de Nobilitate, is an excellent preface, addreſſed to John III. King of Portugal, containing very good inſtructions for Princes. Item Baſileæ, 1556 and 1571, 8vo, and at many other places. In the edition of Antwerp, anno 1635, 8vo, is Oſorio's life, written by his nephew. Some have falſely imagined, that the treatiſe de Gloria was that of Cicero, which Oſorio had found, and publiſhed as his own work. 3. De Regis inſtitutione & diſciplina, Libri VIII, Coloniæ 1574, and 1582, 8vo. Item, Pariſiis, 1583, folio. This Paris edition was made by the care of Barnabas Briſſon. 4. De Rebus Emmanuelis Regis invictiſſimi virtute & auſpicio geſtis, Libri XII. Olyſſipone 1571, folio. Item, Cum præfatione & Commentario Joannis Matalii Metelli de reperta India. Coloniæ 1574, 1580, 1597, 8vo. Item, tranſlated into French with ſome other hiſtories of Portugal, printed in 1581, folio, and Paris 1587, 8vo. The hiſtory Oſorio has given us, is rendered valuable, on account of the great care he took to enquire into the truth of the particulars related by him, and his relating them without diſguiſe. His diction is conciſe and clear. He enquires into the counſels and foundations of the ſeveral things debated on; gives his judgment on the actions of great Men and Kings, and cenſures their faults with freedom, without ſparing thoſe of the Princes his own countrymen. 5. Defenſio ſui nominis. Oſorio publiſhed this work to defend himſelf againſt his enemies, who imputed it to him for a crime, his ſeeming to favour the King of Spain, and aſſert his right to the Crown of Portugal, after King Sebaſtian's death. 6. Epiſtolæ quædam. Hanoviæ, in 12mo.

The 2d Volume includes,

7. Admonitio in Epiſtolam ad Elizabetham Reginam Angliæ. This letter, which Oſorio wrote to Queen Elizabeth, to exhort her to return to the Romiſh Communion, by repreſenting to her the errors * of the Church of England, has been tranſlated into French and Engliſh. W. Haddon wrote an anſwer to this the ſame year, and Oſorio made the following reply. 9. In Gualterum Haddonum Elizabethæ reginæ Magiſtrum Libellorum ſupplicum de vera religione, Libri III. Oliſſipone, 1567, 4to, and in other cities. 10. De Juſtitia Cœleſti, Libri X. ad Reginaldum Polum Cardinalem. Coloniæ 1574, and 1581, 8vo. 11. De vera ſapientia, Libri V. ad Gregorium XIII. P. M. Olyſſipone 1578, and in other places. 12. In Epiſtolam B. Pauli ad Romanos, Libri IV.

* The Reader will obſerve that 'tis a Papiſt ſpeaks.

In the 3d Volume are the following.

13. Paraphraſis in Job, Libri III. 14. Paraphraſis in Pſalmos. 15. Commentaria in Parabolas Solomonis. 16. Paraphraſis in Solomonis ſapientiam.

The 4th Volume contains,

17. Paraphraſis in Iſaïam, Libri V. Bononiæ 1577, 4to, and elſewhere. 18. Commentarius in Oſeam Prophetam. 19. Commentarius in Zachariam. 20. In laudem Divæ Catharinæ oratio. 21. In Evangelium Joannis Orationes XXI (7). 'Tis to be obſerved, that Andrew Schottus, in his Bibliotheque of Spain, erroneouſly aſcribes the pieces contained in this fourth volume, and the two laſt pieces in the third, to Jerom Oſorio, our Author's nephew (8).

(7) Niceron's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 11. p. 206 & ſeq.

(8) Ibid. p. 210.

[H] Here follows his character, according to Dupin.] " His diction was eaſy and eloquent, for which reaſon he has been called the Cicero of Portugal, he " being one of the greateſt imitators of Cicero, " with regard to the ſtyle, his choice of ſubjects, and " his manner of treating them. His compoſitions " are not intermixed with citations, but conſiſt of " connected argumentations. He does not endeavour, " in his Commentaries and Paraphraſes, to explain " the terms of the text, but to extend the ſenſe of " it, and ſhew its order and ſeries. Young Divines, " by ſtudying Oſorio's works, may improve their " diction, and learn to write eloquently, whether as " Chriſtian Philoſophers, Orators, or Divines (9)."

(9) Ibid. p. 205. cited from Dupin.

[I] We muſt take ſome notice of Jerom Oſorio.] He was our Author's nephew, and Canon of Evora. Having been educated by his uncle, he endeavoured to imitate his ſtyle; but he is not ſo fine a writer, tho' he ſeems to have more erudition. He wrote the following works. 1. The Life of Jerom Oſorio, his uncle, prefixed to the edition publiſhed by him of his works. 2. Notationes in Hieronymi Oſorii Paraphraſim Pſalmorum. Theſe remarks, printed in the third volume of his uncle's works, after his paraphraſe, are, according to Dupin, valuable, and filled with critical obſervations on the Hebrew language. 3. Paraphraſis & Commentaria in Eccleſiaſten nunc primùm edita; & Paraphraſis in Canticum Canticorum & in ipſam recens auctæ notationes. Lugdini 1611, 4to (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 211.

" OSSAT (ARNAULD OF) was fatherleſs, motherleſs, and in poor circumſtan- " ces, at nine years of age. Some years after he was put in the ſervice of a Nobleman " of Caſtelnau de Magnoac, in the Dioceſe of Auchi; he being alſo an orphan; and " he accompanied him in his ſtudies, but ſoon got the ſtart of him. After compleating " their ſtudies, this young Nobleman's Governor [A] was deſirous of ſending him to " Paris; and thought he could not do any thing more for his advantage, than to put him " under the care and direction of Mr. Arnauld d'Oſſat, his preceptor and maſter, as is " expreſſed in the account which the Governor in queſtion gave to his Nephew. Thus " he became his maſter's maſter. They arrived in Paris on Friday May 5, 1559. Af- " terwards two other children, Couſin-Germans to this young Nobleman, were ſent to " him

[A] This young Nobleman's Governor.] The name of this pupil of our d'Oſſat, was John de Marca, deſcended from the houſe of Marca, in Bearn, by John de Marca, ſon of Peter de Marca, and of Margaret d'Andoins. Jerom was Captain of fifty croſs-bow men, and Governor of Furnes in Flanders, as is evident from his contract of marriage with Dame Ameline de Riviere, Lady of Doublet and Plaiſſe, and of ſeveral other eſtates or lands in the neighbourhood of Caſtelnau de Magnoac. This contract was ſigned at Cominge the 12th of February, 1341, by which it is agreed, among other particulars, that the ſaid Jerom ſhall uſually reſide on the eſtate of the ſaid Lady. From this marriage ſprung a ſon, called Peter de Marca, who was contracted in marriage with Dame Catharine de Mun, daughter of Bernard de Mun and

" him for education [B]. They continued at Paris, under Mr. d'Oſſat, till the month " of May 1562 ; at which time our d'Oſſat ſending them into Gaſcony, wrote their " uncle a letter, in which he employed ſuch expreſſions as deſerve to be known [C]. " D'Oſſat applying himſelf to the law, was known and eſteemed by many perſons of " diſtinction ; and among others by Meſſire Paul de Foix, at that time Counſellor in " the Parliament of Paris. He procured himſelf, by his merit and friends, the employ- " ment in the Preſidial of Melun, with which he was again inveſted in 1588, as appears " by a Letter of Attorney ſent by him to Paris, to take poſſeſſion of a donation made " him by the King. In the King's warrant granted for that purpoſe, he is ſtiled Abbot " of our Lady of Varennes, an Abbey in the Dioceſe of Bourges. Hence it is manifeſt " that thoſe are miſtaken, who relate that he was Dean of Varennes in the Dioceſe of " Rhodez [D], at the time of his being promoted to the See of Rennes. The remain- " ing part of his life is well enough known (a). There are ſeveral original letters of " Mr. d'Oſſat. written at the cloſe of the year 1584, in Mr. Colbert's Library ; which " letters are ſtill in manuſcript. They are addreſſed to the King, the Queen, and other " perſons (b)."

(a) This article, and the remarks which relate to it, were communicated by the illuſtrious Mr. BALUZE, and are inſerted without the leaſt alteration.

(b) Ibid.

The beſt edition of this Cardinal's letters § (α), is that of Paris in 1698, 4to (d). Amelot de la Houſſaye has illuſtrated it with notes, and a very accurate life of our Author, drawn up with great judgment. We ought to think ourſelves obliged to him, for not following the bad counſel of thoſe, who adviſed him to modernize d'Oſſat's ſtyle [E]. It is a ſhame

(c) Compare this with the remark [D] of the article ESPAGNET.

(1) Mr. Baluze. Apply this note wherever it may be neceſſary in this article.

Paula de Sariac, the 7th of May, 1398. I don't know the ſequel of this genealogy : but I (1) copied all the abovementioned particulars from the original.

De Marca, which is the true name of this family, was changed into that of la Marque, by the authority of d'Oſſat, and on the following occaſion. In the ſuperſcription of the firſt letter which he wrote from Paris to the Governor of his pupil, who, by thoſe letters, appears to have been a very conſiderable man, he directed, To Mr. Thomas Marca ; but thinking this too much in the peaſant-ſtrain, he changed it, and afterwards called him Monſieur la Marca, and at laſt, Monſieur de la Marque : by which name the family goes now. But the late Madame de la Marque, Margaret d'Eſpenan, called one of her ſons, who was deſigned for the church, the Prior de Marca. I am poſſeſſed of a letter which that Lady wrote to her ſon the Prior, the 12th of December, 1659 ; wherein ſhe informs him, that the late Mr. de la Marque, her huſband, had frequently given her a very exact account of the genealogy of the houſe of Marca, in Bearn ; in what manner the family of Caſtelnau ſprung from them ; and that he had been told all theſe particulars by his father, who died at upwards of a hundred years of age. Mr. d'Oſſat being a Cardinal, ſent his picture, from Rome, to Marca, where it is ſtill preſerved.

[B] Afterwards two other children . . . were ſent to him for education.] D'Oſſat being at that time twenty years of age, writes as follows concerning him, in a letter to their uncle, dated the 27th of December, 1559. With regard to myſelf, I promiſe to inſtil good learning into them, and ſet them a good example, and to do all that lies in my power to ſerve them, to the laſt moment of my life, which I will loſe, rather than let them want the leaſt thing I think can be of any advantage to them.

[C] He employed ſuch expreſſions as deſerve to be known.] They are as follow. " To conclude, Sir, " as to your thanking me for the pains I have taken " in educating your nephews, I look upon this as the " effect of your wonted goodneſs ; the reflection of " which, makes me think all the pains and labour " I have beſtowed upon them, well employed ; aſ- " ſuring you, Sir, that my conſcience will never re- " proach me with being wanting in any thing which " might be of benefit to them." Here we have an inſtance of d'Oſſat's probity and good ſenſe, which were then ſeen in affairs of no great importance.

(2) Cardinal d'Oſſat's life, prefix'd to the edition of his letters, publiſhed by Amelot de la Houſſaye, anno 1698.

(3) Amelot de la Houſſaye's Life of Cardinal d'Oſſat, p. 5.

[D] Thoſe are miſtaken, who relate, that he was Dean of Varennes, in the dioceſe of Rhodez.] In this part of Baluze's memoir, ſomething wants to be rectified, as I find by a book (2) publiſhed ſince the firſt edition of this Dictionary. Amelot de la Houſſaye obſerves (3), that the firſt benefice Oſſat ever poſſeſt, was the Priory of St. Martyn du Vieux-Belleſme, which was given him by Cardinal de Joyeuſe, in January or February, anno 1588 ; and that as to the Abbey of our Lady of Varennes, he was never in poſſeſſion of it, tho', indeed, Henry III. had nominated him to it. The proofs on which Amelot de Houſſaye grounds his aſſertions, are, in my opinion, ſtrong. The laſt is grounded on an aſſertion we find in this Cardinal's funeral oration, viz. that having accepted with a good intention, a conſiderable benefice given him by Henry III. and ſome difference ariſing with regard to the poſſeſſion, he reſigned it immediately, firmly determined not to have the leaſt conteſt with any perſon. Probably this Abbey of Varennes is hinted at in the funeral oration in queſtion (4), and conſequently, adds Amelot, thoſe perſons are themſelves miſtaken, who affirm, that thoſe err, who ſay, that d'Oſſat was Dean of Varen in the Dioceſe of Rhodez, as he ſtiles himſelf in the petition which he preſented to the Pope, in the name of Henry IV. as his eſpecial proxy and deputy in the affair of his abſolution (5).

(4) Ibid. p. 6.

(5) Ibid. p. 5.

§ (α) However, the Editors have not reſtored a certain paſſage in a letter dated the 10th of February 1603, in which this Prelate ſaid to the King, that he did not think it proper, for the Monarch in queſtion, to procure his exaltation (to the purple) ; becauſe, as he would thereby become one of the Pope's agents, it might be doubted it would not, from that time, be in his power to ſerve his Majeſty ſo faithfully in Rome, as he had before done. This Author, who, in 1664, diſcovered and pointed out this caſtration *, does not think it probable that this was done undeſignedly ; and I am of opinion, that it might be owing to Cardinal de Richelieu. The caſtration in queſtion, relates to the year 1624. The public knows very well, what the Cardinal's views were at that time, and how great an authority he enjoy'd. With regard to the letter, as publiſhed by Amelot de la Houſſaye, from the caſtrated editions, 'tis barely but a complaint, and that too a very moderate one, addreſſed to the King, viz. that a penſion of 4000 crowns, granted the Cardinal out of the treaſury, was ill paid, eſpecially for two years laſt paſt ; and this complaint is levelled at Duke de Sully, Lord High Treaſurer, againſt whom the Editor has inſerted a note, importing that the Duke in queſtion had, from an unparallel'd barbarity, checked the progreſs of the King's favours, towards ſo faithful a ſervant as Cardinal d'Oſſat. But who can ſay, whether Duke de Sully was as firmly perſuaded of this Cardinal's fidelity, ſince his exaltation to the purple, as the Author of the note ? Perhaps he was not ; and that the Cardinal, to perſuade him of the contrary, inſinuated that, at leaſt with regard to himſelf, it would be doing him juſtice to ſuppoſe, that his being one of the Pope's Agents, had prevented his ſerving the King with as much fidelity as ever. REM. CRIT.]

* Traité des Legats à latere, p. 52, of the ſecond figure or number of Traité de l'origine des Cardinaux. Colen edit. 1665.

[E] We ought to think ourſelves obliged to Amelot de la Houſſaye, for not following the bad counſel of thoſe who adviſed him to modernize d'Oſſat's ſtyle.] He writes as follows in his advertiſement to the reader. " The diction has not been altered in any manner ; " and thoſe who publickly gave out the contrary, " are the very perſons who would have had it chang- " ed ; and, who, vexed becauſe their advice was not " followed, ſhame to the nation, that ſo many perſons ſhould be found in France who cannot bear with the diction of the 16th Century. But yet this depraved taſte is not ſo general, but that there are ſtill many readers who will not allow the diction of the writers of that age to be retouched. This is manifeſt from the apprehenſions which the Paris bookſellers had, of not finding their account in printing, in modern French, the Memoirs of Philip de Comines, as will be ſeen in the remark [E]. I even wiſh that Amelot de la Houſſaie had not made any alterations in the Orthography uſed in the original; it not being in any manner probable that our d'Oſſat had employed ſo many circumflex accents, and omitted the letter S in ſo many places (c); this fault, with regard to probability, not pleaſing a reader who loves accuracy. I muſt not omit Wicquefort's opinion of d'Oſſat's merit [F]. See

(d) Page 12 & ſeq. of the Dutch edition.

" followed, maliciouſly ſpread this report, in order " to depreciate this edition, in the minds of thoſe " whom they know to be admirers of Cardinal " d'Oſſat, as all Stateſmen are in particular. And I " oppoſed this ill advice the more ſtrenuouſly, as I " always imagined that this would be maiming and " disfiguring the nervous ſtyle of a perſon formed by " nature for negotiations, and whoſe diction is wholly " conſecrated to the uſe of the cabinet; to make " him ſpeak differently from what he wrote and " ſpoke. Not to mention that the publick would " not have paid as much regard to my diction, as to " that of this famous Cardinal: which aſſertion " may be corroborated by what Mr. Boileau obſerved " concerning a Member of the French Academy, " who had retouched ſome of Plutarch's lives, tranſ- " lated into French by Amyot: and may alſo be " confirmed, by the refuſal (to my knowledge) of " ſeveral of the moſt experienced bookſellers in Pa- " ris, twelve years ago, to print the Memoirs of " Philip de Comines, which a Lady of genius had " rendered into better French: ſo true it is that the " publick are firmly perſuaded, that ſome books " cannot be retouched without being ſpoilt; and " which reſemble thoſe natural, unaffected beauties, " who are never more charming than in their " diſhabille. But I have ſaid enough. Verbum non " amplius addam." I am of opinion that Philip de Comines, Montagne, and ſome other writers, whoſe chief beauties are inſeparable from their ſtyle, will be proofs againſt the attempts of reviſers. I alſo think that the tranſlation, into modern French, of the Heptameron of the Queen of Navarre, will be rejected by perſons of taſte (6): but I believe, at the ſame time, that the bookſellers will take greater liberty with many other books: theſe will publiſh editions of thoſe I hint at, reviſed and corrected, with regard to ſuch phraſes as may have grown obſolete; by which means they will encourage ſtill more the falſe delicacy and indolence of great numbers of people; for it is a ſhame that thoſe who ſet up for readers, ſhould not be deſirous of knowing what kind of language their anceſtors ſpeak. This abuſe increaſes and ſpreads daily; and multitudes do not care to read the compoſitions written under Lewis XIII. The bookſellers, in order to get cuſtomers, are obliged to have the diction of the works written in that age retouched or modernized. In this manner they ſerved, Anno 1699, the hiſtory of the laſt Duke of Montmorenci, written by the Sieur du Cros (7). This practice is of long ſtanding. I have ſeen an edition of Joſephus tranſlated into French by Genebrard, which the Paris bookſellers had got retouched, that is, had cauſed many words and antiquated expreſſions to be changed in it; and yet I believe Genebrard had not been dead thirty years. They have taken the ſame liberty with Amyot's Plutarch, which the Sieur Sorel condemns very juſtly. It is enough, ſays he (8), to know, that Amyot's diction was eſteemed by the greateſt genius's of his time. They do him great injury in imagining they can correct his works, by retrenching ſome obſolete words, and ſubſtituting others in their room, for this is taking away all his ſtrength and ſimplicity. Nevertheleſs ſome bookſellers at Paris reprinted, not many years ſince, this old tranſlation in a large folio, many antiquated words having been ſuppreſſed in different parts of it. Some perſons were of opinion, that this would make the work in queſtion read more agreeably, and that theſe alterations were laudable. But others think that valuable old books ought to be had in greater veneration; and that it was a ſacrilegious action to have made ſuch alterations in the book we are ſpeaking of; eſpecially when we conſider that thoſe who were employed in that taſk had not abilities for it. They think either that the old tranſlation ought to be left untouched; or an entire new one be made, if any perſon pretends to give a better, according to the genius and mode of the preſent age. He even does not approve of the alterations made in Joinville's original. Here follow his words (9). " We find in Joinville's hiſtory, mani- " feſt characteriſticks of the ſimplicity of the age " he lived in; and perceive that perſons in his ſta- " tion were very little acquainted with the rules of " exact writing. Nevertheleſs, I am of opinion, " that the editors have done us an injury, by their " changing a great number of obſolete words found " in his book, as has been done in ſeveral impreſ- " ſions; becauſe it is no longer the ſame work, but " an entire tranſlation of old French into new. By " this means we, at laſt, may loſe the original; ſo " that we ſhall not be able to have any tolerable idea " of the language ſpoke in the time it was writ. " It were much better the whole had been left as " written originally: and in caſe any paſſages had " been now unintelligible, they might have been " explained in the margin, or by notes annexed; " and all this would have made an agreeable va- " riety." He had ſpoke to much the like purpoſe in p. 252; and it is to be obſerved that he ſays there, that Comines's hiſtory, as well as that of Joinville, have been printed different ways; and that ſome words, which it is thought uſe had aboliſhed, were changed in them. The reader will find by a paſſage of Stephen Paſquier, how antient this practice is among the French. The like imperfection we find in the old manuſcripts of our Romance of the Roſe; in each of which the French diction is the ſame as was ſpoke at the times when they were copied, except only in the rhime, where they could not make any alteration. You will find I know not what Jargon ſpoke by thoſe who copied it, I mean words uſed by the people of Picardy, Normandy, and Champagne; which are things to which a reader ought to have a great regard, before he interpoſes his judgment (10).

(6) See the 1ſt article of NAVARRE, rem. [N].

(7) See Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Dec. 1699, p. 670 & ſeq.

(8) Sorel, Bibl. Francoiſe, p. 220, Paris edit. 1667.

(9) Ibid. p. 321, 322.

(10) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, lib. 8. c. 44 p. 756, of the Paris edition of 1621, in folio.

[F] I muſt not omit Wicquefort's opinion of d'Oſſat's merit.] He has done great honour to his judgment on this occaſion. His words are theſe (11). I have nothing to ſay concerning Arnauld, Cardinal d'Oſſat, becauſe no writer can ſpeak of him without doing him injuſtice, ſince Anthony Muretus, the moſt eloquent author of his age, falls ſhort, in endeavouring to draw his panegyric, in his funeral oration. I ſhall ſay this only of him, that no Miniſter ever diſcharged his truſt with ſo much affection, zeal, application, and fidelity in his maſter's ſervice, as this prelate; with regard to his abilities, we may judge of him from his negotiations extant; for which the publick are obliged, as alſo for ſeveral other excellent books, to the late Meſſieurs de Puy, the honour and ornament of our age: he has given proofs of his ſkill in negotiations, in that he tranſacted with the Grand Duke of Tuſcany, for the reſtitution of the Iſland of If; in that with Pope Clement VIII. in order to reconcile Henry IV. to the Church of Rome; in that of the invalidity of the abovementioned King's marriage, with Queen Margaret of Valois, which had been valid near thirty years; in that of the diſpenſation with regard to the marriage between Catharine of Bourbon, ſiſter to Henry, with the Duke de Bar; and in ſeveral other very important and delicate affairs. His diſpatches are as uſeful to an Embaſſador who hopes to ſucceed in his employment, as the Bible and the Corpus Juris to ſuch Lawyers and Divines as would ſucceed in their reſpective profeſſions. This is the judgment of a great maſter; for de Wicquefort was perfectly well ſkilled in theſe matters; and he quotes d'Oſſat's letters ſo often, that that he ſeems to have ſtudied them with great care. We muſt pardon the miſtake he fell into, in ſaying that Muretus made this Cardinal's funeral elogium; that Orator having been dead many years, when Gallutius the Jeſuit delivered at Rome, in 1604, Arnauld d'Oſſat's funeral oration. I am to obſerve that Naudé earneſtly exhorted all Politicians, to read thoſe very letters which de Wicquefort applauded ſo highly. Omnium meritò cenſentur utiliſſimæ digniſſimæque, quæ Politicorum mentibus atque oculis perpetuò obverſentur, Cardinalis Oſſati Epiſtolæ: utpote quæ graviſſimò ac planè ſenili cultu exaratæ ſunt, feraciſſimoque graviſſimarum rerum ac ſententiarum ingeniò, nuſquam laxæ, nuſquam molles, ſemper æquales, ſemper lectoris animum demulcentes, detinenteſque jucundiſſimâ rerum ac rationum varietate (12), i. e. "The letters of "Cardinal d'Oſſat, are deſervedly looked upon to "be more uſeful than any other, and worthy of "being perpetually read and meditated upon by "Politicians: they being written with the utmoſt "dignity, and with the ſeveral advantages of old "age, and a moſt copious acquaintance with impor-"tant affairs and ſentiments: never flat or effemi-"nate, but always of a piece; and perpetually en-"tertaining the reader's mind, with the moſt de-"lightful variety of incidents and arguments."

(11) Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, lib. 2 § 17. p. m. 423, 424. See alſo ſect. 10. of the ſame book, p. 173.

See also Perrault's Hommes illuſtres du XVII. Siecle, Part II. (d).

(d) Page 12, &c. of the Dutch edition.

(12) Naudeus, Bibliogr. Politica, p. 558. Edit. Crenii, 1692.

We ſhall give ſome neceſſary additions to this article.

☞ OSSAT (ARNAULD OF) was born in Caſſagnabere, a village in the Dioceſe of Auch, Auguſt 23, 1536. His father was in ſo very low a ſtation, that the publick have not yet been able to find out exactly who he was [A]; but it is certain that he was very poor [B]. However, young d'Oſſat being born with a genius which ſeemed capable of great improvement, a Gentleman, named Thomas de Marca, in the Dioceſe of Auch, took an affection for him; and made him ſtudy in concert with the young Lord of Caſtelnau de Magnoac, his Nephew and ward [C]. D'Oſſat having left off teaching, went to Bourges, where he ſtudied the law under the famous Cujas. After receiving his Diploma there, he returned to Paris, and applied himſelf to the Bar, in hopes of making his fortune by his great aſſiduity [D] (a). In 1568 he was looked upon at Paris, as a young man very well ſkilled in the Mathematicks (b). After being Secretary in Rome to Mr. de Foix, Archbiſhop of Toulouſe, and to Cardinal d'Eſte, he exerciſed the ſame employment under Cardinal de Joyeuſe [E]. In 1588 Henry III. would have recalled him from Rome, in order to make him one of the Secretaries of State, but he excuſed himſelf [F]. Henry IV. coming to the Crown, d'Oſſat was employed to obtain the papal abſolution for that Prince; and at laſt ſucceeded in it; for which he was rewarded with the Biſhoprick of Rennes in 1596 [G]. In 1597 he was appointed Counſellour of State in his abſence (c). The Duke of Luxemburg, Embaſſador at Rome, from the French King, having leave in 1598 to return to his native country, d'Oſſat was ordered to ſuperintend the affairs of France, till another Embaſſador ſhould be appointed (d) In 1599 he was raiſed to the Purple [H]. Some time after the Pope, to the great ſatisfaction of King Henry, created our Cardinal, Abbot of Nant in Rouerge (e). Cardinal de Joyeuſe returning to France, d'Oſſat was appointed Vice-

(a) Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 2. p. 12, 13. Paris 1701. 12mo.

(b) From the remarks, to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 969. col. 2.

(c) Perrault, p. 15.

(d) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 34. p. 35, 36.

(e) Ibid. p. 36.

[A] The publick have not yet been able to find out who he was.] The uncertainty on this head has made ſome ſay, that d'Oſſat was natural ſon to the Lord of Caſſagnabere; whilſt others affirm that his father was a Quack-doctor; but it is looked upon as certain, throughout the whole Dioceſe of Auch, that his father was a farrier (1).

(1) Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 2. p. 12. Paris 1701. 12mo. and Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 34. p. 31. Paris 1736, 12mo.

[B] 'Tis certain his father was very poor.] He died in ſuch unhappy circumſtances that he did not leave money enough to bury him. Our Arnauld was then nine years old; and quite abandoned, without friends or money, and in ſuch a ſtation of life as could not give him the leaſt hopes of ever bettering his fortune (2).

(2) Idem ibid.

[C] Made him ſtudy . . . . . with his Nephew and ward.] The reader may ſee above (3) the ſucceſs which d'Oſſat had with his young Lord.

(3) In the text of Bayle's article of OSSAT (ARNAUD D') above.

[D] He applied himſelf to the Bar.] Getting acquainted with Mr. Paul de Foix, he went to Rome with that Gentleman in 1574. He returned thither in 1580 with Mr. de Foix, who was ſent to Rome in 1580 by Henry III. and was afterwards appointed his Embaſſador in ordinary at that Court. D'Oſſat lived then with Mr. de Foix, in quality of his Secretary. That Gentleman dying at Rome, towards the cloſe of the year 1582, Cardinal d'Eſte, protector of the affairs of France, appointed him his Secretary; and d'Oſſat living four years in his family, it was then he began to diſplay his abilities for negotiations, and to learn all the intrigues of the Court of Rome (4).

(4) Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 2. p. 13.

[E] D'Oſſat was Secretary to Cardinal de Joyeuſe.] Cardinal d'Eſte, protector of the French Nation, dying in 1586, d'Oſſat was continued in the Secretaryſhip under Cardinal de Joyeuſe, by the King's expreſs command; who knowing his capacity, was deſirous that he ſhould ſerve as a guide to this Cardinal, who being at that time but 26 years of age, had not gained ſufficient experience. Although Cardinal de Joyeuſe had not himſelf appointed d'Oſſat, he yet had an affection for him; and preſented him, in 1588, to the Priory of St. Martin du Vieux Belleſme. Mention was made above, of his employment in the Preſidial Court of Melun; and of his being appointed Abbot of Notre-Dame de Varennes (5).

(5) In the text of Bayle's article of OSSAT (ARNAULD D') above.

[F] He excuſed himſelf.] He thought this employment incompatible with the prieſtly Office, and that it would be too laborious. His refuſal on this occaſion proved his exaltation; for had he returned to France, he would have been involved in the calamities of his country; or been prevented from performing thoſe great ſervices he afterwards did his native country (6). Another very honourable motive is aſcribed to his refuſal, viz. becauſe Mr. de Villeroy, who was d'Oſſat's benefactorr muſt have been removed, in order to make room for him (7).

(6) Perrault, ubi ſupra.

(7) Niceron's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 34. p. 35. Paris 1736, 12mo.

[G] To obtain the papal abſolution for Henry IV.] This affair ſeemed to be embarraſſed with almoſt inſurmountable difficulties, ariſing either from the Spaniards, the Princes of the houſe of Lorrain, or the Huguenots, who indeed had a great affection for Henry IV. but could not bear the thoughts of his being reconciled to the See of Rome. However, d'Oſſat managed this negotiation ſo artfully; and ſo happily removed all the ſcruples of the Pope who was extremely diffident, that it was at laſt terminated very happily (8).

(8) Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, p. 14.

[H] He was raiſed to the Purple.] That King had ſolicited this favour of the Pope for ſome time, which was refuſed on account of d'Oſſat's low extraction; but at laſt he was included in the promotion of the thirteen Cardinals, created by Pope Clement VIII. May 3, 1599 (9). On this occaſion, d'Oſſat refuſed to accept of the coach and horſes and the red damaſk bed which Cardinal de Joyeuſe ſent him three

(9) Niceron's Hommes illuſtres, p. 36.

Vice-protector of the French Nation; in which employment he did all the ſervice imaginable to thoſe who wanted his aſſiſtance (f). In 1600 the King nominated him Biſhop of Bayeux, the revenues of which were more conſiderable than thoſe of Rennes; but finding the affairs of his Sovereign would not allow him to reſide in his Dioceſe, he deſired leave to reſign, which he obtained with great difficulty. He died about the 13th of March 1604, in the 68th year of his age; and was buried in St. Lewis's Church, belonging to the French Nation, in Rome, where the underwritten epitaph was inſcribed to his memory [I]. The laſt important negotiation he tranſacted with the Pope, was for the obtaining a diſpenſation for the marriage of Duke de Bar, with the King's ſiſter, then a Proteſtant (g). Here follows his character [K]. An inſtance is related of his great diſintereſtedneſs [L]. We ſhall give a liſt of his works [M].

(f) Perrault, p. 15.

(g) Ibid. p. 16.

three weeks after; for ſays he, in a letter to Mr. de Villeroy, though I have not every thing neceſſary for me to ſupport the ſplendor of my preſent dignity; I yet will not lay aſide the modeſty and temperance I have hitherto obſerved; nor receive ſo noble a gift from any other Nobleman or Prince but my Sovereign (10).

(10) Perrault, p. 15.

[I] The under-written epitaph was inſcribed to his memory.]

D. O. M.

Arnaldo Oſſato, Gallo, S. Euſebii Preſbytero Cardinali, Epiſcopo Baiocenſi, qui omnium per multos annos Gallicanorum in Urbe negotiorum, conſiliorumque particeps, & adminiſter, rariſſimæ in Reges ſuos fidei, egregiorumque meritorum teſtimonio, ſacrâ purpurâ ornatus, ampliſſimi ordinis dignitatem eâ ſapientiæ, integritatiſque famâ, eâque officiorum in omnes propenſione cumulavit, ut ſui deſiderium exteris quoque nationibus cum admiratione reliquerit.

Vixit annos 67; menſes 6; dies 2.

Deceſſit pridie Idus Martii 1604.

Petrus Boſſu, Lugdunenſis, cubiculi Præfectus à ſecretis, & Renatus Cortin, Andegavenſis, à cubiculo, item & Secretarius ex trientibus hæredes Patrono optimo atque indulgentiſſimo S. P. P. C. (11).

(11) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, p. 37, 38.

[K] Here follows his character.] He was a man of prodigious penetration; applied himſelf ſo cloſely to affairs, and eſpecially, was ſo judicious in forming his reſolutions, that it is almoſt impoſſible to find out one falſe ſtep in the many negotiations in which he was concerned (12).

(12) Perrault, p. 16.

[L] An inſtance is related of his diſintereſtedneſs.] Cardinal d'Eſte bequeathed d'Oſſat four thouſand Crowns, and offered him a diamond worth twenty thouſand, deſiring him to keep it till his executors ſhould have paid him the abovementioned ſum. However, the earneſt entreaties employed by the Cardinal, could not prevail with him to keep that pledge; and when the legacy was paid him thirteen years after, he received it as though it had been a gift from the executors. This money indeed came very ſeaſonably the firſt year after his acceſſion to the Purple; for otherwiſe, as he himſelf declares, he would have been almoſt ruined (13).

(13) Ibid. p. 14.

[M] We ſhall give a liſt of his works.] 1. Expoſitio in diſputationem Jacobi Carpentarii de Methodo. Pariſ. Wechel. 1564. 8vo. This is a defence of the Logic of Peter Ramus, (under whom he had learnt philoſophy in the college of Preſle) in oppoſition to James Charpentier, who had attacked him. The latter anſwered only by injurious expreſſions, as uſual with thoſe who have nothing better to offer (14). Perrault mentions this work (15), but does not ſeem to know that it was printed, he ſaying, that "of the curi- "ous works written by d'Oſſat, only his letters are "extant (16). 2. Lettres du Cardinal d'Oſſat, Paris 1624, folio." The firſt Editor of theſe letters, altered ſome paſſages in them, and ſuppreſſed whole pieces, in order not to offend certain perſons then living, whoſe reſentment he perhaps dreaded. Item, The ſecond edition reviſed and enlarged, Paris 1624, folio and quarto. In this edition, ſome things which had been retrenched in the other, were added; but it may ſtill be looked upon as imperfect, in compariſon of thoſe publiſhed by Amelot de la Houſſaye. Item, The third edition, enlarged, Paris 1627, folio and octavo. Item, Paris 1641, folio. Item, Roan 1643, 4to. Item, A new edition, corrected from the original manuſcript, and very much enlarged by letters written ſince 1596, and other pieces never publiſhed before, with the Cardinal's life, and notes hiſtorical and political, by Amelot de la Houſſaye, Paris 1697, 4to. Two volumes. Item, Enlarged with two notes of M. de la Houſſaye, not inſerted in the Paris edition of 1697. Amſterdam 1708, 12mo, five volumes. This is the beſt edition, as being the moſt ample. Jerom Carini tranſlated theſe letters into Italian, from the firſt editions, and his tranſlation was printed at Venice, in 1629, 4to. The various editions which have been made of theſe letters, are a proof how greatly they were eſteemed by the public. And indeed, tho' the affairs they treat of, are not of ſo much concern at this time, as in the age when they were writ, they may ſtill be of great ſervice to politicians, as teach the art of negotiating, they particularly with the court of Rome. Amelot de la Houſſaye's notes not only illuſtrate them, but alſo inform the reader of many hiſtorical facts and political maxims (17). Another Author obſerves, that d'Oſſat's letters are ſo finely written, ſo judicious, and abound with ſuch excellent maxims, that we cannot form to ourſelves too advantageous an idea of them (17).

(14) Niceron, 38.

(15) Perrault, p. 13.

(16) Ibid. p. 16.

(17) Niceron, p. 38 & ſeq.

(17) Perrault, p. 16.

I

OTHO III. ſucceeded his father, who died in 983, at about twelve years of age. On this account, the beginning of his reign was not free from commotions; however, they were all ſuppreſſed very happily; and when his years permitted him to aſſume the reins of Empire, he ſhewed himſelf highly worthy to take them in hand. His preceptor was the famous Gerbert, a native of Auvergne (a), whom he raiſed to the Archiepiſcopal See of Ravenna, and afterwards Pope, by the name of Sylveſter II. The affair that gave him moſt trouble, was that at Rome, where Creſcentius would fain have kept the Sovereign Power in his own hands, and whence he drove Pope Gregory V. the Emperor's relation [A]. He was prepared for a vigorous defence, when advice was brought that this Prince was marching towards Rome to chaſtiſe him; but he made very little reſiſtance; and was obliged, in a few days, to ſurrender himſelf, with the Anti-Pope he had created. The latter was ſcourged, had his eyes put out, and was at laſt killed by the populace,

(a) Du Cheſne, Vie des Papes.

[A] Pope Gregory V. the Emperor's near relation.] His name was Bruno, and he was ſon to Otho of Saxony, Duke of Franconia and Suabia; which Otho was the ſon of Ludolphus, and grandſon of Otho I. ſo that Bruno was great grandſon of Otho, grandſon of Otho III. Thoſe who declared him preceptor to Otho I, have been ſtrangely cenſured for it (1). Some may doubt whether the Critic be in the right, in making Otho, the ſon of Ludolphus, Duke of Bavaria; for 'tis certain on the one hand, that Bavaria being given by Otho I. to his brother Henry, continued in the poſſeſſion of the deſcendents of this Henry; and on the other, that Otho the Son of Ludolphus was Duke of Suabia after his populace, before the Emperor had time to pronounce ſentence of condemnation on him [B]. Hereunder is the puniſhment inflicted on Creſcentius [C], which was in 998. Pope Gregory V. reſtored at the ſame time, died ſome months after; and it was then Otho raiſed Sylveſter II. to the Pontificate. The people of Rome, emboldned by the Emperor's abſence, who was returned to Germany, made a freſh commotion; they not liking to be dependent on the Germans. Otho was therefore obliged to attempt once again to reſtore the city of Rome to tranquillity; but he took a wrong courſe; he flattering himſelf that if he did but once appear ſolâ Majeſtate ornatus, armed ſingly with his Majeſty, the factions would immediately lay down their arms; but the contrary happened, and ſerved as an example to ſhow, that a Prince ſhould never expoſe his Majeſty unarmed, to the mercy of a rebellious populace. The inhabitants of Rome took ſuch great advantage of Otho's appearing with few or no troops, that they confined him in his Palace; ſo that it is not known what might have befallen the Emperor in his captivity, which was inevitable, had not Hugh Marquis of Tuſcany, and Henry Duke of Bavaria, poſted to Rome, and amuſed the common people, by offering ſeveral propoſals for an accommodation, till ſuch time as they had furniſhed the Emperor an opportunity to make his eſcape. This was in 1001. Now as this Prince had good troops in Italy, whither he was returned only to drive the Saracens out of it, from whom he had recovered Capua; it was not long before he returned to Rome [D] with ſo powerful a body of troops, that he chaſtiſed the inhabitants at pleaſure. He ſet out for Germany in the beginning of the year 1002; but he died in Paterno, the 28th of January of the ſame year, before he was got out of Italy. He is thought to have died by poiſoned gloves, which Creſcentius's widow, one of the moſt handſome women of her time, gave him, out of revenge for the forfeiting the word he had given; he having promiſed to marry her, merely to enjoy her; and afterwards, when he had ſatiated his deſires, laughed at the promiſe (b). He had been unhappy in his wives [E]; ſhe whom he had married (c) was not only leud, but likewiſe guilty of another crime for which he burnt her; and ſhe whom he did not marry his father; but 'tis equally certain, that Otho II. being at war with Henry II. Duke of Bavaria, gave Bavaria to Otho, ſon of Ludolphus (2).

(1) Vide Specimen Errorum, & Perizonio vulgatum, anno 1693, p. 119.

(b) Extracted from Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, Liv. 2.

(c) Mary of Arragon. See her article.

(2) See the hiſtory of Bavaria, by Blanc, Tom. 2. p. 138.

[B] The Anti-pope . . . was killed by the populace, before the Emperor had time to pronounce ſentence of condemnation on him.] Some ſay (3) that the populace ſeized the Anti-pope, before Otho had been admitted into Rome; that they pulled out his eyes; cut off his ears and noſe; ſet him on an Aſs, his face turned towards the tail; and that Otho, to whom they afterwards opened the gates, baniſhed him to the moſt remote part of Germany, and that he died there of grief ſoon after. Here ſome Writers affirm particulars concerning the Anti-pope, which others relate of Creſcentius. Some relate (4) that it was Otho who cauſed the Anti-pope's noſe to be cut off; his eyes to be put out; and afterwards had him flung headlong from the top of the caſtle St. Angelo. Theſe claſhings give people a great diſtaſte for the ſtudy of hiſtory, and are a diſhonour to mankind; for if men were good for any thing, Hiſtorians would agree exactly in incidents ſo remarkable as the abovementioned. But how ſhould many Hiſtorians agree, ſince often a ſingle one is not conſiſtent with himſelf. Conſult Mathias's Theatrum (5), and it will appear, that the Anti-pope was whipt, and his eyes put out, and was, at laſt, killed by the populace, before Otho had condemned him. Antipapa à vulgo virgis cæſus, oculis privatus, & demum confoſſus, priuſquam de eo Otto ſententiam tulit. And 'tis related in page 889, "that the Emperor "having cauſed the Anti-pope's noſe to be cut off, "and his eyes pulled out, threw him headlong from "the ſummit of the capitol." Imperator anno Chriſti 998 Romam profectus eſt, Antipapam naſis & oculis privavit, & de Capitolio præcipitem dedit, uti ſupra prolixius diximus. Theſe laſt words are very odd; the Author quotes himſelf falſely; he having given an account quite different from what he relates in this place.

(3) Petr. Damian. Ep. 2. ad Cad. Ciaconius, Sigonius, cited by Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, Liv. 2.

(4) Heiſs, Hiſt. de l'Empire, Tom. 1. p. m. 122.

(5) Mathias, Theatr. p. 888.

[C] Hereunder is the puniſhment inflicted on Creſcentius.] He was ſet on an Aſs, his head being turned toward the tail, and in this poſture, was carried up and down the whole city; after which, ſeveral of his limbs being cut off, he was hanged. His accomplices were puniſhed differently (6). Some Writers give the following account of this affair (7). Creſcentius, after having made the moſt vigorous defence poſſible in the fortreſs of Rome, endeavoured to prevent his deſtruction, by throwing himſelf at Otho's feet; but this Prince had him carried back to the caſtle, in order that he might take him by force. Creſcentius made a moſt deſperate defence there; when, at laſt, the caſtle was ſtormed, and all were put to the ſword, except Creſcentius, who, being covered with wounds, was taken priſoner, and immediately thrown headlong from the ſummit of the fortreſs, dragged through the dirt, and afterwards hung upon ſo high a gallows (8), that he was ſeen by the whole city (9). According to Moreri, he was only beheaded; but Heiſs (10) ſays, that himſelf, and twelve of his accomplices, were hanged up on the higheſt tree that could be found.

(6) Ex Sethe Caliſio.

(7) Glaber. lib. 1. and Dithmar, lib. 4. cited by Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, p. m. Liv. 2.

(8) See article BARELOT, remark [B].

(9) Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, p. m. 123.

(10) Hiſt. de l'Empire, Tom. 1. p. m. 122.

[D] It was not long before he returned to Rome.] After examining ſtrictly the account given by ſeveral Hiſtorians, it appears to me plain, that Mathias is miſtaken, when he relates that Otho intended to march into Germany, there to raiſe an army, which might enable him to puniſh the Romans for their rebellion, but that he died on the road. According to this account, he muſt have died unrevenged, the contrary of which is aſſerted by good Authors (11). However, it would be very raſh in any perſon, to rank this in the claſs of errors; for the hiſtory of the middle age is ſo much confuſed, and has paſt through ſo many bad hands, that we find authorities pro and con, and numberleſs variations. This deprives me of a great number of materials; for ſhould I venture to condemn thoſe who relate an incident after a certain manner, authorities would not be wanting which aſſert the direct contrary. 'Tis ſcarce poſſible to frame a falſhood (12) for thoſe ages; for let a Writer relate, merely from his own fancy, and at random, the circumſtances of any action, it is a thouſand to one but ſome Author or other will confirm his wild aſſertions.

(11) See Dithmar. apud Calviſium, ad ann. 1001, 1002.

(12) i. e. to aſſert any particulars without any proof or teſtimony.

[E] He had been unhappy in his wives.] The fair ſex ſeem, in general, to have been impropitious to Otho; for, beſides what I related concerning his wife, and his miſtreſs, I have read ſomewhere, (13), that it was merely for the ſake of that miſtreſs (Creſcentius's widow,) that he entered Rome with ſo ſmall a guard, that it had like to have proved a perpetual priſon to him. Add, that Theophania his mother, daughter of an Emperor of Conſtantinople, made him incur the hatred of a great many Nobles (14); and that after his mother's death (15), being brought up by Adelai de or Alice, his grandmother, he thought himſelf obliged to ſend her from court. 'Tis probable, that the wiſeſt of his courtiers did not give him this advice; however, he thought it neceſſary that this ſhould be done. Notwithſtanding this, he yet entruſted women with governments; for during his journey

(13) Huber. Hiſt. Civil. Tom. 1.

(14) See Joan. Cluver. Hiſtoria Univerſalis, in Othone III.

(15) Which, according to Cluverius, happened in 989; or, according to Calviſius, Mathias, &c. in 991.

marry [F], brought him to his end. Thoſe who affirm that the College of the ſeven Electors was eſtabliſhed in his reign are miſtaken (d), whether they aſcribe the eſtabliſhment of it to Otho himſelf, or to Pope Gregory V. It is more juſt to ſay, that Poland was made a Kingdom by that Emperor, as I obſerved in the article of BOLESLAS I. Wonders have been related concerning Otho's penitence [G]. His devotion was ſo great that he undertook pilgrimages (e); and it is even ſaid, that he had made a promiſe to turn Monk (f). I would not cite, as an indication of his devotion, the cloths in which he had cauſed the whole book of the Revelations to be exhibited in embroidery (g).

(d) See the proofs of this in Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, book 2.

(e) See the article BOLESLAS I.

(f) Calviſius, ad ann. 1001. Chriſti.

(g) Matthias, Theatr. Hiſt. p. m. 886.

journey to Rome, in 996, he gave that of Saxony to Mathilda or Maud, his aunt by the mother's ſide; and, after her death, to his ſiſter Alice.

[F] She whom he did not marry.] One Glaber, an Hiſtorian, ſays, that Otho married her. A certain circumſtance is, that after taking her to his bed, he contracted an averſion for, and abandoned her.

[G] Wonders have been related concerning Otho's penitence.] 'Tis related, that he ſometimes uſed to faſt a whole week, thurſdays excepted; that he beſtowed alms with a very liberal hand, and would ſhed floods of tears to expiate his ſins. But the Latin deſcribes this better; Plurima ingemiſcens facinora noctis ſilentio, vigiliis & orationibus intentus, lacrimarum quoque rivis abluere non deſtitit, ſæpenumero omnem hebdomadam excepta quinta feria jejunium producens, in eleemoſynis valdè largus (16). To this, add what I have related elſewhere (17) concerning his pilgrimages.

(16) Dithmar. lib. 4. cited by Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, p. 128.

(17) Article BOLESLAS I. remark [A].

OTTOBONI (PETER) a Venetian, was Pope in the 17th Century, under the name of Alexander VIII. Mark Ottoboni his father, high Chancellor of Venice, purchaſed Patents of Nobility, which coſt him an hundred thouſand Ducats in 1646. Peter Ottoboni having gone through a courſe of ſtudies, firſt at Venice, and afterwards in Padua, and taken his Doctor of Law's degree in the laſt of thoſe two cities, went to Rome at twenty years of age. Under Pope Urban VIII. he had the Governments of Terni, Rietti, Citta, Caſtellana, and the employment of Auditor of the Rota. In 1652 he was raiſed to the Purple by Innocent X. and two years after was made Biſhop of Breſcia. He was Datary under Alexander VII. and at laſt elected Pope, October 6, 1689, in the room of Innocent XI. (a). The war, which was lighted up with great fury between the houſes of Auſtria and France, contributed very much to the election of Ottoboni; becauſe thoſe Cardinals who were neuter, too juſtly feared to endanger the Romiſh Religion, in caſe they ſhould chuſe as Pope a perſon who was born a ſubject of the King of Spain, as the late Pope was, whoſe partiality againſt France had done infinite ſervice to the Proteſtants. They therefore imagined that Ottoboni, who was a perſon qualified for the papal throne, would ſuit the then preſent juncture of affairs better than any other perſon, becauſe he was a Venetian. The only advantage France gained by this election was, Pope Alexander VIII. ſollicited the Venetians ſo ſtrongly to engage in war with the Turks; and aſſured to procure them ſuch mighty ſuccours, that he quite put a ſtop to the peace which the Emperor would fain have concluded with the Port, in order to have an opportunity of employing all his troops againſt the French. In other reſpects, Alexander VIII. devoted his whole thoughts to the aggrandizing of his family [A]. He was

(a) Mercure Galant, for Octo- 1689.

[A] Alexander devoted his whole thoughts to the aggrandizing of his family.] What is ſaid of beaſts; that no bites are more dangerous than thoſe when they are dying, may very juſtly be ſaid of Nepotiſm. Ut quam maxime mortiferi eſſe morſus ſolent morientium beſtiarum ſic plus negotii fuit cum ſemiruta Carthagine quam integra (1), i. e. "As beaſts, when dying, "uſe to give the moſt deadly bites; ſo Carthage, "when half deſtroyed, gave more trouble than "when in its flouriſhing State." To which I may add the following words of Seneca *. In gladiatoribus quoque conditio dura victoris eſt cum moriente pugnantis. Nullum magis adverſarium timeas quam qui vivere non poteſt occidere poteſt. Concitatiſſima eſt rabies in deſperatione, & morte ultima in furorem animus impellitur, i. e. "It is a hard condition, in the combats "of the gladiators, that the victor ſhould be obliged "to fight with a dying man. No adverſary ought "to be dreaded more than a man who cannot live, "but may kill. Deſpair inſpires the moſt furious "rage; and the ſoul when expiring, is roufed to "madneſs." Nepotiſm being brought very low under Pope Alexander VIII. it collected all its ſtrength, in order to be the more capable of devouring. It might be ſaid of the uncle; he is old, and makes haſte, becauſe he knows his time to be ſhort. Menage uſed to tell a ſtory that will come very apropos here. Alexander VIII. (ſaid he) being elected Pope at ſeventy nine years of age, and having preferred all his Nephews in three weeks time, aſked one of his principal Domeſticks what the world ſaid of him. He replied, that he did not loſe any time in advancing his family. Says the Pope, oh! oh! ſono vinti tre hore e mezza, 'tis half an hour after three and twenty (2) †. To act in the manner he did, with regard to an abuſe which his ſucceſſor was to aboliſh, was beſtowing an honourable funeral on it. Perhaps Pope Ottoboni's very advanced age, was not the only motive which prompted him to make ſuch diſpatch in enriching his whole family. He conſidered, perhaps, that length of time had made the people of Rome forget, in ſome meaſure, the wild diſorders that flowed from Nepotiſm, they not having appeared during the long reign of Innocent XI. Conſequently, the murmurs of the people might be very much leſſened in that reſpect; and he was to govern ſubjects who had enjoyed an interval of repoſe and tranquility after their former fatigues. This calls to my memory the knaviſh arts of flatterers; and the great dexterity with which, like true jugglers, they whirl about the moſt ſacred things. But in order that this criticiſm, which is not my own, may have greater weight and authority, I have copied it from a book printed at Paris, and allowed of by the licenſer (3). "Among "the applauſes (4) which he beſtows on Innocent XI. that on which he expatiates the moſt, is, his "keeping his Nephews in a private ſtation, in imi- "tation of our Saviour, who knew no other relations "than thoſe who did his father's will. Alexander "VIII. having had views quite contrary to thoſe "of his predeceſſor, Palatius found out a way to "juſtify the ſollicitous care with which he heaped "up wealth and honours on his relations; and aſ- "ſerts, that in this point alſo the Pope in queſtion "had followed our Saviour's example, who honoured "his relations, according to the fleſh, with the par- "ticipation of his Prieſthood, and intruſted them "with the diſpenſation of his Goſpel: ſo fruitful is "eloquence in inventions, when the paſſions of per- "ſons in power are to be flattered, or the greateſt "irregularities in their conduct to be excuſed."

(1) Florus, lib. 2. c. 15.

* Seneca, controv. epiſt. 9.

(2) See the Menagiana, p. 208. Dutch edit.

† The Italians count the whole twenty-four hours of the natural day, round; and do not divide it, as we do, into twice twelve hours. Rem. by the Tranſlator.

(3) Journ. des Savans, for Decemb. 15, 1692. p. 731. Dutch edit.

(4) i. e. John Palatius, Author of a work, in 5 vols folio, printed at Venice, anno 1691, and entitled, Geſta Pontificum Romanorum.

very little affected with the diviſions which prevailed between the Courts of Rome and France [B]. He did but amuſe the Miniſters of Lewis XIV. and ſhewed on a ſudden, by the promulgation of a Bull, little before his death [C], that he had only laughed at them. The French, in hopes of gaining his favour, changed their note: they had ſaid few advantageous things, for ſome time, of Innocent XI. and afterwards had ſpoke a great many very ill things of him; but the Poets and Orators began to reſume their panegyrical vein in favour of his ſucceſſor. But they found that, to proceed on ſurer grounds, it would be neceſſary for them to ſquare their conduct, in the article of applauding, according to the maxim which Solon adviſed mankind to obſerve, in order to pronounce or determine with reſpect to the felicity of a perſon [D]. Cardinal Peter Ottoboni was ſo far advanced in years, at the time of his being advanced to the Papal Chair, that it is no wonder he enjoyed but a ſhort reign, it being but of fifteen or ſixteen months, this Pontif dying the firſt day of February 1691. A prediction, which has very much the air of an impoſture, was ſpread concerning his death [E].

[B] He was very little affected with the diviſions which prevailed between the Courts of Rome and France.] And yet the affair in queſtion was of ſo much importance, as to require a ſpeedy concluſion: and had Alexander VIII. been as zealous for the intereſt of St. Peter's chair, as for thoſe of his family, his reflection on the ſhort time he had to live, would have prompted him to put an end as ſoon as poſſible to the diviſions with regard to France, rather than make a quick diſpatch in enriching his family. By delaying this, he left his ſucceſſor the glory of re-eſtabliſhing in France the Pope's authority on its antient foot; which would have been impoſſible, had he ſtayed till the King of France was at peace with his neighbours. True policy required, that the Court of Rome ſhould take advantage of the tickliſh State of the affairs in France; and this Innocent did with great ſkill. Certain Fanaticks, who had declared, that the league formed againſt France in 1688 would be fatal to the Papal throne; and that the approaching deſtruction of Popery would begin by the reformation of the French Court, are very much out, ſince France, by that league, is become more popiſh than it was in 1682 and 1688; and conſequently Popery has repaired one of its breaches. Fooliſh are they who give credit to ſuch creatures. See the article of BRAUNBOM, remark [C].

[C] By the promulgation of a Bull a little before his death.] This bull was ready the fourth of Auguſt 1690, it being dated that day; but it was not publiſhed till the 30th of January 1691. It fulminates whatever was tranſacted in prejudice to the Pope's authority, in the aſſembly of the Clergy of France, Anno 1682. The reaſon of that Bull's not being publiſhed ſooner, was, the Pope was deſirous of amuſing Lewis XIV. of gaining ſome advantages by him; but when he found he had one foot in the grave, he obſerved no farther meaſures, and let fly his Bull. This was of great benefit to the expounders of St. Malachi: they did not know how to apply to Peter Ottoboni the ſymbol pœnitentia glorioſa, which concerns him in the predictions of that pretended Prophet. They were not content with ſaying, that this Pope had been elected on St. Bruno's day; or that his name was Peter, though the pretence of thoſe two Saints was very glorious; this, I ſay, they looked upon as too forced and far fetched: but the Bull gave occaſion to ſay, that Alexander VIII. had at laſt glorioufly repented of the indulgence he had ſhown to the Court and Clergy of France (5). I obſerve here, that the decree of the inquiſition dated December 7, 1690, againſt thirty one propoſitions, vexed the Divines of the Gallican Church. See the letter written by an Abbot to a Prelate of the Court of Rome (6).

(5) See Acta Eruditor. 1691, p. 151.

(6) It contains 66 pages, 12mo, in my edition, which is the 2d. The title bears, according to the edition printed in Thouloufe, 1691.

[D] This maxim, which Solon adviſed mankind to obſerve, in order to pronounce or determine with regard to the felicity of a perſon.] This maxim is, that we cannot judge of a man's happineſs, till after his death; for thoſe who appear to us happy, ſhall perhaps be reduced to the extreams of miſery before they leave the world. Ovid has finely expreſſed this thought of Solon.

Sed ſcilicet ultima ſemper
Exſpectanda dies homini: dicique beatus
Ante obitum nemo, ſupremaque funera debet (7).

(7) Ovid. Metamorp. lib. 3. v. 135.

That is,

" But no frail man, however great or high,
" Can be concluded bleſt before he die.

ADDISON.

The fickleneſs or depravity of the human heart, ſhould induce us not to praiſe a man till after his death. By this caution we ſhall ſave ourſelves the inconveniency of changing our note, and many other things. Salvian was not ignorant of this maxim; he obſerving, that wiſdom is applauded in the iſſue of things; and that it cannot be praiſed in childhood, in youth, or in proſperity, becauſe in thoſe circumſtances, all is applauded that is dubious. That whatever is liable to change, cannot be ſafely commended, &c. That a thing, whoſe condition is no longer doubtful, will deſerve a true applauſe; encomiums being then durable, when the merits of the thing applauded cannot be loſt. Sapientia (8), inquit ſermo divinus, in exitu canitur. Cur eam non dixit cani in pueritia, non in juventute, non in ſtatu rerum incolumium, non in proſperitatibus ſecundorum? Scilicet quia in his omnibus quicquid laudatur incertum eſt. Quàm diu enim quis ſubjacet mutationi, non poteſt cum ſecuritate laudari. Et ideo, ut ait, ſapientia in exitu canitur. Exiens enim quis de incertis periculorum, certum merebitur evaſa omni rerum varietate ſuffragium: quia tunc ſtabilis & firma laus eſt, quando meritum non poterit jam perire laudati. Sapientia, inquit, in exitu canitur.

(8) Salvian. contra Avaritiam, lib. 4. p. m. 145.

[E] A prediction, which has very much the air of impoſture, was ſpread concerning his death.] A Frenchman, whoſe name I conceal, had written, from Geneva, to his friends in Holland, about the beginning of the winter, in the year 1690, that a man in Milan went to his Confeſſor, and told him, that he found himſelf near his end; that he ſhould die in two days, his brother in four, the Pope at Chriſtmas, and the King of France at Eaſter. The Writer of this news added, that the two brothers died at the time ſpecified. The inſtant they knew that the Pope was not dead at Chriſtmas, the news was dropt; but it was revived during the ſiege of Mons (9); and, to give it the more weight, Chriſtmas day was no longer ſaid to be the time in which the Pope would die; but it was given out, that the man at Milan ſaid only that the Pope would die in a few weeks. It were to be wiſhed that ſome perſon had taken the pains to keep an exact account of this kind of predictions. Had they been ſet down annually, in our chronicles, we perhaps ſhould not be ſo liable, at this time, to be impoſed upon by them.

(9) In March, 1691.

☞ OTWAY (THOMAS), an eminent tragick writer, was ſon of Mr. Humphrey Otway, Rector of Wolbeding in Suſſex, and was born at Trottin in that County, on the 3d of March 1651. He was educated in Wykeham's ſchool near Wincheſter, and became a Commoner of Chriſt Church in Oxford in the beginning of the year 1669. He left the Univerſity without a degree, and retired to London, where he not only applied himſelf himſelf to poetry, but ſometimes acted in plays, whereby he ſupported himſelf, and gained the favour of Charles Fitz-Charles, Earl of Plymouth, one of the natural ſons of King Charles II. In 1677 he went in the quality of a Cornet with the new-raiſed Engliſh forces deſigned for Flanders. But he returned from thence in very neceſſitous circumſtances [A], and applied himſelf again to the writing of plays, and other poems [B]. He died at the ſign of the bull on Tower-Hill, April 14, 1685; and was interred in a vault under the Church of St. Clement Danes (a) He tranſlated out of French into Engliſh, The Hiſtory of Triumvirates; the firſt part of Julius Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſius; the ſecond part of Auguſtus, Anthony, and Lepidus. Being a faithful Collection from the beſt Hiſtorians and other Authors, concerning that Revolution of the Roman Government which happened under their Authority. London 1686 in 8vo. Mr. Longbaine (b) tells us, that "his genius in Comedy lay a little too much to Libertiniſm; but "in Tragedy he made it is buſineſs for the moſt part to obſerve the decorum of the Stage. "He was a man of excellent parts, and daily improved in his writing; but yet ſome-"times fell into plagiariſm as well as his contemporaries, and made uſe of Shakeſpear, to "the advantage of his purſe at leaſt, if not his reputation." Mr. Addiſon (c) obſerves, that our Author has followed nature in the Language of his Tragedy, and therefore ſhines in the paſſionate Parts more than any of our Engliſh Poets. As there is ſomething familiar and domeſtick in the Fable of his Tragedy, more than in thoſe of any other Poet, he has little pomp, but great force in his expreſſions. For which reaſon, though he has admirably ſucceeded in the tender and melting part of his Tragedies, he ſometimes falls into too great a familiarity of phraſe in thoſe, which, by Ariſtotle's rule, ought to have been raiſed and ſupported by the dignity of expreſſion. It has been obſerved by others, that this Poet has founded his Tragedy of Venice Preſerved on ſo wrong a Plot, that the greateſt characters in it are thoſe of Rebels and Traitors. Had the Hero of his Play diſcovered the ſame good qualities in the defence of his country, that he ſhewed for its ruin and ſubverſion, the audience could not enough pity and admire him. But as he is now repreſented, we can only ſay of him what the Roman Hiſtorian ſays of Catiline, that his fall would have been glorious, (ſi pro patria ſic concidiſſet) had he ſo fallen in the ſervice of his country. Mr. Charles Gildon (d) ſtiles Mr. Otway a Poet of the firſt magnitude, and tells us (e), that "he "was a perfect maſter of the Tragick Paſſions, and draws them every where with a juſt "and natural ſimplicity, and therefore never fails to raiſe ſtrong emotions in the ſoul. "But that Mr. Dryden, who affects a quite different ſtyle, and ſeldom or never touches "the paſſions, for moſt part of his time he commonly expreſſed a very mean, if not "a contemptible opinion of OTWAY, though at laſt, eſpecially in his Preface to du "Freſnoy, he declared in his favour; and yet even here he could not but throw in ſome "exceptions againſt his diction." The paſſage of Mr. Dryden is as follows: "To "expreſs the paſſions, which are ſeated on the heart by outward ſigns, is one great "precept of the painters, and very difficult to perform. In poetry, the very ſame "paſſions and motions of the mind are to be expreſſed; and in this conſiſts the principal "difficulty, as well as the excellency of that art. This (ſays my Author) is the gift of "Jupiter; and to ſpeak in the ſame heathen language, we call it the gift of our Apollo, "not to be obtained by pains or ſtudy, if we are not born to it. For the motions, "which are ſtudied, are never ſo natural, as thoſe, which break out in the height of a "real

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 781, 782. 2d edit.

(b) Account of the Engliſh dramatick Poets, p. 395, 396. edit. Oxford, 1691.

(c) Spectator, No. 39. vol. 1.

(d) Laws of Poetry explained and illuſtrated, p. 201. edit. Lond. 1721.

(e) Ibid. p. 211.

[A] Returned from thence in very neceſſitous circumſtances.] The Earl of Rocheſter, in his Seſſion of the Poets (1), repreſents his diſtreſſed condition in the following lines.

(1) See the Poems of John, Earl of Rocheſter, p. 113. edit. 1680.

Tom Otway came next, Tom Shadwell's dear Zany,
And ſwears for heroics he writes beſt of any:
Don Carlos his pockets ſo amply had fill'd,
That his mange was quite cur'd, and his lice were all kill'd.
But Apollo had ſeen his face on the ſtage,
And prudently did not think fit to engage
The ſcum of a play-houſe, for the prop of an age.

[B] His plays and other poems.] His plays are as follow. 1. Alcibiades, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. London 1675, in 4to, dedicated to Charles, Earl of Middleſex. 2. Don Carlos, Prince of Spain, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London 1676, in 4to, and dedicated to the Duke of York. 3. Titus and Berenice, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1677, in 4to. It conſiſts of three acts. 4. Cheats of Scapin, a farce, acted at the Duke's theatre, and printed with Titus & Berenice, and dedicated to John, Earl of Rocheſter. This farce is tranſlated from Moliere. 5. Friendſhip in Faſhion, a comedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1678, in 4to, and dedicated to Charles, Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex. 6. The Hiſtory and Fall of Caius Marius, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1680, in 4to, and dedicated to the Lord Viſcount Falkland. A great part of this tragedy is borrowed from Shakeſpear's Romeo and Juliet. 7. The Orphan; or, The unhappy Marriage, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1680, in 4to, and dedicated to her Royal Highneſs the Ducheſs of York. This tragedy is founded on a novel, called, Engliſh Adventures: ſee the hiſtory of Brandon, p. 17 (2). 8. The Soldier's Fortune, a comedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1681, in 4to. It is dedicated to Mr. Bentley, the Bookſeller, and is, as he ſays, a ſort of acquittance for the money he received for the copy. Mr. Langbaine obſerves (3), that there are ſeveral paſſages in this play, that have been touched before by others; of which that Writer gives inſtances. 9. Venice preſerved; or, A Plot diſcovered, a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1682, in 4to, and dedicated to the Ducheſs of Portſmouth. 10. The Atheiſt; or, The ſecond part of the Soldier's Fortune, a comedy, acted at the Duke's theatre. Printed at London, 1684, in 4to, and dedicated to the Lord Eland, eldeſt ſon to the Marquis of Halifax. Beſides theſe plays, he wrote ſeveral poems, viz. The Poet's Complaint to his Muſe; or, A Satyr againſt Libels. London, 1680, in 4to. Windſor-Caſtle; or, A Monument to our late Sovereign King Charles II. of ever bleſſed Memory. London, 1685, in 4to. An Epiſtle to R. D. printed in the Miſcellany Poems, containing a new tranſlation of Virgil's Eclogues, Ovid's

(2) Langbaine, Account of the Engliſh dramatic Poets, p. 398, 399. edit. Oxford, 1691.

(3) Ibid. p. 399.

" real paſſion. Mr. Otway poſſeſſed this part as thoroughly as any of the antients or " moderns. I will not defend every thing in his Venice Preſerv'd; but I muſt bear " this teſtimony to his memory, that the paſſions are truly touched in it, though perhaps " there is ſomewhat to be deſired both in the grounds of them, and in the height and " elegance of expreſſion. But nature is there, which is the greateſt beauty." Mrs. Barry, the celebrated actreſs, uſed to ſay, that in her part of Monimia in the Orphan, ſhe never ſpoke theſe three words, Ah! poor Caſtalio! without tears: upon which occaſion Mr. Gildon obſerves (f), that all that pathetick force had been loſt, if any more words had been added, and the Poet would have ſtriven in vain to heighten them, by the addition of figures of ſpeech; ſince the beauty of thoſe three plain ſimple words is ſo great by the force of Nature, that they muſt have been weakened and obſcured by the moſt ſhining flowers of Rhetorick.

(f) Ubi ſupra, p. 201, 211.

Ovid's Elegies, Odes of Horace, &c. London, 1684, in 8vo, in which is inſerted our Author's tranſlation of the 16th Ode of Horace. He tranſlated likewiſe from Latin into Engliſh, The Epiſtle of Phœdra to Hippolytus, printed in the Tranſlation of Ovid's Epiſtles, by ſeveral hands. London, 1681, in 8vo. He wrote the Prologue to Mrs. Behn's City Heireſs; or, Sir Timothy Treat-All, printed at London, 1682, in 4to. T

☞ OVERBURY (THOMAS), ſon of Nicholas Overbury of Bourton on the Hill near Morton in Marſh in Glouceſterſhire, Eſq; by Mary his wife, daughter of Giles Palmer of Compton-Scorfen in the pariſh of Ilmington in Warwickſhire (a), was born at Compton-Scorfen in the houſe of his grandfather by the mother's ſide, about the year 1581. In Michaelmas Term 1595 he became a Gentleman Commoner of Queen's College in Oxfordſhire, where he made a great progreſs in logick and philoſophy (b), and November 15, 1598, took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); which being compleated by determination in the Lent following, he left the Univerſity, and ſettled for a time in the Middle-Temple, where he had been before entered in order to ſtudy the Municipal Law. He afterwards travelled for ſome time, and returned a moſt accompliſhed perſon (d). About the time of the Coronation of King James I. he contracted an intimate acquaintance with Sir Robert Carr, Knight of the Bath; who ſoon after being taken into great favour with his Majeſty, he not only procured Mr. Overbury to be knighted at Greenwich June 19, 1608, but likewiſe his father to be made one of the Judges in Wales (e). Sir Thomas perceiving the great familiarity between his patron Carr, now made Viſcount Rocheſter, and the Lady Frances, daughter of Thomas Earl of Suffolk, and wife of Robert Earl of Eſſex, was ſo much diſpleaſed at it, knowing the Lady to be a woman of no clear character, that he endeavoured to diſſuade the Viſcount from keeping her company, or entertaining any thoughts of marrying her [A]. The Viſcount reſenting this advice, diſcovered what he had ſaid to the Lady, who reſolved upon his deſtruction, and conſulted with her uncle the Earl of Northampton, who was privy to the intrigue between her and the Viſcount. It was at laſt determined to diſpatch Sir Thomas with poiſon, which not being ſo convenient to be done in a publick place, the Viſcount and Earl contrived to exaſperate the King againſt him, that when he was impriſoned, they might have the better opportunity of executing their deſign (f). It happened about this time, that the King wanting to ſend an Embaſſador to Flanders, according to ſome, to France or Ruſſia, according to others, the Viſcount recommended to him Sir Thomas Overbury; and his Majeſty immediately agreed to the choice of him. The Viſcount, under ſhew of friendſhip, imparted the King's intentions to Sir Thomas, but diſuaded him from accepting of that employment, ſince it might hinder him from a better way of advancement, promiſing him to ſoften his Majeſty, if he ſhould be diſpleaſed with his refuſal of that poſt. He then went to the King, and artfully incenſed him againſt Sir Thomas for his refuſing to obey his Majeſty's command; and that Gentleman was for his contempt committed to the Tower, April 21, 1613 (g) [B]. Here he lay in cloſe confinement, till he was (a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 388. 2d edition. Lloyd in his State Worthies, p. 769. 2d edit. ſays, that ſhe was born at Burton on the Hill in Glouceſterſhire.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) Ibid. Faſti, Oxon. vol. 1. col. 154.

(d) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Arthur Wilſon's Life of King James I. p. 66, 67. edit. London, 1653. Sir Fulk Grevill's Five Years of King James, p. 17 & ſeqq. edit. Lond. 1643. and Sir Anthony Weldon's Court and Character of King James, p. 60 & ſeqq. edition London, 1651.

(g) Camden, Annales Regis Jacobi I. erroneouſly ſays, 1612.

[A] Endeavoured to diſſuade the Viſcount from keeping her company, or entertaining any thoughts of marrying her.] Sir Laurence Hyde, the King's Council, at the arraignment of Richard Weſton at Guildhall, London, November 19, 1615, obſerved (1), that " Sir " Thomas Overbury having divers times diſſuaded " the Earl, then Viſcount Rocheſter, from ſeeking " by any means to procure marrying with the Counteſs of Eſſex, to which he ſaw the Earl too much " inclined; having very earneſt conference with the " Earl one night in private in the gallery at Whitehall concerning his intendments, perceiving the " Earl that time too much to deſire that unlawful " conjunction, in the ardency of his fervent affection " unto the Earl, and the great preſcience of future " miſery it would inevitably bring unto him (his " well-beloved Lord and Friend) uſed ſpeeches to " to this effect: Well, my Lord, if you marry that filthy " baſe woman, you will utterly ruin your honour and your- " ſelf. You ſhall never do it by mine advice or conſent, " and if you do, you had beſt look to ſtand faſt. My " Lord reply'd, (bewitched with the love of the " Counteſs, and moved with the words of Sir Thomas Overbury for ſlighting her) My own legs are " ſtreight and ſtrong enough to bear me up: but in faith, " I will be even with you for this; and ſo parted " from him in a great rage. This conference was " overheard by ſome in an adjoining room, and their " depoſitions for the truth hereof were read in court. " Although this conference moved the Earl to ſuch " a ſudden choler, yet it ſeemed Sir Thomas Overbury conceited it not to be otherwiſe than a ſudden " extreme diſtemperature or paſſion, and not a final " concluſion of their boſom friendſhip, in which " the Earl ſeemed as reciprocal as before, howſoever " in his double dealing it ſeemed to be clearly otherwiſe."

(1) True and hiſtorical relation of the poyſoning of Sir Thomas Overbury; with the ſeveral arguments and ſpeeches of thoſe that were executed thereupon, &c. collected out of the Papers of Sir Francis Bacon, the King's Attorney General, p. 20, 21. edit. Lond. 1651.

[B] Committed to the Tower, April 21, 1613.] Sir Henry Wotton, in a letter of his to Sir Edmund Bacon, dated Thurſday, St. George's Eve, 1613 (2), writes thus: " The Count was full of diſcourſe and " expectation, that the King being now diſincum- " bered was diſpatched by poiſon September the 15th following, and his body was interred in the Town-

(2) Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 408, 409, 410. ral, p. 20, 21. edit. Lond. 1651.

" bered of the care of his daughter, would towards " this feaſt of St. George, fill up either all, or ſome " at leaſt of thoſe places, that had laid vacant ſo " long, and had been in this time of their emptineſs, " a ſubject of notorious oppoſition between our great (3) Rocheſter. " Viſcount (3), and the houſe of Suffolk. Thus, I " ſay, ran the opinion, when yeſterday, about ſix a " clock at evening, Sir Thomas Overbury, was " from the Council-chamber, conveyed by a Clerk " of the Council, and two of the guard, to the " Tower, and there, by warrant conſigned to the " Lieutenant, as cloſe priſoner. Which both by " the ſuddenneſs, like a ſtroke of thunder, and more " by the quality and relation of the perſon, breed- " ing in the beholders (whereof by chance I was " one) very much amazement, and being likely in " ſome proportion, to breed the like in the hearers, " I will adventure, for the ſatisfying of your thoughts " about it, to ſet down the forerunning and leading " cauſes of this accident, as far as in ſo ſhort a time " I have been able to wade in ſo deep a water. It is " conceived, that the King hath a good while been " much diſtaſted with the ſaid Gentleman, even in " his own nature, for too ſtiff a carriage of his for- " tune; beſides that ſcandalous offence of the Queen " at Greenwich, which was never but a palliated " cure. Upon which conſiderations, his Majeſty " reſolving to ſever him from my Lord of Rocheſter, " and to do it not diſgracefully or violently, but in " ſome honourable faſhion, he commanded, not long " ſince, the Archbiſhop, by way of familiar diſ- " courſe, to propound unto him the Ambaſſage of " France, or of the Arch-duke's court, whereof the " one was ſhortly to be changed, and the other at " the preſent vacant. In which propoſition, it ſeem- " eth, though ſhadowed under the Archbiſhop's " good-will, that the King was alſo contented ſome " little light ſhould be given him of his Majeſty's in- " clination unto it, grounded upon his merit. At " this the fiſh did not bite; whereupon the King " took a rounder way, commanding my Lord Chan- " cellor, and the Earl of Pembroke, to propound " jointly the ſame unto him, (which the Archbiſhop " had before moved) as immediately from the King; " and to ſweeten it the more, he had (as I hear) an " offer made him of aſſurance, before his going, of " the place of Treaſurer of the Chamber, which he " expecteth after the death of the Lord Stanhope, " whom belike the King would have drawn to ſome " reaſonable compoſition. Notwithſtanding all which " motives and impulſives, Sir Thomas Overbury re- " fuſed to be ſent abroad, with ſuch terms, as were " by the Council interpreted pregnant of contempt, " in a caſe where the King had opened his will; " which refuſal of his, I ſhould, for my part, eſteem " an eternal diſgrace to our occupation, if withal, I " did not conſider how hard it is to pull one from the " boſom of a favourite. Thus you ſee the point, " upon which one hath been committed, ſtanding " in the ſecond degree of power in the Court, and " conceiving (as himſelf told me but two hours be- " fore) never better than at that preſent of his own " fortunes and ends. Now in this whole matter, " there is one main and principal doubt, whether " this were done without the participation of my " Lord of Rocheſter; a point neceſſarily infolding " two different conſequences; for were it done with- " out his knowledge, we muſt expect of himſelf " either a decadence or a ruin; if not, we muſt " then expect a reparation by ſome other great pub- " lick ſatisfaction, whereof the world may take as " much notice. Theſe clouds a few days will clear. " In the mean while I dare pronounce of Sir Tho- " mas Overbury, that he ſhall return no more to " his ſtage, unleſs Courts be governed every year by " a new philoſophy, for our old principles will not " bear it." Mr. John Packer, in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, then Embaſſador in Holland, dated at London, April 22, 1613, and printed in Winwood's Memorials of State (4), writes thus: " Ye- (4) Vol. 3. p. 447. edit. Lond. 1725, in folio. " ſterday about ſix of the clock, my Lord Chancel- " lor, and my Lord of Pembroke, were employed by " the King to ſpeak with Sir Thomas Overbury, and " to make him an offer of an Ambaſſage into the " Low Countries or France, which he would. " Whereto he made anſwer, that he was not capa- " ble of ſuch employment for want of language, " nor able to undergoe it by reaſon of his weakneſs, " being ſo exceedingly troubled with the ſpleen, " that if he had a long letter to write, he was feign " to give over. Therefore he ſhould not be fit to " attend any buſyneſs, as in accepting this offer he " muſt be forced to do. And whereas it was al- " leadged, that his Majeſty intended this for his good " and preferment, he would not leave his country " for any preferment in the world. Some ſay, he " added ſome other ſpeech, which was very ill " taken; but what it ſhould be I cannot yet learn. " But not to trouble your Lordſhip with length, this " report being made to the King, he ſent my Lord " of Pembroke for the Lords, who were in Councill, " (my Lord Chancellor ſtaying ſtill with his Majeſty,) " to whom he declared, when they were come, that " he could not obtaine ſo much of a Gentleman, and " one of his ſervants, as to accept an honorable " imployment from him. In concluſion he gave them " order to ſend for him, and to ſend him to the " Tower, where he is cloſe priſoner. I leave all " circumſtances and preambles to your Lordſhip. " Now for my Lord of Rocheſter, who had but new " ly begun to leave his chamber, he knew nothing till " all was done and he gone; which your Lordſhip " may imagine did much perplex him. But that " evening my Lord of Pembroke and Sir Henry " Nevill were with him, and ſo were againe " morning, who have given him ſo good advice, " that if he follows it, as I hope he will, all this " will be well with him, and no hurt to his friend. " Thus in haſt I have but only given your Lordſhip " a taſte of this buſyneſs, which your Lordſhip ſhall " hear more particularly by the report of others." Mr. John Chamberlaine likewiſe in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated at London May 6, 1613 (5), (5) Ibid. p. 453. writes as follows: The true cauſe of Sir Thomas Overbury's committing to the Tower, was a contemptuous anſwer, and refuſing of forreign imployments offered him in the King's name; and eſpecially that he inſiſted, that the King could not in law nor juſtice force him to forſake his country. But ſome ſay, he was moſt urged to that of Muſcovy, which drave him to that peremptory and unmannerly anſwer. Indeed we have great doings in hand, and ſtrange projects for that place, which I doubt will all prove diſcourſes in the air, for they be grounded upon certaine ſpeeches of ſome oft he Nobility to an Engliſh Merchant about two years ſince; but tempora mutantur, and the caſe is much altered there ſince that time. Yet the King apprehends the buſyneſs very earneſtly, and hath cauſed Sir Henry Nevill to confer with ſome of the Councill about it diverſe times; wherein they ſay he hath ſhewed great ſufficiency, and diſcourſed at large what commodity might ariſe by bringing the whole trade of Perſia and the inland parts of the Eaſt Indies up the river Hydaſpes, and ſo with a ſhort cut down the river Oxus into the Caſpian Sea, and then up the river Volga to a ſtraight of land, that will carry all into the river Dwina, that runs down to St. Nicholas and the town of Archangell, the ordinary port and ſtation of our ſhipping in thoſe parts. Theſe are goodly ſpecious diſcourſes of things not ſo eaſily done as ſpoken. For my part, I can never believe, that people will put themſelves ſo under the King's protection, as to be governed by a deputy; and we can afford them no other. And if the matter ſhould come to any paſs, what a buſyneſs and charge it would be to tranſport thither twelve or fifteen thouſand men (which are the numbers ſpoken of) you may judge. Some ſay, my Lord Rocheſter took Sir Thomas Overbury's committing to heart. Others talk as if it were a great diminution of his favour and credit; which the King doubting would not have it ſo conſtrued; but the next day told the Council, that he meant him daily more grace and favour, as ſhould be ſeen in ſhort time; and that he took more delight and contentment in his company and converſation than in any man's living. . . . There was a ſpeech of a divorce to be proſecuted this term betwixt the Earl of Eſſex and his Lady; and to that end he was content to confeſs (whether true or faigned) inſufficiency in himſelf. But there happened an accident, that hath altered the caſe; for ſhe having ſought out a certain

(b) Camden, ubi ſupra. Wood is miſtaken in ſaying, that it was within two months.

Town-Chapel the ſame day [C]. About two years after (b) the whole contrivance of his death was diſcovered, and ſeveral perſons being found guilty of, or conſenting to it, were afterwards executed, viz. Sir Jervas Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower, Richard Weſton and tain wiſe woman had much conference with her; and ſhe (after the nature of ſuch creatures) drawing much money from her, at laſt couſened her of a Jewell of great value; for which being apprehended and clapt up, ſhe accuſed the Lady of diverſe ſtrange queſtions and projects; and in concluſion, that ſhe dealt with her for the making away of her Lord, as aiming at another mark. Upon which ſcandal and ſlander, the Lord Chamberlaine and his friends think it not fit to proceed in the divorce. The ſame Gentleman in another letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated at London June 10, 1613 (7), writes thus: "Sir Thomas Overbury lyes ſtill by it, and "for ought I hear is like ſo to do..... The divorce "between the Earle of Eſſex and his Lady is on foot, "and hath been argued twice or thrice at Lambeth "before certain Commiſſioners, but à huis clos. The "greateſt difficulty is, that though he be willing to "confeſs his inſufficiency towards her, yet he would "have liberty to marry with any other, as being "maleficiatus only ad illam. Yet ſome Lawyers are "of opinion, that if ſhe will take her oath, that "he is impotent towards her, it will ſerve the turn; "whereof it is thought ſhe will make no bones, as "preſuming that ſhe is provided of a ſecond: which "I ſhould never have ſuſpected, but that I know "he was with her three hours together within theſe "two days; which makes me ſomewhat to ſtagger, "and to think that great folks, to compaſs their "own ends, have neither reſpect to friends or fol-"lowers." The Earl of Southampton in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated Auguſt 6, 1613 (8), writes thus. I perceive by your laſt letter that you have been of late particularly advertiſed of the proceedings in England, and how the buſyneſs, of which we deſire ſo much to hear the concluſion, is ſtill in ſuſpence. The difficulty alledged is the not having as then accommodated the matter of Sir Thomas Overbury, which many times bred diſturbance, and hindred the performance of the reſolution taken; and it is in vain to hope for any good iſſue of the other untill that be ſettled, which I thinke to be done long ere this after this manner; that upon his ſubmiſſion he ſhall have leave to travail, with a private intimation not to return until his Majeſtie's pleaſure be further known. And much adoe there hath been to keepe him from a publique cenſure of baniſhment and loſs of office; ſuch a rooted hatred lyeth in the King's heart towards him. And that Blocke being now removed, I find the ſame confidence, that I left touching Sir Henry Neville; which I ſhall be as glad of as any, but (as I wrote before) this often deferring hath made me doubtfull. Of the Nullity (8) I ſee you have heard as much as I can write; by which you may diſcern the power of a King with Judges; for of thoſe, which are now for it, I know ſome of them, when I was in England, were vehemently againſt, as the Biſhop of Ely (9) and Coventry (10). For the buiſneſs itſelf, I proteſt I ſhall be glad, if it may lawfully, that it may go forward; though of late I have been fearful of the conſequence, and have had my fears encreaſed by the laſt letters, which came to me. But howſoever the manner of interpoſing gives me no cauſe of contentment.

(7) Ibid. p. 460.

(8) Ibid. p. 475.

(8) Of the marriage of the Earl of Eſſex and his Lady.

(9) Dr. Lancelot Andrews.

(10) Dr. Richard Neile.

[C] Here he lay in cloſe confinement till he was diſpatched by poiſon, September the 15th following, and his body was interred in the Tower-chapel the ſame day.] In the true and hiſtorical Relation of the poyſoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, cited in the Remark [A], we are informed (11), that Weſton was recommended by Sir Thomas Monſon, at the deſire of the Counteſs of Eſſex, to Sir Jervas Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower, to be the keeper of Overbury. This Weſton confeſſed, that he had been a procurer and pander to that Lady, while ſhe was Counteſs of Eſſex, and the Viſcount Rocheſter. He being appointed Sir Thomas Overbury's keeper on the 6th of May 1613, would not ſuffer that Gentleman's Father, Brother, or any of his relations or friends to ſee him during his confinement, and agreed with Mrs. Turner, an agent of the Counteſs's, to adminiſter to Sir Thomas whatever ſhe ſhould ſend him. Accordingly having received from Mrs. Turner the ſame day a yellow poiſon called Roſacar in a viol, and carrying Sir Thomas's ſupper in one hand, and the viol in the other, and meeting the Lieutenant of the Tower, he ſaid, Sir, ſhall I give it him now? The Lieutenant anſwered, What ſhall you give him? Weſton replied, As if you did not know, Sir. The Lieutenant blaming him, he carries the poiſon into an inner room, which Weſton adminiſtered to Sir Thomas Overbury the 9th of May in broth. This was proved by the confeſſion of Weſton and the Lieutenant. Weſton having given him this poiſon, which worked violently by vomits and purging; he demanded his reward of Mrs. Turner, who replied, The man is not yet dead; perfect your work, and you ſhall have your hire. Sir Thomas Overbury by his cloſe impriſonment and poiſoning grew ſick, and having no friends ſuffered to viſit him, wrote to the Viſcount to procure his releaſement; who anſwered, that the time would not permit, but as ſoon as poſſible he would haſten his delivery. On the 5th of June the Viſcount wrote to him a letter, in which he ſent him a white powder, deſiring him to take it: It will make you, ſays he, more ſick; but fear not, I will make this a means for your delivery and for the recovery of your health. Sir Thomas took the powder, which worked upon him extremely, whereupon his ſickneſs grew more violent, this powder being poiſon, as Weſton confeſſed. Sir Thomas Overbury thus languiſhing, and being ſurprized, that he could not in two months after taking this powder be releaſed, wrote to the Viſcount, repreſenting his diſtreſſed condition, and reproaching his Lordſhip with forgetfulneſs; and his letter was to this purpoſe, as St. Thomas's ſervants, who ſaw it, depoſed: Sir, I wonder you have not yet found means to effect my delivery; but I remember you ſaid you would be even with me, and ſo you are indeed. But aſſure yourſelf, my Lord, if you do not releaſe me, but ſuffer me thus to die, my blood will be required at your hands. The Viſcount wrote to comfort him, and excuſed himſelf for not being able yet to procure his delivery. Sir Thomas after taking the powder languiſhed more and more; and to comfort him, ſome followers of the Viſcount were ſent to him daily in the name of his Lordſhip, and by the appointment of the Lady Eſſex, who told him, that if he deſired any meats, which might be better provided for him than thoſe in the Tower, he ſhould have them. This was three months after his impriſonment. He, according to the cuſtom of ſick perſons, deſired luſcious meats, tarts, and jellies; which were provided by Mrs. Turner, with the knowledge of the Counteſs, and ſent to him, poiſoned with Mercury Sublimate, and Sir Thomas eat of them, which increaſed his ſickneſs (2). After he had been five months in priſon, he wrote a letter to the Viſcount, a copy of which is in the Cotton Library. Titus B. VII. On the back of it the following words are written in the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke's own hand, Cop. Overb. letter to Ro. And indeed, both the ſubject matter and the ſtyle ſufficiently evidence its Author, though it is plain, that the copier was not very correct in the tranſcribing it, there being ſeveral palpable miſtakes in it. As there is no date to it, it is pretty difficult to adjuſt the preciſe time when it was written, tho' one paſſage in it, where he mentions his being five months a priſoner, makes it clear, that it was not long before his unhappy end, which it is not improbable this very letter might haſten. The letter is as follows. "This "paper comes under ſeales, and therefore ſhall "be bold to ſpeake to you, as I uſed to do myſelf. "I underſtand, that you told my brother, that my "unreverent ſtile ſhould make an alienation betwixt "you and me hereafter, at leaſt ſuch a one, as we "ſhould never be as we had been. With what face "could you tell him, that you would be leſſe to "me, to whome you owe more than to any ſoul "liveing, both for your fortune, underſtanding, and "reputation? One who loſt his fortune with Ignati, "entered into a quarrel with Niger, ſuffered five "months baniſhment, and now five months miſera-"ble impriſonment; and now to make ſo poor a "pretence, to ſay you will alter toward me for the "ſtyle

(11) p. 22.

(12) Ibid. p. 22——25.

and James Franklin, who attended Sir Thomas Overbury in his chamber, and gave him meats and broths, wherein the poiſon was mingled; and Anne Turner, a phyſician's widow, who prepared the poiſon. In May 1616, Carr, Earl of Somerſet, and the Lady Frances his Counteſs, were condemned to death for contriving the murder, and hiring the perſons

" ſtyle of my letters? Alas! this ſhift will not ſerve " to cover your vow, your ſacrificeing me to your " woman, your holding a firm friendſhip with thoſe " that brought me hither, and keepe me heare, and " not make it your firſt act of any good termes with " them to ſet me free, and reſtore me to yourſelf " againe. And you bid my brother keep your intent " ſecret, that you might ſteale away with your " wickedneſs. But that ſhall not be; you and I " will come to a public tryal before all the friends I " have. They ſhall know what words have paſt " betwixt us heretofore of another nature then theſe; " and I pray you, keep you my letters, that they may " ſee how much I forgot your Lordſhip in my ſtyle. " I ſhall be upon the racke, you at your eaſe negli- " gent of me, and I muſt ſpeak calmly. Yf Hector " of the Harlaw be ſo infamous for betraying a " ſtranger, your ſtorie ſhall be put down to betray, " and ſo quit a friend. But now I will confeſs you, " ſo ſoon as I perceived how little (never name love) " human affection, how little compaſſion, (no, not " ſo much as the colt in Enfield Chace) when I heard " how, notwithſtanding my miſerie, you viſited your " woman, frizled your head never more curiouſly, " took care for hangings, and dayly were ſolicitous " about your cloaths; officious in waighting, could " preſerve your cozen and Gibbe; held day-traffique " of letters with my enemies, without any turning " it to my good; ſent me nineteen projects and " promiſes for my libertie, then at the beginning of " the next week, ſent me ſome frivolous account of " the miſcarriage of them, and ſo ſlip out of towne; " and all this ill nature ſhewed by the man, whoſe " conſcience tells him, that truſting to him brought " me hither, and by him that conveighed all my " ſervice to Julius, and made himſelf valued by " his maiſter for it, and my ſhare to be a priſon " upon ſuch tearmes that never man ſuffered yet, nay " knoweth, that what he ſpeakes and writes howerly, " is mine, and yet forget him that ſowed that " in him, and upon whoſe ſtocke he ſpendes; nay, " forget him, betwixt whom was nine years love, " and ſuch ſecrets of all kinds have paſſed, and in " the noyance, my father and mother languiſhing " for me. My ſoul wiſheth ſhe might but lye upon " the boards to bear me compány. My brother Lyd " overthrown by it, his aunt diſcharging him from " her houſe, which ſaved 300 l. a yeare. And he " that is the Author of all, and that hath more " cauſe to love, yet periſh for me, rather than ſee " me periſh, to ſtand ſtupid, and leeſe a jot of any " thing that concerns himſelf, go on and make " much of one; nay, let my enemies play upon me, " ſend for tickets under my hand; ſo that, by God, " ſince I came in, I have not found the advantage " of a ſtrawe, by not ſo much as a ſervant in my " extream ſickneſs, nor my friends free to ſpeake " my laſt wordes to. When I had obſerved this, the " bitterneſs of my ſoul cannot conceal itſelf in let- " ters; and that his wickedneſs may never die, I " have all this vacation wrote the ſtory betwixt you " and me, from the firſt hower to this day; what I " found you at firſt; what I found you when I came; " how I loſt all the great ones of my countrye for " ſtudying your fortune, reputation, and underſtand- " ing; how many hazards I have runn for you; how " many Gentlemen, for giving themſelves to you, " a ſtranger, are now left to the oppreſſion of their " enemies; what ſecrets have paſt betwixt you and " me; and then for the laſt part, how when you fell " in love with that woman, as ſoon as you had " wonne her by my letters, and after all the difficul- " ties being paſt, then uſed your own for common " paſſages; then you uſed your own, and never af- " ter, but denied, concealed, and jugled betwixt " your man and yourſelf; and upon that cauſe there " came many breaches at Huntington and New-Mar- " ket, and after at Whitehall. Thereupon you " made your vow, that I ſhould live in the Court, " was my friend, and many oaths, which are now " fulfilled; ſtayed me here when I would have been " gone, and ſent for me twice that daythat I was caught " in the trap; and long intending in your thoughts " long agoe a marriage with that woman, deny'd " ſince me to enquire of her; would ſpeak ill of " her yourſelf; and having been now two months " reconciled to a league, not to have firſt, upon thoſe " of theirs, made ſure my liberty and return; and " now at laſt, when we may eaſily live the reſt of " our life in peace, and enjoy the remembrance of " troubles, now you leave me out, and take occaſion " upon unreſpective language, to ſay, you will never be " to me as you have bin. All theſe particulars I have " ſet down in a large diſcourſe, and on Tueſday I " made an end of wrighting it fair, and on Fryday " I have ſealed it up under eight ſeales, and ſent it " by a friend of myne whome I dare truſt, takeing " his oath not to open it. I ſend to him, and then " to all my friends Noble, and Gentlemen, and " Women, and then to read it to them, and take " copies of it; and vowde to have wrote the truthe. " This, I thinke, you will not deny a worde. So " thus, if you will deal thus wickedly with me, I " have provided that, whether I die or live, your " nature ſhall never die, nor leave to be the moſt " odious man alive."

Sir Thomas languiſhed till September 6. when Mrs. Turner procured an Apothecary's boy, for 20 l. to poiſon a glyſter, which was adminiſtred by the boy and Weſton to Sir Thomas upon the 7th of September; who after that fell into a great extremity of vomiting and purging till he expired. At his death, his body appeared to be covered with blains and bliſters, which the Viſcount reported to be occaſioned by the pox, though that imputation was fully removed by Sir Thomas's ſervants, and other perſons, who depoſed, that before his impriſonment, he was of a clear and ſound body, and only had an iſſue in his left arm, in order to draw off the rheum and humours, which his continually ſitting at his ſtudy ſubjected him to. None of his friends or relations were permitted to ſee his body, nor was it view'd by the Coroner, which is uſual when any private priſoner dies in the Tower; but it was immediately buried in a pit digged in a very mean place (13).

(13) True and hiſtorical Relation, p. 26.

In the Cotton Library, Titus, B. VII. fol. 464, &c. are the two following Letters of the Earl of Northampton to Sir Jervas Elways or Helwiſe, the Lieutenant of the Tower.

" Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

" My Lord of Rocheſter deſiring to do the laſt " honour to his deceaſed friend, requires me to de- " ſire you to deliver the body of Sir Thomas Over- " bury to any friend of his, that deſires it, to do " him honour at his funeral. Herein my Lord " declares the conſtancy of his affection to the dead, " and the meaning that he had in my knowledge to " have given his ſtrongeſt ſtraine at this time of " the King's being at Tiballes, for his delivery. I " fear no impediment to this honourable deſire of " my Lord's but the unſweetneſs of the body, be- " cauſe it was reported, that he had ſome iſſues, and " in that caſe the keeping of him above muſt needs " give more offence than it can do honour. My " fear is alſo, that the body is already buried upon " that cauſe whereof I write; which being ſo, it is " too late to ſet out ſolemnity. Which with my " kind commendations I ende, and reſte,

" Your affectionate and aſſured friend,

" H. Northampton."

P. S. " You ſee my Lord's earneſt deſire with my " concurring care, that all reſpect be had to him, " that may be for the credit of his memory; but yet " I wiſh withall, that you do very diſcreetly enforme " yourſelf, whether this grace hath been afforded perſons concerned in it; but were afterwards pardoned by the King, and only baniſhed the Court. Sir Thomas Overbury was a man of admirable wit and learning, as appears from his writings [D]. He had a Nephew of both his names, who was a Knight, and Juſtice of Peace for the County of Glouceſter, and enjoyed the eſtate of the Overbury's at Bourton on the Hill in that County; which he ſold about the year 1680 to Alexander Popham, Eſq; and afterwards retired to an eſtate of his at Adminton in Queinton Pariſh in Glouceſterſhire, where he died February 28, 1680, and was interred in Queinton Church,

" formerly

" formerly to cloſe priſoners; or whether you may " grant my requeſt in this caſe, who ſpeak out of " the ſenſe of my Lord's affection, though I be a " Counſellor, without offence or prejudice. For I " would be loath to draw either you or myſelf into " cenſure, now I have well thought of the matter, " though it be a work of charity."

Upon the back of this letter are the following words, Sir Gervaiſe Helwiſe's own hand:

So ſoon as Sir Thomas Overbury was departed, I writ unto my Lord of Northampton; and becauſe my experience could not direct me, I deſired to know what I ſhould do with the body, acquainting his Lordſhip with his iſſues, as Weſton had informed me, and other fowlneſs of his body, which then was accounted the pox. My Lord writ unto me, that I ſhould firſt have his body viewed by a jewry; and I well remember his Lordſhip adviſed me to ſend for Sir John Lidcote to ſee the body, and to ſuffer as many els of his friends to ſee it as would, and preſently to bury it in the body of the Quire, for the body could not keep. Notwithſtanding Sir Thomas Overbury dying about five in the morning, I kept his body unburied until three or four o'clock in the afternoon. The next day Sir John Lidcote came thither; I could not get him to beſtow a coffin nor a winding-ſheet upon him. The coffin I beſtowed; but who did winde him, I know not. For indeed the body was very noyſome; ſo that notwithſtanding my Lord's direction, by reaſon of the danger of keeping the body, I kept it overlong, as we all felt.

GER. HELWYSSE.

The other letter of the Earl of Northampton is as follows.

" Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

" Let me intreat you to call Lidcote and three or " four of his friends, if ſo many come, to view " the body, if they have not already done it; " and ſo ſoon as it is viewed, without ſtaying the " coming of a meſſenger from the Court, in any " caſe ſee it enterred in the body of the Chappel " within the Tower inſtantly. If they have viewed, " then bury it by and by; for it is time, conſider- " ing the humours of that damn'd crew, that only " deſire means to move pity, and raiſe ſcandals. " Let no man's inſtance move you to make ſtay in " any caſe, and bring me theſe Letters, when I next " ſee you. Fail not a jote herein, as you love your " friends; nor after Lidcote and his friends have " viewed, ſtay one minute, but let the Prieſt be " ready; and if Lidcote be not there, ſend for him " ſpeedily, pretending that the body will not tarry. " In poſte haſte at 12.

" Yours ever."

[D] His writings.] His Poem intitled, The Wife, was printed ſeveral times at London during his life. In 1614 it was reprinted at London in 4to, with the following title: A Wife, now the Widow of Sir Thomas Overburye. Being a moſt exquiſite and ſingular Poem of the choice of a Wife. Whereunto are added many witty Characters and conceited Newes, written by himſelfe and other learned Gentlemen his friends. To this edition is prefixed the following advertiſement of the printer to the reader, dated May 16, 1614, omitted in the following ſubſequent editions. " Thy ignorance may challenge libertie " enough not to reliſh the deepe arte of poetry, be- " cauſe opinion makes thee obſtinate, and rude tra- " dition hath taught thee nothing but an abuſe of " knowledge. For when thou readeſt a quaffing fel- " lowes Barbariſme, a worthy-written ſtile in Tra- " gedies, and a colluſive flouriſh onely fronted with " the name of excellent, thou over-lookſt them all " with the uſual contempt or aſperſion of frivolous " and fantaſticke labours; putting no difference be- " twixt the horſe pictured on a ſigne-poſt, and the " curious limb'd Pegaſus. But the Age gives one " comfort in extremitie, that as there is a Lizard, " which aſſailes, ſo there is one, which wonders at " the majeſtie of man. Sure I am, if any ſhall " neglect, nay not commend the worth of this " ſo generally approved Poem, he may (if it pro- " ceeds from nice criticiſme) bee well concluded " as a churliſh retainer to the Muſes; if from a di- " rect plaine dealing, he muſt be degraded for in- " ſufficiencie. For had ſuch a Volume been extant " among the antient Romanes, though they wanted " our eaſie converſations of wit by printing; yet " would they rather and more eaſily have committed " the ſenſe hereof to braſſe and cedar leaves, then let " ſuch an author have left his due eternitie. If to con- " verſe with a creature ſo amiable here deſcribed be " thought more than difficult, let then the contem- " plation of it be admirable, which hath expreſſed " the Soule in ſo compact a forme of body. The " ſurpluſage, that now exceeds the laſt edition was " (that I may bee honeſtly impartiall) in ſome things " only to be challenged by the firſt author, but others " now added, (little inferior to the reſidue) being in " nature anſwerable, and firſt tranſcribed by Gentle- " men of the ſame Qualitie, I have upon good in- " ducements made publicke with warrantie of their " and my own credit. Not doubting therefore to " be doubly diſcharged both by the verdict of " conſcience and the well-deſerved thankes of all ju- " dicious readers, I bid you every one farewell." The Argument or Method, as it is called, of this Poem, is as follows. Firſt of Marriage, and the Effects thereof Children. Then of his contrarie, Luſt; then for his Choice. Firſt his opinion negatively, what ſhould not be: the firſt cauſes of it, that is, neither Beauty, Birth, nor Portion. Then affirmatively, what ſhould be, of which kind there are fower; Goodneſs, Knowledge, Diſcretion, and as a ſecond thing, Beauty. The firſt onely is abſolutely good; the other, being built upon the firſt, doe likewiſe become ſo. Then the application of that woman by love to himſelf, which makes her a wife. And laſtly, the only condition of a wife, Fitneſſe. In this Poem our Author writes thus:

For wandring Luſt, I know 'tis infinite;
It ſtill begins, and addes not more to more;
The guilt is everlaſting, the delight
This inſtant doth not feele of that before:
The taſte of it is only in the ſenſe,
The operation in the conſcience.
Woman is not luſt's bounds, but womankind:
One is love's number; who from that doth fall,
Hath loſt his hold, and no new reſt ſhall find:
Vice hath no meane, but not to be at all:
A wife, is that enough, luſt cannot find,
For luſt is ſtill with want, or too much pinde.
Bate luſt the ſin, my ſhare is ev'n with his;
For not to luſt, and to enjoy, is one:
And more or leſſe paſt, equall nothing is;
I ſtill have one, luſt one at once alone;
And though the woman often changed be,
Yet hee's the ſame without varietie.
Marriage our luſt (as 'twere with fuell fire)
Doth, with a medicine of the ſame, allay;
And not forbid, but rectifie deſire.
Myſelf I cannot chuſe, my wife I may:
And in the choice of her it much doth lye,
To mend myſelfe in my poſteritie.
O rather let me love, than be in love!
So let me chuſe, as wife and friend to find:
Let me forget her ſex, when I approve.
Beaſts likeneſſe lyes in ſhape, but ours in minde:
Our ſoules no ſexes have, their love is cleane,
No ſex, both in the better part are men.

and James Franklin, who attended Sir Thomas Overbury in his chamber, and gave him meats and broths, wherein the poiſon was mingled; and Anne Turner, a phyſician's widow, who prepared the poiſon. In May 1616, Carr, Earl of Somerſet, and the Lady Frances his Counteſs, were condemned to death for contriving the murder, and hiring the perſons

" ſtyle of my letters? Alas! this ſhift will not ſerve " to cover your vow, your ſacrificeing me to your " woman, your holding a firm friendſhip with thoſe " that brought me hither, and keepe me heare, and " not make it your firſt act of any good termes with " them to ſet me free, and reſtore me to yourſelf " againe. And you bid my brother keep your intent " ſecret, that you might ſteale away with your " wickedneſs. But that ſhall not be; you and I " will come to a public tryal before all the friends I " have. They ſhall know what words have paſt " betwixt us heretofore of another nature then theſe; " and I pray you, keep you my letters, that they may " ſee how much I forgot your Lordſhip in my ſtyle. " I ſhall be upon the racke, you at your eaſe negli- " gent of me, and I muſt ſpeak calmly. Yf Hector " of the Harlaw be ſo infamous for betraying a " ſtranger, your ſtorie ſhall be put down to betray, " and ſo quit a friend. But now I will confeſs you, " ſo ſoon as I perceived how little (never name love) " human affection, how little compaſſion, (no, not " ſo much as the colt in Enfield Chace) when I heard " how, notwithſtanding my miſerie, you viſited your " woman, frizled your head never more curiouſly, " took care for hangings, and dayly were ſolicitous " about your cloaths; officious in waighting, could " preſerve your cozen and Gibbe; held day-traffique " of letters with my enemies, without any turning " it to my good; ſent me nineteen projects and " promiſes for my libertie, then at the beginning of " the next week, ſent me ſome frivolous account of " the miſcarriage of them, and ſo ſlip out of towne; " and all this ill nature ſhewed by the man, whoſe " conſcience tells him, that truſting to him brought " me hither, and by him that conveighed all my " ſervice to Julius, and made himſelf valued by " his maiſter for it, and my ſhare to be a priſon " upon ſuch tearmes that never man ſuffered yet, nay " knoweth, that what he ſpeakes and writes howerly, " is mine, and yet forget him that ſowed that " in him, and upon whoſe ſtocke he ſpendes; nay, " forget him, betwixt whom was nine years love, " and ſuch ſecrets of all kinds have paſſed, and in " the noyance, my father and mother languiſhing " for me. My ſoul wiſheth ſhe might but lye upon " the boards to bear me company. My brother Lyd " overthrown by it, his aunt diſcharging him from " her houſe, which ſaved 300 l. a yeare. And he " that is the Author of all, and that hath more " cauſe to love, yet periſh for me, rather than ſee " me periſh, to ſtand ſtupid, and leeſe a jot of any " thing that concerns himſelf, go on and make " much of one; nay, let my enemies play upon me, " ſend for tickets under my hand; ſo that, by God, " ſince I came in, I have not found the advantage " of a ſtrawe, by not ſo much as a ſervant in my " extream ſickneſs, nor my friends free to ſpeake " my laſt wordes to. When I had obſerved this, the " bitterneſs of my ſoul cannot conceal itſelf in let- " ters; and that his wickedneſs may never die, I " have all this vacation wrote the ſtory betwixt you " and me, from the firſt hower to this day; what I " found you at firſt; what I found you when I came; " how I loſt all the great ones of my countrye for " ſtudying your fortune, reputation, and underſtand- " ing; how many hazards I have runn for you; how " many Gentlemen, for giving themſelves to you, " a ſtranger, are now left to the oppreſſion of their " enemies; what ſecrets have paſt betwixt you and " me; and then for the laſt part, how when you fell " in love with that woman, as ſoon as you had " wonne her by my letters, and after all the difficul- " ties being paſt, then uſed your own for common " paſſages; then you uſed your own, and never af- " ter, but denied, concealed, and jugled betwixt " your man and yourſelf; and upon that cauſe there " came many breaches at Huntington and New-Mar- " ket, and after at Whitehall. Thereupon you " made your vow, that I ſhould live in the Court, " was my friend, and many oaths, which are now " fulfilled; ſtayed me here when I would have been " gone, and ſent for me twice that daythat I was caught " in the trap; and long intending in your thoughts " long agoe a marriage with that woman, deny'd " ſince me to enquire of her; would ſpeak ill of " her yourſelf; and having been now two months " reconciled to a league, not to have firſt, upon thoſe " of theirs, made ſure my liberty and return; and " now at laſt, when we may eaſily live the reſt of " our life in peace, and enjoy the remembrance of " troubles, now you leave me out, and take occaſion " upon unreſpective language, to ſay, you will never be " to me as you have bin. All theſe particulars I have " ſet down in a large diſcourſe, and on Tueſday I " made an end of wrighting it fair, and on Fryday " I have ſealed it up under eight ſeales, and ſent it " by a friend of myne whome I dare truſt, takeing " his oath not to open it. I ſend to him, and then " to all my friends Noble, and Gentlemen, and " Women, and then to read it to them, and take " copies of it; and vowde to have wrote the truthe. " This, I thinke, you will not deny a worde. So " thus, if you will deal thus wickedly with me, I " have provided that, whether I die or live, your " nature ſhall never die, nor leave to be the moſt " odious man alive."

Sir Thomas languiſhed till September 6. when Mrs. Turner procured an Apothecary's boy, for 20 l. to poiſon a glyſter, which was adminiſtred by the boy and Weſton to Sir Thomas upon the 7th of September; who after that fell into a great extremity of vomiting and purging till he expired. At his death, his body appeared to be covered with blains and bliſters, which the Viſcount reported to be occaſioned by the pox, though that imputation was fully removed by Sir Thomas's ſervants, and other perſons, who depoſed, that before his impriſonment, he was of a clear and ſound body, and only had an iſſue in his left arm, in order to draw off the rheum and humours, which his continually ſitting at his ſtudy ſubjected him to. None of his friends or relations were permitted to ſee his body, nor was it view'd by the Coroner, which is uſual when any private priſoner dies in the Tower; but it was immediately buried in a pit digged in a very mean place (13).

(13) True and hiſtorical Relation, p. 26.

In the Cotton Library, Titus, B. VII. fol. 464, &c. are the two following Letters of the Earl of Northampton to Sir Jervas Elways or Helwiſe, the Lieutenant of the Tower.

" Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

" My Lord of Rocheſter deſiring to do the laſt " honour to his deceaſed friend, requires me to de- " ſire you to deliver the body of Sir Thomas Over- " bury to any friend of his, that deſires it, to do " him honour at his funeral. Herein my Lord " declares the conſtancy of his affection to the dead, " and the meaning that he had in my knowledge to " have given his ſtrongeſt ſtraine at this time of " the King's being at Tiballes, for his delivery. I " fear no impediment to this honourable deſire of " my Lord's but the unſweetneſs of the body, be- " cauſe it was reported, that he had ſome iſſues, and " in that caſe the keeping of him above muſt needs " give more offence than it can do honour. My " fear is alſo, that the body is already buried upon " that cauſe whereof I write; which being ſo, it is " too late to ſet out ſolemnity. Which with my " kind commendations I ende, and reſte,

" Your affectionate and aſſured friend,

" H. Northampton."

P. S. " You ſee my Lord's earneſt deſire with my " concurring care, that all reſpect be had to him, " that may be for the credit of his memory; but yet " I wiſh withall, that you do very diſcreetly enforme " yourſelf, whether this grace hath been afforded perſons concerned in it; but were afterwards pardoned by the King, and only baniſhed the Court. Sir Thomas Overbury was a man of admirable wit and learning, as appears from his writings [D]. He had a Nephew of both his names, who was a Knight, and Juſtice of Peace for the County of Glouceſter, and enjoyed the eſtate of the Overbury's at Bourton on the Hill in that County; which he ſold about the year 1680 to Alexander Popham, Eſq; and afterwards retired to an eſtate of his at Adminton in Queinton Pariſh in Glouceſterſhire, where he died February 28, 1680, and was interred in Queinton Church,

" formerly

" formerly to cloſe priſoners; or whether you may " grant my requeſt in this caſe, who ſpeak out of " the ſenſe of my Lord's affection, though I be a " Counſellor, without offence or prejudice. For I " would be loath to draw either you or myſelf into " cenſure, now I have well thought of the matter, " though it be a work of charity."

Upon the back of this letter are the following words, Sir Gervaiſe Helwiſe's own hand:

So ſoon as Sir Thomas Overbury was departed, I writ unto my Lord of Northampton; and becauſe my experience could not direct me, I deſired to know what I ſhould do with the body, acquainting his Lordſhip with his iſſues, as Weſton had informed me, and other foulneſs of his body, which then was accounted the pox. My Lord writ unto me, that I ſhould firſt have his body viewed by a jewry; and I well remember his Lordſhip adviſed me to ſend for Sir John Lidcote to ſee the body, and to ſuffer as many els of his friends to ſee it as would, and preſently to bury it in the body of the Quire, for the body could not keep. Notwithſtanding Sir Thomas Overbury dying about five in the morning, I kept his body unburied until three or four o'clock in the afternoon. The next day Sir John Lidcote came thither; I could not get him to beſtow a coffin nor a winding-ſheet upon him. The coffin I beſtowed; but who did winde him, I know not. For indeed the body was very noyſome; ſo that notwithſtanding my Lord's direction, by reaſon of the danger of keeping the body, I kept it overlong, as we all felt.

GER. HELWYSSE.

The other letter of the Earl of Northampton is as follows.

" Worthy Mr. Lieutenant,

" Let me intreat you to call Lidcote and three or " four of his friends, if ſo many come, to view " the body, if they have not already done it; " and ſo ſoon as it is viewed, without ſtaying the " coming of a meſſenger from the Court, in any " caſe ſee it enterred in the body of the Chappel " within the Tower inſtantly. If they have viewed, " then bury it by and by; for it is time, conſider- " ing the humours of that damn'd crew, that only " deſire means to move pity, and raiſe ſcandals. " Let no man's inſtance move you to make ſtay in " any caſe, and bring me theſe Letters, when I next " ſee you. Fail not a jote herein, as you love your " friends; nor after Lidcote and his friends have " viewed, ſtay one minute, but let the Prieſt be " ready; and if Lidcote be not there, ſend for him " ſpeedily, pretending that the body will not tarry. " In poſte haſte at 12.

" Yours ever."

[D] His writings.] His Poem intitled, The Wife, was printed ſeveral times at London during his life. In 1614 it was reprinted at London in 4to, with the following title: A Wife, now the Widow of Sir Thomas Overburye. Being a moſt exquiſite and ſingular Poem of the choice of a Wife. Whereunto are added many witty Characters and conceited Newes, written by himſelfe and other learned Gentlemen his friends. To this edition is prefixed the following advertiſement of the printer to the reader, dated May 16, 1614, omitted in the following ſubſequent editions. " Thy ignorance may challenge libertie " enough not to reliſh the deepe arte of poetry, be- " cauſe opinion makes thee obſtinate, and rude tra- " dition hath taught thee nothing but an abuſe of " knowledge. For when thou readeſt a quaffing fel- " lowes Barbariſme, a worthy-written ſtile in Tra- " gedies, and a colluſive flouriſh onely fronted with " the name of excellent, thou over-lookſt them all " with the uſual contempt or aſperſion of frivolous " and fantaſticke labours; putting no difference be- " twixt the horſe pictured on a ſigne-poſt, and the " curious limb'd Pegaſus. But the Age gives one " comfort in extremitie, that as there is a Lizard, " which aſſailes, ſo there is one, which wonders at " the majeſtie of man. Sure I am, if any ſhall " neglect, nay not commend the worth of this " ſo generally approved Poem, he may (if it pro- " ceeds from nice criticiſme) bee well concluded " as a churliſh retainer to the Muſes; if from a di- " rect plaine dealing, he muſt be degraded for in- " ſufficiencie. For had ſuch a Volume been extant " among the antient Romanes, though they wanted " our eaſie converſations of wit by printing; yet " would they rather and more eaſily have committed " the ſenſe hereof to braſſe and cedar leaves, then let " ſuch an author have left his due eternitie. If to con- " verſe with a creature ſo amiable here deſcribed be " thought more than difficult, let then the contem- " plation of it be admirable, which hath expreſſed " the Soule in ſo compact a forme of body. The " ſurpluſage, that now exceeds the laſt edition was " (that I may bee honeſtly impartiall) in ſome things " only to be challenged by the firſt author, but others " now added, (little inferior to the reſidue) being in " nature anſwerable, and firſt tranſcribed by Gentle- " men of the ſame Qualitie, I have upon good in- " ducements made publicke with warrantie of their " and my own credit. Not doubting therefore to " be doubly diſcharged both by the verdict of " conſcience and the well-deſerved thankes of all ju- " dicious readers, I bid you every one farewell." The Argument or Method, as it is called, of this Poem, is as follows. Firſt of Marriage, and the Effects thereof Children. Then of his contrarie, Luſt; then for his Choice. Firſt his opinion negatively, what ſhould not be: the firſt cauſes of it, that is, neither Beauty, Birth, nor Portion. Then affirmatively, what ſhould be, of which kind there are fower; Goodneſs, Knowledge, Diſcretion, and as a ſecond thing, Beauty. The firſt onely is abſolutely good; the other, being built upon the firſt, doe likewiſe become ſo. Then the application of that woman by love to himſelf, which makes her a wife. And laſtly, the only condition of a wife, Fitneſſe. In this Poem our Author writes thus:

For wandring Luſt, I know 'tis infinite;
It ſtill begins, and addes not more to more;
The guilt is everlaſting, the delight
This inſtant doth not feele of that before:
The taſte of it is only in the ſenſe,
The operation in the conſcience.
Woman is not luſt's bounds, but womankind:
One is love's number; who from that doth fall,
Hath loſt his hold, and no new reſt ſhall find:
Vice hath no meane, but not to be at all:
A wife, is that enough, luſt cannot find,
For luſt is ſtill with want, or too much pinde.
Bate luſt the ſin, my ſhare is ev'n with his;
For not to luſt, and to enjoy, is one:
And more or leſſe paſt, equall nothing is;
I ſtill have one, luſt one at once alone;
And though the woman often changed be,
Yet hee's the ſame without varietie.
Marriage our luſt (as 'twere with fuell fire)
Doth, with a medicine of the ſame, allay;
And not forbid, but rectifie deſire.
Myſelf I cannot chuſe, my wife I may:
And in the choice of her it much doth lye,
To mend myſelfe in my poſteritie.
O rather let me love, than be in love!
So let me chuſe, as wife and friend to find:
Let me forget her ſex, when I approve.
Beaſts likeneſſe lyes in ſhape, but ours in minde:
Our ſoules no ſexes have, their love is cleane,
No ſex, both in the better part are men.

Church. He wrote, 1. A true and perfect Account of the Examination, Trial, Condemnation, and Execution of Joan Perry and her two ſons, John and Richard Perry, for the ſuppoſed murder of William Harriſon, Gent, &c. London 1676 in 4to, written by way of Letter to Thomas Shirley, Doctor of Phyſick, in London. 2. Queries propoſed to the ſerious Conſideration of thoſe, who impoſe upon others in things of divine and ſupernatural Revelation, and proſecute any upon the account of Religion; with a deſire of their candid and Chriſtian Reſolution thereof. Printed in 1677. In anſwer to this Mr. George Vernon, Rector of Bourton on the Water, publiſhed the ſame year at London in 8vo, Ataxiæ Obſtaculum; an Anſwer to certain Queries intitled, Queries propoſed, &c. Upon this Sir Thomas Overbury wrote a Reply, entitled, Ratiocinium Vernaculum: Or, A Reply to

But phyſicke for our luſt their bodies be,
But matter fit to ſhew our love upon,
But only ſhells for our poſteritie:
Their ſouls were giv'n leſt man ſhould be alone;
For but the ſoule's interpreters words be,
Without which bodies are no companie.
That goodly frame we ſee of fleſh and blood,
Their faſhion is, not weight; it is, I ſay,
But their laye part, but well digeſted food:
'Tis but 'twixt duſt and duſt life's middle way:
The worth of it is nothing that is ſeene,
But only that it holds a ſoule within.
And all the carnal beautie of my wife
Is but ſkin-deep, but to two ſenſes knowne;
Short even of pictures, ſhorter-liv'd then life,
And yet the love ſurvives, that's built thereon:
For our imagination is too high,
For bodies, when they meet, to ſatisfie.
All ſhapes, all colours, are alike in night;
Nor doth our touch diſtinguiſh ſoule or faire;
But man's imagination and his ſight;
And thoſe, but the firſt weeke, by cuſtome are Both made alike, which diffred at firſt view;
Nor can that diffrence abſence much renew.
Nor can that beauty lying in the face,
But merely by imagination be
Enjoy'd by us in an inferior place:
Nor can that beauty be enjoying we
Make ours become; ſo our deſire growes tame;
We changed are, but it remaines the ſame.

He afterwards tells us, that goodneſs ſhould be one of the chief objects in his choice of a wife.

" Good is a fairer attribute than white:
" 'Tis the mind's beauty, keepes the other ſweet:
" That's not ſtill one, nor mortall with the light;
" Nor glaſſe nor painting can it counterfet.
" Shee's truly faire, whoſe beauty is unſeen
" Like Heav'n faire ſight-ward, but more fair within.
" By good, I would have holy underſtood:
" So God ſhe cannot love, but alſo mee:
" The law requires our words and deeds be good:
" Religion ev'n the thoughts doth ſanctifie:
" And ſhee is more a maide, which raviſh't is,
" Than ſhee which only doth but wiſh amiſſe.
" Luſt only by Religion is withſtood:
" Luſt's object is alive, his ſtrength within;
" Moralitie reſiſts but in cold blood;
" Reſpect of credit feareth ſhame, not ſin:
" But no place dark enough for ſuch offence
" She findes that's watch't by her owne conſcience.
" Then may I truſt her body with her mind,
" And thereupon ſecure need never know
" The pangs of jealouſie; and love doth find
" More paine to doubt her falſe, then know her ſo;
" For patience is of evills, that are known,
" The certaine remedie; but doubt hath none.
" And be the thought once ſtirr'd, 'twill never die;
" Nor will the griefe more mild by cuſtome prove;
" Nor yet amendment can it ſatisfie:
" The anguiſh more or leſſe is as our love:
" This miſerie doth jealouſie enſue,
" That we may prove her falſe, but cannot true.
" Suſpicion may the will of luſt reſtraine,
" But good prevents from having ſuch a will:
" A wife that's good doth chaſte and more containe;
" For chaſte is but an abſtinence from ill;
" And in a wife that's bad although the beſt
" Qualities, yet in a good, the leaſt."

. . . . . .

" Give me next good, an underſtanding wife,
" By nature wiſe, not learned by much art:
" Some knowledge on her ſide will all my life
" More ſcope of converſation impart;
" Beſides her in-born vertue fortifie:
" They are moſt firmely good, that beſt know why.
" A paſſive underſtanding to conceive,
" And judgment to diſcerne, I wiſh to find:
" Beyond that all as hazardous I leave.
" Learning and pregnant wit in womankind,
" What it findes malleable, maketh fraile,
" And doth not adde more ballaſte, but more faile.
" Bookes are a part of man's prerogative;
" In formall inck they thoughts and voyces hold,
" That we to them our ſolitude may give,
" And make time preſent travaile that of old.
" Our life Fame peeceth longer at the end,
" And bookes it farther backward do extend.
" Domeſticke charge doth beſt that ſex befit,
" Contiguous buiſnes, ſo to fixe the mind,
" That leaſure ſpace for fancies not admit:
" Their leaſure 'tis corrupteth womankind.
" Elſe being plac'd from many vices free,
" They had to heav'n a ſhorter cut than we."

To this poem are ſubjoin'd Characters, or witty Deſcriptions of the Properties of ſundry Perſons; and Newes from any whence, or old truthes under a ſuppoſall of Noveltie: Occaſioned by divers Eſſayes and private Paſſages of Wit between ſundry Gentlemen upon that Subject. To the fifteenth edition are prefixed, Elegies of ſeveral Authors on the untimely Death of Sir Thomas Overbury, poyſoned in the Tower. In this edition are added many new Characters; Certaine Edicts from a Parliament in Eutopia, written by the Lady Southwell; Paradoxes, as they were preſented before his Majeſty at Whitehall, &c. The Mountebankes Receipts and Songs. We ſhall give a Specimen of his characters in that of A meer Scholar, which is as follows. " A meer Scho" lar is an intelligible aſs, or a ſilly fellow in blacke,
" that ſpeaks ſentences more familiarly than ſenſe.
" The antiquity of his Univerſity is his creed, and " the excellency of his colledge, though but for a " match of foot-ball, an article of his faith. He
" ſpeaks Latine better then his mother-tongue; and
" is a ſtranger in no part of the world but his owne
" country. He do's uſually tell great ſtories of him-
" ſelfe to ſmall purpoſe, for they are commonly ri" diculous, be they true or falſe. His ambition is,
" that he either is or ſhall be a Graduate. But if " ever he get a Fellowſhip, he has then no fellow.
" In ſpight of all Logike he dares ſweare and main-
" taine it, that a cuckold and a townſman are termi-
" ni convertibiles, though his mother's huſband bee
" an Alderman. Hee was never begotten, as it
" ſeems, without much wrangling; for his whole
" life is ſpent in pro & contra. His tongue goes al-
" waies before his wit, like a Gentleman-uſher, but " ſomewhat faſter. That hee is a compleat Gentle-
" man in all points cap á pe, witneſſe his horſeman-
" ſhip and the wearing of his weapons. Hee is com" monly long-winded, able to ſpeake more with
" eaſe, than any man can endure to heare with pa" tience.

to Ataxiæ Obſtaculum : Being a pretended Anſwer to certain Queries diſperſed in ſome parts in Glouceſterſhire. London 1678, in 8vo. T.

" tience. Univerſity-jeſts are his univerſal diſcourſe, " and his newes the demeanour of the Proctors. His " phraſe, the apparell of his minde, is made of di- " vers ſhreds like a cuſhion ; and when he goes " plaineſt, it hath a raſh outſide and fuſtian linings. " The current of his ſpeech is cloſed with an Ergo; " and whatever be the queſtion, the truth is on his " ſide. 'Tis a wrong to his reputation to be igno- " rant of any thing ; and yet he knowes not that " he knowes nothing. Hee gives directions for " huſbandry from Virgil's Georgicks, for cattell from " his Bucolicks, for warlike ſtratagems from his Æne- " ids or Cæſar's Commentaries. He orders all things, " and thrives in none ; ſkillfull in all trades, and " thrives in none. He is led more by his ears than " his underſtanding, taking the ſound of words for " their true ſenſe ; and dos therefore confidently be- " lieve, that Erra Pater was the father of Here- " tiques ; Rodulphus Agricola, a ſubſtantial farmer ; " and will not ſticke to averre, that Syſtemo's Logicke " doth excell Keckerman's. His ill lucke is not ſo " much in being a foole, as in being put to ſuch " paines to expreſſe it to the world ; for what in " others is naturall, in him, with much adoe, is " artificiall. His povertie is his happineſſe, for it " makes ſome men believe, that he is none of For- " tune's favourites. That learning, which hee hath, " was in non-age put in backeward like a gliſter, and " it's now like ware miſlaid in a Pedler's packe ; " he has it, but knowes not where it is. In a word, " hee is the index of a man, and the title-page of a " ſcholar, or a puritane in morality ; much in pro- " feſſion, nothing in practice." Beſides theſe pieces, he wrote, Of the Remedy of Love, in two Parts : A Poem. London 1620, in 8vo. There are aſcribed two pieces, viz. Obſervations upon the Provinces United, and on the Preſent State of France. London 1651, in 8vo, with his picture before it ; and The Arraign- ment and Conviction of Sir Walter Raleigh at the King's Bench-Bar at Weſtminſter, 17 Novemb. 1603, &c. London 1648, in 4to, ſaid to be copied by our Author. T.

☞ OUGHTRED (WILLIAM), an eminent Engliſh Mathematician in the 17th Century, was born at Eaton about the year 1573, as appears from a picture of his by Hollar, where he is ſaid to be Anno Ætatis 73, 1646 ; and educated in the ſchool there ; whence he was elected to King's College in Cambridge in 1592 (a), where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1596, and of maſter in 1599. He was Fellow of that College ; and in this Society continued about eleven or twelve years The time, which could be ſpared there from his academical ſtudies, he employed upon the Mathematical Sciences ; and by inciting, aſſiſting, and inſtructing others, he brought many to reliſh that noble and uſeful part of learning (b). He received holy Orders from Dr. Thomas Bilſon, Biſhop of Wincheſter (c). About the year 1603 he left the Univerſity, and was preſented to the Rectory of Aldbury near Guildford in Surrey, where he lived ſo retired and ſtudious a life, that he ſeldom travelled ſo far as London once in a year ; his recrea- tions being diverſity of ſtudies ; " and as oft, ſays he (d), as I was toyled with the labours " of my own profeſſion, I have allayed that tedioufneſs by walking in the pleaſant and " more than Elyſian fields of the diverſe and various parts of human learning, and not " of the Mathematicks only." About the year 1628 the Earl of Arundel, who then lived at Weſt-Horſely, though he afterwards bought an houſe at Aldbury, ſent for him, and afterwards at London appointed him a chamber in his own houſe (e), where he in- ſtructed his Lordſhip's Son William in the Mathematicks (f). In 1631 he publiſhed at London in a ſmall octavo, Arithmeticæ in numero & ſpeciebus Inſtitutio : quæ tum Logiſ- ticæ, tum Analyticæ, atque adeo totius Mathematicæ quaſi Clavis eſt. Ad nobiliſſimum ſpec- tatiſſimumque Juvenem Dn. Gulielmum Howard, Ordinis, qui dicitur, Balnei Equitem, honoratiſſimi Dn. Thomæ, Comitis Arundelliæ & Surriæ, Comitis Mareſchalli Angliæ, &c. filium [A]. This book was reprinted with conſiderable alterations and additions in the year 1648, under this title ; Gulielmi Oughtredi Ætonenſis, quondam Collegii Regalis in Cantabrigiâ Socii, Clavis Mathematice denuo limata ſive potius fabricata. And in 1647 it was publiſhed in Engliſh in 8vo, with the title of The Key of the Mathematicks new forged and filed ; together with a Treatiſe of the Reſolution of all kinde of affected Æquations in numbers. With the Rule of compound Uſury ; and a Demonſtration of the Rule of falſe Po- ſition ; and a moſt eaſie Art of delineating all manner of plaine Sun-dyalls, geometrically taught by William Oughtred [B]. The third edition of his Clavis was printed at Oxon 1652 in

(a) From the Regiſter of King's College, Cambridge.

(b) See his Apologetical Epiſtle, ſubjoined to his Circles of Proportion, London 1633, in 4to.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) See the Dedication to our Author's Clavis Mathematicæ.

[A] In 1631 he publiſhed at London in a ſmall 8*vo*, Arithmeticæ in numeris & ſpeciebus Inſtitutio, &c.] There is a copy of this book in the hands of William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S. with notes throughout in the hand-writing of Mr. John Greaves, Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in the Univerſity of Oxford. The Dedication to Sir William Howard, Knight of the Bath, and ſon of Thomas Earl of Arundel, is dated at Arundel-houſe January 1, 1631. Dr. John Wallis in his Hiſtory of Algebra, in the chapter concerning Mr. Oughtred and his Clavis, ſays, that " though " when Vieta firſt introduced this way of ſpecious " Arithmetick, it was then more neceſſary (the " thing being new) to expreſs the terms made uſe of " in words at length ; yet when the thing was once " received in practiſe, Mr. Oughtred, (who affected " brevity, and to deliver what he taught as briefly as " might be, and reduce all to a ſhort view) contented " himſelf with ſingle letters inſtead of thoſe words. " And by this means he hath in his Clavis a great " deal of very good Geometry brought into a very " narrow room ; and you ſhall hardly find in any, " who have written before, ſo much of it delivered " with ſo much clearneſs in ſo few words. I know " there are, who find fault with his Clavis, as too " obſcure, becauſe ſo ſhort, but without cauſe ; for " his words are always full, but not redundant, and " need only a little attention in the reader to weigh " the force of every word, and the ſyntax of it ; " and he will then find as much ſaid in a few words, " as others are uſed to expreſs in a large diſcourſe. " And this, when once apprehended, is much more " eaſily retained, than if it were expreſſed with the " prolixity of ſome other writers, where the reader " muſt firſt be at the pains to weed out a great deal " of ſuperfluous language, that he may have a ſhort " proſpect of what is material ; which is here con- " tracted for him in a ſhort ſynopſis."

[B] The Key of the Mathematicks new forged and filed, &c.] This is dedicated by our author to Sir Richard Onſlow, Knight, one of the Knights of the Parliament for the County of Surrey, and to Arthur Onſlow, in 8vo; to which were added the following pieces. I. Æquationum affectarum Resolutio: ubi etiam multa de Logarithmorum usu interseruntur. II. Elementi decimi Euclidis Declaratio. III. De Solidis Regularibus Tractatus. IV. De Anatocismo sive Usurâ compositâ. V. Regula falsæ Positionis demonstrata. VI. Theorematum in Libris Archimedis de Sphærâ & Cylindro Declaratio. VII. Horologiorum Sciotericorum in plano, Geometricè solum, sine Calculo Trigonometrico, delineandorum modus facillimus; per quem Meridiana, Substylaris, & Stylus ipse, non investigantur modo, sed etiam, in cujus vis generis Plano, situ proprio inscribuntur, omniaque perspicuè demonstrantur. Inventore Gulielmo Oughtredo, 23m. Ætatis annum agente. His Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument, were published at London 1633 in 4to, by his scholar, Mr. William Forster [C]; to which is added in some Onslow, Esq; one of the Burgesses of the Parliament, eldest son of the said Sir Richard Onslow. In the Preface to the Reader he observes, that "many years "since he being employed by the late illustrious "Earl of Arundel to instruct one of his sons in the "Mathematicks, penned, for his use, in Latine, a "method of precepts, for the more ready attaining, "not a superficial notion, but a well-grounded un-"derstanding of those mysterious sciences, and of "the antient writers thereof. This afterwards, says "he, at the request of divers learned and judicious "men, I published under the name of Clavis Ma-"thematicæ. Which treatise being not written in "the usuall synthetical manner, nor with verbous "expressions, but in the inventive way of Analytice, "and with symboles or notes of things instead of "words, seemed unto many very hard, though in-"deed it was but their own diffidence, being scared "by the newnesse of the delivery, and not any dif-"ficulty in the thing itselfe. For the specious and "symbolical manner neither reacheth the memory "with multiplicity of words, nor chargeth the "phantasie with comparing and laying together; "but plainly presenteth to the eye the whole course "and processe of every operation and augmentation. "Now my scope and intent in the first edition of "that my Keye was, and in this new filing, or ra-"ther forging of it, is to reach out to the ingenious "lovers of these sciences, as it were Ariadne's "thread, to guide them through the intricate laby-"rinth of these studies, and to direct them for the "more easy and full understanding of the best and "antienteſt author; such as are Euclides, Archimedes, "Apollonius Pergæus, that great Geometer, Diophantus, "Ptolemæus, and the rest: that they may not only learn "their propositions, which is the higheſt point of art, "that most students aime at; but also may perceive "with what solertiousnesse, by what engines of æqua-"tions, interpretations, comparations, reductions, and "disquisitions, those antient worthies have beautified, "enlarged, and first found out this most excellent "science. Truly, when I was conversant in read-"ing their bokes, and with wonder observed their "most witty demonstrations, so skilfully framed out "of principles, as one would little expect or thinke, "but laid together with divine artifice; I was even "amazed, whence possibly any power of imagina-"tion should be able to sustaine so immense a pile of "consequences, and cause that so many things, so "far asunder distant, could be at once present to "the minde, and as with one consent joyne and lay "themselves together for the structure of one argu-"ment. Wherefore that I might more clearly be-"hold the things themselves, I uncasing the propo-"sitions and demonstrations out of their covert "of words, designed them in notes and species ap-"pearing to the very eye. After that, by compa-"ring the divers affections of Theoremes in equality, "proportion, affinity, and dependence, I tryed to "educe new out of them. Lastly, by framing like "questions problematically, and in way of analysis, "as if they were already done, resolving them into "their principles, I sought out reasons and means, "whereby they might be effected. And by this "course of practice, not without long time and "much industry, I found out this way for the helpe "and facilitation of art. Hereunto also is added, a "short tract concerning the resolution of adfected "æquations proposed in numbers; whereof mention "is made in the end of the former booke. And by "the way is inserted so much as is needfull for the "use both of decimall parts and of logarithmes. "And last of all, a most natural and easie geome-"tricall way of delineating sun-dyals upon any plaine "howsoever situated." The tract concerning Geometrical Dialling was invented by our Author between 22 and 23 years of age. There is a copy of his Key of the Mathematicks, with a great many additions and corrections in his own hand-writing, in the possession of William Jones, Esq; F. R. S.

[C] His Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument, was published at London 1633, in 4to, by his scholar, Mr. William Forster.] The title is as follows: The Circles of Proportion, and the Horizontal Instrument. The former shewing the manner how to work Proportions both simple and compound, and the ready and easy resolving of Quæstions both in Arithmetic, Geometrie, and Astronomie; and is newly increased with an Additament for Navigation. All which rules may also be wrought with the penne by arithmetic, and the canon of triangles. The later teaching how to work most Quæstions, which may be performed by the globe: and to delineat dialls upon any kind of plaine. Hereunto is annexed the excellent use of two rulers for calculation. Invented and written in Latine by W. O. Translated into English, and set out for the public benefit, by William Forster. The Dedication of Mr. Forster to Sir Kenelm Digby is dated May 1. 1632. and in it he writes thus: "Being in the time of the long vaca-"tion, 1630, in the country of the reverend, and "my most worthy friend and teacher, Mr. William "Oughtred (to whose instruction I owe both my Ini-"tiation, and whole progress in these sciences,) I, "upon occasion of speech, told him of a Ruler of "Numbers, Sines and Tangents, which one had bespo-"ken to be made (such as is usually called Mr. Gun-"ter's Ruler) six feet long, to be used with a payre "of beame compasses. He answered, That was a "poore invention, and the performance very troublesome. "But, said he, seeing you are taken with such mecha-"chanicall wayes of instruments, I will shew you what "devises I have had by mee these many years. And first, "he brought to me two Rulers of that sort, to be "used by applying one to the other, without any "compasses. And after that, he shewed mee those "Lines cast into a Circle or Ring, with another move-"able Circle upon it. I seeing the great expedite-"nesse of both these wayes, but especially of the "latter, wherein it farre excelleth any other instru-"ment, which hath been knowne, told him, I "wondered that he could so many years conceale "such usefull inventions, not onely from the world, "but from myselfe, to whom in other parts and "mysteries of art, he had been so liberall. He "answered, that the true way of art is not by instru-"ments, but by demonstrations; and that it is a pre-"posterous course of vulgar teachers to begin with in-"struments, and not with the sciences; and so instead of "artists, to make their schollers only doers of tricks, "and as it were juglers, to the despite of art, losse of "precious time, and betraying of willing and industrious "wits upon ignorance and idlenesse. That the use of "instruments is indeed excellent, if a man be an ar-"tist; but contemptible, being set and opposed to art. "And lastly, that he meant to commend to me the skill "of instruments, but first he would have me well in-"structed in the sciences. He also shewed me many "notes and rules for the use of those circles, and of "his Horizontal Instrument, (which he had projected "about 30 years before) the most part written in "Latine. All which I obtained of him leave to "translate into English, and make publike, for the "use and benefit of such as were studious and lovers "of these excellent sciences. Which thing, while "I with ſome Editions Mr. Oughtred's Apologetical Epiſtle to the Engliſh Gentry againſt Mr. Richard Delamain [D]. In 1636 was printed at London in 8vo, our Author's Deſcription and

" I with mature and diligent care (as my occaſions " would give me leave) went about to doe; another, " to whom the Author, in a long conference, diſ- " covered his intent, uſing more haſt than good " ſpeed, went about to preoccupate; of which un- " timely birth, and preventing (if not circumventing) " forwardneſſe, I ſay no more, but adviſe the ſtu- " dious Reader, only ſo farre to truſt, as he ſhall be " ſure doth agree to truth and art." This Mr. Forſter appears to have been a Teacher of the Mathematics, in London, from the following note at the bottom of the Circles of Proportion; Thoſe, that deſire further inſtructions in the uſe of theſe inſtruments, or other parts of the mathematiques, may repaire to W. Forſter, at the Red-Bull, over-againſt St. Clement's Church-yard, without Temple-Bar.

[D] To which is added, in ſome editions, Mr. Oughtred's Apologeticall Epiſtle to the Engliſh Gentry, againſt Mr. Richard Delamain.] This Epiſtle is entitled, To the Engliſh Gentry, and all others ſtudious of the Mathematics, which ſhall bee Readers hereof; the juſt Apologie of Wil. Oughtred, againſt the ſlaunderous Inſimulations of Richard Delamain, in a Pamphlet, called, Grammelogia; or, The Mathematicall Ring; or, Mirifica Logarithmorum projectio circularis. In this epiſtle he obſerves, that it is not without impiety to be affirmed, that any part of good literature is alien and abhorrent from the calling of a Divine; but that in all ages, many of the moſt eminent in the ſublimity of Theologie, have beene alſo converſant in the ſtudy of the Mathematicks, moſt profitably making them to ſerve and ancillate to their higheſt contemplations. And they that have wanted ſuch helpe, have heartily wiſhed for it, and found in themſelves the defect. And that in no other thing, after his ſacred word, Almighty God (who creating all things in number, weight, and meaſure, doth moſt exactly geometrize) hath left more expreſſe prints of his heavenly and infallible truth, then in theſe ſciences; in which onely the mind and underſtanding of a man can find ſecure reſt and ſure footing, all other knowledges being involved with a thicke miſt of ignorance and obſcurity. Beſides, that the exerciſe of theſe arts accuſtomed to the certainty of demonſtration, quickeneth the underſtanding, rouſing it up from a laſie and drowſie indormition and ſervile aſſent to dialecticall and conjecturall probabilities, and ſpurring it forward, and ſupplying it with means, unto the accurate inveſtigation of true and undeceivable principles. With regard to the Horizontal Inſtrument, he tells us, that long ago, when he was a young ſtudent of the Mathematical Sciences, he tried many ways and devices to fit himſelf with ſome good dial or inſtrument portable for his pocket, to find the hour, and try other concluſions by; and accordingly framed for that purpoſe both quadrants, and rings, and cylinders, and many other compoſures; yet not to his full content and ſatisfaction; for either they performed but little, or elſe were patched up with a diverſity of lines by an unnatural and forced contexture. And at laſt conſidering, that all manner of queſtions concerning the firſt motions were performed moſt properly by the Globe itſelf, rectified to the preſent elevation by the help of a moveable Azimuth; he projected the Globe upon the plane of the Horizon, and applied to it at the center, which was therein the Zenith, an Index with projected degrees, for the moveable Azimuth; in which projection he firſt found, what he had before with much ſtudy and pains in vain ſought for. And becauſe he ſeldom went to London, where he might have the help of large compaſſes and other inſtruments for drawing the arches of very big circles, he was forced to betake himſelf to ſuch ſhift as art would afford him, and invented many theorems, problems, and practices, (ſuch as no man before, that ever he could find, had delivered) for the finding out of the interſections, and all and every points of all thoſe circles, by which he might draw the ſame, and divide them being drawn. " About thirty years ſince, ſays he, I preſented one " of them drawne with my own hand to the truely " Reverend Prelate, Doctour Byliſon, Biſhop of Win- " cheſter, by whom I was made Preſbyter. About " five and twenty years agoe I beſtowed one upon a " noble Ladie, the wife of a worthy and learned " Knight, then abiding neere the place where I " live, but ſince dwelling in Worceſterſhire; which " Lady with ingeniouſneſſe and ſolertie more than " ſœminine, tooke delight in the ſpeculation and uſe " of the Globe. And for her I writ many notes " upon my inſtrument, the very ſame almoſt word " for word, which many years after I ſent in a let- " ter to Elias Allen, and are they, which Delamain " acknowledgeth to have ſeene, but ſlighteth. . . . . " In the ſpring 1618, I being at London, went to " ſee my honoured friend Maſter Henry Briggs at " Greſham College; who then brought me acquaint- " ed with Maſter Gunter, lately choſen aſtronomie " reader there, and was at that time in Dr. Brooks " his chamber; with whom falling into ſpeech " about his Quadrant, I ſhewed him my Horizontal " Inſtrument. He viewed it very heedfully, and " queſtioned about the projecture and uſe thereof, " often ſaying theſe words, It is a very good one. " And not long after he delivered to Maſter Briggs, " to be ſent to me, mine owne inſtrument printed " off from one cut in braſſe, which afterwards I un- " derſtood he preſented to the Right Honourable the " Earle of Bridgwater. And in his booke of the " Sector printed ſix years after, among other projec- " tions ſetteth down this; herein ingenuous, that " he did not challenge it to himſelf (as our chal- " lenger doth) but not ingenuouſly enough acknow- " ledging from whom he had it. But ſuch is the pro- " vidence of God, I kept that very letter of Maſter " Briggs, wherein he ſent me that print from Maſter " Gunter, dated from Greſham College June 2; " 1618, and the Poſtſcript June 4, and which came " to my hands June 10. In which letter are theſe " words; Maſter Gunter doth here ſend you the print of " a Horizontal Diall of his drawing after your inſtru- " ment. This very letter hath beene left by me in " the hands of Elias Allen above theſe two years, " to be ſeene of any one, that will require it. . . . " About two yeares after I had ſhewed that my in- " ſtrument to Maſter Gunter, I beſtowed the very " ſame individual one upon a young Gentleman, " now a Baron, my very honourable and moſt intire " friend, a man full of vertue, full of learning, " full of all goodneſs and true nobility, whoſe onely " defect and fault is an unquenchable thirſt after " knowledge and good literature; who hath yet the " very ſame in his cuſtody, and is at this preſent in " London; whoſe honourable word and teſtimony " will confirme, that he himſelfe ſo many years " agoe knew the uſes of that inſtrument. And yet " our challenger never unvayled it to him, nor dareth " preſcribe for ſo long time. In Michaelmas " Term 1627 I came to London, and Elias Allen " having beene ſworne his Majeſtie's ſervant, had a " purpoſe to preſent his Majeſtie with ſome New- " yeares gift, and requeſted me to deviſe ſome pretty " inſtrument for him. I anſwered, that I have " heard his Majeſty delighted much in the great " concave dyall at Whitehall: and what fitter in- " ſtrument could hee have than my horizontall, " which was the very ſame repreſented in flat? and " that I would upon the backeſide ſet the theories " of the ſun and moone, and ſo by helpe of both " ſides, eclipſes might be calculated with great fa- " cility. He liked it well. The horizontall ſide " was begunne by my direction. I was not long at " home, but Maſter Allen being at a ſtand in his " worke, ſent to me for helpe. I writ him a large " letter two ſheets of paper long; wherein I taught " him the uſes of the inſtrument, eſpecially the ho- " rizontall, and afterward the fabric or delineation of " it, and how to find the ſemidiameters and centers " of the ſeverall circles both great and leſſer, and " the way to divide them: which letter Maſter Al- " len yet keepeth, and is the ſame I ſpake of before, " and which Delamain confeſſeth he ſaw." With regard to the Circles of Proportion, Mr. Oughtred confeſſes, that he had not ſo good a claim againſt all men, as for his horizontall inſtrument, tho' againſt Mr. Delamain he had. The honour of the invention, ſays he, next to the Lord of Merchiſton, and our Maſter and Uſe of the double Horizontall Diall. In 1652 at the end of the Engliſh Edition of H. Van Etten's Mathematical Recreations, printed at London, there was publiſhed a Tract of Mr. Oughtred, intitled, The Deſcription of the double Horizontall Diall, whereby not only the Hour of the day is ſhewn, but alſo the Meridian Line is found: and moſt Aſtronomical Queſtions, which may be done by the Globe, are reſolved. Invented and written by William Oughtred. In 1657 was printed his Trigonometria; hoc eſt, modus computandi Triangulorum Latera & Angulos, ex Canone Mathematico traditus & demonſtratus. Una cum Tabulis Sinuum Tangent. & Secant. &c. And likewiſe a tranſlation of it printed at London the ſame year in 4to, under this title; Trigonometrie: Or, The manner of calculating the Sides and Angles of Triangles by the Mathematical Canon, demonſtrated by William Oughtred, Etonenſ. He kept a correſpondence by letters with ſome of the moſt eminent ſcholars of his time upon mathematical ſubjects, ſome of which letters we ſhall preſent to the Reader in the Note [E], the originals being communicated to us by the learned William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S. Mr. David Lloyd (g) tells us, that our Author "having

(g) Memoirs, p. 608. edit. Lond. 1668.

Briggs, belongeth (if I have not been wrongly informed) to Maſter Gunter, who expoſed their numbers upon a ſtreight line; which being once done, was there any ſuch maſterie to bring the ſame line about a circle? And what doth this new inſtrument (call it the Circles of Proportion, or call it the Ring, or what other name you liſt) ought elſe, but only bowe and inflect Maſter Gunter's Line or Ruler? The manner how I fell upon it, was thus: I have in my ſtudie and practice of the mathematics been not a little converſant in calculation. And that I might both facilitate the labour, and try the worke, I invented many ſolerties and compendiations in logiſtica, for the one, and framed diverſe kinds of inſtruments, and mechanicall practices for the other; that when I ſhould find the performance in both wayes not to diſagree, I might be aſſured of my juſt diligence in numerary computation. Among other inſtruments, I much liked the ſame Line or Ruler; only this defect I found, that it required many times too great a paire of compaſſes, which would be hard to open, apt to ſlip, and troubleſome for uſe. I therefore firſt deviſed to have another Ruler with the former; and ſo by ſetting and applying one to the other, I did not only take away the uſe of compaſſes, but alſo made the worke much more eaſy and expedite, when I ſhould not at all need the motion of my hand, but onely the glancing of my ſight, and with one poſition of the Rulers, and view of mine eye, ſee not one onely, but the manifold proportions incident unto the queſtion intended. But yet this facility alſo wanted not ſome difficulty, eſpecially in the line of tangents, when one arch was in the former mediety of the quadrant, and the other in the latter; for in this caſe it was needfull, that either one ruler muſt bee as long againe as the other; or elſe that I muſt uſe an inverſion of the ruler, a regreſſion. By this conſideration, I firſt of all ſaw, that if thoſe lines upon both rulers were inflected into circles, that of the tangents being in both doubled, and that theſe two circles ſhould move one upon another, they with a ſmall thread in the center to direct the ſight, would bee ſufficient with incredible and wonderfull facility to worke all queſtions of Trigonometry, both right-lined and ſphericall. And according to this my ſpeculation, above twelve years agoe, I with mine owne hand made me two ſuch circles, which I have uſed ever ſince, as my occaſions required. "In the long vacation 1630, I ſhew-
" ed both the rulers and the circle to William Forſter,
" (ſomewhat præmaturely then for the deſire I had
" to leade him on the right way of art I intended)
" at my Parſonage-houſe, as in his epiſtle before his ' tranſlation he doth himſelf teſtify. To whom,
" exhorting me to publiſh them, I ſaid, I would not " appear to the world in ſuch toyes; but if hee
" would take the paines to tranſlate ſome rules I had " written, into Engliſh, we would beſtow upon Elias
" Allen (if he ſhall thinke they may bee beneficiall
" to him) both theſe circles of proportion, and alſo
" another inſtrument, conſiſting of two halfe circles,
" moſt plainely and eaſily giving the proſthaphæreſes
" of the planets according to the theory of Coper-
" nicus (which I have had fairly drawn with mine
" owne hand above theſe twenty years) which might
" be ſet upon the other ſide of the plate, and
" would together make up the moſt compleat inſtru-
" ment for all Aſtronomie, that ever yet to my know" ledge came forth. And of this intire inſtrument,
" at my comming up to London in Michaelmas
" Term following, to attend my ſervice, I did ac-
" cordingly make a moſt free donation to Elias Al-
" len, by the engagement of my promiſe."

[E] Some of which letters we ſhall preſent to the Reader in the note.]

" To the wor:ll my very lovinge friende, Mr.
" Owtreade.

" Salutem in Chriſto.

" Worthy Sir,

" If yow be at leaſure from your harveſt affaires,
" I would once moore deſier your helpe in trying the " concluſion of the quadrature of the circle. By deepe
" conſideration of the 4th chapter of Ezechiel, I doe
" finde a maniſeſt figure of declaring of the quadrate
" thereof, with all the circumſtances. The Pro" phet is willed to take a tile, or (as the word in the " Hebrew beareth) Album, a whight-table, Abacum,
" or paper; and to wright theron the name
" of the Citty Hieruſalem, which ſignifieth the " doctrine or viſion of Concorde: and it fitteth to
" the purpoſe, of a circle made to accorde with a
" right line, betweene whom ther hath alwaies
" ben unreconcileable warr. The name Hieruſalem
" ירושלם containeth, according to the common
" wrighting, 1146; but I finde alſo a ſecrett wri" ting therof in this manner, רושקם, that
" is 80 moore added, and maketh the whole num" ber 1226. And the wordes, which followe, dabis
" ſuper eam OBSIDIONEM, ædificabis TURRIM, fundes
" AGGEREM, dabis EXERCITUS, pones ARIETES IN " CIRCUITU, written in the Hebrew, and the " whole number of conſonants and vowells put to" gether of theſe words, maketh the ſame number
" 1226. And according to the common ſenſe of " thee words, it ſignifieth manifeſtly, a ſtudy of " attaining the knowledge of the ſecrett thereof.
" He is bidden firſt to ſleepe uppon his left ſide 390
" dayes, and to beare the iniquity of Iſrael; which
" ſignifieth the ſuppoſing of the quadrature to be
" the triple of that number, which is a figure of
" the iniquity of Iſrael, as that number is unequall
" to the circle. Then he is willed to ſleep on his " right ſide fourty dayes, and to beare the iniquity
" of Juda. The wordes quadraginta dies, in the He-" brewe (detracting the number of the vowells from " conſonants) make 2479, which is the diameter
" given by the firſt operation, and is notwithſtand-
" ing unequall, though leſſe than the former. He " is alſo bidden to take an yron grate to putt be" tweene him and the citty; that is, the ſquare of " ſeavens made in the manner of a grate, as a me-
" ſolabium betweene the circle, which is beſieged,
" and the right line, which is brought unto it. Then
" he is commaunded to goe about the ſiege, and not
" to ſtirr to the examining of the fraction, before he
" hath perfected and gon over the 390 partes.
" Alſo he is willed to take certaine puls, and to " make a breade of them for the number of the " dayes 390. By which is meant the compoſiti-
" on of all thoſe wordes together into one ſen-
" tens, which ſignify in the Hebrew the drawing of
" a line of ſyphers; and the number of the line is
" expreſſed by the weight of the water, which he is " to drinke, that is, the 6 part of an Hin, which is " 12, the Hin containing 72. Afterward he is will-
" ed to cutt the hayre of his head and bearde: the

" having a ſtrong perſuaſion upon principles of Art (much confirmed by the ſcheme of " his Majeſty's return in 1660, ſent his Majeſty ſome years before by the Biſhop of " Avignon) that he ſhould ſee the King reſtored, he ſaw it to his incredible joy, and had " his dimittis a month after, June 30, 1660, and the 86th (b) year of his age." But in Collier's Dictionary (i) it is aſſerted, that he died about the beginning of May 1660; for upon hearing the news of the Vote at Weſtminſter, which paſſed May 1ſt, for the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he expired in a ſudden extaſy of joy. Mr. Aubrey tells us (k), that he was interred in the Chancel of the Church of Aldbury, June 15, 1660, Anno Ætatis 88, and odd days. Mr. Lloyd obſerves (l), that " the choiceſt Mathematicians of that " age owe much of their ſkill to him, whoſe houſe was full of young Gentlemen (m), " that came from all parts to be inſtructed by him. He was much requeſted to have " lived

(b) This is a miſtake; for Mr. Oughtred was 87 years of age when he died.

(i) Vol. 2.

(k) Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of Surrey, vol. 4. p. 70, 71. edit. London 1718.

(l) Ubi ſupra.

(m) As Sir William Backhouſe, Mr. Stokes, Dr. William Lloyd, Mr. Arthur Haughton, who had much ado to prevail with his modeſty to publiſh his Trigonometrie.

" two wordes containe the beginning of the fraction " of 653, after the 6 place 3⌊141592⌊653. " He is alſo to divide them into three equall parts, " and to caſt all of them away, ſave only a litle " part, that is, one unitt; and yet of that to caſt " away ſomewhat. That little reſidew, which muſt " ſtand in the 7 place, is ſignified by an inward read- " ing to be $\frac{20}{30}$, for the unities are ſuppoſed to be 30 " a peece. So that in the 7 place, it ſeemeth the " ſtay ſhould be of fractions to come to an ende, " that the whole proportion of this diameter 390, " to the circle 1226, ſhould be 3⌊141592$\frac{20}{30}$, " which cutteth between $\frac{7 \text{ minus}}{6 \text{ plus}}$ in the ſeventh " place. Now the reaſon, which moveth me to " hoape for ſomewhat out of this place is, that it is " evident, that the way of Archimedes and Ceulin, can " never poſſibly come to an ende in the operation, to " make a certaine ſtay. For ther grownde being " the multiplication of an inſcript figure, by his " polygones to come to the nature of a circle, it " can never be effected. For the laſt polygon figure, " which can be imagined, muſt be compounded of " right lines, which part two angles. Therefore " thoſe lines may be againe divided into leſſer with- " out ende, according to the rules of philoſophy: " therefore they muſt always ende between plus and " minus. Mooreover, ſuppoſe the trew proportion of " the circle weare propounded by God, it muſt of ne- " ceſſity be either leſſe than Ceulin's, or equal, or " moore. If it be leſſe, or equall, it cannot be, " becauſe theſe proportions are defective from the " periphery, as may be proved demonſtratively. A- " gaine, if it exceed an unite, it cannot be by the " ſame demonſtration. Therefore of neceſſity it muſt " exceede Ceulin, wherſoever it ſhould chance to fall, " and yett not an unite. Therefore this is my de- " ſire, that you would take ſo much paynes for me, " as to trye whether by algebra it be poſſible to " overthrowe this ſuppoſition of the perfect propor- " tion abovenamed. For wheras Ceulin hath $\frac{7 \text{ minus}}{6 \text{ plus}}$ " in the 7 place, the unite being ſuppoſed to be a " denary, this diviſion of the unite into thirty cut- " teth a middle betweene 18, which is as 6, and " 21, which is as 7. And wheras mention was " made of a meſolabium in the ſquare of ſeavens, I " finde this uſe thereof, that the ſquare of ſevens con- " taining ⌊6 latera 175 a part, and in all in the 49 " places, 1225; ther is but one unite differens from " the circle 1226, which is reconciled by adding of " 20 days to every one of the 16 ſides of the ſquar, " being ſuppoſed to conſiſt of yeares; which fracti- " on making 320 dayes, is in groſſe taken for a " year; ſo that although every ſide conſiſting of 175 " years and 20 dayes be heterogeneall in things from " the ſemidiameter of 390 years, it is homogeneall " in number. And I finde that the life of Abra- " ham, which was 175 whole years, contayned 20 " dayes over, as I can demonſtrate by a ſecrett read- " ing. So that this formall reconciliation, not reall, " of the ſquare of ſevens unto the circle of 1226, is " made by adding of a 20 to the making of a juſt " proportion, to become thereby a figure of the " quadrature of 390 to 1226, by adding the fraction " of 20 in the 7 place. But to leave all queſtions, " which may ariſe about the premiſſes, I only deſire " you would try, if by algebra you may diſprove this " determinate fraction of $\frac{20}{30}$ in the ſeaventh place, " for the juſt proportion of the diameter 390 unto " 1226. For Ceulin's operation doeth not infringe it, " for all his ſubalterne fractions added to the 6 place " in the ſcale, doth not amount to another unite, that " it ſhould exceed $\frac{20}{30}$; and his operation onely pro- " ceedeth by proportion, that as 390⌊2479, maketh " the proportion 3⌊141592, ſo 390⌊247921 " maketh the proportion 3⌊14159265, and ſo pro- " ceedeth by the way of proportion continually to " come to a leſſer fraction.

" I entreat you moſt earneſtly, that ſo ſoone as " your leiſure will ſerve, you will take pains heerin, " and ſend me the operation which you make. For " although it ſeemeth to me, that ther being noe " meſolabium known, which may be as a logicall me- " dium to prove or diſprove this propoſition, ſa- " ving only the method of Ceulin, which cannot doe " it; yet I deſire to be ſatisfied by your experiens, " not by my owne gueſſe. And ſo wiſhing you all " happines, I reſt

Goldſmithes Alley in Red-Croſſe-Street, the 27th of Auguſt 1633.

" Your moſt loving friend,

" Wm. Alabaſter."

" To my worthie friend Mr. William Oughtred.

" Worthie Sir,

" I thanke you for your little booke, but eſpeci- " allie for the waie of callculating the diviſions of " your guaging Rod. I wiſh both for theyr owne " ſakes and yours, that the citizens were as capable " of the acutenes of this invention, as they are com- " monly greedie of gaine; and then I doubte not " but they would give you a better recompence than " I doubt now they will. I deferred to write to you " untill I heard from Mr. Derand, which I have " nowe done, and ſend you heer incloſed his letter to " you, wherein I perceive he is nowe fullie ſatisfied " of the perfection of your demonſtration. I alſo " received a letter from him, in which he highlie " commends the ſharpneſs of your invention in that " demonſtration. He writes alſo, that your Clavis " is in greate eſtimation amongſt the Mathematicians " at Paris. I have no more to trouble you with at " this time; and ſo wiſhing you all happineſs, I reſt,

" Your aſſured Friend,

Wellbeck, Feb. 11, 1635.

" Charles Cavendyſſhe."

Eruditiſſimo Domino, Domino Oughtred.

Eruditiſſime Domine,

Recepi Dominationis veſtræ Literas ſimulque dubiorum ſolutionem, quæ mihi veſter in ſolvendis mathematicis problematibus agendi modus, doctiſſimus ille quidem, ſed apud nos non ita receptus, procreaverat. Ubi enim Hypotheſim ſemel aliquam ad propoſitam quamlibet demonſtrationem aſſumpſimus, illam non patimur quamdiu probationum diffluit ſeries immutari. Et ſiquando contingat eam facilitatis majoris gratiâ, aliaſve ob cauſas, variari, id admittimus quidem, at ita tamen ut ſimul etiam Lectorem, ne tantæ mutationis inſcius deludatur, ut nobis dum veſtras rimaremur demonſtrationes contigit, admonemus. Et certè ſi Dominatio veſtra prioribus ſuis in literis de variatâ nos demonſtrationum ſuarum ratione feciſſet certiores, haud dubium eſt, ni fallor, quod illarum ſecreta omnia primis conatibus, ut & ſecundis fecimus, mutatis ad mentem veſtram ideis, penetraſſemus. Cæte-

" lived in Italy, France, and Holland, when he was little obſerved in England; as face-
" tious in Greek and Latin, as ſolid in Arithmetick, Aſtronomy, and the Sphere of all
" Meaſures, Muſick, &c. exact in his ſtyle as in his judgment, handling his tube and
" other inſtruments at eighty as ſteadily as others did at thirty; owing this, as he ſaid,
" to temperance and archery; principling his people with plain and ſolid truths, as he " did the World with great and uſeful arts; advancing new inventions in all things but " Religion; which in its old order and decency he maintained ſecure in his privacy, pru-
" dence, meekneſs, ſimplicity, reſolution, patience, and contentment." After his death ſeveral tracts of his were publiſhed. For in the year 1660 Sir Jonas Moore annexed to his Arithmetic, then printed at London in 8vo, a Treatiſe, intitled, Conical Sections: Or, The ſeveral Sections of a Cone: being an Analyſis, or methodical Contraction of the two firſt rum gratias agimus Dominationi veſtræ immortales, quod quemadmodum ſuo illo labore ac ſtudii nobiliſſimi Domini de Cavendiſh votis plenius ſatisfecit, ſic noſtra etiam cumulatiſſimè adimplerit. Vale.

Pariſiis, 8 Jan. 1635. Dominationis veſtræ obſequentiſſimus in Chriſto Servus,

Franc. Derand.

" To his honoured friend Mr. Oughtred.

Reverend Sir,

"  I will once againe earneſtly intreat you, that " you bee rather diffuſe in the ſettinge forthe of your " Engliſh Mathematical Clavis, than conciſe, conſi- " deringe that the wiſeſt of men noted of olde, and " ſaid, Stultorum infinitus eſt numerus. Thoſe arts " cannot be made too eaſy, they are ſo abſtruſe of " themſelves, and men either ſo lazye or dull, that " theire faſtidious wits will take a loathinge at the " very entrance of theeſe ſtudyes, unleſs it bee ſweeten- " ed with plaineſſe and facilitye. Brevitye maye " well argue a learned author, that without any ex- " ceſſe or redundance, either of matters or wordes, " can give the very ſubſtance and eſſence of the " thinge treated of; but it ſeldome makes ſcholler; " and if one be capable, twenty are not; and if " the maſter ſumme up in brife the parts of his " owne longe labours and travailes, it is not eaſy to " imagine the ſcholars can with leſs laboure than it " coſt their maiſter dive into the depth thereof. I " am not of their opinion, that would have myſte- " ries in the world, (divine myſteries, which God " himſelf hath locked from us, excepted,) for if ig- " norance is the puniſhment and conſequence of " ſinne, and it behoves us to take away from others " this vaile, which ſinne hath drawne betweene our " eyes and the truth of things, ſo ſhall men imitate " Angells, every ſuperior illuminatinge and per- " fecting his inferior, which redoundeth to the ho- " nour and dignity of them both, but more of the " giver than receiver. The abyſſe of theſe ſciences " is inexhauſtible, and much is loſt, that our aunceſ- " tors knewe, much yett unknowne to either; and " therefore all the helpe that humane wit or induſ- " trye can afford us, all little enough; and when all " is done, there will be a Terra incognita for Mathe- " maticians of after-ages to faile unto. Thus, Sir, " you ſee I am free and bold, becauſe lovinge and " confident, and that you will be pleaſed ſo to take " it, I will count it pardon ſufficient; and whatſo- " ever iſſues from you as a child of your braine, I " deſire it may lodge with mee, wheare it ſhall have " the beſt wellcome that affection can give it.

" Your loving and true Friende,

Lincolne, July 2, 1636. " William Robinſon."

In another letter to Mr. Oughtred dated June 11, Mr. Robinſon writes thus:

" Reverend Sir,

" But that your letter came upon the very point of " my departure out of towne (when commonly buſi- " neſſes come faſteſt on, and myſelfe indeede not " very well) I had returned you anſwere, whilſt I " was there; but for theſe reaſons and ſome others " I preſumed to defer a little, till both myne owne " occcaſions and a fit meſſenger, as now it happens, " bringe it up unto you. As for the booke I ſent " you, which I ingeniouſly confeſſed was out of my " true love unto you, I give you thanks for your per- " uſal thereof, for your judgment, and plaine deal- " inge therein; and that being all I requeſted at " your hands, I reſt ſatisfied, and concerning it there " ſhall not neede to paſſe any more betwixt us. I am " gladd alſo you have peruſed Snellius, who indeed " pleaſed me exceedingly; and I thought in the " readinge of him, a more exact way (if inſtruments " and artiſt bee both exact) could not poſſibly bee " taken, than by angles taken with a very lardge " Quadrant, and ſo good an artiſt and logiſticke " as Snellius was. Upon your letter I borrowed " your newe booke (but I intend to take your cour- " teouſe offer of one of them from Mr. Allen,) and " finde your way, p. 23, to be exceedinge good (and " indeed a curious good waye,) but why in your let- " ter you ſhould rather wiſhe the plaine table, I doe " not ſee; yett I confeſſe my ignorance therein, " being only a book ſpeculator (ſuch is the condition " of my life,) and no practicioner, becauſe I am re- " ſtrained, may well hide the reaſon from me, and " therefore do ſubmitt. In aſſigninge of a degree I " find this difference betwixt you and Snellius, that " he makes a degree to contain 353305 $\frac{785}{1000}$ En- " gliſh feete, you only 351120. The difference is " 2185 $\frac{785}{1000}$, which though not much in a whole " degree, yet I marvaile how it ſhould happen be- " twixt ſuch two good artiſts. The way by the " height of a hill and a tangent, which is Maurolycus's way, I did not propoſe as to relye upon it in " practice; but ſuppoſinge Snellius his obſervations " to be exact, I thought to try, the Earth's diame- " ter, being already given, and the height of a hill " alſo, ſuppoſe to bee 7920 feet, that is, a mile and " $\frac{1}{2}$ in the perpendicular (a height heigh enough) yett " it will not hitt, but either varyeth the Angle at " the center, or the diameter given by Snellius; yet " I dare not diſtruſt Snellius his way, it is ſo demon- " ſtrative. Your booke of navigation delighteth " mee exceedingly, and I doubt not but to finde in " it (for my time of peruſal hath yett beene but " ſhorte) the way of the ſhipp exactly taught, and " ſome things extraordinary, ſeeing (as I perceive) " you have reade Snellius his Typhus Batavus, which " was the beſt that I had reade before I reade yours; " and ſeeinge you have layd open ſo much of the " arte alreadye, I could wiſh wee might ſee a Typhus " Aldeburienſis come from the Archimedes thereof, for " verily, I thinke, omne Bonum Mathematicum, may " come from thence, if ſo you pleaſe. And I pro- " teſt unto you ſincerely, wear I able as ſome, at " whoſe handes you have merited exceedingly, or (to " ſpeake more abſolutely,) as able as willing, I " would as freely give you 500 l. per ann. as 500 " pence. And I cannot but be aſtoniſhed at this our " age, wherein pelfe and droſs is made their ſummum " bonum, and the beſt parte of man, with the true or- " naments thereof, ſcience and knowledge, are ſo " ſleighted. I would, I ſay, it weare in my power as " efficaciouſly as it is in my will, and there ſhould " not paſſe many dayes ere it weare donne. I make " no queſtion but my Lord Marſhiall (1) is very no- " ble, and intended really to you; but meethinkes " there was ſome neglect that ſo poore a favour had " ſo badd ſucceſſe. Had I intereſt about London " (for I ſee, and indeed is moſt convenient, you " would not bee far from thence) I would do my " beſt, which I will doe notwithſtandinge, though I " can promiſſe nothing but my good will, which " ſhall firſt Books of Mydorgius; and whereby the Nature of the Parabola, Hyperbola, and Ellipſis, are very plainly laid down. Tranſlated from the Papers of the learned William Oughtred. In 1675 there was printed at London in 8vo, in Mr. John Smith's Horological Dialogues, printed in 8vo, a Tract, intitled, An Appendix, wherein is contained a method of calculating all numbers for Watches; written originally by that famous Mathematitian Mr. William Oughtred, and now made publick by J. S. of London Clock-maker. Mr. Smith in the Preface to his Appendix, ſays, "The method following was many "years ſince compiled by Mr. Oughtred, for the uſe of ſome ingenious Gentlemen, his "friends,

(1) The Earl of Arundel.

"ſhall not be wantinge to the utmoſt. I ſhall longe "exceedinglye till I ſee your Clavis turned into a "pick-locke; and I beſeech you inlardg it, and "explaine it what you can, for we ſhall not neede "to feare either tautology or ſuperfluity: you are "naturally conciſe, and your cleare judgment makes "you both methodicall and pithye; and your ana-"lyticall way is indeed the only way. And if could "ſpeake a worde in your eare (for I would not "hinder Mr. Allen's profitt) I could wiſh your bookes "might be abſolute of themſelves, without any de-"pendance of inſtruments, which are either litle, "and ſo of no uſe, or if lardge, very coſtlye, and at "the beſt (to uſe Mr. Forſter's words, or rather your "owne by his pen) [they make ſcholers only doers of "tricks, or as it weare juglers, &c.] revera præſtigiis "inſtrumentorum quaſi in cortice, magna artis jactura, "imò contemptu, detinentur, yourſelfe truly averreth in "your epiſtle, which I ſpeake not as fearinge that "your Clavis ſhall be accommodated to any inſtru-"ment, but to prevent any other future worke of "yours, unleſſe withall it be abſolute of itſelfe, that "a man may chuſe whether he will buy the inſtru-"ment or no.

"As you have brought in a ſymbolicall kinde of "expreſſion (which is verye neate and good) and "wiſhe alſo that the decimall fraction weare com-"mon, (and if the decimall integer weare brought "in alſo, but that it would make ſhrewde havock "amongſt the tables extant, to divide a whole cir-"cle into ten,) it would be eaſye; but if diviſion re-"maining, which is now currant, I would have "Snellius his names of Complementum & Reſiduum "brought in; the one beinge, data Peripheriæ ad "Quadrantem differentia; the other, Exceſſus ſemi-"circuli ad datam peripheriam; ſmall things, I con-"feſſe, yett proper and diſtinct; whereas Comple-"mentum ad Semicirculum is a circumlocution, and it "is better, that diſtinct thinges have diſtinct names. "I am not ignorant, that yourſelfe hath given a "touch of this, pag. 94. ch. 13. of your Trigonome-"trye; but the word Exceſs you ſeem to uſe in a "different ſenſe. . . . . Thus, dear Sir, my beſt love "remembered to you, I ſhall ever be ready with my "beſt indeavours to doe you ſervice, and remain,

June 11th. "Your much obliged friende,
"W. Robinſon."

"To my very worthy and much reſpected freend,
"Mr. William Oughtred.

"Salutem a Salutis Datore.

"My very worthy and loving friend,
"To a Gentleman in the Citie of London, a friend "of his beyond ſea hath ſent lately a tractat in Na-"tural Philoſophye, in Germane language. This "Gentleman intretinge me to tranſlate it into Latine, "becauſe he underſtands not theGerman language, and "values the tractat much; at his intreatinge, I have "tranſlated it into Latine. I knowing that you are "a lover of all good ſciences, I beſtow this copy on "you. No man hath any of this copy in Latine, "nor was it ever printed in Latin; but only the "Gentleman himſelfe, who hath paid for the tran-"ſlation thereof, hath the firſt copie, and this is the "ſecond that I ſend unto you. Accipito ergo eo ani-"mo, quo tibi miſſum eſt. Confiteor eſſe exiguum munuſ-"culum.

"Tibi ad omnia officiorum genera
This 15 of Decemb. 1637. "longe paratiſſimus,

"Johannes Huniades Ungaro-
"Tranſilvanus."

"Mr. Foſter, our Lecturer in Aſtronomy in Gre-"ſham College, is put out, becauſe he wil not kneel "downe at the Communion Table, when he takes "the Communion. A Schotſman, one that is Verbi "Dei Miniſter, is now Lecturer in Mr. Foſter's place."

"To Mr. Oughtred.

"Sir,

"Amongſt the mathematicall rarities theſe times "have afforded, there are none of that ſmall num-"ber I (a late intruder into theſe ſtudies) have "yet viewed, which ſo fully demonſtrates their Au-"thors great abilities, as your Clavis, not richer in "augmentations, than valuable for contraction. That "forceth me to cenſure myſelf preſumptuous in "this action; and this tedious, that I have not all-"ready related the occaſion. The choiſeſt forreigne "wits within theſe 30 years, as Galileus, Scheinar, "Keplar, Hortenſius, and Monſieur de Cartas, have "ſo diligently pried into perſpectives, that it may "credibly be thought that their rareſt uſe is allready "known; yet ſo it is, I have eyther found out, or "ſtumbled at, a moſt certaine and eaſy way, wher-"by the diſtance between any the leaſt ſtars, viſible "only by a perſpective glaſſe, may be readily given, "I ſuppoſe, to a ſecond, affording the diminutions "and augmentations of the planets ſtrangely preciſe, "as alſo their centers, ſtretchable to the invention of "the moone's true parallex of altitude by its owne "body, and of the inclination of one ſtar to another "of a well knowne ſcite, and able to bring ſufficient "aid to your aged eyes, to finde all requiſits (accord-"ing to yours of navigation) at a large diſtance for "ſearching the earth's Diameter. It is a novelty ca-"pable of ſuch frequent uſe, that before it travell to "other able Judges, may I receive that favour it "ſhall undergo your experiment and cenſure. I "beſtow onely part of that time in thoſe ſtudies, "which other Gentlemen our neighbours ſpend in "hunting, and want that great help an able artiſt "might afford; and believe that you will find thoſe "errors I ſee not. If you pleaſe to grant my requeſt, "I may be readily enformed by a letter ſent by the "northern poſt, or left at the Beare in Baſing-hall-"ſtreet, with the Wakefield Cariers, directed to my "Father's houſe in Middleton, neare Leedes, where "remains, Sir,

Decemb. 2d. 1640. "Your troubleſome unknown friend,
"Will. Gaſcoigne."

"To his worthy and much reſpected friend, Mr.
"William Oughtred.

"Sir,

"Though I am a ſtranger to your perſon, yet I "am well acquainted with the fame of your ſingular "ſkill in the mathematicks; and hereupon have ſo "farr preſumed as to entreat your aſſiſtance for the "geometricall ſolution of the incloſed diagram, "which to you, that have attained the perfection of "the analyticall art, perhaps will not appeare diffi-"cult. But whether all that may be performed by "algebraicall equations, may likewiſe be wrought "geometrically, according to a linearye operation, "I am not able to reſolve, and therefore intreate to "be inſtructed from you. The preſent propoſition "will happely conduce to the invention of that ſo "much deſired and long ſought for probleme for the "finding of two meane proportionalls betweene two "extreames given, which having hitherto exerciſed "the witte and endeavours of the moſt famous geo-"metricians, I preſume would not prove unworthy "your paines, who by the general ſuffrages of all

" friends, who, for recreation at the Univerſity, ſtudied to find out the reaſon and " knowledge of watch-work; which ſeemed alſo to be a thing, with which Mr. " Oughtred himſelf was much affected, as may, in ſome part, appear by his putting out " his ſon to the ſame trade, for whoſe uſe (as I am informed) he did compile a larger " Tract. In 1676 ſome of our Author's Tracts were printed at Oxford in 8vo, under this title: Guilelmi Oughtred Ætonenſis, quondam Collegii Regalis in Cantabrigiâ Socii, Opuſcula Mathematica hactenus inedita. This Collection contains the following Pieces; I. Inſtitutiones Mechanicæ. II. De variis corporum generibus, gravitate, & magnitudine comparatis. III. Automata. IV. Quæſtiones Diophanti Alexandrini Libri III. V. De Triangulis planis rectangulis. VI. De diviſione ſuperficierum. VII. Muſicæ Elementa. VIII. De Propugnaculorum Munitionibus. IX. Sectiones Angulares. He left behind him a great number of papers upon mathematical ſubjects, in his own hand-writing; as alſo moſt of the Greek and Latin mathematical Books, illuſtrated with his own Notes, and

" men, are deſervedly reported the ableſt mathema- " ticians, that our age knows. Sir, I have beene be- " holding to Mr. Elias Allen for the conveyance of " this letter; and if you will vouchſafe me the fa- " vour at your beſt leaſure to returne me two or " three lines in anſwere, and cauſe it to be left at " Mr Allen for me, I ſhall reſt very thankfull for " the courteſye, and ever remaine,

London, this preſent 20 of June, 1642.

" Yours to be commanded in what " I am able,

" Will. Price.

Mr. Oughtred's anſwer.

" S I R, June 6. 1642.

" It is true, that I have beſtowed ſuch vacant " time as I could gaine from the ſtudy of divinitie, " which is my calling, upon humane knowledges, " and amongſt other upon the Mathematics; where- " in the little ſkill I have attained being compared " with others of my profeſſion, who for the moſt " part contenting themſelves only with their own " way, refuſe to tread theſe ſalebrous and uneaſy " pathes, maye peradventure ſeme the more. But " now being in yeares, and mindfull of mine end, " and having payed dearly for my former delights " both in my health and ſtate, beſides the prejudice " of ſuch, who not conſidering what inceſſant la- " bour may produce, recon ſoe much wanting unto " me in my proper calling, as they think I have " acquired in other ſciences: by which opinion (not of " the vulgar only) I have ſuffered both diſreſpect and " alſo hinderance in ſome ſmall preferments I have " aimed at. I have therefore now learned to ſpare " myſelf, and am not willing to deſcend againe in " Arenam, and to ſerve ſuch ungratefull muſes. " Yet, Sir, at your requeſt, I have peruſed your " Problem, the effect whereof is this: Datis, &c."

" To the Reverend and much honoured friend Mr. Outredd.

" S I R,

" By the ſmall, yet favourable converſation you " have been pleaſed ſometymes heretofore to beſtow " uppon mee, I am encouraged to requeſt as much " more thereof as your other occaſions and ſtudyes of " greater moment may (att leaſt miſſively, if not " perſonally) permitt. And for an entrance into " ſuch intercourſe, I make myſelfe an object to your " further courteſie, intreating that your exchange of " a paper may returne mee a relation of the moſt " materiall uſes, whereunto an exact quadrature of " a circle is appliable, therewithall to refreſh my " late hard ſtudy and labour to attayne an ability to " expoſe before the authority of your judgment an " infallible demonſtration thereof, when with con- " venience and privacy your deſirable preſence I " ſhall comfort and honour.

" Your friend in aſſured affection, London, Octob. " and in ſubmiſſive 26, 1645. " reverence ſervant,

" Robert Keyhway."

Mr. Oughtred's anſwer.

" Worthy Sir,

" There was indeed left at my houſe a leter di- " vers dayes after the date thereof, but I neither " knew by whom it was brought, neither was there " any direction whether I ſhould returne my anſwere. " Beſides, I have had ſhewed unto me divers over- " tures, of ſuch as have attempted that myſtery of " art, that have in tryal failed. And we know " that Orontius, and Joſeph Scaliger, and Longomontanus, " great maſters in that ſcience, have rather made " demonſtration of their heroical endeavours, then " of the conqueſt they propoſed. And to ſay the " truth, I have held the diſquiſition is infeaſible, " becauſe although noe doubt there may be a right " line equal to a circulare, yet they being heteroge- " neous, ther cannot in art be any due compariſon " betweene them; for comparatio is homogeneorum. " We have out of Archimedes's grounds both by Van " Ceulen and his follower Willebrode Snellius, ſoe nere " an equation of a right line to a nicete, that if the " whole Univerſe were ſand, there would not be the " difference of one graine; and yet we cannot ſay " the exact quadrature is by them delivered. Ney- " ther will it ſerve to thoſe yet undiſcovered uſes, " which the proper and genuine equation (ſuch as " I conceive, it muſt be) will noe doubt afford; as " namely the menſuration of ſegments of circles, " ſphæres, cylinders, and cones, with the fruſtra " thereof; the ſolution of the problemes in the ſe- " cond booke of Archimedes de Sphærâ & Cylindro, " which now are only ſoluble by cubical æquations; " the meaſuring of meniſci and arbeli, and other " figures compoſed eyther of right lines and circles, " or of different circles: all which would be moſt " excellent diſcoveries and plus ultra's in art. And I " ſhould alſo thence expect a facile and ready way for " the proportion of ſubtenſæ in a circle to their cir- " cumferences. Theſe and many other abſtruſe Adyta, " hitherto almoſt deſpaired of, may, I ſuppoſe, by " your magiſterial invention, tanquam Mercurii Ca- " duceo, be ſet open. Sir, this is the effect of all I " am able to anſwer to your deſire, unleſs I more " fully knew the manner of your way. I ſpeake " this the rather, and am induced to a better confi- " dence of your performance, by reaſon of a new " Geometric-analytical art or practiſe found out by " one Cavallieri an Italian, of which above three " years ſince I receaved information by a letter from " Paris, wherein was prælibated only a ſmall taſt " thereof, yet ſo that I divine great enlargement " of the bounds of the mathematical Empire will " enſue. I was then very deſirous to ſee the author's " owne book, while my ſpirits were more free and " lightſome, but I could not gett it in France. Since " being more ſtept into yeares, daunted and broken " with the ſufferings of theſe diſaſtrous times, I muſt " content myſelf to keep home and not put out to " any foraine diſcoveries. Thus with thankfull ac- " knowledgment of your ſo noble favour to deigne " me worthy the communication of ſuch a ſecret, " I reſt ready to doe you all ſervice, which may be " within the power of " Your humbleſt ſervant,

" the true honorer of your worth,
" W. O."

and with an abridgement of almoſt every propoſition and demonſtration thereof in the margin. Theſe Books and Manuſcripts came into the hands of his friend Sir Charles Scarburgh

" To Mr. Oughtred.

" Worthy Mr. Oughtred,

" The profit I formerly received by the firſt edition " of your Clavis Mathematica, as alſo by your other " workes, made me not ignorant what might be ex- " pected from your pen; which, with the character " I received from yours and my noble friend Sir " Charles Cavendiſh, then at Paris, of your ſecond " edition of the ſame piece, made me at my return " into England ſpeedily to get and diligently peruſe " the ſame. Neither truely did I find my expecta- " tion deceived, having with admiration often con- " ſidered how it was poſſible (even in the hardeſt " things of Geometry) to deliver ſo much matter in " ſo few words, yet with ſuch demonſtrative " clearneſſe and perſpicuity; and hath often put " me in mind of learned Merſennus his judgment " (ſince dead) of it, that there was more matter " comprehended in that little book then in Dio- " phantus and all the antients. Sir, as I hold it be- " low an ingenuous ſpirit to flatter where worth is " not, ſo do I think it little leſſe then robbery to " keep back from you the knowledge of that eſti- " mation is put upon your perſon and book in forrain " parts; which I wiſh heartily might ſerve as an " encouragement to ſet you forward in the publica- " tion of other things of the like nature; of which " (as I heare) you are not unfurniſhed; that putting " together all done by you both in the Latine and " Engliſh tongue, the two moſt famous ſciences of " Geometry and Aſtronomy, both for ſolid precept, " and inſtrumental practiſe, might receive (for the " honour of our Nation) from yours more advance- " ment then from any one hand whatſoever. And " amongſt inſtruments (which are good helps, but ill " maſters) why might you not be perſuaded to pub- " liſh the deſcription of that mentioned by you elſe- " where, for the ready ſupputation of the places of " the planets as a backſide to your double Horizontall, " which, though particular, might in its chiefeſt uſe " of finding the Meridian Line be made (as I think) " generall by fixing it on a moveable foot, and then " being elevated or depreſſed according to the diffe- " rent elevation of the pole, and turned about at " the ſame angle, till the double ſhadow point out " the ſame hour, ſtanding thus in the meridian, be " made uſe of for the protraction of the houre-lines " upon any plaine without reſpect had to its ſituation, " by a thread paſſing from the center of the Hori- " zontal Dial through the interſection of the houre- " ſpaces continued to any plain whatſoever. But to " return whence I have digreſſed; amongſt many " other excellent rules in your Clavis, I caſt my eye " upon that example of the firſt rule of doubling, " &c. the angle of a rectangle triangle oppoſite to " the baſe; but muſt confeſſe could never performe by " it what I ſought; as by the ſecond I ever did. The " reſult of my work acording to both your rules, " you will find hereto annexed, in which I am bold " to begge your judgment, where my fault may be, " or a farther explication of the ſame, being aſſur- " ed of your civility and goodneſſe, and glad alſo " to ſnatch any occaſion to renew that little acquain- " tance I formerly have had of you by our caſuall " meeting at Mr. Allen's in the Strand, by whoſe " meanes I ſend this, and who will do me the fa- " vour to return your anſwer hereunto, if you ſhall " pleaſe to ſend it him directed to Sir Roger Twyſden's " hous at Eaſt-Peckham in Kent for me, that am,

" S I R,

" Your moſt affectionate friend

Eaſt-Peckham, Feb. 18, $16\frac{4}{5}\frac{2}{8}$. " to ſerve you, " John Twyſden."

" To my ever honoured Tutor, Mr. William " Oughtred.

" Honoured Sir,

" Since I left you, I have recollected, as much " as my journeys before, and neceſſary exerciſes af- " ter my return to Cambridge, would permit me, " thoſe notions I receaved from you. The firſt thing " I did was to follow your counſel, in perfecting " myſelfe in the projection and trigonometrie, which, " I thinke, Sir, I doe now fully underſtand. Some " other things alſo I have reviewed, but find more " occaſion to acknowledge my engagements to you " for your cleare inſtructions, then to trouble you " with many doubts. Yet ſome things there are, Sir, " which preſuming upon your goodneſſe, and the " encouragement you gave me, I ſhall deſire to be " ſatisfied in: as Clavis, p. 100. Quare theorema " primum de menſurando fruſtro Coni ſit $\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}$Aq⌊ $+\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}$ " AqT$-\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}EqT=$ triplo fruſtro. I doe not un- " derſtand, Sir, why you ſay $\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}$ not $\frac{3}{1}\frac{1}{1}\frac{1}{3}$, when I " ſuppoſe you meane the area multiplied in the " height, and as before 'tis, ſay $\frac{3}{1}\frac{1}{1}\frac{1}{3}Rq=$area cir- " culi. Pray, Sir, ſhew me what I have miſappre- " hended, and wherein my error lyes. In p. 1. " Archimed. de Sph. & Cylind. § 11. $\frac{\pi}{\delta}$Mq is proved " $=\cap$ coni, becauſe it is $=\frac{\pi}{\delta}$AO in KO; but " that the ſemipher: into the ſide of a cone is $=\cap$, " I know not how to demonſtrate. Another thing " which troubles me is in p. 37 de ſol. reg. where " the ſuperficies (4) is 4<613628 the ſoliditie, but " 0<513216, which ſeemes leſſe then the ſuperficies. " I muſt humbly crave your aſſiſtance, Sir, to be in " theſe, and, if I treſpaſſe not too much upon you, " how in Clavis, p. 108, the duplication of an an- " gle differs from the biſection, ſince the radius alters " nothing. I have procured your Trigonometrie to be " written over in a faire hand, which when finiſhed, " I will ſend to you, to know if it be according to " your mind; for I intend (ſince you were pleaſed " to give your aſſent) to endeavour to print it with " Mr. Briggs his tables, and ſo ſoone as I can gett " the Prutenick Tables, I will turne thoſe of the ſunne " and moone, and ſend them to you. Sir, my ac- " knowledgment of what I owe to you, is all I ſhall " further adde; onlie I muſt deſire your acceptance " of an Hierocles upon Pythagoras, (which I have ſent " with this letter) from him, who ſhall alwayes, as " his dutie binds, pray for you, and remaine, Coll. Regal. Cantabrig. Febr. 6th, 1654-5. " Sir, your obliged honourer

" Richard Stokes."

" Sir, I, as you commanded, communicated your " commendations to our Provoſt, who deſires his may " be returned to you."

There is a draught of Mr. Oughtred's anſwer to this letter among his papers, which is as follows:

" Your firſt quæſite is, why (in pag. 100. de men- " ſurando fruſtra Coni) I ſay not $\frac{3}{1}\frac{1}{1}\frac{1}{3}$ Rq, but $\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}$ " Dq? The reaſon is, becauſe in the ſcheme, the " lines A and E (ſides of the quadrate baſes) are the " diameters of inſcribed circles, which are the co- " nic baſes, and not the radii or ſemidiameters. " Nowe becauſe Dq=4Rq, the area of the circle " ſhall be $\frac{3}{1}\frac{1}{1}\frac{1}{3}+\frac{\text{Dq}}{4}$, that is, $\frac{3}{4}\frac{1}{5}\frac{1}{2}$ Dq.

" Your ſecond quæſite is, why (in p. 1. Archim. " de Sph. & Cyl.) ſemiperiphoria baſis coni in latus æ- " quetur ſuperficiei conicæ; that is $\frac{\pi}{\delta}$ AO + KO " $=\cap$? The reaſon is evident; becauſe the ſuper- " ficies of an æquilateral cone is a ſector of a circle " inflected round, the center being the vertex. But " the area of the whole circle is æqual to the half " ambite multiplied by the radius (nempe $\frac{\pi}{\delta}$Rm R): " wherefore the area of a ſector ſhall be æqual to half " the arch cut out multiplied by the radius.

" Your third quæſite is, why (in pag. 37, de ſolid. " reg.) the number of the ſuperficial meaſure is ſtill " greater then the number of the ſolide content? " The reaſon is moſt perſpicuous, becauſe the one is " reconed in unciis quadratis, the other, in cubicis.

" Your fourth quæſite is, why (in Anguli tum du- " plicatione tum ſubduplicatione, p. 100.) the æquation " wherby

Scarburgh the Phyſician; and the Manuſcripts, with many of the Books, are now in the Muſæum of William Jones, Eſq; abovementioned.

" wherby it is ſolved, is the very ſame in both? But " in the numerous reſolution you will find a maine " difference, according to that, which is ſought in " both, noted with a ſtrait line over the head.

" But let this be remembred, that whoever will " rightly ſtudy my book, that it may be a Clavis to " him, he muſt be attentus, operans, conſtanterque per " ipſa veſtigia inſequens; non enim oſcitantibus ſcripſi, " ſed verè matheſeos candidatis. Preſſa ſunt magis " quam brevia.

" To my much honoured friend, Mr. William " Oughtred.

" Sir,

" I have herewith ſent you a trifle of my own, (an " obſervation of a ſolar eclipſe of laſt year) not wor- " thy your acceptance; yet ſuch as the reſpect, which " I ow you, commands me to preſent unto you, ha- " ving nothing better to tender; and to aſſure you " that I am,

Oxford, Febr. 5th, 165⅗. " S I R,

" Yours in all obſervance,

" John Wallis.

" S I R,

" If your occaſions may permit you, I ſhould moſt " earneſtly deſire your help in the ſolution of the " problem inſuing; which, if not from yourſelf, I " know not whence to expect. The uſe, which I " ſhall be able to make of it, will bee well worth ſome " pains; which makes me the more bold to trouble " you with it, and crave your pardon for that pre- " ſumption.

" Expoſitis quantitatibus A . B . C . D . E . F . &c.

" Quarum rectangula ſint AB ‖ 1, BC ‖ 2, CD ‖ 3, DE ‖ 4, EF ‖ 5 &c.

" Quæritur quanta ſit A . B . C . D . E . F . &c.

Mr. Oughtred's ſolution, which we find ſet down at the bottom of this letter, is as follows: " Eſto A " numerus aliquis, five integer, five fractus; puta 3 " rectangula ſunt 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. &c. Dividatur u- " numquodq; per unum ex lateribus ſuis, ut habea-

3/1	1/1	(1/3	1/3	2/1	(6/1	6/1	3/1	(1/2	1/2	4/1	(8/1	8/1	1/1	(2/5	2/5	6/1	(48/8	48/8	7/1	(24/8
A	×	B	B	×	C	C	×	D	D	×	E	E	×	F	F	×	G	G	×	H				&c.
	1			2			3			4			5			6			7

" tur latus alterum. Latera autem ſunt A . B. C . D . &c.

" To my worthy and much eſteemed friend, Mr. " William Oughtred.

" S I R,

" In that of mine to you, ſent together with an " account of an eclipſe obſerved at Oxford laſt ſum- " mer, (which, I hope, is come to your hands) I made " bold to propoſe a problem, which then came new- " ly to mind, (though that, in order to which I pro- " poſed it, had been longer thought of,) which, as " I remember, was to this purpoſe. . . . . Wherein " if you can do mee the favour to help mee out, it " will be a very great ſatisfaction to mee, and (if I " do not delude myſelf) of more uſe than at firſt view " it may ſeem to bee. Sir, I doubt, I preſume too " much upon your goodneſſe, in offering you this " trouble; wherein I muſt crave your pardon. If " your occaſions will permit you to beſtow ſome " thoughts thereon, you will thereby very much " oblige,

" S I R,

Excester Coll. in Oxford, Febr. 28th, 1654-5.

" Your very affectionate friend, " and humble ſervant,

" John Wallis."

The following letter was written to Mr. John Wallis, upon the occaſion of his dedication to our Author, of his Arithmetica Infinitorum, dated July 19th, 1655.

" To Mr. Wallis.

" Moſt honored Sir,

" I have with unſpeakable delight, ſoe farr as my " neceſſary buſineſſes, the infirmneſſe of my health, " and the greatneſs of my age (approching nowe to " an end) would permitt, peruſed your moſt learn- " ed papers, of ſeveral choice arguments, which you " ſent me, wherein I doe firſt with thankfullnes ac- " knowledg to God, the Father of lightes, the great " light he hath given you, and next gratulate you, " even with admiration, the cleerneſſe and perſpi- " cuitie of your underſtanding and genius, who " have not only gone, but alſo opened a way into " thoſe profoundeſt myſteries of art, unknown, and " not thought of by the antients. With which your " myſterious inventions I am the more affected, be- " cauſe full 20 years agoe the learned patrone of " learning, Sir Charles Cavendiſh, ſhewed me a pa- " per written, wherin were ſome few excellent new " theoremes, wrought by the way, as I ſuppoſe, of " Cavallerio; which I wrought over againe more " agreably to my way. The paper, wherein I " wrought it, I ſhewed to many, wherof ſome took " copies; but my owne I cannot find. I mention " it for this, becauſe I ſawe therin a light breaking " out for the diſcovery of wonders to be revealed to " mankind in this laſt age of the world; which " light I did ſalute as afarre off, and nowe at a nerer " diſtance embrace in your proſperous beginings. Sir, " that you are pleaſed to mention my name in your " never-dying papers, that is your noble favour to " me, who can adde nothing to your glory, but on- " ly my applauſe, and prayer that God by you will " perfect theſe happy beginings, ſoe propitiouſly ad- " vanced to his glory; which is the harty deſire of

" Your very loving friend,

" W. O."

T.

OVIDIUS NASO (PUBLIUS) a Roman Knight, was one of the beſt Poets of the Auguſtan Age. I have a great number of Collections for this article, but cannot digeſt them at preſent, and therefore ſhall give only a ſmall part of them. Nature had inſpired him with ſo ſtrong a propenſion to verſification, that he laid aſide, for the love of the Muſes, all that care which muſt neceſſarily be taken, by thoſe perſons who are deſirous of attaining to exalted poſts. But if his inclination to poetry quite extinguiſhed the fire of ambition in his mind, it fomented and increaſed that of the paſſion of love. He was diſtractedly fond of the pleaſures of Venus [A], and this was almoſt the only vice with which

[A] He was diſtractedly fond of the pleaſures of Venus.] He himſelf informs us of the qualifications, with which nature had endued him for that exerciſe, and the uſe he had made of them.

Exigere à nobis anguſta nocte Corinnam,
Me memini numeros ſuſtinuiſſe novem (1).

He found himſelf lively and gay, in the morning, after which he was tainted. He was not ſatisfied with loving, and of making conqueſts in an amorous way; he alſo taught the publick the art of loving, and the art of making love; that is, he reduced, into a ſyſtem, a pernicious ſcience, for which nature gives but too many inſtructions, and whoſe only aim is the diſhonour of families, but chiefly of hapleſs huſbands. He was baniſhed for writing ſuch books; but this, in all probability, was a pretence, rather than the true cauſe of his being ſent into exile [B]. He employed, but after having paſſed a whole night in the pleaſures of love; and wiſhed to die in the actual fruition of that pleaſure. Nothing ſeemed to him more ſuitable to the way of life he had led, than to end it in ſuch an exerciſe.

(1) Ovid. Amor. lib. 3. eleg. 7. ver. 25.

Sæpe ego, laſcivæ conſumto tempore noctis,
Utilis & forti corpore mane fui.
Fœlix, quem Veneris certamina mutua perdunt!
Di faciant, leti cauſa ſit iſta mei!
Induat adverſis contraria pectora telis
Miles, & æternum ſanguine nomen emat.
Quærat avarus opes; & quæ laſſarit arando
Æquora, perjuro naufragus ore bibat.
At mihi contingat Veneris langueſcere motu;
Cùm moriar, medium ſolvar & inter opus:
Atque aliquis noſtro lacrymans in funere dicat,
Conveniens vitæ mors fuit iſta ſuæ (2).

(2) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. eleg. 10. ver. 27.

What can be ſaid, or conceived more proper to expreſs the frantic tranſports of a diſpoſition of mind that is laſcivious to the higheſt degree? 'Tis my opinion that Lais the Curtezan (3), who died in the manner which Ovid thought ſo happy, would have wiſhed for that fate. The love compoſitions of this Poet are the moſt obſcene of all thoſe of the antients now extant. 'Tis not that we therein find the looſe expreſſions, which are in Catullus, Horace, and Martial; nor the infamous practices of the unnatural ſin which thoſe three Poets mention ſo openly; but the delicacy and choice of the terms, in which Ovid prided himſelf, make his works ſtill more dangerous, ſince, by that means, they repreſent in a very plain and moſt elegant manner, all the artifices and moſt laſcivious impurities of love. He does not ſpeak on the teſtimonies of others, but from his own experience and practice. 'Tis true indeed that in the apology he drew up for himſelf in the place of his baniſhment, he proteſted that he had not done the actions deſcribed by him, and that his head had a much greater ſhare in his compoſitions than his heart. He boaſts that he had not been engaged in any intrigues which gave the leaſt handle for ſcandal; and that even, among people of the lower claſs, he had not given any of them the leaſt room to doubt, whether they were the fathers of their children their wives brought them.

(3) See the article LAIS, citation 60.

Sed neque me nuptæ didicerunt furta magiſtro:
Quodque parùm novit, nemo docere poteſt.
Sic ego delicias, & mollia carmina feci,
Strinxerit ut nomen fabula nulla meum.
Nec quiſquam eſt adeo mediâ de plebe maritus,
Ut dubius vitio ſit pater ille meo.
Crede mihi; mores diſtant à carmine noſtro.
Vita verecunda eſt, Muſa jocoſa mihi.
Magnaque pars operum mendax & ficta meorum
Plus ſibi permiſit compoſitore ſuo.
Nec liber indicium eſt animi, ſed honeſta voluptas,
Plurima mulcendis auribus apta ferens (4).

(4) Ovid Triſtium, lib. 2. ver. 347.

The Senſe is,

" But wives were never taught intrigues by me;
" No man can teach what he not underſtands.
" I, ſo in love's ſoft genial joys indulg'd,
" That common fame ne'er ventur'd to accuſe me.
" Not a Plebeian huſband once can think
" His children ſpurious, and that I'm their father.
" Believe my conduct differs from my verſe:
" My life is virtuous, tho' my Muſe be wanton.
" Moſt of my Poems are mere airy fictions,
" That treat of joys their author never practis'd.
" Nor is my book the picture of my mind;
" No, it deſcribes ſoft ſcenes of honeſt joys
" Fit to delight the ear and charm the ſoul."

To reconcile this with the 19th Elogy of book II. De Amoribus, we muſt ſuppoſe that what he ſays there concerning himſelf is a mere fiction. He exhorts his fair-one's huſband to be jealous; and not to deprive him, by his indolence, of the moſt delicious ſweets which might accrue from his intrigue. He wants this man to be a rival, and not an eaſy, complaiſant huſband.

Quid mihi cum facili, quid cum lenone marito?
Corrumpis vitio gaudia noſtra tuo.
Quin alium, quem tanta juvet patientia, quæris?
Me tibi rivalem ſi juvat eſſe, veta (5).

(5) Idem, Amor. lib. 2. eleg. 19, in fine.

'Tis certain that many Poets have given us, as their ſucceſſes in gallantry, many incidents which were ſo many fictions of their own invention; but it cannot be ſaid whether this be Ovid's caſe: we live at too remote a diſtance from his age; and it cannot be doubted but that ſome perſons, after being called in queſtion (6), boaſt of their innocence, though they are really guilty.

(6) i. e. When their own poems are brought in evidence againſt them.

[B] His books . . . . in all probability, was a pretence, rather than the true cauſe of his being ſent into baniſhment.] He acknowledges in ſeveral places in his works, that the two cauſes of his misfortunes were, his having writ books on the art of loving, and that he had been a ſpectator of ſomething. He does not explain what that was; but he hints that it was more the cauſe of his calamities than his compoſitions; for he ſuppoſes, upon his complaining to Cupid, that after having employed his endeavours to extend his Empire, he had obtained no other recompence than to be baniſhed among Barbarians; Cupid anſwered, you know very well that I was not the chief cauſe of your wrongs.

Utque hæc, ſic utinam defendere cætera poſſes,
Scis aliud quod te læſerit, eſſe magis (7).

(7) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 3. epiſt. 3. ver. 71.

The Senſe is,

" You cannot plead for others as for theſe.
" Alas! a greater crime brought on your ruin."

He compares himſelf to unhappy Actæon.

Cur aliquid vidi? cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi eſt?
Inſcius Actæon vidit ſine veſte Dianam,
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille ſuis (8).

(8) Idem, lib. 2. Triſt. ver. 103.

The Senſe is,

" Why ſaw I aught? My eyes, why rendred guilty?
" Why was the crime to me, imprudent, known?
" Heedleſs Actæon ſaw Diana naked;
" Nor was he leſs a prey to his own hounds."

He repeats the ſame complaint in many places, viz. of having been an undeſigned ſpectator of the guilt of others.

Inſcia quod crimen viderunt lumina, plector:
Peccatumque oculos eſt habuiſſe meum (9).

(9) Idem, ibid. lib. 3. eleg. 5. ver. 49.

The Senſe is,

" I ſuffer for a crime I'd not have ſeen;
" And all my guilt, is, being bleſt with ſight."

And declares that he dares not reveal that myſtery.

Perdiderint cum me duo crimina, carmen & error,
Alterius facti culpa ſilenda mihi eſt (10).

(10) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. ver. 207.

The

but to no purpoſe, the utmoſt efforts of his genius in addreſſing the Emperor, with the view of ſoftening him. He died among the Getæ, to whoſe country he had been exiled. He married three wives, and divorced the two firſt (a), but highly applauded the third (b). Some criticks have exclaimed againſt his diction [C]; in which they would have (a) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 3. eleg. 10.

(b) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. eleg. 3. & alibi.

The Senſe is,

" My verſe and my imprudence prov'd my ruin.
" Another's guilt I ever muſt conceal."

And elſewhere:

Et quid præterea peccarim quærere noli,
Ut pateat ſola culpa ſub arte mea *.

(*) Idem, lib. 2. de Ponto, epiſt. 9. ver. 75.

The Senſe is,

" Aſk me no more, in what I have offended,
" My crime's from my profeſſion——"

Attempts have been made to gueſs what this myſtery was; and the more ſilent he is, the more the curioſity of people has been excited to find out this ſecret. Some are perſuaded, that he had come unawares upon Auguſtus and his daughter Julia, when they were in their amorous dalliances; and they confirm this, by a paſſage of Suetonius, from which they pretend to gather, that Caligula deſpiſed his mother, becauſe he imagined that ſhe ſprung from the inceſtuous commerce of Auguſtus and Julia. Alteram ſubjiciunt alii, nempe eum vidiſſe Auguſtum turpiter cum Juliâ filiâ jacentem. . . . Cui opinioni favere viſus eſt Caligula, dum matrem ſuam ſpernebat, quaſi ex inceſto concubitu Auguſti, cum filia ſua Julia, prognatam (11). 'Tis certain Suetonius (12) relates, that Caligula would not own Agrippa for his grandfather by the mother's ſide. He thought him of too mean an extraction, and affirmed that his mother was the daughter of the Emperor Auguſtus and Julia; but this conſideration did not make him have the leaſt diſregard for Agrippina his mother; ſo far from it, he would have deſpiſed her, had he thought that ſhe was born in a lawful way. Abbot de Marolles (13) having related that Ovid catched Auguſtus, engaged in too great a familiarity with his daughter Julia, adds, on Suetonius's teſtimony, that it was thought Caligula's mother ſprung from the inceſtuous embraces of Julia and Auguſtus. But Suetonius does not ſay this; he only informs us, that Caligula ſpread ſuch a report. The Abbot (14) in queſtion relates, that Ovid was baniſhed for having read to Julia, Auguſtus's grand-daughter, the laſt verſes of his book de Arte Amandi; and for having catched Auguſtus in too great a familiarity with that young Princeſs. The truth of all theſe conjectures may juſtly be doubted; for Ovid not omitting any kind of ſubmiſſion and adulation, in the verſes written by him during his exile, and which he ſent to Rome; not having, I ſay, omitted any of thoſe expreſſions and particulars which he thought could any way contribute to mollify Auguſtus, we cannot ſuppoſe that he would ſtudiouſly introduce in his verſes ſuch particulars, as might contribute moſt to foment that Emperor's reſentment. Now if it be ſuppoſed that Auguſtus's indignation was grounded on our Poet's having been a ſpectator of ſome infamous actions; it muſt be ſuppoſed that Ovid muſt neceſſarily diſpleaſe him in a prodigious degree, by ſtudiouſly ſaying, that his eyes having ſeen a ſecret which he dared not to reveal, were the cauſe of his being ſent into baniſhment. However, I own that this is not a convincing reaſon. See the note [K] below.

(11) Brietius, de Poetis Latinis.

(12) Suetonius, in Caligula, cap. 23.

(13) In Ovid's Life.

(14) In his notes of book 3. de Arte Amandi, which were ſo very obſcene, that he did not attempt to tranſlate them.

[C] Some criticks have exclaimed againſt his diction.] Paſſerat owns that he had been Profeſſor of the Belles Letttres a long time, without having once explained any of Ovid's works, becauſe he found that a ſtrong prejudice prevailed againſt that Poet; Inveteravit enim opinio, vulgique fama percrebuit, eum Poëtam eſſe non multæ doctrinæ, humiliſque & nimium luxuriantis ſtyli; atque etiam, ſi diis placet, Latinæ linguæ elegantiam nitoremque in eo requiri: adeò ut Italus quidam vel hac re inprimis nobilis, cum humanioribus literis unicum gnatum imbueret, illa miro artificio contexta mutatæ ter quinque volumina formæ in patrium ſermonem converterit, ne, ſi Latinè legeret, ex Ovidii ſcriptis ſordes & barbariem colligeret beata pueri vena, quæ jam tum ad exemplum Maronis properabat (15). i. e. " An opinion had long " prevailed, and was univerſally ſpread, that the " poet in queſtion was a man of no great learning, " and that his diction was too low and over-luxuriant; " likewiſe (God bleſs them) that his ſtyle was not po- " lite and elegant enough: ſo that a certain Italian " Gentleman, who was greatly ſkilled in theſe " things, and was inſtructing his only ſon in claſſi- " cal learning, made a verſion, into his native " tongue, of the fifteen books of the Metamorpho- " ſes, which are ſo wonderfully contrived; for fear " leſt his pupil, by reading theſe books in the origi- " nal, ſhould corrupt his beautiful diction, which " imitated that of Virgil, by ſtudying Ovid's barba- " rous, incorrect compoſitions." Balzac had heard of the whimſical taſte of the abovementioned Italian. I know, ſays he (16), that under the pontificate of Leo X. a Gentleman of Venice (17), highly eſteemed by Fracaſtorius, from whoſe name he entitled his dialogue on poetry, was accuſtomed to burn in a ſolemn manner, on the anniverſary of his birth day, the works of Martial; and to make a ſacrifice of them annually to the manes and memory of Catullus. And I alſo knew that another delicate contemporary of his, uſed to aſſert, that the corruption of the Latin tongue began in Ovid, whoſe Metamorphoſes he tranſlated for the uſe of his ſon; in order that he might learn the mythology, without running the hazard of corrupting his diction; and that, at the ſame time that he was ſtudying the valuable knowledge of poetry, he might not run the hazard of vitiating his ſtyle by Ovid's vicious expreſſion. Scaliger obſerves, that Peter Victorius, and Lambinus, had a great contempt for Ovid (18). Petrus Victorius de Ovidio non veritus fit dicere, cum ut oratione & verſibus, ita vita & moribus enervatum. . . . Non longe ab hac temeraria ſententia diſcedit Dionyſius Lambinus, qui imperitiſſime eum malum Latinitatis auctorem vocat; i. e. " Petrus Victori- " us did not ſcruple to ſay of Ovid, that his diction " and poetry were as depraved as his life and morals; " Dionyſius Lambinus is almoſt as raſh and ſilly in " the judgment he pronounces, he calling him the " author of bad Latin." Another learned critic (19) complains of the ſame taſte, but without mentioning any perſon.

(15) Paſſerat. Orat. & Præfat. p. m. 218, 219.

(16) Oeuvr. diverſes, p. m. 406.

(17) His name was Andrew Navagerio. See Strad. Proluſ. 5. lib. 2. p. m. 334, 335. & Paul. Jov. in elog. cap. 78. p. m. 181.

(18) Scalig. in Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonum, p. 217.

(19) Muret. on Senec. Quæſt. Nat. lib. 3. cap. 27.

[*] If the imitation of nature be the buſineſs of a poet, I know no Author who can juſtly be compared with Ovid, eſpecially in the deſcription of the paſſions. And to prove this, I ſhall need no other judges, than the generality of his readers; for all paſſions being inborn with us, we are almoſt equally judges, when we are concerned in the repreſentation of them: now I will appeal to any man who has read this poet, whether he finds not the natural emotion of the ſame paſſion in himſelf, which the poet deſcribes in his feigned perſons? His thoughts, which are the pictures and reſults of thoſe paſſions, are generally ſuch as naturally ariſe from thoſe diſorderly motions of our ſpirits. Yet, not to ſpeak too partially in his behalf, I will confeſs, that the copiouſneſs of his wit was ſuch, that he often writ too pointedly for his ſubject, and made his perſons ſpeak more eloquently than the violence of their paſſion would admit: ſo that he is frequently witty out of ſeaſon; leaving the imitation of nature, and the cooler dictates of his judgment, for the applauſe of fancy. Yet he ſeems to have found out this imperfection in his riper age; for why elſe ſhould he complain that his Metamorphoſes was left unfiniſhed? Nothing ſure can be added to the wit of that poem, or of the reſt: But many things ought to have been retrenched; which I ſuppoſe would have been the buſineſs of his age, if his misfortunes had not come too faſt upon him. But take him uncorrected as he has been tranſmitted to us, and it muſt be acknowledged, in ſpight of his Dutch friends, the commentators, even of Julius Scaliger himſelf, that Seneca's cenſure will ſtand good againſt him,

Neſcivit quod bene ceſſit relinquere; have greatly diſpleaſed Alphonſo King of Naples [D]. I refer ſeveral particulars to the place where I cenſure Moreri [E].

The

He never knew how to give over, when he had done well; but continually varying the ſame ſenſe an hundred ways, and taking up in another place, what he had more than enough inculcated before, he ſometimes cloys his readers, inſtead of ſatisfying them: and gives occaſion to his tranſlators, who dare not cover him, to bluſh at the nakedneſs of their father. This then is the allay of Ovid's writing, which is ſufficiently recompenſed by his other excellencies; nay, this very fault is not without its beauties; for the moſt ſevere cenſor cannot but be pleaſed with the prodigality of his wit, tho' at the ſame time he could have wiſhed, that the maſter of it had been a better manager, every thing which he does, becomes him; and if ſometimes he appears too gay, yet there is a ſecret gracefulneſs of youth, which accompanies his writings, tho' the ſtaidneſs and ſobriety of age be wanting. In the moſt material part, which is the conduct, 'tis certain that he ſeldom has miſcarried; for if his elegies be compared with thoſe of Tibullus and Propertius, his contemporaries, it will be found that thoſe Poets ſeldom deſigned before they writ: and tho' the language of Tibullus be more poliſhed; and the learning of Propertius, eſpecially in his fourth book, more ſet out to oſtentation; yet their common practice was to look no farther before them, than the next line; whence it will inevitably follow, that they can drive to no certain point, but ramble from one ſubject to another, and conclude with ſomething which is not of a piece with their beginning;

Purpureus late qui ſplendeat unus & alter
Aſſuitur pannus, as Horace ſays;

though the verſes are golden, they are but patched into the garment. But our Poet has always the goal in his eye, which directs him in his race; ſome beautiful deſign, which he firſt eſtabliſhes, and then contrives the means which will naturally conduct him to his end. This is evident to judicious Readers in the work of his (Ovid's) Epiſtles *.

* Dryden's preface to the tranſlation of Ovid's Epiſtles, London, 1736, 12mo.

The late Dr. Sewell thinks that Ovid did not always lay down a Scheme before he wrote, he ſaying, Mr. Dryden ſeems to have taken this reaſon from the conduct of Mr. Waller, and ſome of his contemporaries, rather than from the practice of the antients, of whom none but Ovid, and he very ſeldom, obſerved that rule. I don't affirm, but that an inſtance or two may be given from many of them, ſuch as the Sulpitia of Tibullus, and others; yet, in moſt the tranſitions are ſo frequent, that they remain glaring inſtances againſt this aſſertion. Indeed the nature of the ſubject is ſuch, as not to be treated of without it: for I can't ſuppoſe theſe Poets ſat down to ſtudy fine things, like our Cowley; but that they writ from the heart, and if ſo, their pens muſt be under the guidance of their paſſions, not of their wit. Wantonneſs of imagination is fit for deſcription, turns of thought and images, which the heart is not at leiſure to think of, much leſs to affect, when the paſſions are ſincere, and the whole man in earneſt †. "Ovid's Epiſtles, ſays Mr. Dryden, are generally granted to be "his moſt perfect pieces; the ſtyle of them is thought "to be tenderly paſſionate and courtly, two properties well agreeing with the perſons, who were heroines and lovers. Yet where the characters were "lower, as in Oenone and Hero, he has kept cloſe "to nature, in drawing his images after a country "life, tho' perhaps he has romaniz'd his Grecian "Dames too much, and made them ſpeak ſometimes "as if they had been born in the city of Rome, "and under the Empire of Auguſtus. There ſeems "to be no great variety in the particular ſubjects "which he has choſen; moſt of the epiſtles being "written from Ladies who were forſaken by their "lovers: which is the reaſon that many of the ſame "thoughts come back upon us in divers letters: but "of the general character of women, which is mo-"deſty, he has taken a moſt becoming care; for his "amorous expreſſions go no further than virtue "may allow; and therefore may be read, as he in-"tended them, by Matrons without a bluſh ‖." In all Ovid's works, ſays an ingenious writer , his wit is allowed to be luxuriant, which his riper age would have corrected in his Metamorphoſes: but he ſhews how difficult it would have been to him, by the letters which he continued to write in his exile, with the utmoſt exuberance of thought and expreſſion. Scaliger and Mr. Dryden differ upon the point, whether Ovid knew how to leave off when he had well begun. . . . In Ovid's ſtyle is a native ſimplicity, which whoever goes about to mend, will find he corrupts it. He ſays more by nature than art can come up to. What he does, ſeems produced without pain; but it would be in vain for the greateſt labour to attempt it. . . . Some have thought that Ovid had too much compaſſion for his own failings, and that he rather loved, than would any way correct them. . . Ovid has had the greateſt character among the learned in all ages: for . . . . . Velleius Paterculus, a curious judge, joins him with Tibullus, as the two perſons who had brought their poems to perfection. By Martial, and others, he is placed with Virgil, as being both conſummate in their way. The fathers Lactantius, St. Jerom, and St. Auſtin, have not denied his Metamorphoſes its juſt commendation. Planudes tranſlated it into Greek, to reſtore that learning, part of which had been brought from thence, back again to his own country. Stephens moſt juſtly eſteems him the beſt painter among the Poets. Heinſius thought, that whoever would be drawn to the life, muſt ſit to him. And Raphael Regius ſays, that his commanders, their ſtratagems, and their battles, are ſo touched by his pencil, that whoever views them attentively, will imagine himſelf ſo engaged, as to take part in their conflicts. And then no Poet has more naturally deſcribed the manners of the perſons he mentions, nor is more ſententious, nor better expatiates upon the common places of morality; as temperance, friendſhip, love of his country, labour, valour, learning, honeſty, &c. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

† Preface to Dart's tranſlation of Tibullus, p. 13, 14. London, 1720. 8vo.

‖ Dryden's preface, ubi ſupra.

 Dr. William King, in the preface, p. 31, to his Imitation of Ovid's Art of Love, London, printed (no date) 8vo.

[D] . . . . they would have greatly diſpleaſed Alphonſo King of Naples.] This Prince being at the head of his army in the neighbourhood of Sulmo, aſked whether Ovid was a native of that town; and being anſwered that he certainly was, he ſaluted Sulmo, and paid his acknowledgments to the genius of that country, for giving birth to ſo great a Poet. He added, that he would willingly give up part of his dominions, to recal Ovid to life, his memory being more dear to him, than the poſſeſſion of Abruzzo. Urbem ſalutavit, gratiaſque genio loci egit, in quo tantus olim poeta genitus eſſet, de cujus laudibus cum non pauca diſſeruiſſet, tandem famæ ejus magnitudine commotus. Ego inquit huic regioni quæ non parva regni Neapolitani, nec contemnenda pars eſt, libenter ceſſerim, ſi temporibus meis datum eſſet hunc poetam ut haberent, quem mortuum pluris ipſe faciam, quam omnis Aprutii dominatum (20).

(20) Jovianus Pontanus, de Principe, folio 54 verſo, Oper. Tom. 1. edit. Florent. 1520, in 8vo.

[E] I refer ſeveral particulars to the place where I cenſure Moreri.] His firſt error is in miſquoting the diſtich, in which our Poet declares that he will be an honour to his country (21).

Mantua Virgilio gaudet, Verona Catullo,
Pelignæ (22) dicar gloria gentis ego (23).

(21) Ovid. Amor. lib. 3. Eleg. 15. ver. 7.

(22) Ovid was a native of Sulmo, in the county of the Beligni.

(23) 'Tis ero, inſtead of ego, in Moreri.

The ſenſe is,

"Mantua in Virgil boaſts, and old Verona
"Prides in Catullus: I myſelf ſhall be
"Sulmo's chief glory."

Secondly, 'tis a terrible barbariſm to ſay that he was of an equeſtrian family (24). Thirdly; 'tis falſe to aſſert, that Ovid ſays, Book I. Eleg. 2. of his Triſtium, that, in his younger days, he carried arms, under Marcus Varro, in his expedition to Aſia. The two verſes cited by Moreri do not ſay this. They are theſe:

(24) This has been corrected in the Dutch edit.

Non peto quas quondam petii ſtudioſus Athenas,
Oppida non Aſiæ, non mihi viſa prius.

The ſenſe is,

"I ſeek not Athens to improve my ſtudies,
"As formerly; nor Aſia's ſplendid cities,
"Nor places ſeen before."

The

The nobleſt compoſition that came from Ovid's pen is his Metamorphoſis. Our Author himſelf formed this judgment of it, and this was the chief foundation on which he grounded the immortality of his name. He propheſies, that this work will reſiſt the moſt powerful

The beſt editions have it non loca viſa prius, inſtead of non mihi viſa prius: theſe two readings are much the ſame; ſo that I cannot ſee how Ciofanus, who followed the ſecond, could find in this diſtich, a proof that Ovid bore arms under Marcus Varro, whom he accompanied into Aſia; and that, at his return, he went to Athens to ſtudy in that city. Sub M. Varrone, qui cum Aſiam petiit militavit, inde reverſus ſtudii cauſa Athenas ſe contulit. Qua de re ſic lib. 1. Triſt. Non peto quas quondam, &c (25). 'Tis very plain this diſtich cannot prove, either that Ovid carried arms under Marcus Varro, or that he went into Aſia with him; nor that he travelled to Aſia before he was in Athens. The Poet, beſeeching the Gods to quell the ſtorm, repreſents to them, among other particulars, that he is expoſed to the ſea on a calamitous account, viz. in order to ſail into Scythia; and not to go to Greece, or to any country he had ſeen before. Fourthly, 'Tis falſe to aſſert, that Seneca is of opinion, he had pleaded ſome cauſes at the Bar. When Seneca is quoted without any addition, 'tis ſuppoſed to be the Philoſopher, and doubtleſs Moreri meant it ſo; nevertheleſs we do not find any thing in Seneca the Philoſopher, which ſhews that Ovid pleaded. We might rather expect to find this in Seneca's father, but neither is it there; all we read is, that our Poet ſtudied the art of oratory under Arellius Fuſcus, and declaimed very ſucceſsfully in his ſchool. Hanc controverſiam memini me videre Naſonem declamare apud Rhetorem Arellium Fuſcum cujus auditor fuit. . . . Oratio ejus jam tum nihil aliud poterat videri quam ſolutum carmen. Adeo autem ſtudioſe Latronem audivit, ut multas ejus ſententias in verſus ſuos tranſtulerit. . . . Tunc autem cum ſtuderet, habebatur bonus declamator. Hanc certe controverſiam ante Arellium Fuſcum declamavit, ut mihi videbatur longe ingenioſius, excepto eo quod ſine certo ordine per locos diſcurreret (26). i. e. "I remember to have heard Ovid declaim, upon this ſubject, in preſence of Arellius Fuſcus, the rhetorician, whoſe diſciple he was. . . . At that time his diction could be conſidered only as poetical proſe. He was ſo attentive an auditor of Latro, that he tranſplanted a great many of his maxims or ſentences into his poems. He was looked upon, at the time when he was purſuing his ſtudies, as one who declaimed well. When he ſpoke on this ſubject before Arellius Fuſcus, I thought he acquitted himſelf much the moſt ingeniouſly, except that he was a little apt to digreſs from his theme." Probably Moreri was led into this error by Abbot de Marolles (27), who cited Seneca to prove that Ovid pleaded at the bar. This is undoubtedly true; but inſtead of having recourſe to the pretended teſtimony of Seneca, he ſhould have cited Ovid himſelf, who affirms that he had pleaded the cauſes of ſome perſons impeached before the tribunal of the Centumviri; and that having been choſe Umpire in ſome law-ſuits, he had ended them as became a man of probity and honour.

(25) Herculus, Ciofanus, in Vita Ovidii.

(26) Seneca, pater, Controverſ. 10. ſive 2. lib. 2. p. m. 153.

(27) In Ovid's life.

Nec male commiſſa eſt nobis fortuna reorum
Uſque decem decies inſpicienda viris.
Res quoque privatas ſtatui ſine crimine judex;
Deque mea faſſa eſt pars quoque victa fide (28).

(28) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 93.

The ſenſe is,

"Oft for the guilty with ſucceſs I've pleaded,
"(Before ſtern Judges) fearleſs and unaw'd.
"I frequent Umpire was in private matters,
"Nor could the vanquiſh'd party once accuſe me."

Fifthly, Moreri ſhould not have ſaid that, after his father's death he devoted himſelf entirely to poetry; he not obſerving this circumſtance in the detail he gives us of his conduct. He only ſays, that he is ſuppreſſed, in compliance with his father's remonſtrances, the ſtrong propenſion he had for writing verſes; and applied himſelf to ſuch things as ſuited young perſons of his rank.

Sæpe pater dixit, ſtudium quid inutile tentas?
Mæonides nullas ipſe reliquit opes.
Motus eram dictis: totoque Helicone relicto,
Scribere conabar verba ſoluta modis.
Sponte ſuâ carmen numeros veniebat ad aptos.
Et, quod tentabam ſcribere, verſus erat.

(29) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 4. eleg. 10. ver. 21.

The ſenſe is,

"Oft would my father ſay, why, Ovid, why,
"Spend you your moments in theſe fruitleſs ſtudies?
"Homer himſelf left not a groat behind.
"Struck with th' advice, I threw aſide my lyre;
"And ſtrove, induſtriouſly, to write in proſe.
"But oh! harmonious all my periods fell;
"And all I wrote was flowing, tuneful verſe.

He even takes notice of (30) his elder brother's death, as a circumſtance which preceded his return to Parnaſſus; but he does not ſay any ſuch thing, with reſpect to his father's death. And indeed, how could he have ſaid any ſuch thing, ſince he owns that he ſoon reſumed his poetical amuſements, and that his father lived fourſcore and ten years (31)? Sixthly, The Emperor did not baniſh him to the Province of Pontus in Aſia; but to Tomos, an European town, ſtanding on the Euxine Sea, near the mouth of the Danube. Seventhly, He ſhould not have related, without a cenſure, the opinion of thoſe who declare, that he was ſent into exile for having made love to Julia, Auguſtus's daughter, for whom he had a paſſion under the name of Corinna. This opinion is very antient, it being approved by Sidonius Apollinaris.

(30) Idem, ibid.

(31) Idem, ibid.

Et te carmina per libidinoſa
Notum Naſo tenet, Tomoſque miſſum,
Quondam Cæſareæ nimis puellæ
Falſo nomine ſubditum Corinnæ (32).

(32) Carm. 23. ver. 157. Savaro approves this opinion, Not. ib. and in Epiſt. 10. lib. 2.

The ſenſe is,

"And Ovid, famous for his wanton ſtrains,
"In exile ſent to Tomos' baleful clime;
"Who Cæſar's Julia claſp'd in fond embrace;
"Calling his noble fair-one, bright Corinna..

But Aldus Manutius (33) had given three reaſons to refute this. The firſt is, Ovid's ſaying on all occaſions, that his exile was owing to two cauſes, viz. to his writing amorous verſes; and to a fault he does not mention, and which was accidental and involuntary (34). But this cannot be ſaid of an intrigue carried on to enjoyment, with Auguſtus's daughter. Now our Poet went far with Corinna, he himſelf informs us (35).

(33) In Vita Ovidii.

(34) See the remark [B], citat. (7) and (8).

(35) He flattered himſelf with being the father of the child ſhe was going with. Et tamen aut ex me conceperat, aut ego credo, Eſt mihi pro facto ſæpe, quod eſſe poteſt. Ovid. Amor. lib. 2. eleg. 13. ver. 5.

. . . . . .
Singula quid referam? nihil non laudabile vidi:
Et nudam preſſi corpus ad uſque meum.
Cætera quis neſcit? laſſi requievimus ambo.
Proveniant medii ſic mihi ſæpe dies (36).

Aldus Manutius's ſecond reaſon is grounded upon Ovid's being very young, when he devoted himſelf to Corinna.

(36) Ovid. in Amor. lib. 1 eleg. 5. ver. 25.

Carmina cum primùm populo juvenilia legi;
Barba reſecta mihi biſve ſemelve fuit.
Moverat ingenium totam cantata per Urbem
Nomine non vero dicta Corinna mihi (37).

(37) Idem, lib. 4. Triſt. eleg. 10. ver. 57.

The ſenſe is,

"When firſt I publiſh'd youthful, amorous verſes,
"My chin had felt but once or twice the razor.
"I ſtrung my lyre for fam'd Corinna's beauty,
"And ſung it loud, but in a borrow'd name.

Theſe verſes imply, that Ovid was but about twenty powerful efforts of ſwords, fire, thunder, and the iron teeth of time [F]. This prediction has not yet been found falſe. One of the fineſt paſſages in this poem, is the Exordium. 'Tis a deſcription of the Chaos, and the manner in which the univerſe was drawn from it. Nothing can be clearer and more intelligible than this beautiful deſcription, if we conſider only the phraſeology of the Poet; but if we examine his tenets, they appear ill connected and contradictory; and the whole is a greater Chaos than that deſcribed by him. This gives me an opportunity of acquitting myſelf of a promiſe I had made (c). I will examine whether the ideas of ſuch ancient Authors as have ſpoke of the Chaos were when he ſung his amours for the pretended Corinna. Now he was fifty when Auguſtus ſent him into baniſhment. Is it any ways probable that this Emperor ſhould have been ſo long in diſcovering and puniſhing an intrigue carried on between his daughter and a Poet? In fine, Manutius obſerves, that Ovid would not have ſpoke ſo affectionately of his Corinna in the verſes juſt cited, had ſhe been the cauſe of his misfortune and diſgrace, he ſo mournfully deplores. Eightly, I do not know of any Author who ſays, that Ovid made his addreſſes to Livia, Auguſtus's wife; and that he compoſed his books de Arte Amandi, for her. Theſe would deſerve to be refuted in a yet ſtronger manner than Sidonius Apollinaris. Ninthly, Thoſe who ſay that the city called Tomos, near which he was buried, is now called Kiour (38), are no leſs miſtaken than ſuch as ſay it is called Tomiſuar; and therefore Moreri ought not to have related thoſe things, without informing his readers at the ſame time, that they are falſe. The city of Tomos whither Ovid was baniſhed, was on this ſide the Danube, with regard to Italy.

(c) In the remark [H] of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(38) He ſhould have ſaid Kiow, or Kiovia. Hofman alſo ſays Kiour. Marolles, in Ovid's Life, ſays Xiovie.

(39) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 203. See alſo lib. 3. eleg. 10.

Ne timeam gentes quas non bene ſubmovet Iſter (39).

The ſenſe is,

" That I may'nt dread the nations which the Danube,
" Not well retains———

Now this does not agree, either with Kiow ſituated on the Boryſthenes, nor with Temiſwaer, a city of Tranſilvania. Tenthly, What Moreri relates concerning Ovid's tomb, found at Sabaria or Stain in Auſtria on the river Save, is full of errors, as I'll one day ſhew. Eleventhly, 'Twas in 1540, and not in 1548, that the Queen of Hungary ſhewed our Poet's pen. Iſabella Pannoniæ Regina circiter annum M. D. 40. Ovidii calamum ex argento Tauruni, quæ eſt urbs inferioris Pannoniæ, oſtendit Petro Angelio Bargæo, qui hoc ipſum mihi narravit, cum hac inſcriptione OVIDII NASONIS CALAMUS; qui non multo ante id tempus ſub quibuſdam antiquis ruinis fuerat repertus. Eum Regina ipſa plurimi faciebat, & veluti rem ſacram, carum habebat (40). i. e. " About the year 1540, Iſabella, " Queen of Hungary, ſhewed to Peter Angelus Bar- " gæus, (a circumſtance he himſelf told me) Ovid's " ſilver pen in Belgrade, a city of lower Hungary, " with the following inſcription, OVID'S PEN; which " had been found ſome time before under ſome an- " tient ruins. The Queen herſelf ſet a high value " upon it, as tho' it had been ſome ſacred relick." I obſerved that this Queen was a woman of learning, in the article I gave of her.

(40) Hercules Ciofanus, in Vita Ovidii, p. m. 29.

[F] He propheſies that his Metamorphoſes will reſiſt the moſt powerful efforts of ſword, fire, thunder, and the iron teeth of Time.] Here follow the nine verſes which conclude his Metamorphoſes.

Jamque opus exegi, quod nec Jovis ira, nec ignes,
Nec poterit ferrum, nec edax abolere vetuſtas.
Cùm volet illa dies, quæ nil niſi corporis hujus
Jus habet, incerti ſpatium mihi finiat ævi:
Parte tamen meliore mei ſuper alta perennis
Aſtra ferar, nomenque erit indelebile noſtrum.
Quaque patet domitis Romana potentia terris,
Ore legar populi: perque omnia ſecula famâ,
Si quid habent veri vatum præſagia, vivam (40).

(41) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. 15. in fine.

The ſenſe is.

" The work is finiſh'd, which nor dreads the rage
" Of tempeſts, fire, or war, or waſting age:
" Come, ſoon or late, Death's undetermin'd day,
" This mortal Being only can decay;
" My nobler part, my fame, ſhall reach the ſkies,
" And to late times with blooming honours riſe:
" Whate'er th' unbounded Roman power obeys,
" All climes and nations ſhall record my praiſe:
" If, 'tis allowed to Poets to divine,
" One half of round Eternity is mine.

WELSTED.

[The late Sir Samuel Garth has made a great many fine remarks on Ovid's Metamorphoſes, with regard to the propriety of his ſimiles and epithets; the perſpicuity of his allegories; the inſtructive excellency of the morals; and the peculiar happy turn of his fancy. He begins with the elegance of his deſcriptions, which he exemplifies in that fine one of the ſouth-wind, and afterwards in part of that of the golden age, which he contraſts to that given by Virgil, at the end of the ſecond Georgick. He next compares Virgil's deſcription (in Æneid 7th) of a ſtag, which gave the firſt occaſion to the war betwixt the Trojans and Rutulians, with the image which Ovid gives of the favourite ſtag ſlain accidentally by Cypariſſus, and affirms it to be equal to that of Virgil. Sir Samuel would have the watry court of the river Peneus, contraſted with Virgil's ſubterranean Grot of Cyrene the Naiad, mother to Miſtæus. He obſerves farther, that the divine Poet, Virgil, goes on in pomp of numbers, and eaſy magnificence of words, till he introduces the ſtory of Orpheus and Eurydice; in the narration of which, he is as much ſuperior to Ovid, as the reeds of his own Mantuan ſhepherds are leſs muſical than the lyre of Orpheus. After pointing out ſome other examples, he concludes this head with ſaying, There are many other deſcriptions ſcattered in the Metamorphoſes, which for juſt expreſſion of nature, and majeſtic modulation of words, are only inferior to thoſe tranſcribed, as they are ſhorter; which makes the objection, that his diction is commonly loitering into proſe, a great deal too ſevere: for the Metamorphoſes muſt be conſidered as very incorrect, and Virgil's works as finiſhed. Sir Samuel proceeds to the ſimilitudes of Ovid, which (he obſerves) are always remarkably ſhort, and convey ſome pleaſing idea to the imagination. 'Tis in this branch of the poem, that he has diſcovered as juſt a judgment, as any of the claſſicks whatever. Poets, to give a looſe to a warm fancy, are generally too apt, not only to expatiate in their ſimiles, but introduce them too frequently: by doing the firſt, they detain the attention too long from the principal narration; and by the latter, they make too frequent breaches in the unity of the poem. Thoſe two errors Ovid has moſt diſcerningly avoided. How ſhort and ſignificant are generally his compariſons! he fails not in theſe to keep a ſtiff rein on the high-mettled Pegaſus; and takes care not to ſurfeit here, as he has done on other heads, by an erroneous abundance. Sir Samuel, after giving ſome examples. . . . The objection (ſays he) to Ovid, that he never knows when to give over, is too manifeſt. Tho' he frequently expatiates on the ſame thought, in different words; yet in his ſimiles, that exuberance is avoided. There is in them all a ſimplicity, and a confinement to the preſent object; always a fecundity of fancy, but rarely an intemperance: nor do I remember he has erred above once by an ill-judged ſuperfluity, which is, where he brings in the ſimile, after deſcribing the Labyrinth built by Dædalus, in book 8. of his Metamorphoſes. The reader may take notice, how unforced Ovid's compliments, and how natural his tranſitions generally are. With how much eaſe does he ſlide into ſome new circumſtance, without any variation of the unity of the ſtory? The texture is ſo artful, that it may be compared to the work of his own Arachne, where the were juſt; and if they could truly affirm, that this ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer [G]. I will ſhew that the ſtruggle between the four elements, did not ceaſe, as they

the ſhade dies ſo gradually, and the light revives ſo imperceptibly, that it is hard to tell where the one ceaſes, and the other begins. When he is going off from the ſtory of Apollo and Daphne, (book 1. of the Metamorph.) how happily does he introduce a compliment to the Roman Conquerors? The compliments to Auguſtus are very frequent in the laſt book of the Metamorphoſes; as thoſe to the ſame Emperor are in the Georgicks of Virgil, which alſo ſtrike the imagination by their agreeable flattery. The compliments have a great ſublimity, and are worthy the grandeur of the heroes, and the wit of the poet. . . . Ovid deſerves as much praiſe, for ſaying a great deal in a little, as cenſure for ſaying a little in a great deal. None of the claſſick Poets had the talent of expreſſing himſelf with more force and perſpicuity. Sir Samuel gives ſome inſtances of this, and goes on. Ovid never excells himſelf ſo much, as when he takes occaſion to touch upon the paſſion of love; all hearts are in a manner ſenſible of the ſame emotions; and, like inſtruments tun'd uniſons, if a ſtring of any one of them be ſtruck, the reſt, by conſent, vibrate. The fable of Biblis ſhews how touchingly the Poet argues in love affairs, as well as thoſe of Medea and Scylla. The two laſt are left by their heroes, and their reflections are very natural and affecting. Ovid ſeemed here to have had Virgil's paſſion of Dido in his eye, but with this difference; the one had converſed much with Ladies, and knew they loved to talk a great deal: the other conſidered no leſs, what was natural for them to ſay, than what became them to ſay. Virgil has, through the whole management of this rencounter, diſcovered a moſt finiſhed judgment. Æneas, like other men, likes for convenience, and leaves for greater. Dido, like other Ladies, reſents the neglect, enumerates the obligations the lover is under, upbraids him with ingratitude, threatens him with revenge, then by and by ſubmits, begs for compaſſion, and has recourſe to tears. Nor does the genius of Ovid more exert on the ſubject of love, than on all others. In the contention of Ajax, Ulyſſes's elocution is moſt nervous and perſuading. Where he endeavours to diſſuade mankind (book 15. of his Metamorphoſes) from indulging carnivorous appetites in his Pythagorean philoſophy, how emphatical is his reaſoning! Thro' the whole texture of this work, Ovid diſcovers the higheſt humanity, and a moſt exceeding good nature. The virtuous in diſtreſs are always his concern; and his wit contrives to give them an immortality with himſelf. He ſeems to have taken the moſt pains in the firſt and ſecond book of the Metamorphoſes, tho' the thirteenth abounds with ſentiments moſt moving, and with calamitous ſentiments introduced with great art. The animated thoughts and lively images of this poem are numerous. None ever painted more to the life than our Author, tho' ſeveral groteſque figures are now and then ſeen in the ſame groop. The moſt plentiful ſeaſon that gives birth to the fineſt flowers, produces alſo the rankeſt weeds. Ovid has ſhewn in one line, the brighteſt fancy ſometimes; and in the next, the pooreſt affectation. Ovid was much too fond of . . . . . witticiſms, which are more to be wondered at, becauſe they were not the faſhion of that age, as punns and quibbles are of this. Virgil, as I remember, is not found trifling in this manner above once or twice. With regard to Ovid's diction, Sir Samuel obſerves, that a great many of his lines end with monoſyllables; and more indeed than ſeems conſiſtent with the majeſty of heroick verſe. When lines (continues he) are deſigned to be ſermoni propiores, this liberty may be allowable, but not ſo when the ſubject requires more ſonorous numbers. Virgil ſeems to endeavour to keep up his verſification to an harmonious dignity; and therefore, when fit words do not offer with ſome eaſe, he'll rather break off in an hemiſtick, than that the line ſhould be lazy and languid. He well knew, how eſſential it was in poetry to flatter the ear; and at the ſame time was ſenſible, that this organ grows tired by a conſtant attention to the ſame harmony; and therefore he endeavoured now and then to relieve it by a cadence of pauſes, and a variation of meaſures. Thoſe that are moſt converſant in claſſick poetry, muſt be ſenſible, that Virgil has been much more ſollicitous, than Ovid, to keep up his lines to an eaſy and muſical flow; but tho' the criticks charge the latter with breaking through Proſody and Grammar, and allowing himſelf too often the licence of Græciſms; I take this cenſure to be only an arrogant pedantry in the Grammarians, and groundleſs in itſelf; but tho' it were true, I dare be confident it is full as juſt upon Virgil. Certainly no body can imagine, but that theſe two celebrated Authors underſtood their own tongue better, than the ſcrupulous Grammarians of after-ages, who are too dogmatical and ſelf-ſufficient, when they preſume to cenſure either of them, for not attending ſtrictly enough to Syntax, and the meaſure of verſe. The Latin tongue is a dead language, and none can decide with confidence on the harmony or diſſonance of the number of theſe lines, unleſs they were thoroughly acquainted with their pauſes and cadence. They may indeed pronounce with much more aſſurance on their diction; and diſtinguiſh where they have been negligent, and where not finiſhed. There are certainly many lines in Ovid, where he has been downright lazy, and where he might have avoided the appearance of being obviouſly ſo, by a very little application. Ovid's allegories are either phyſical or natural; moral or hiſtorical. Of the firſt kind is the fable of Apollo and Python: in the explanation of this, all the Mythologiſts agree; exhalations and miſts being the conſtant effects of inundations, are here diſſipated by the rays of the ſun. Of the ſecond kind, are Acteon torn to pieces by his own pack of dogs, and Eriſichton ſtarved by the diſeaſe of hunger. Theſe two allegories ſeem to ſignify, that extravagance and luxury end in want. Of the third, is the ſtory of the rape of Europa. Hiſtory ſays, ſhe was daughter to Agenor, and carried by the Candians in a galley, bearing a bull in the ſtern, in order to be married to one of their Kings, named Jupiter. As to Ovid's being cenſured for being too free with the characters of his Gods, it muſt be conſidered, that what appeared an abſurdity in one Poet, is not ſo much his own fault, as that of the times before him. The characters of the Gods in the old heroic age, repreſented them unjuſt in their actions; mutable in their deſigns; partial in their favours; ignorant of events; ſcurrilous in their language; ſome of the ſuperior hierarchy treating one another with injurious brutalities, and are often guilty of ſuch indecencies and miſbehaviour, as the loweſt of mortals would bluſh to own. The commentators may endeavour to hide ſome abſurdities in the Iliad, under the veil of allegories; but the reader that conſiders the whole texture of that poem, will find, that the Author's meaning, and their interpretation, are often as unlike, as the imaginary heroes of his time, are to the real ones of ours. Ovid was ſo far from paying a blind deference to the venerable name of his Grecian predeceſſor, in the character of his Gods; that when Jupiter puniſhes Andromeda for the crimes of her mother, he calls him injuſtus Ammon, (Metamorph. book 4.) and takes commonly an honourable care of the decorum of the Godhead, when their actions are conſiſtent with the divinity of their character. His allegories include ſome religious or inſtructive moral, wrapt up in a familiar perſpicuity; and the reader cannot fail of obſerving, how many excellent leſſons of morality Ovid has given us in the courſe of his fables. To conclude, the poem of the Metamorphoſes has been the great magazine which has furniſhed the greateſt Poets of the following ages with fancy and alluſions; and the moſt celebrated Painters with ſubjects and deſigns. See Sir Samuel's preface to the tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes. London, 1719. 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

[G] I will examine whether the ideas of ſuch ancient Authors as have ſpoke of the Chaos were juſt; and if they they ſuppoſe, at the time when the world was created; and I will ſhew that, (be this how they could truly affirm, that this ſtate of confuſion ſubſiſted no longer.] To proceed methodically, I muſt firſt give Ovid's deſcription of the Chaos; which is only an imitation or paraphraſe of what he had met with in antient Greek Authors.

Ante mare & terras, & quod tegit omnia cælum,
Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe,
Quem dixêre Chaos; rudis indigeſtaque moles:
Nec quicquam, niſi pondus iners, congeſtaque eodem
Non bene junctarum diſcordia ſemina rerum.
Nullus adhuc mundo præbebat lumina Titan,
Nec nova creſcendo reparabat cornua Phœbe,
Nec circumfuſo pendebat in aëre tellus,
Ponderibus librata ſuis: nec brachia longo
Margine terrarum porrexerat Amphitrite.
Quâque erat & tellus, illic & pontus, & aër.
Sic erat inſtabilis tellus, innabilis unda,
Lucis egens aër: nulli ſua forma manebat.
Obſtabatque aliis aliud: quia corpore in uno
(42) Ibid. lib. 1. ver. 5. Frigida pugnabant calidis, humentia ſiccis,
Mollia cum duris, ſine pondere habentia pondus (42).

That is,

" Before the ſeas, and this terreſtrial ball,
" And heav'n's high canopy, that covers all,
" One was the face of Nature; if a face,
" Rather a rude and indigeſted maſs:
" A lifeleſs lump, unfaſhion'd and unfram'd,
" Of jarring ſeeds; and juſtly Chaos nam'd.
" No ſun was lighted up, the world to view;
" No moon did yet her blunted horns renew:
" Nor yet was earth ſuſpended in the ſky;
" Nor pois'd, did on her own foundations lye:
" Nor ſeas about the ſhores their arms had thrown;
" But earth, and air, and water were in one.
" Thus air was void of light, and earth unſtable,
" And waters dark abyſs unnavigable.
" No certain form on any was impreſt;
" All were confus'd, and each diſturb'd the reſt.
" For hot and cold were in one body fixt;
" And ſoft with hard, and light with heavy mixt.
DRYDEN.

Thus we find that, by the Chaos, was meant a formleſs maſs of matter, in which the ſeeds of all particular bodies were mixed indiſcriminately with the utmoſt confuſion. The air, the water, and the earth, were every where confounded; all things were at war one with the other, and each part was oppoſed to each; heat and cold, moiſture and dryneſs, levity and gravity, were at variance, in one and the ſame body, throughout the whole vaſt extent of matter. Now Ovid ſuppoſes that this confuſed ſtate of things was diſintangled in manner following.

Hanc DEUS, & melior litem natura diremit.
Nam cælo terras, & terris abſcidit undas,
Et liquidum ſpiſſo ſecrevit ab aëre cælum.
Quæ poſtquam evolvit, cæcoque exemit acervo,
Diſſociata locis concordi pace ligavit.
Ignea convexi vis & ſine pondere cæli
Emicuit, ſummâque locum ſibi legit in arce:
Proximus eſt aër illi levitate, locoque.
Denſior his tellus, elementaque grandia traxit,
Et preſſa eſt gravitate ſui. Circumfluus humor,
Ultima poſſedit, ſolidumque coërcuit orbem.
Sic ubi diſpoſitam, quiſquis fuit ille DEORUM;
Congeriem ſecuit, ſectamque in membra redegit:
(43) Idem, ibid. Principio terram, &c. (43).

That is,

" But God, or Nature, while they thus contend,
" To theſe contending diſcords put an end:
" Then earth from air, and ſeas from earth were driv'n,
" And groſſer air ſunk from ætherial heav'n.
" Thus diſembroil'd, they take their proper place;
" The next of kin contiguouſly embrace;
" And foes are ſunder'd, by a larger ſpace.
" The force of fire aſcended firſt on high,
" And took its dwelling in the vaulted ſky:
" Then air ſucceeds, in lightneſs next to fire,
" Whoſe atoms from unactive earth retire.
" Earth ſinks beneath, and draws a numerous throng
" Of pond'rous, thick, unweildy ſeeds along.
" About her coaſts, unweildy waters roar,
" And, riſing on a ridge, inſult the ſhore.
" Thus when the God, whatever God was he,
" Had form'd the whole, and made the parts agree,
" That no unequal portions might be found,
" He moulded earth into a ſpacious round, &c.
DRYDEN.

We are here told, that this war of the elements blended and intangled together, was terminated by the authority of a God who ſeparated them, and aſſigned each their place; placing the fire in the higheſt region, the earth in the loweſt, the air immediately below the fire, and the water immediately below the air; and afterwards forming a band of friendſhip and concord between theſe four elements thus ſettled in ſeparate Places. Conſequently our Poet's ſyſtem may be reduced to the ſix propoſitions following.

I. Before there was a heaven, an earth, and a ſea, nature was one homogeneous whole (44).

(44) Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe.

II. This whole was but an unweildy maſs (45), in which the principles of things were huddled together indiſcriminately and without ſymmetry, and after a diſcordant manner.

(45) Nec quicquam niſi pondus iners &c.

III. Heat ſtruggled in the ſame body with cold; dryneſs and moiſture did the ſame; as alſo levity and gravity.

IV. God put an end to this war, by ſeparating the combatants.

V. He aſſigned them diſtinct habitations, according to the levity or gravity proper to each.

VI. He formed a ſtrict alliance between them.

Here follow, in general, the defects in this doctrine of Ovid. I know not whether it was ever criticiſed, or whether the Commentators have ever examined, philoſophically, this part of the Metamorphoſes; but methinks they might eaſily have perceived,

I. That the firſt propoſition is not very conſiſtent with the ſecond; for if the parts of a whole are compoſed of heterogeneous or contrary ſeeds or principles, that whole cannot be looked upon as homogeneous.

II. That the ſecond propoſition is not conſiſtent with the third; for it cannot be ſaid that a whole, in which there is equal levity and gravity, is merely a heavy maſs.

III. That this heavy maſs cannot be looked upon as inactive, pondus iners, ſince contrary principles are blended in it without ſymmetry; whence it follows, that their actual combat ſhould be followed by the victory of one or of the other.

IV. That the three firſt propoſitions being once true, the fourth and fifth are ſuperfluous; for the elementary qualities are a principle ſufficient to diſintangle or clear up a Chaos, without the intervention of another cauſe; and to fix the parts either near to the center, or far from it, in proportion to their levity or gravity.

V. That the fourth propoſition is falſe, on another account; for, ſince the time that the heavens, the air, the water and earth were produced; the combat or ſtruggle betwixt cold and heat, moiſture and dryneſs, levity and gravity, is as ſtrong in the ſame body as it could ever have been before.

VI. That, for the reaſon juſt now given, the ſixth propoſition muſt be falſe. Whence it is manifeſt, that the deſcription of the Chaos and its extrication, is compoſed of propoſitions more oppoſite to one another, than the elements were during the Chaos.

I need not enlarge on each of thoſe falſe doctrines of Ovid; but ſome of them require a pretty long illuſtration.

REFUTATION of the doctrine of the Chaos, upon the ſuppoſition of its having been homogeneous.

I. I ſay nothing can be more abſurd, than to ſuppoſe a Chaos homogeneous during a whole eternity, tho' it poſſeſs'd the elementary qualities, both thoſe called Alteratrices, viz. heat, cold, moiſture, and dryneſs; as thoſe called Motrices, viz. levity and gravity;

how it will) they ought to have excepted man out of their general rule, ſince he is ſubject vity; the former cauſing motion upward, and the latter motion downward. A maſs of this kind cannot be homogeneous; and muſt neceſſarily contain all ſorts of heterogeneity. Heat and cold, moiſture and dryneſs, cannot be together, but that their action and reaction muſt temper them, and change them into other qualities, which make that form of mixt bodies: and as this temperament may be made in proportion to the numberleſs diverſities of combinations, the Chaos muſt have contained a numberleſs multitude of ſpecies of compounds. The only way to conceive an homogeneous Chaos, would be to ſay, that the qualities called Alteratrices of the Elements modified themſelves, in the ſame degree, in all the particles of matter; ſo that there was, every where, exactly the ſame lukewarmneſs, the ſame ſoftneſs, the ſame ſmell, the ſame taſte, &c. but this would be deſtroying with one hand, what is built with the other; 'twould be a contradiction in terms, to call a Chaos a work the moſt regular, the moſt wonderful in ſymmetry, the moſt admirable with regard to proportion, that can poſſibly be conceived. I confeſs, that the mind of man is better pleaſed with a work that is diverſified, than with one that is uniform; but yet our ideas inform us, that the harmony of contrary qualities, preſerved with uniformity throughout the whole univerſe, would be as wonderful a perfection, as the unequal partition which ſucceeded the Chaos. What knowledge, what power, would not this uniform harmony, diffus'd over all nature, require? It would not ſuffice, to throw, into every mixt body, an equal quantity of each of the four ingredients; but ſome would require more, ſome leſs, according as the force or power of ſome is greater or leſs for acting than for reſiſting; it being well known, that the Philoſophers diſtribute to elementary qualities, action and re-action in a different degree. Calor, qui maximè eſt activus, minimus eſt in reſiſtentia; è contrario autem ſiccitas minor in activitate, major in reſiſtentia; frigus, quod ſecundo loco eſt activum, tertio eſt reſiſtivum: humor denique penultimo loco activus, ſecundo reſiſtivus (46). Upon the whole, it would be found, that the cauſe which metamorphoſed the Chaos, would have taken it, not out of a ſtate of confuſion and war, as is ſuppoſed, but from a ſtate of regularity, which, of all things, was the moſt accompliſhed; and which, by reducing contrary force to an equilibrium, kept them in ſuch a repoſe or reſt, as was equivalent to peace. 'Tis therefore certain, that if the Poets would ſave the homogeneouſneſs of the Chaos, they muſt ſtrike out all they add concerning that fantaſtical confuſion of contrary ſeeds, as well as that indigeſted mixture and perpetual combat between jarring principles.

(46) Arriaga, Diſput. 3. de Generat. ſect. 11. n. 178. p. m. 500.

REFUTATION of the Chaos, upon the ſuppoſition of its having continued an infinite ſpace of time.

II. But to overlook this contradiction, we ſhall find ſubject enough to attack them on other points. Let us begin by attacking them on the article of eternity. Nothing can be more abſurd than to admit, during an infinite ſpace of time, the mixture of the inſenſible parts of the four elements; for inſtance we ſuppoſe, in thoſe parts, the activity of heat, the action and re-action of the four firſt qualities; and beſides this, the motion of the particles of the earth and water towards the center; and the motion towards the circumference, of thoſe of fire and air, we eſtabliſh a principle which will neceſſarily ſeparate thoſe four kinds of bodies one from the other; and which, to effect this, will only require a certain limited time. Let the reader reflect a little on what is called the phial of the four Elements. Into that phial ſome metallick particles are put, and afterwards three liquors much lighter than one another. Let all theſe be ſhaken together, and we ſhall not diſcern any of thoſe four ingredients, the parts of each blending with the parts of the other: but then let the phial ſtand ſtill, and every ingredient will reſume its former place. All the metallick particles will aſſemble at the bottom of the phial; thoſe of the liquor whoſe levity is greateſt at the top; thoſe of the liquor of leſs levity than that, and of leſs gravity than this, will fix themſelves in the third; thoſe of the liquor of greater gravity than theſe two, but of leſs gravity than the metallick particles, fix themſelves in the ſecond place; and, in this manner, we recover the diſtinct ſituations, which had been blended and confounded by ſhaking the phial. No great patience is required to effect this; a very ſhort ſpace of time being ſufficient to give a freſh view of the ſituation, which nature has given in the univerſe, to the four elements. We may conclude, by comparing the univerſe to this phial; that had the earth, reduced to duſt, been mixt with the matter of which the ſtars, the air, and water, are compoſed, in ſuch a manner that even the inſenſible particles of each of theſe elements had been blended together; the whole would inſtantly have endeavoured to ſeparate or diſingage itſelf; and, at the end of a prefixed time, the particles or parts of the earth would have formed one maſs, thoſe of five another, and ſo of the reſt, in proportion to the levity and gravity of each kind of body.

We may employ another compariſon, and imagine the Chaos to be like new wine fermenting. This is a ſtate of confuſion; the ſpirituous and terreſtrial particles blend themſelves together, and we cannot diſcover, either by the ſight or taſte, what is properly wine, and what tartar or lees. This confuſion or blending occaſions a furious battle between theſe different particles of matter. The ſtruggle is ſo violent, that it ſometimes burſts the veſſel; but in two or three days an end is put to this inteſtine war. The groſs particles diſingage themſelves, and ſink by virtue of their own gravity. The lighteſt diſingage themſelves alſo, and evaporate (47) by their levity; and, by this means, the wine recovers its natural ſtate. This very thing would have happened in the Chaos of the Poets. The contrariety of the principles blended together indiſcriminately would have produced a violent fermentation, which yet, at the end of a certain time, would have made the terreſtrial particles deſcend, and the ſpirituous parts mount upwards; and, in a word, would have made each body go to its proper ſituation, according to its gravity or levity. Nothing therefore can be more repugnant to reaſon and experience, than to ſuppoſe a Chaos of eternal duration, though it ſhould contain all the ſtrength or power which has appeared in nature ſince the creation of the world. For it muſt be well obſerved, that whatever we call general laws of nature, laws of motion, mechanical principles, is the ſame with what Ovid and the Peripateticks call heat, cold, moiſture, dryneſs, levity, and gravity. They affirmed, that the whole force and activity of nature, all the principles of the generation and alteration or change of bodies were comprehended in the ſphere of theſe ſix qualities. Since therefore they admitted them in the Chaos, they neceſſarily acknowledged in it the ſame virtue or power which occaſions or forms in the univerſe, generations, corruptions, winds, rain, &c.

(47) There is always found a void in the veſſel, after that the wine has done fomenting; which is an evident proof that ſeveral particles muſt have evaporated or broke through the pores or crannies of the veſſel.

III. Thence ariſes another objection, which is of almoſt as much weight as the preceding ones. Ovid, and thoſe whoſe opinions he paraphraſed, had recourſe, but without any neceſſity for their ſo doing, to the intervention of a God, for clearing up the Chaos; for they acknowledged that it included all the internal force or power, capable of ſeparating the particles of it, and of giving to each element its proper place or ſituation: but after this was done, why did they call for the intervention of an external cauſe? Did not they, in this, imitate thoſe bad Poets who, in a play, brought God upon the ſtage, to remove a trifling obſtacle? To reaſon juſtly on the creation of the world, we ought to conſider God as the author of matter, and the firſt and ſole principle of motion. If we cannot raiſe ourſelves to all the idea of a creation properly ſo called, we ſhall never get clear of the difficulties; and ſhall be forced, which way ſoever we turn, to advance things which our reaſon cannot reconcile to itſelf; for if matter is ſelf-exiſtent, we cannot very well conceive that God could, or ſhould give it motion. It would be independent of any other thing with regard to the reality of its exiſtence: why therefore ſhould it not have the power to exiſt always in the ſame place, with regard to each of its parts? Why ſhould it be forced

Whether it be a conſiſtent way of reaſoning to have recourſe to God for diſentangling or clearing up the Chaos.

ject to the moſt dreadful confuſions and contrarieties that could have deformed the Chaos.

forced to change its ſituation at the will and pleaſure of another ſubſtance? Add to this, that had matter been moved by an external principle, it would intimate that its neceſſary and independent exiſtence are ſeparate and diſtinct from motion; the reſult of which is, that its natural ſtate is that of reſt; and therefore that God could not give motion to it, without diſordering the nature of things; nothing being more ſuitable to order, than to follow the eternal and neceſſary inſtitution of nature. Of this I ſhall ſpeak more at large in other places (48). But of all the errors which reſult from our rejecting the creation, there is none, in my opinion, more inconſiderable, than the ſuppoſing that if God is not the cauſe of the exiſtence of matter; he is, at leaſt, the firſt mover of bodies; and, in that quality, the author of elementary Properties, and of the diſpoſition and form we ſee in nature. The ſuppoſition of his being the firſt mover of matter, is a principle from which the following conſequence reſults naturally, viz. that he formed the heavens and the earth, the air, and the ſea; and is the mighty architect of this great, this wonderful edifice called the world. But if we diveſt him of this quality of firſt mover; if we affirm that matter moves independently of him, and had the diverſity of forms in itſelf; that, with reſpect to ſome of its parts, its motion tended towards the center; and, with regard to others, tended towards the circumference; that it contained particles of fire, water, air, and earth; if, I ſay, we affirm all this with Ovid, we ſhall employ God needleſly and improperly to the formation of the world. Nature could have done very well without the intervention or aſſiſtance of a God; it had ſtrength and power ſufficient to ſeparate the particles of the elements, and to aſſemble together thoſe of the ſame rank or claſs (49). Ariſtotle had a clear idea of this truth, and a much better one than Plato, who admitted, before the creation of the univerſe, an irregular motion in diſorderly matter. Ariſtotle ſhows, that this ſuppoſition deſtroyed itſelf, ſince, unleſs we have recourſe to a progreſs in infinitum, the elements muſt have been endued with a natural motion. It was natural, ſome directed themſelves towards the center, and others towards the circumference: and conſequently they diſpoſed themſelves in a manner neceſſary for forming the world or univerſe as we now ſee it; ſo that there was a world, at the time of this pretended irregular motion, and antecedent to the world, which is a contradiction. Here follow his words, which it is proper I ſhould quote, to give the reader the eaſier opportunity of examining whether or no I have exhibited their true ſenſe. Τὸ αὐτὸ δὲ τοῦτο συμβαίνειν ἀναγκαῖον· κἂν εἰ καθάπερ ἐν τῷ Τιμαίῳ γέγραπται, πρὶν γενέσθαι τὸν κόσμον, ἐκινεῖτο τὰ στοιχεῖα ἀλόγως· ἀνάγκη γὰρ ἢ βίαιον εἶναι τὴν κίνησιν, ἢ κατὰ φύσιν. εἰ δὲ κατὰ φύσιν ἐκινεῖτο, ἀνάγκη κόσμον εἶναι, ἐάν τις βούληται θεωρεῖν ἐπιστήσας. τό, τε γὰρ πρῶτον κινοῦν ἀνάγκη κινεῖν αὐτὸ, κινούμενον κατὰ φύσιν· καὶ τὰ κινούμενα μὴ βίᾳ, ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις ἠρεμοῦντα τόποις, ποιεῖν ἥπερ ἔχουσι νῦν τάξιν· τὰ μὲν βάρη ἔχοντα, ἐπὶ τὸ μέσον, τὰ δὲ κουφότητα, ἀπὸ τοῦ μέσου· ταύτην δ' ὁ κόσμος ἔχει τὴν διάταξιν, i. e. "'Tis neceſſary that the ſame "thing ſhould happen, even though, as Timæus "writes, the elements had been moved in an irregular manner, before the formation of the world; "for motion muſt neceſſarily be violent or natural. "But if they were moved according to nature, 'twill "appear to any ſtudious enquirer, that there muſt "neceſſarily be a world. For the firſt mover muſt, "itſelf, neceſſarily move; its motion being given "according to nature; and thoſe things which "moved without any force or impulſe, reſting in "their proper places compoſed the order they now "are in: thoſe which have gravity being ſelf directed towards the center, but thoſe which have "levity being directed from the center. Such is "the preſent order of the world." He obſerves, in conſequence of this, and very juſtly, that Anaxagoras who admitted no motion (50) antecedent to the firſt formation of the world, had a clearer idea of this matter than the reſt (51).

Such modern Peripateticks or Ariſtotelians as are moſt zealous for ſincere orthodoxy, cannot find any fault in this diſcourſe of Ariſtotle; they owning that the qualities Alteratrices and Motrices of the four elements, are ſufficient to produce all the effects of nature. They only bring in God as the preſerver of thoſe elementary faculties of which he is the firſt cauſe, or elſe make him interpoſe only his general concurrence; and they acknowledge, that excepting this, they perform all things; and, in quality of a ſecond cauſe, are the perfect and complete principle of all generations (52). A ſchool divine would therefore readily own, that if the four elements had exiſted independently of God, with all the faculties they now poſſeſs, they themſelves would have formed the machine called the world, and have maintained it in the ſtate in which we now ſee it. He therefore ſhould own two great defects in the doctrine of the Chaos; the firſt and principal is, its taking from God the creation of matter, and the production of the qualities peculiar to fire, air, earth, and ſea: the other is, that after taking this from him, it brings him unneceſſarily on the ſtage of the world, to ſettle the four elements in their proper places. Our new Philoſophers, who have rejected the qualities and faculties of the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, would find the ſame imperfections in the deſcription of Ovid's Chaos; for what they call general laws of motion, principles of mechanicks, modifications of matter, figure, ſituation and diſpoſition of the atoms, imports only that active and paſſive virtue of nature which the Ariſtotelians underſtand, under the terms, qualities, Alteratrices and Motrices of the four elements. Since therefore, according to the doctrine of the Ariſtotelians, theſe four bodies placed according to their natural levity and gravity, are a principle ſufficient for all generations; the Carteſians, the Gaſſendiſts, and the reſt of the modern Philoſophers, ought to aſſert that motion, ſituation, and configuration of the parts of matter, are ſufficient to produce all natural effects, without excepting even the general diſpoſition which placed the earth, the air, the water, and ſtars, where we ſee them. Thus the true cauſe of the world, and of the effects produced in it, is not different from the cauſe which gave motion to the parts of matter, whether it aſſigned at the ſame time to every atom its determinate figure, as the Gaſſendiſts pretend; or whether it only gave to parts, which were entirely cubical, an impulſe, which, by the duration of motion reduced under certain laws, would afterwards make them aſſume all kinds of figures. This is the hypotheſis of the Carteſians. Both the one and the other ought conſequently to acknowledge, that had matter been ſuch, before the creation of the world, as Ovid declared it to be, it would have been able to draw or diſingage itſelf from the Chaos by its own power; and to aſſume the form of the world without the aſſiſtance of God. They therefore ought to charge Ovid with two miſtakes: the one, in his ſuppoſing that matter, without the aſſiſtance of the Deity, contained the ſeeds of all mixt bodies, heat, motion, &c. the other is his aſſerting, that it would not have drawn its ſelf from a ſtate of confuſion without the aſſiſtance of God. This is giving too much and too little on theſe two occaſions reſpectively; 'tis neglecting aſſiſtance in the greateſt neceſſity, and ſuing for it when it is not neceſſary.

I know there are ſome people who do not approve of this fiction advanced by Des Cartes, with regard to the manner in which the world might have been formed (53). Some laugh at it, and look upon it as injurious to God; whilſt others charge it either with falſities or impoſſibilities. To the former it may be anſwered, that they don't underſtand this ſubject; and that were it known to them, they would own that nothing is more proper to give an exalted idea of the infinite wiſdom of God, than to aſſert that out of matter which had no form, he could make this world in a certain time, by barely preſerving the motion once given, and reduced to a ſmall number of ſimple and general laws. As to thoſe, who combat the particulars of Des Cartes's ſyſtem, as containing things contrary to the laws of mechanicks, and to the real ſtate which Aſtronomers have diſcovered in the Vortices, I ſhall content myſelf with

(48) See the remark [S] of the article EPICURUS; and alſo remark [A] of the article HIEROCLES the Philoſopher.

(49) Compare what was ſaid above, remark [G], num. 8. of the article ANAXAGORAS.

(50) Ariſtoteles, de Cælo, lib. 3. cap. 2. p. m. 370, [G].

(51) I cited Ariſtotle's words, citat. (161) of the article EPICURUS.

(52) We muſt except the ſoul of man.

REFLECTION on a notion of Des Cartes, concerning the manner, in which the world might have been formed.

(53) See Des Cartes's principles, part 3. n. 46 & ſeq.

anſwering them, that this does prevent the main part of his hypotheſis from being juſt; and I am fully perſuaded that Mr. Newton (*), the moſt formidable of all thoſe who have criticiſed Des Cartes, does not doubt but that the actual ſyſtem of the world might be the production of a few mechanical laws, eſtabliſhed by the Author of all things; for if we ſuppoſe that bodies determined to move in ſtrait lines, and to tend, either towards the center or the circumference, as often as the reſiſtance of other bodies ſhall oblige them to move in a circular manner, we eſtabliſh a principle which will neceſſarily produce great varieties in matter; and if it does not form this ſyſtem, 'twill form another.

* Sir ISAAC NEWTON. An OBSERVATION on the Epicurean hypotheſis.

The hypotheſis of the Epicureans, though ſo ridiculous and extravagant, affords wherewith to form a certain world. Do but once allow them the different figures of atoms, with the inalienable power of moving themſelves according to the laws of gravity; of mutually repelling one another, and of reflecting in ſuch and ſuch a manner, according as they ſtrike one another in a perpendicular or oblique direction; if this is but once granted, it cannot be denied but that the fortuitous concourſe of theſe atoms may form mighty bodies, which contain hard and fluid bodies, heat and cold, denſity and tranſparency, vortices, &c. All that can be denied them is, the poſſibility that chance ſhould produce ſuch a ſyſtem of bodies as our world; wherein ſo many things perſevere ſo long in their regularity, and ſo many animal machines a thouſand times more ingenious than thoſe of the art of man, which neceſſarily require an intelligent direction.

I will occaſionally examine a notion of Lami, a Member of the faculty in Paris, who is as great a ſtickler for atoms, as an oppoſer to Ariſtotle and Des Cartes; as is manifeſt from his work De Principiis rerum (54). Now this is the anſwer he makes to an objection commonly raiſed againſt the Epicurean Hypotheſis. The argument is built on the following compariſon: by throwing together letters at random, we ſhould never compoſe the Iliad of Homer; conſequently the fortuitous concourſe of atoms could never produce a world. Lami anſwers, that there is a wide difference between theſe two things. The Iliad cannot be formed but by the exact and determinate joyning of a certain number of letters; the method of compoſing it is therefore but one, amid the numberleſs multitude of ways in which letters may be diſpoſed: we therefore ought not to wonder, that chance ſhould never hit upon that only way, among a numberleſs multitude of others. But to make a world in general (this or another) it is not neceſſary that atoms ſhould meet and combine in a certain and exact, ſingle and determinate manner; for, in what manner ſoever they fix or lay hold one on the other, they will neceſſarily form aſſemblages of bodies, and conſequently a world. He does not ſtop here, but gives the compariſon another turn. How fortuitous ſoever, ſays he, the joyning of ſeveral letters may be, they neceſſarily form ſyllables and words; and conſequently the caſual concourſe of atoms will neceſſarily form bodies. If we object to him, that theſe words formed at random have no ſignification, he anſwers, it is becauſe words have only ſuch a ſignification as men thought proper to give them; and that thence it comes, that in order for their being ſignificative, they muſt be diſpoſed agreeably to the inſtitution of man; but that the virtue and power of atoms being independent of man, they produce conſiderable effects, ſuch as may raiſe his admiration, in what manner ſoever they may be diſpoſed (55). It will not be very neceſſary for us to examine all this; we may allow part of his pretenſions, and at the ſame time deny that our world, in which there are ſo many regular things, and theſe directed to certain ends, can be by the effect of chance. I muſt obſerve that Epicurus was obliged to acknowledge one inſtance of chance, as wonderful at leaſt as the Iliad would be, if compoſed by the fortuitous concourſe of certain letters. He ſuppoſed the Gods to have a human form, and thought them eternal. He therefore was forced to acknowledge that the fortuitous concourſe of atoms, of which the firſt men were made, had exactly and faithfully copied a certain determinate and ſingle original, viz. the form or figure of the Gods. We muſt hear Cicero on this ſubject. Hoc dico, non ab hominibus formæ figuram perveniſſe ad Deos: Dii enim ſemper fuerunt, & nati nunquam ſunt, ſiquidem æterni ſunt futuri. At homines nati: antè igitur humana forma, quàm homines eâ quâ erant formâ Dii immortales. Non ergo illorum humana forma, ſed noſtra divina dicenda eſt. Verùm hoc quidem, ut voletis: illud quæro, quæ fuerit tanta fortuna, (nihil enim ratione in rerum naturâ factum eſſe vultis) ſed tamen quis iſte tantus caſus, unde tam felix concurſus atomorum, ut repentè homines Deorum formâ naſcerentur? Semina Deorum decidiſſe de cælo putamus in terras, & ſic homines patrum ſimiles extitiſſe? vellem diceretis: Deorum cognationem agnoſcerem non invitus. Nihil tale dicitis: ſed caſu eſſe factum ut Deorum ſimiles eſſemus (56), i. e. "I aſſert as follows, viz. that the "Gods could not receive their form or figure from "men; for the Gods exiſted from all times, and "were never born, they being eternal. But men "are born; conſequently before men had their "human form, the immortals muſt have had theirs, "ſuppoſing them to be the ſame. Our form ſhould "therefore be called divine, and not theirs human. "But let this be as you will: I would make the fol-"lowing query; by what particular fortune was it, "(for you don't allow reaſon to be any ways con-"cerned in the creation of the univerſe) from what "ſtrange chance, and happy concourſe of atoms "could it come to paſs, that men ſhould be born, "on a ſudden, with the form or figure of the Gods? "Muſt we ſuppoſe that the ſeed of the Gods fell "from heaven upon the earth, and that this made "men reſemble their fathers? I would have you "aſſert this: I would willingly acknowledge a kin-"dred or relation with the Gods: but you do not "ſay any thing like this; but that it was by mere "chance we were formed like the Gods." This reſemblance between the Gods and men, formed by mere chance, is more aſtoniſhing than it would be to ſee a child, by taking up a pencil, and running it over a piece of paper as his infantine fancy might direct, draw as juſt and exact a reſemblance of Cæſar, as Michael Angelo could have done of that Hero.

(54) In the Acta Eruditor. 1682, p. 155, is an extract of it; which ſays that it was printed at Paris in 1680; but that was only a new title; I myſelf reading that book in 1678, at which time it was not a new book.

(55) Taken from chap. 39, book 3, of William Lami, de rerum principiis.

(56) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 32.

IV. The laſt obſervation I am to make is, relates to Ovid's aſſerting, that the war between the four elements, which, during the Chaos had been perpetual, was terminated by the authority of the God who formed the world. Is not this intimating that the elements, ever ſince that time, have been in profound peace? And is not ſuch an intimation very ill grounded and contradicted by experience? Has the war ever ceaſed between heat and cold, moiſture and dryneſs, levity and gravity, fire and water, &c.? Since Ovid complied with the hypotheſis of the four elements, he ought to have known, that the antipathy between their qualities ſtill exiſts; and that there is never any peace or truce between them, not even when they compoſe the temperament of mixt bodies? They do not return to ſuch a peace or compoſition till they have reciprocally annoyed one another; and if during any moments their combat is interrupted, it is becauſe the reſiſtance of one party is exactly equal to the activity of the other: When quite ſpent, they take breath; ever prepared to haraſs and deſtroy one another, the inſtant their ſtrength will give them leave. The equilibrium cannot laſt long; for each party is perpetually receiving ſuccour; and one party muſt loſe what the other gains. Accordingly Ovid ſaw that ſtill, as at the time of the Chaos, their combat prevailed univerſally, and even to the little receſſes of the ſame mixt body.

REFUTATION of Ovid's doctrine, on its ſuppoſing that the war between the elements ceaſed, when the Chaos was diſembroiled.

Corpore in uno
Frigida pugnabant calidis, humentia ſiccis,
Mollia cum duris, ſine pondere habentia pondus (57).

(57) Ovid. Metam. lib. 1. ver. 18.

That is,

"All were confus'd, and each diſturb'd the reſt,
"For hot and cold were in one body fixt;
"And ſoft with hard, and light with heavy mixt.
DRYDEN.

The laws of this combat are, that the weakeſt muſt be entirely ruined, proportionable to the whole extent of the power of the ſtrongeſt. Mercy and pity have no room here; and no propoſals of an accommodation are liſtened to. This inteſtine war makes way for for the diſſolution of the compound, and compaſſes that end one time or other. Living bodies are more expoſed to it than others, and would ſoon ſink, if nature did not recruit them; but at laſt the ſtruggle between the natural heat and the radical moiſture proves mortal to them. The power of time, which conſumes all things, and which Ovid deſcribes ſo happily in the 15th book of the Metamorphoſes, is founded only on the conflict of bodies.

Tempus edax rerum, tuque invidioſa vetuſtas,
Omnia deſtruitis, vitiataque dentibus ævi
Paulatim lenta conſumitis omnia morte (58).

(58) Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. ver. 234.

That is,

" Thy teeth, devouring Time, thine, envious age,
" On things below ſtill exerciſe your rage:
" With venom'd grinders you corrupt our meat;
" And then, at lingring meals, the mortals eat.
DRYDEN.

Our Poet, when he wrote this deſcription, forgot what he had related in the chapter of the Chaos: ſo that we need but compare the beginning of his book with the end, to prove him guilty of contradiction. He aſſerts in the firſt book, that an end was put to the ſtruggle between the elements; and declares in the 15th book, that they deſtroy one another reciprocally, and that nothing perſeveres in the ſame ſtate.

(59) Ovid. Metam. lib. 15. ver. 237.

Hæc quoque non perſtant, quæ nos elementa vocamus (59).
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Omnia fiunt
Ex ipſis, & in ipſa cadunt: reſolutaque tellus
In liquidas rareſcit aquas; tenuatus in auras
Aëraque humor abit; dempto quoque pondere rurſus
In ſuperos aër tenuiſſimus emicat ignes.
Inde retro redeunt, idemque retexitur ordo:
Ignis enim denſum ſpiſſatus in aëra tranſit;
Hic in aquas; tellus glomerata cogitur undâ.
Nec ſpecies ſua cuique manet: rerumque novatrix
Ex aliis alias reparat natura figuras (60).

(60) Ibid. ver. 244.

That is,

" Not thoſe which elements we call, abide.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" All things are mix'd of thoſe, which all contain,
" And into theſe are all reſolv'd again:
" Earth rarifies to dew; expanded more
" The ſubtil dew in air begins to ſoar;
" Spreads, as ſhe flies, and weary of her name,
" Extenuates ſtill, and changes into flame;
" Thus having by degrees perfection won,
" Reſtleſs they ſoon untwiſt the web they ſpun;
" And fire begins to loſe her radiant hew,
" Mix'd with groſs air, and air deſcends to dew;
" And dew condenſing, does her form forego,
" And ſinks, a heavy lump of earth, below.
" Thus are their figures never at a ſtand,
" But chang'd by nature's innovating hand;
" All things are alter'd, nothing is deſtroy'd,
" The ſhifted ſcene for ſome new ſhew employ'd."
DRYDEN.

(61) Let it not be objected, to excuſe him of falling into a contradiction, that he introduces Pythagoras the Philoſopher ſpeaking in this place; for moſt of the things he puts into his mouth, are either narrations or opinions conformable to the notions of thoſe, who explained generation and corruption by the qualities of the elements.

He afterwards gives ſeveral inſtances of conqueſts which the waters make over the earth, and the earth over the waters, &c. Where then is the pacification ſo much boaſted by him in his firſt book? See the margin (61).

Though he had not contradicted himſelf, we yet might cenſure him very juſtly; for as the world was to be a theatre of viciſſitudes, nothing could have been more improper than to ſuppoſe the four elements in peace; and the ceaſing of the Chaos, ſo far from putting an end to their conteſts, ſhould have begun to ſet them at variance, had there been a good harmony between them during the Chaos. 'Tis their combat that renders nature fruitful: their concord would make it barren; and was it not for the implacable war waged by them wherever they meet, there would be no generation. The production of one thing is always the deſtruction of another.

Nam quodcunque ſuis mutatum finibus exit,
Continuo hoc mors eſt illius quod fuit ante (62).

(61) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 671.

The Senſe is,

" When things are ſhifted, and their form abandon,
" This is the death of that which was before."

Generatio unius eſt corruptio alterius. This is an axiom in philoſophy. Ovid therefore ſhould have preſuppoſed, that the God who aſſigned diſtinct places to the elements, commanded them to fight, and not give the leaſt quarter; and to act like very ambitious conquerors, who ſhould employ every method poſſible to invade the neighbouring States. Dido's wiſh ſhould have been like the orders given them.

Nunc, olim, quocunque dabunt ſe tempore vires,
Littora littoribus contraria, fluctibus undas
Imprecor, arma armis, pugnent ipſique nepotes (63).

(63) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 627.

That is,

" Our arms, our ſeas, our ſhores, oppos'd to theirs,
" And the ſame hate deſcend on all our heirs".
DRYDEN.

They indeed act as if they had received ſuch an injunction, and that their ſtrongeſt paſſion was, to put it duly in execution. Cold extends its ſphere as far as poſſible, and there deſtroys its enemy. Heat acts the like part, and theſe two qualities alternately become maſters of the field of battle, the one in winter, the other in ſummer; and imitate thoſe victorious armies, which, after winning a deciſive battle, forces their enemy to fly for refuge to his citadels, purſue him thither, beſiege, and reduce him to the utmoſt extremities. Cold, during the ſummer, flies for refuge to caves and ſubterraneous places; and, to prevent its being entirely conquered, redoubles the efforts of its reſiſtance, and fortifies it as ſtrongly as poſſible, by the virtue or power called Antiperiſtaſis; and this the heat does in the winter. The elementary philoſophers, who thus explain the effects of nature, ſay, that every quality endeavours to ſubdue, in ſuch a manner, the things it attacks; that not contented with reducing them to a ſtate of vaſſallage, and to make them fight under their ſtandard, it endeavours to tranſmute them into its own ſtate, omne agens, ſay they, intendit ſibi aſſimilare paſſum, i. e. " Every agent ſtrives to aſſimilate to itſelf whatever " it works upon." Now can we meet with a more hoſtile and more ambitious animoſity than this?

Empedocles was miſtaken, in aſſociating with the four elements, friendſhip and enmity; the former for union, and the latter for diſunion (64). We allow that the union and diſunion of parts are extremely neceſſary for the productions of nature; but it is certain that friendſhip has no ſhare in this: the ſole diſcord, the ſole antipathy of elements, aſſembles bodies in one part, and diſperſes them in another. We muſt aſcribe theſe two qualities of Empedocles at moſt to living bodies only: but air and fire, water and earth, have no other aſſociates but enmity.

(64) See Ariſtotle's Phyſicks, lib. 8. chap. 1. and Diogn. Laert. lib. 8. num. 76, & ibi Aldobrandinus & Menagius.

Living bodies act very conformably to the order, which Ovid muſt ſuppoſe was given them, by the author of the diſembroiling of the Chaos, viz. an order for them to deſtroy one another; for it is literally true, that they ſubſiſt only by deſtruction: whatever contributes to the ſupport of their life loſes its form, and changes its ſtate and ſpecies. Vegetables deſtroy the conſtitution and qualities of all the juices they can attract. Animals exerciſe the ſame havock on all things, which ſerve them for food. They eat one another; and ſeveral ſpecies of beaſts make war upon the other, in no other view but to devour ſuch of their enemies as they ſhall kill. In ſome countries men act the ſame part, and they are great deſtroyers every where. I do not here hint at the havock, which proceeds from ambition, avarice, cruelty, or from ſuch other paſſions as give riſe to wars; I ſpeak only of the effects of the care we take to feed and nouriſh our bodies. Man, in this reſpect, is a principle ſo ruinous and deſtructive, that were all

Chaos [H]. A man muſt ſhew a moſt depraved taſte to imagine that a certain Poem entitled all the reſt of the animals as much ſo in proportion, it would be impoſſible for the earth to furniſh them with proviſions ſufficient. When we caſt our eyes in the ſtreets and markets of great cities, on the prodigious multitude of herbs, roots, and fruits, and a numberleſs multitude of other things which are for food to the inhabitants, would one not imagine that all this was proviſion for a whole week? Would one ſuppoſe that this ſhew is to be renewed daily? Would one think that ſo ſmall an aperture as the human mouth was a gulph, an abyſs, which ſwallows up all we have been ſpeaking of in a little time? Experience only could perſuade us of the truth of this. In the Saintevremoniana lately publiſhed are the following words (65). 'Tis ſaid that there are four thouſand people in Paris who ſell oyſters; and that fifteen hundred large oxen, and upwards of ſixteen thouſand ſheep, calves or hogs, beſides a prodigious quantity of poultry and game of all kinds are daily eat there. Hence the reader may judge how great the conſumption muſt be in thoſe countries, where the inhabitants are greater eaters and feed more upon fleſh.

(65) Page 293, Dutch edit. 1701.

The condition of nature being therefore ſuch, that beings are produced and preſerved by the deſtruction of one another, Ovid ought not to have affirmed, that the war between the elements was put an end to when the world began, and the Chaos ended (66). It would have been enough to ſay, that the ſituation and force of the combatants were regulated and balanced in ſuch a manner, that their uninterrupted hoſtilities ſhould not bring about the deſtruction of the work, but only agreeable viciſſitudes: Per queſto variar natura è bella, (this variety gives a beauty to nature) as the Italians ſay. Some will perhaps imagine, that the war not ceaſing upon the orderly diſpoſition of theſe principles, was not ſo much a ceſſation of the Chaos, as the rough draught or ſketch of a diſembroiling; and that after this diſembroiled compoſition, that is our world, ſhall have laſted a certain number of ages, it will be ſucceeded by a much more beautiful world whence diſcord will be baniſhed. And they will pretend, perhaps, that St. Paul (67) confirms their opinion, when he ſays that all creatures wait earneſtly to be delivered from their ſtate of vanity and corruption. But they may ſay what they pleaſe; I will not loſe my time in examining their notions.

(66) See in Tom. 18, of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, p. 23, a remark in oppoſition to an aſſertion of Gregory Nazianzen, in his 12th oration, viz. That the world is ſupported and kept together by peace.

(67) Chap. 8. ver. 19 & ſeq. of the Romans. This paſſage greatly puzzles the Commentators.

'Tis to obſerved that, according to the mechanical principles by which the new Philoſophers endeavour to explain the effects of nature, 'tis eaſier to comprehend the perpetual war between bodies, than by the philoſophy of the four elements. For all the action of the ſix elementary qualities being, according to the new philoſophy, nothing but local motion; 'tis plain that every body oppoſes and combats whatever it meets with; and that the particles of matter tend only to claſh, break and repreſs one another, in the utmoſt rigour of the laws of the ſtrongeſt power.

[Sir Samuel Garth makes ſome remarks on this ſubject. After quoting the following lines, Nec circumfuſo pendebat in aere tellus, Ponderibus librata ſuis, he adds, Thus was the ſtate of nature before the creation: and here it is obvious, that Ovid had a diſcerning notion of the gravitation of bodies. 'Tis now demonſtrated, that every part of matter tends to every part of matter with a force, which is always in a direct ſimple proportion of the quantity of the matter, and an inverſe duplicate proportion of the diſtance; which tending or gravitating is conſtant, and univerſal. This power, whatever it be, acting always proportionably to the ſolid content of bodies, and never in any proportion to their ſuperficies, cannot be explained by any material impulſe. For the laws of impulſe are phyſically neceſſary: there can be no αὐτεξούσιον or arbitrary principle in meer matter; its parts cannot move, unleſs they be moved; and cannot do otherwiſe, when preſſed on by other parts in motion; and therefore 'tis evident from the following lines, that Ovid ſtrictly adhered to the opinion of the moſt diſcerning Philoſophers, who taught that all things were formed by a wiſe and intelligent mind. Juſſit & extendi campos, ſubſidere valles, Fronde tegi Sylvas. The Fiat of the Hebrew Law-giver is not more ſublime, than the juſſit of the Latin Poet, who goes on in the ſame elevated and philoſophical ſtyle. His ſuper impoſuit Liquidum, & gravitate carentem Æthera. Here the Author ſpreads a thin veil of æther over his infant creation; and though his aſſerting the upper region to be void of gravitation, may not, in a mathematical rigour, be true; yet 'tis found from the natural enquiries made ſince, and eſpecially from the learned Dr. Halley's diſcourſe on the Barometer, that if, on the ſurface of the earth, an inch of quickſilver in the tube be equal to a cylinder of air of 300 foot, it will be at a mile's height equal to a cylinder of air of 2700000; and therefore the air at ſo great a diſtance from the earth, muſt be rarified to ſo great a degree, that the ſpace it fills up, muſt be a very ſmall proportion to that which is entirely void of matter.

I think we may be confident, from what already appears, as well as from what our Author has writ on the Roman feaſts, that he could not be totally ignorant of aſtronomy. Some of the criticks would inſinuate from the following lines, that he miſtook the annual motion of the ſun for the diurnal. Sectus in obliquum.——Tho' the ſun be always in one or other of the zodiack, and never goes by either motion more northward or ſouthward, than is here deſcribed; yet Phaeton being deſigned to drive the chariot but one day, ought to have been directed in the æquator, or a circle parallel to it, and not round the other oblique one of the ecliptick; a degree of which, and that by motion contrary to the diurnal, he was obliged to go in that length of time. I am inclined to think that Ovid had ſo great an attention to poetical embelliſhments, that he voluntarily declined a ſtrict obſervance of any aſtronomical ſyſtem. For though that ſcience was far from being neglected in former ages; yet the progreſs which was made in it, by no means equalled that of our preſent time. Lucretius, though in other things moſt penetrating, deſcribes the ſun ſcarce bigger than he appears to the eye.

Nec nimio ſolis major rota, nec major ardor
Eſſe poteſt, noſtris quam ſenſibus eſſe videtur.

And Homer, imagining the ſeats of the Gods above the fixed ſtars, repreſents the falling of Vulcan from thence to the iſle of Lemnos, to continue during a whole day.

Πᾶν δ'ἦμαρ φερόμην, ἅμα δ'ηελίῳ καταδύντι]
Κάππεσον ἰν Λήμνω.

The Greek Poet aims here to give a ſurpriſing idea of the height of the celeſtial manſions; but if the computation of a modern Aſtronomer be true, they are at ſo much a greater diſtance, that Vulcan would have been more years in falling, than he was minutes. Preface by Sir Samuel Garth to the tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, p. 4 & ſeq. London 1719, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

[H] They ought to have excepted man out of their general rule, ſince he is ſubject to the moſt dreadful confuſions and contrarieties that could have deformed the Chaos.] But if we ſet aſide the reaſons or arguments given in the preceding remark, and grant that Ovid might have aſſerted, in general, that the creatures were drawn from the Chaos; we yet may be permitted to ſay, that he could not affirm in particular, that this favour was extended to man. I only conſider the views we may have, when deſtitute of the light of revelation. In this ſtate, is it poſſible for us not to conclude, that the horrors of the Chaos ſtill ſubſiſt, with reſpect to man? For, to wave the perpetual ſtruggle between the elementary qualities, which prevail ſomething more in this frame, than in moſt other material Beings, is there not a furious war between his body and ſoul, his reaſon and his ſenſes, his ſenſitive and reaſonable ſoul? Reaſon ought to ſuppreſs and calm this diſorder, and pacify theſe inteſtine ſtruggles; but it is both Judge and Party; its decrees are not executed, and only increaſe the evil (68). This obliged one of the juſteſt and moſt ſhining Genius's of the 17th century, to prefer the condition of ſheep to that of man. Peruſe the following paſſage.

Cependant nous avons la raiſon pour partage,
Et vous en ignorez l'uſage.
Innocens animaux n'en ſoiez point jaloux
Ce n'eſt pas un grand avantage.
Cette fiere raiſon dont on fait tant de bruit
Contre les paſſions n'eſt pas un ſeur remede,

(68) With regard to the complaints brought againſt reaſon, ſee the Nouvelles Lettres contre Maimbourg, p. 755 & ſeq. and ſome paſſages from Cicero, in the remark [E] of the article PAULICIANS.

Un peu de vin la trouble, un enfant la ſeduit,
Et dechirer un cœur qui l'apelle à ſon aide,
Eſt tout l'effet qu'elle produit.
Toûjours impuiſſante & ſevere
Elle s'opoſe à tout, & ne ſurmonte rien.
Sous la garde de votre chien
Vous devez beaucoup moins redouter la colere
Des loups cruels & raviſſans,
Que ſous l'autorité d'une telle chimere
Nous ne devons craindre nos ſens (69).

(69) Madame Des Houlieres, Idylle des Moutons, p. 32, 33. Amſterdam edit. 1694.

The ſenſe is,

" Tho' reaſon is our lot, and you're denied it,
" Yet (harmleſs lambs) this ſhou'd not make you jealous,
" For, tho' extoll'd, its benefit is ſmall.
" This haughty reaſon, ſo much prais'd by men,
" Is not a ſure defence againſt the paſſions.
" Wine ruffles it, a child can quite miſlead it.
" Th' effect produc'd by it is only this,
" The heart which ſeeks its aid is ſurely broke.
" For ever impotent, for ever churliſh,
" All things it combats, and is ſtill defeated.
" Leſs formidable are rapacious wolves
" To you, fond lambkins, than our boaſted reaſon,
" Which o'er our ſenſes bears deſpotic ſway".

Theſe lines are found in Madame des Houlieres. We alſo find that ſhe looks upon the condition of inanimate creatures to be preferable to ours. Here follow her reflections, addreſſed to a ſtream or rivulet (70).

(70) Ibid. In l'Idylle du Ruiſſeau, p. 119, 220.

Avec tant de bonheur d'où vient votre murmure ?
Helas votre ſort eſt ſi doux !
Taiſez-vous ruiſſeau, c'eſt à nous
A nous plaindre de la nature.
De tant de paſſions que nourrit notre cœur
Aprennez qu'il n'en eſt pas une
Qui ne traine après ſoi le trouble, la douleur,
Le repentir, ou l'infortune.
Elles dechirent nuit & jour
Les cœurs dont elles ſont maîtreſſes.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
De toutes ſortes d'unions
Que notre vie eſt éloignée !
De trahiſons, d'horreurs, & de diſſenſions
Elle eſt toûjours accompagnée.
Qu'avez-vous merité, ruiſſeau tranquille & doux,
Pour être mieux traité que nous ?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Enfin dans cet horrible gouffre
De miſere & de vanité
Je me perds ; & plus j'enviſage
La foibleſſe de l'homme & ſa malignité,
Et moins de la divinité
En lui je reconnois l'image.

The ſenſe is,

" Since you're ſo happy, whence ariſe theſe murmurs ?
" Delightful brooks ! thrice happy is your lot.
" With juſtice we, not you, exclaim at Nature.
" The various paſſions which our heart foments,
" Are all attended with a baleful train,
" Repentance, anguiſh, terrors and misfortunes.
" Inceſſant, theſe, that hapleſs heart conſume,
" O'er which their ever-fatal power extends.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" Unbleſs'd is human life with chearful union.
" Its ſole attendants are a cruel band ;
" Dark treaſons, horrors, plagues and dire diſcuſſions.
" Ye gently-flowing brooks, whence comes this favour ?
" Why are you us'd ſo kindly ; men ſo ill ?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" In this dread gulph of vanity and woe
" So long I wander, darkling, that I'm loſt.
" The more I view man's frailty and his guilt,
" The leſs God's image ſeems on him impreſt.

The lines I ſhall quote hereunder, are a freſh proof of the Chaos, in which mankind were left. Things of the moſt oppoſite kind, light and darkneſs, are ever inſeparable in man ; they follow one another reciprocally in him ; they tread upon one another's heels : the leſs a man knows, the more he imagines he does ; the more he knows, the more ſenſible he is of his ignorance, and the more liable he is to deviate from the right path. Is it poſſible for a Being to be the ſubject of a more capricious conflict ?

Que l'eſprit de l'homme eſt borné !
Quelque tems qu'il donne à l'étude,
Quelque penetrant qu'il ſoit né,
Il ne ſait rien à fond, rien avec certitude :
De tenebres pour lui tout eſt environné ;
La lumiere qui vient du ſavoir le plus rare
N'eſt qu'un fatal éclair, qu'un ardent qui l'égare.
Bien plus que l'ignorance elle eſt à redouter.
Longues erreurs qu'elle a fait naitre
Vous ne prouvez que trop que chercher à connoître
N'eſt ſouvent qu'aprendre à douter (71).

(71) Madame Des Houlieres, in the Reflexions diverſes, p. 94, 95.

The ſenſe is,

" What narrow limits bound the life of man !
" However bright his genius, tho' he ſpend
" His years in painful ſtudy, ſtill his mind
" Knows nought with certainty, or in perfection.
" All things, to him, are wrapt in ſhades and darkneſs.
" Learning's moſt ſhining light's a fatal meteor,
" An Ignis fatuus, glimmering and miſguiding,
" And ignorance leſs fruitful is of dangers.
" The errors which from learning's light ariſe,
" Too plainly prove, that ſearching after knowledge
" Often produces nought but endleſs doubts.

[Had Bayle been acquainted with the following beautiful lines of the Earl of Rocheſter, he doubtleſs would have quoted them, preferable to any other, on this occaſion. My Lord obſerves, That man,

" before certain inſtinct will prefer
" Reaſon, which fifty times for one does err.
" Reaſon, that Ignis fatuus in the mind,
" Which leaving light of nature (ſenſe) behind ;
" Pathleſs and dang'rous wand'ring ways it takes
" Thro' errors, fenny bogs and thorny brakes ;
" Whilſt the miſguided follower climbs with pain
" Mountains of whimſies, heap'd in his own brain :
" Stumbling from thought to thought, falls headlong down
" Into doubt's boundleſs ſea, where like to drown,
" Books bear him up a while, and make him try
" To ſwim with bladders of philoſophy :
" In hopes ſtill to o'ertake the ſkipping light,
" The vapour dances in his dazling ſight,
" Till ſpent, it leaves him to eternal night.
" Then old age and experience hand in hand,
" Lead him to death, and make him underſtand,
" After a ſearch ſo painful and ſo long,
" That all his life he has been in the wrong.
" Huddled in dirt, the reaſ'ning engine lies,
" Who was ſo proud, ſo witty, and ſo wiſe.
" Pride drew him in, as cheats their bubbles catch,
" And makes him venture to be made a wretch.
" His wiſdom did his happineſs deſtroy,
" Aiming to know what world he ſhould enjoy ;
" And wit was his vain frivolous prepence,
" Of pleaſing others at his own expence. *]

* Addit. of the Tranſl. from Rocheſter's Poems, p. 7. London, 1712. 12mo.

I ſhould never have done, did I go about to collect all the good things which have been writ, concerning the contrariety of the ingredients of which man is compoſed. Count de Buſſy Rabutin, tells us, " That he ſhall never forget what father Senault " ſaid to him on this ſubject : that there was a very " cloſe connection between the ſoul and the body, " and yet, that they were always claſhing ; and, in " a word, that they were two enemies, who can ne- " ver part, and two friends who can never agree. " Nothing was ever truer, or better ſaid (72)." There (72) Buſſi Rabutin, letter 21, part 4. p. 53. Dutch edit.

There appears to me greater freedom, or greater vivacity, but not more judgment, (tho' I think there's a great deal in it) in this paſſage of Balzac. But who do you think, reverend father, wrote the following words? "We are compoſed of two enemies who are "ever at variance: the ſublime part of the human "ſoul is ever at war with the inferior part of it. "We will go farther: MAN IS COMPOSED OF A "GOD AND OF A BEAST, FASTENED TOGETHER. "If you gueſs the Author of theſe four lines, I will "think you as great a magician as thoſe who foretold "the birth of King Sapores (73).

(73) Balzac, in a diſſertation addreſſed to the reverend father, Andrew de St. Denys, a divine of the congregation of the Feuillants; at the end of his Socrate Chretien, p. m. 193, 194.

There are excellent reflections on this ſubject, in the two orations of Gregory Palamas, Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, in the 14th Century. They are written by way of dialogue, pleadings, and definitive ſentence: the Soul accuſing the Body, and the Body defending itſelf; not merely by denying, but by colouring the Fact, with the Sentence pronounced by the Judges. I borrow the words of Claudius Eſpencæus, who tranſlated the two declamations in queſtion into French, and publiſhed his Verſion at Paris in 1570, 8vo. Du Verdier Vau-Privas quotes ſome ſtrokes from it (74). I will now tranſcribe a long paſſage which contains ſome very excellent particulars, and at the ſame time ſome faults. "The Philoſophers .... did not know the "diſpoſition of the ſprings, which give motion to the "human heart; and had not any notion or ſuſpi-"cion of the ſtrange change which had been "wrought in it, by which reaſon was become the "ſlave of the paſſions..... They indeed are par-"donable for not having known the cauſe of the "change which had been wrought in man; but "they are no ways ſo, for not having perceived this "change; for it is pardonable in perſons, who paſs "their lives without reflection, not to know what "paſſes within themſelves; but that the curious "obſervers of nature, that men, whoſe chief appli-"cation was to ſtudy and know themſelves, ſhould "not have obſerved, that men were no longer guid-"ed and governed by reaſon, this is comprehenſible. "And indeed, how can we conceive that it was poſ-"ſible for perſons of diſcernment, not to have diſ-"covered by their knowledge and their own expe-"rience, that it is not in the power of reaſon, tho' it "exert all its ſtrength and applications, to deſtroy a "paſſion which has been once rooted in the human "heart, neither by the help of years, nor by the in-"fluence of any example, nor yet the fear of any "evil; and yet they ſhould not have perceived what "is ſeen and felt by the dulleſt and moſt ignorant "perſons. A little reflection therefore on what they "experience in themſelves, was therefore capable "of making them acquainted with the ſtate of rea-"ſon, and of convincing them of their own weak-"neſs; and of making them conceive, that man, "who was once in the moſt elevated part of the ſoul, "who inhabited that calm, luminous region, whence "he ſaw and regulated himſelf internally and exter-"nally, is now plunged or immerſed in the ſenſes, "where he gratifies and indulges himſelf in plea-"ſures, as though he were born for them. They alſo "would have perceived, that although reaſon has "loſt the power it once had in man, yet its light is "not ſo totally extinguiſhed, but that he has ſtill "glimmerings enough ſufficient for him to perceive "his duty (75)." Theſe are Mr. Eſprit's words, in a work publiſhed by him in 1678. All he obſerves with regard to the weakneſs and ſlavery of reaſon is very true; but he is in the wrong for accuſing the Philoſophers in general of not knowing this ſervitude, nor having had the leaſt ſuſpicion of the cauſe which produced it; for it is certain that ſeveral Heathens had a knowledge in this particular, which he ſuppoſes they had not. I am ſenſible that the Stoicks ſpoke in too pompous a ſtrain of the empire of reaſon; and that the idea they formed to themſelves of their wiſe man heated their imaginations to ſuch a degree, that they let dropt ſome particulars which had the air of madneſs; not in their ſuppoſing that, if freed from the paſſions, he would conſtantly and inviolably obey the laws of order and virtue; but in their ſuppoſing that it was in the power of man to root out every vicious paſſion. This was their capital error; in this they diſcovered their ignorance with regard to the ſtate and condition of man. The other part of their doctrine was judicious, viz. that if man could conquer or root out his paſſions, he might without difficulty practiſe virtue, and arrive at perfection (76). However, Mr. Eſprit ought to have confined his cenſures to them, and not extend them ſo far as he has done; who told him that the Philoſophers did not know that the ſoul of man is immerſed in the ſenſes? Was Cicero a ſtranger to this when he wrote the following paſſage in Book III. of the Republick, which St. Auſtin preſerved, and wherein we have ſo lively a deſcription of the captivity of the ſoul, and the empire of the paſſions. Homo non ut à matre, ſed ut à noverca natura editus eſt in vitam, corpore nudo, & fragili, & infirmo, animo autem anxio ad moleſtias, humili ad timores, molli ad labores, prono ad libidines, in quo tamen ineſſet tamquam OBRUTUS quidam divinus ignis ingenii, & mentis (77), i. e. "Man is brought into life, not as "by a mother but by a ſtep-mother; his body being "naked, weak and infirm; his mind affected by "uneaſineſſes, humbled by fears, averſe to labour, "and prone to luſt; in which there yet appears a "divine ſpark of reaſon and underſtanding, but "STIFLED as it were." Had Cicero no knowledge, no ſuſpicion of the odd change that had been wrought in man, whereby reaſon had become the ſlave of the paſſions? What then can thoſe words mean, which St. Auſtin has alſo preſerved, whereby Cicero ſeems to approve of thoſe antient Heathen Prophets, who thought that the birth of man was a puniſhment for ſome ſin committed in another life (78)? Does he not approve a reflection he had read in Ariſtotle, viz. that the union of the ſoul and body was a puniſhment like to that inflicted by ſome antient robbers; of faſtning living bodies to dead carcaſſes, mouth to mouth, belly againſt belly, and ſo of the other parts (79)? Was not this owning that the ſoul is, by ſin, reduced to the miſerable condition it ſuffers in the body? Was it not conſidering ſin, as the cauſe, which had diveſted it of its natural ſtate and its primitive nobility. Here follows this beautiful paſſage in queſtion of Cicero. Ex quibus humanæ vitæ erroribus, & ærumnis fit, ut interdum veteres illi ſive vates, ſive in ſacris, initiiſque tradendis divinæ mentis interpretes, qui nos ob aliqua ſcelera ſuſcepta in vita ſuperiore, pœnarum luendarum cauſſa natos eſſe dixerunt, aliquid vidiſſe videantur; verumque ſit illud, quod eſt apud Ariſtotelem, ſimili nos affectos eſſe ſupplicio, atque eos, qui quondam, cum in prædonum Etruſcorum manus incidiſſent, crudelitate excogitata necabantur: quorum corpora viva cum mortuis, adverſa adverſis accommodata, quam aptiſſime colligabantur: ita noſtros animos cum corporibus copulatos, ut vivos cum mortuis eſſe conjunctos (80). To conclude; I know not why Mr. Eſprit affirms, that the Philoſophers did not know that the power of reaſon is loſt, and yet its light is preſerved. Did not Euripides the Dramatic Philoſopher ſay, that after having long meditated on the depravity and corruption of mankind; he found, that their committing ſin was not owing to the diſpoſition of the underſtanding; but to their deviating from virtue though they knew her; ſome through indolence, and others from a love of voluptuous pleaſures. He puts the beautiful reflections following into Phædras's mouth.

(74) See page 175 & ſeq. of the Bibliotheque Françoiſe.

(75) Eſprit, preface to la Fauſſeté des vertus humaines.

(76) See Nouvelles Lettres contre Maimbourg, p. 758.

(77) See the fragments of Cicero, collected by Andrew Patricius, p. m. 70. He cites this as extracted from St. Auſtin, lib. 4. contra Pelagium.

(78) See remark [R] of the article TULLIA.

(79) Compare the citation of the article LEO X, in which I quote a paſſage from Virgil.

(80) Cicero, in Hortenſio, apud Auguſtin. lib. 4. contra Pelagium. See the fragments collected by Andrew Patricius, p. m. 102, 103.

Ἤδη ποτ' ἄλλως νυκτὸς ἐν μακρῷ χρόνῳ
Θνητῶν, ἐφρόντισ', ἡ διέφθαρται βίος.
Καί μοι δοκοῦσιν οὐ κατὰ γνώμης φύσιν
Πράσσειν κάκιον. Ἔστι γὰρ τόγ' ἐν φρονεῖν
Πολλοῖσιν, ἀλλὰ τῇδ' ἀθρεῖν ταῦτ'.
Τὰ χρηστ' ἐπισκάμμεσθα, κοὐ γιγνώσκομεν,
Οὐκ ἐκπονοῦμεν δ'. οἱ μὲν ἀργίας ὕπο,
Οἳδ' ἡδονὴν προθέντες ἀντὶ τοῦ καλοῦ
Ἄλλην τιν'

Jam ſæpe mecum aliàs noctis in longo tempore
Cogitavi, quomodo corrupta ſit hominum vita.
Et mihi videntur non ſecundum animi naturam: at præter eam
Deterius facere. eſt enim recta rerum cognitio
Multis. Sed ſic ſpectanda ſunt hæc.
Bona quidem tenemus, & novimus:
Sed non facimus: alii quidem propter ignaviam,
Alii vero anteponentes voluptatem honeſto,
Aliam aliquam (81).

(81) Euripides, in Hippolyto, ver. 375, p. m. 349. Obſerve that Farnaby, in Ovid. Metam. lib. 7. ver. 11. aſcribes this falſity to the Medæa of Euripides.

titled De Vetula, was written by Ovid [I]. I will quote ſome verſes from it (d) to give thoſe, who have not this author's Poem, an opportunity of judging of the Writer.

(d) In the citation 90.

I will

The ſenſe is,

" Frequent, Iv'e paſt the lonely, tedious night,
" In meditation on man's ſad corruption.
" From my reflections this reſult ariſes;
" 'Tis not, from nature, man is prone to vice.
" From nature he receiv'd true reaſon's light.—
" The genuine ſtate of the affair is this;
" Virtue we know, but follow not her precepts;
" Betray'd by indolence, or love of pleaſure.

Is it poſſible to deſcribe better than theſe words of Ovid do, the inability of reaſon, with regard to the making us do what ſhe approves?

Concipit interea validos Ætias ignes,
Et luctata diu, poſtquam ratione furorem
Vincere non poterat; Fruſtra Medea repugnas, Neſcio quis deus obſtat, ait (82).
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Excute (83) virgineo conceptas pectore flammas,
Si potes, infelix. Si poſſem, ſanior eſſem;
Sed trahit invitam nova vis: aliudque Cupido,
Mens aliud ſuadet. Video meliora, proboque,
Deteriora ſequor (84).

(82) Ovid. Metam. lib. 7. ver. 9.

(83) Idem, ibid. ver. 17.

(84) She owns, in Euripides, that ſhe knows, or is ſenſible of the crimes ſhe will commit; but that her paſſion prevails over her knowledge. Καὶ μανθάνω μὲν οἷα τολμήσω κακὰ, Θυμὸς δὲ κρείσσων τῶν ἐμῶν βουλευμάτων. Et intelligo quidem qualia ſint ea mala, quæ ſum auſura. Sed ira eſt potentior meis conſiliis. Euripid. in Medea, ver. 1078, p. 319.

That is,

" Mean while Medea, ſeiz'd with fierce deſire,
" By reaſon ſtrives to quench the raging fire;
" But ſtrives in vain!——Some God (ſhe ſaid) withſtands,
" And reaſon's baffled council countermands.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" Wretch, from thy virgin-breaſt this flame expel,
" And ſoon—Oh cou'd I, all would then be well!
" But love, reſiſtleſs love, my ſoul invades;
" Diſcretion this, affection that perſuades,
" I ſee the right, and I approve it too;
" Condemn the wrong, . . . and yet the wrong purſue. TATE, &c.

The Reader will take notice in particular, that Medea aſcribes this irreſiſtible impulſe to ſome God. This was the uſual refuge of the Heathens, in accounting for ſuch paſſions as draw men away, in ſpight of the light of his mind, and the knowledge of his true intereſt (85). They always diſcovered ſomething divine in this, and commonly the puniſhment of ſome ſin antecedent to it. This ſhews they were not ſo ignorant as Mr. Eſprit ſuppoſes; but that they had ſome idea of what divines teach us, with regard to the loſs of free-will by means of ſin; and concerning the abandoned ſtate of thoſe who abuſe the favour of God.

(85) See remark [Y] of the article HELENA.

I could have cited, inſtead of Ovid, a great number of Writers who were profeſſed Philoſophers; but thought it would be much better to point out Mr. Eſprit's miſtake; for 'tis leſs excuſable not to be acquainted with the writings of ſuch a Poet, than not to have read the Greek Authors. I alſo would have collected a great number of teſtimonies of ſufficient credit to convince us, that the antients knew very well that the ſtate of mankind is ſtill a Chaos. But the ſtrongeſt deſcriptions of the Orators, Poets, or heathen Philoſophers, cannot exhibit to us ſo lively an idea of this, as that given by St. Paul. We therefore need but caſt an eye on the picture which this great Apoſtle, directed by eternal truth, preſents us with, in his epiſtle to the Romans. That which I do, I allow not (86); for what I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I CONSENT unto the law, that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but ſin that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me (that is, in my fleſh) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is preſent with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not. For the good that I would, I do not: but the will which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but ſin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law, that when I would do good, EVIL IS PRESENT with me. For I delight in the law of God, after the inward man. But I ſee another law in my members, warring againſt the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of ſin, which is in my members. O wretched man that I am, who ſhall deliver me from the body of this death!

(86) Epiſtle to the Romans, chap. 7. ver. 15 & ſeq.

Obſerve, that I have conſidered the Chaos with regard to man, only with regard to the inteſtine war, which every man feels individually in himſelf. Had I conſidered the diſſenſions, which reign between one nation and another, and even between neighbours, with all the hypocritical, fraudful and forcible things, &c. practis'd among them, I ſhould have a very extenſive, and moſt fruitful field to confirm what I propoſed to prove.

[I] A man muſt ſhew a moſt depraved taſte, to imagine that a certain poem, entitled, de Vetula, was written by Ovid.] 'Tis ſaid that this Poet, deſpairing to be recalled from his exile, wrote the book in queſtion, and ordered it to be buried with him (87). 'Tis added (88), that this poem having been found in a publick burying-ground, in the ſuburbs of the city of Dioſcuries, was carried to Conſtantinople by the King of Cholcis's order, and publiſhed by Leo, Prothonotary of the ſacred palace, and Secretary to the Emperor Vaſtaſius (89). 'Tis divided into three books; and is ſaid to have been entitled De Vetula, from the adventure related by the Author of the ſecond. He was diſtractedly fond of a young girl who was exquiſitely beautiful; and had prevailed, by gifts, with an old woman to aſſiſt him in his amours. This old woman had been the fair-one's nurſe; and after having repreſented ſeveral times the difficulties of the enterprize, ſhe at laſt had aſſured the ſpark, that at ſuch an hour, and in ſuch a place, he would find his miſtreſs in bed; but that he muſt ſtep into it very ſoftly and without a candle. Ovid, fired with the ſtrongeſt paſſion that ever man felt, ſtole into the bed in queſtion. But in all his Metamorphoſes, he had not wrote of any transformation ſo extraordinary as that he then found; for inſtead of finding that aſſemblage of charms, which his fancy was ſo filled with, he met with nothing but the deformities of old age, no one being in the bed but the old nurſe in queſtion. This inſpired him with the ſtrongeſt fury and rage. But we muſt hear the Poet.

(87) Leo Protonotarius, in Præfatione Librorum de Vetula.

(88) Gloſſator ejuſdem Operis de Vetula.

(89) Or John Ducas. He was Emperor from the year 1222, to 1255.

Heu mihi! tanta meis regnans dulcedo medullis
Quàm modicum manſit! Reperi contraria votis.
Vertitur in luctum cytharæ ſonus, inque ſtuporem
Deliciarum ſpes, moritur fax ignis amoris.
Si quid erat, quod epar, ventoſo turbine miſſo,
Fecerat arrectum, ſubitò languetque caditque:
Sopitur virtus, frigeſcunt omnia membra.
Credere quis poſſet, quod virgo, quattuor implens
Nuper olympiades, adeò citò conſenuiſſet?
Nunquam tam modico Roſa marcuit. In nova formas
Corpora mutatas cecini, mirabiliorque
Non reperitur ibi mutatio, quàm fuit iſta:
Scilicet, ut fuerit tam parvo tempore talis,
Taliter, in talem vetulam mutata puella!
Heu quàm diſſimiles ſunt, Virginis artubus, artus!
Accuſant Vetulam, membrorum turba ſenilis,
Collum nervoſum, ſcapularum cuſpis acuta,
Saxoſum pectus, laxatum pellibus uber,
Non uber, ſed tam vacuum, quàm molle, velut ſunt
Burſæ paſtorum: venter ſulcatus aratro,
Arentes clunes macredine, crudaque crura,
Inflatumque genu, vincens adamanta rigore.
Accuſant Vetulam membrorum marcida turba.
Concitus exurgo, cœpi firmare, quod illam
Appeterem ferro: ſed mens ad ſe revocavit
Virgineam famam, quæ ſcandala ne pateretur,
Continui; quamvis omnis ſpes ejus habendæ
Jam diſceſſiſſet. Sic dextra quievit, amorque
Extinctus, vivum potuit ſuperare dolorem (90).

(90) Ovid. de Vetula, lib. 2. cap. 30 & 31. p. m. 48.

The young Lady married, and after living twenty years with her, and having had a great number of lyings-in, which had made a ſtrange havock in her beauty, her huſband died (91). She then diſcovered a ſtrong deſire to become the wife of Ovid, who acquieſced

(91) Poſtquam viginti circiter annos cum ſponſo fuerat, partuque effœta frequenti & ſua jam facies diſpendia parturiendi ſenſerat. Idem, ibid. cap. 34. p. 50.

I will begin my ſupplement, with the illuſtration of what I ſaid in oppoſition to thoſe, who imagine that the cauſe of his exile was his having ſurprized Auguſtus in a moſt horrid inceſtuous commerce [K]; and will ſhew that their conjectures, with regard to Julia, daughter quieſced with her wiſhes; but, in the whole, he did not find that what he had obtained was really a favour; the woman he had married being now an old woman. This made Ovid reſolve to change his way of life, and to devote himſelf to ſtudies of a ſolid kind.

This Poem, and another entitled Brunellus Vigelli, ſeu Speculum ſtultorum, were printed at Wolfembuttle in 1662. The Editor affirms in his Preface dated the 13th of December 1661, that the Poems in queſtion had been printed near two hundred years before in the city of Colen. Naudé did not know this firſt edition, he ſaying that this pretended Poem of Ovid had been printed twice; firſt ſeparately, and without the printer's name or the place where printed, in 1534; and a ſecond time, inter Ovidii erotica & amatoria opuſcula, publiſhed at Francfort in 1610, with a pretty good Preface (92). He obſerves (93), that Robert Holcot quoted ſeveral verſes of that work, in his Commentary on the Book of Wiſdom, Lecture 60 of the old Venice Edition, Lecture 61 of that of Baſil (94), without denying or affirming that Ovid was the true Author of it. An ſit liber Ovidii, Deus novit, quamvis à Leone Protonotario Sacri Palatii Vaſtaſii Principis, referatur liber ille extractus de ſepulchro Ovidii, unde teſtamentum Ovidii nuncupatur; dicit enim quod inventus fuit in cœmiterio Publico, in quodam ſepulchro, in ſuburbano Dioſcori Civitatis, quæ eſt caput Regni Colchorum; & quia ibi non erat copia Latinorum, eo quod Armenici linguam Latinam non intelligunt, Rex Colchorum miſit illum librum Conſtantinopolim, ubi erat copia Latinorum. Refert etiam quod inter antiquorum ſepulchra unum inventum eſt, in quo epigramma fuit ſcriptum litteris Armenicis, cujus inſcriptio ſic ſonabat, Hic jacet Ovidius, ingenioſiſſimus Poëtarum, obiit autem anno Chriſti XVIII. ſicut refert Guillelmus de Euange in Chronico ſuo, tertio anno, unde conſtat quòd ſi veraciter liber ſuus erat, fuit pulcherrima prophetia de Chriſto, i. e. "Heaven knows whether this Poem was really "writ by Ovid, though Leo, prothonotary of the "ſacred palace to the Emperor Vaſtaſius, relates, "that it was taken out of Ovid's tomb, whence it "is called Ovid's will. He ſays that it was found in "a publick burying place, in a certain ſepulchre, in "the ſuburbs of the city of Dioſcurias, the chief "city of the Kindom of Colchis. And as few peo"ple there underſtood Latin, the Armenians not un"derſtanding that language, the King of Colchis "ſent the book in queſtion to Conſtantinople, where "great numbers underſtood Latin. He likewiſe in"forms us, that, among the antient Sepulchres, one "was found, in which was an inſcription in Arme"nian characters, to the following effect. Here lies "Ovid, a moſt ingenious Poet, who died the 17*th year* "of Chriſt, as William de Evange relates, under the "third year of his Chronicle: whence it is manifeſt, "that if that book was really writ by him, it was a "moſt noble prophecy of Chriſt." A man who is no great ſcholar, might ſwear, without being thought raſh in any manner, that Ovid never wrote ſo barbarous a Poem as the above-mentioned; and that it was compoſed by a Chriſtian of the lower Empire.

(92) Naude, Dialogue de Maſcurat, p. 226.

(93) Ibid. p 225.

(94) Note that Naude cenſures Selden, who, in his treatiſe de Diis Syris, p. m. 31, quotes, for this, Holcot's 21ſt Lecture on the Book of Wiſdom.

[K] I will illuſtrate what I ſaid (95), in oppoſition to thoſe who imagine, that the cauſe of Ovid's exile was his having ſurpriſed Auguſtus in a moſt horrid, inceſtuous commerce.] I have cited Father Briet, who ſays that ſome perſons imagine, that Ovid catched Auguſtus and his daughter Julia in the amorous congreſs; and I did not refute this, as I now do, by a demonſtrative argument, viz. that when our Poet was diſgraced, Julia had been ſeveral years out of Rome, as well as become the object of her father's indignation (96). Inſtead of alledging this demonſtrative argument, I only objected a probable circumſtance to that opinion, viz. that it is no ways likely that, had Ovid been baniſhed for the cauſe ſuppoſed by them, he would have ſo often declared, that his diſgrace was owing to ſomething he had ſeen. Nothing would have been more likely to heighten Auguſtus's affliction; whereas our Poet employed all the turns of wit he was maſter of, to ſooth and ſoften him. But this objection, how ſpecious ſoever, is not unanſwerable; for it cannot be denied but that the object which Ovid had ſeen concerned Auguſtus ſo far, that the recalling it to his memory, muſt neceſſarily revive his grief, and make his wounds bleed afreſh. Ovid himſelf confeſſes this in the following lines addreſſed to the Emperor.

(95) In the remark [B].

(96) See the remark of the article JULIA, daughter of Auguſtus.

Perdiderint cum me duo crimina, carmen & error,
Alterius facti culpa ſilenda mihi.
Nam non ſum tanti, ut RENOVEM TUA VULNERA, Cæſar, Quem nimio plus eſt INDOLUISSE ſemel (97).

(97) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 207.

The Senſe is,

"My verſe and my imprudence prov'd my ruin.
"Another's heavy guilt I muſt conceal:
"Myſelf too worthleſs to recal your woes;
"For oh! to grieve you once, is once too much."

He here gives two cauſes for the ruin of his fortune; the one for having writ verſes in an amorous ſtrain; and the other, for having been accidentally a ſpectator of certain things. He juſtifies himſelf as well as he can, and is very particular with reſpect to the former (98); but he is ſilent on the latter, for fear of reviving Auguſtus's ſorrow. He therefore was ſenſible, that the revival of this remembrance of this incident grieved and exaſperated him, and yet he mentioned it on all occaſions in his Poems: he therefore was not ſo prudent as I ſuppoſed him to be; and conſequently I employed an argument which proves too much, it proving that he avoided to recal ſorrowful ideas, and it is certain that he did not avoid this.

(98) Idem, ibid.

This objection is ſtronger againſt Aldus Manutius than againſt me; for the reaſon I employed affects thoſe, only who are of opinion that Ovid catched Auguſtus either with his daughter or grand-daughter; but Aldus Manutius employs it, in general, againſt thoſe who conjecture, that this Emperor was catched in an indecent action. Ubique exilii cauſſam tum libros de Arte, tum errorem fuiſſe commemorat (Ovidius): quis verò ille error fuerit, nunquam aperuit, ne magis Auguſtus ſibi iraſceretur, verùm quia, ut ipſa ait,

Nitimur in vetitum ſemper, cupimuſque negata;

quidnam id fuerit, plurimi ſcire conati ſunt, & conatur ſemper aliquis; quapropter ſuſpicati ſunt quidam turpe aliquod Auguſti ſecretum caſu vidiſſe Ovidium, quod non placet, quia toties objiciendo ſcelus, immitiorem reddidiſſet Cæſarem, quem lenire & placare ſtudebat (99), i. e. "Ovid aſſigns, in every part of his writings, two "cauſes for his being ſent into baniſhment, viz. his "Book on the Art of Love, and ſome fault com"mitted through inadvertency; what this inadver"tent fault was, never before appeared, for fear of "exaſperating Auguſtus ſtill more. But, as he him"ſelf obſerves, (99) Aldus Manutius, in Vita Ovidii, apud Ciofan. Obſervat. in Ovid. p. m. 20.

"We even fly to things forbid, and covet
"What is denied.

"Many have endeavoured (and ever will) to diſcover "it. Hence ſome have ſuſpected, that Ovid had "accidentally been an eye-witneſs to ſome indecent "action in Auguſtus; but this is not likely; ſince, "by ſo often ſpeaking of Cæſar's crime, he muſt "naturally have diſpleaſed him the more; whereas "he did all that lay in his power to ſooth and ap"peaſe." I might be in the right, though this Aldus Manutius were in the wrong. Ovid might have recalled to the memory of Auguſtus, ſome indecent action, without our allowing a poſſibility of its being inferred from thence, that he was ſo imprudent as to revive the idea of a horrid inceſt. This remembrance muſt be infinitely more likely to vex and exaſperate, than would be the recalling a mere intrigue, in which he might have been catched with a magiſdaughter to that Emperor, are falſe; and that, with reſpect to Julia his grand-daughter, they are highly improbable. I ſtill perſiſt in thinking, that the love-verſes were not ſo much the true cauſe of Ovid's baniſhment, as the pretence for it; and of this I can give a good proof, viz. that his books concerning The Art of loving, were chiefly complained againſt, and they had been made public many years at the time of his baniſhment; he compoſing them about the year of Rome 752 (e), and being ſent into exile trate's wife or daughter; and yet Auguſtus might have been diſpleaſed at ſuch a diſcovery, and been exaſperated at Ovid in the manner we find it related. As the Emperor in queſtion was ſeventy years of age, this circumſtance, with many others that might be ſuppoſed, might naturally prompt him to be offended at a man who had been a ſpectator of this Love-myſtery. Ciofanius paid no regard to the reflection of Aldus Manutius; but, on the contrary, declared for the opinion I juſt now eſpouſed. Ejus exilii, ſive potius relegationis cauſam longè veriorem eam eſſe puto, viſum à ſe fortè fortuna Auguſtum Cæſarem in re quadam turpi atque obſcæna. Teſtatur enim Ariſtot. lib. 11. De Arte dicendi, nullum eſſe tam magnum, tamque vehemens odium, quàm illud. quod ex eo naſcitur, cum quis in ejuſmodi re turpi deprehenditur (100), i. e. "In my opinion, it is much more probable that he "was diſgraced, or rather ſent into baniſhment, on "account of his having accidentally ſeen Auguſtus "Cæſar in ſome ſhameful indecent action. For we "are told by Ariſtotle, in the ſecond Chapter of "his Rhetoric, that no hatred is ſo violent, as that "which ariſes from the being catched in an immo-"deſt action." Obſerve that neither of theſe two Authors make the leaſt inſinuation of an inceſtuous commerce; and remember, that if the argument I employed is liable to objection, it muſt nevertheleſs be owned, that the conjecture of the inceſt is neceſſarily falſe with regard to Julia, Auguſtus's daughter, ſhe having been ſent into baniſhment long before Ovid had offended that Emperor; and take notice that he was already forbid the Court when he wrote his book De Arte Amandi; and that there was an interval of eight or nine years, between his compoſing thoſe books and his being ſent into baniſhment. This refutes Abbot de Marolles, who affirmed that one of the two reaſons of Ovid's diſgrace was, for his having mentioned, in his Art of Love, a particular which had diſpleaſed the Emperor, where he ſpeaks of his daughter under the name of Corinna (101). See above (102) the arguments of Aldus Manutius, in oppoſition to thoſe who declare that the Corinna in queſtion was Auguſtus's daughter (103).

(e) He ſays, lib. 1. Art. Amat. ver. 171, that the the ſpectacle of the ſea-fight had been lately given, and that young Cæſar was preparing for his expedition into the eaſt. Now this correſponds with the year 752.

Let us examine the conjectures with reſpect to Julia the grand-daughter. They cannot be inforced from the paſſage of Suetonius (104); for if any ſtreſs were to be laid on Caligula's extravagance, this could only affect Julia the daughter of Auguſtus; and obſerve, that Suetonius, in relating this extravagance, does not ſay any thing that ſeems to hint, that reports had been ſpread concerning Auguſtus's falling in love with his daughter or grand-daughter. Here he, nevertheleſs, had a very fair opportunity of juſt mentioning this; but ſince Seutonius has not ſaid any thing about it (105), either in this place, or when he ſpoke of Auguſtus's leudneſs, and of his behaviour with regard to the two Julias, it is an indication that there was not any tradition with regard to the inceſt in queſtion; for had there been any, the hiſtorian in queſtion would not have been ignorant of it, and would certainly have mentioned it. His caſt of mind prompted him to diſcover ſuch anecdotes, and inſert them boldly in his book, of which a thouſand inſtances might be given. But be this as it will, chronology does not give me ſo much aſſiſtance here, as againſt the other conjectures; for Ovid, and Julia grand-daughter of Auguſtus, were baniſhed the Court much about the ſame time.

This Julia died the year of Rome 781, after an exile of twenty years. Per idem tempus Julia mortem obiit quam neptem Auguſtus convictam adulterii damnaverat projeceratque in inſulam Trimetum . . . . illic viginti annis exilium toleravit (106). She therefore was baniſhed in 761. Ovid was fifty years old when baniſhed (107), and conſequently this was in 761, he being born anno 711 (108). He obſerves, in an epiſtle wherein he mentions Auguſtus's death, that he had then lived ſix years among the Getæ (109), which confirms my aſſertion, ſince it is certain that Auguſtus died in 767. Now as we don't know the day when our Poet's diſgrace began, though we know that he croſſed the Adriatic in December, to go into the country of the Getæ (110); and as we are equally ignorant of the day and month in which Julia incurred her grandfather's indignation; we cannot refute, from chronological arguments, thoſe who ſhould aſſert, that theſe two perſons were ſent into exile, becauſe of the anger with which Auguſtus was fired, to find his inceſtuous commerce was diſcovered. Ovid, who had been a ſpectator of this, grew odious; and, on the other hand, Julia herſelf became odious alſo; the Emperor being determined to rid himſelf of two objects, which might revive the ignominy of this diſcovery. Accordingly they were both baniſhed from Rome; and to have the better handle for doing this, Julia was convicted of defiling the nuptial bed (111); and Ovid was charged with publiſhing verſes of a ſcandalous nature. Theſe are circumſtances, that perhaps might be refuted in an unanſwerable manner, did we know the exact dates; but till this, we ſhall not be able to refute them by chronological arguments. Scaliger would be of great ſervice on this occaſion (112), had he not miſtook, when he ſuppoſes that Ovid was full fifty two years old at his leaving Rome. This would prove that he was not baniſhed till about the end of March 763.

However, if we were at a loſs for arguments drawn from chronology, there are others, which we may oppoſe to the conjecture with regard to the inceſtuous commerce between this Emperor and his grand-daughter.

I. I ſhall draw the firſt from the ſilence of Suetonius (113.)

II. Secondly, from Ovid's declaring perpetually, that one of the cauſes of his misfortunes was his having inadvertently been a ſpectator of I know not what. He does not deny, but that he was ſenſible that his being a ſpectator on this occaſion had exaſperated the Emperor, and that the bare mention of it made his wound bleed afreſh; but ſince, notwithſtanding this, he mentions it ſo often, we muſt naturally ſuppoſe that the thing he ſaw was not highly infamous, nor of ſuch a nature as to draw down on Auguſtus the curſes of the Romans, who had the utmoſt love, reſpect, and veneration for him. Ovid had too much ſenſe and judgment, not to be ſenſible that, with regard to ſuch a ſecret as this, thoſe who have the misfortune to be privy to it, cannot act more prudently than to endeavour to have it believed, that they have entirely obliterated the remembrance of it. The moſt general and indeterminate expreſſions that could be employed, would always ſeem a little too ſignificative to the Monarch concerned in the affair hinted at; and might make him afraid, that after a writer had ſo often hinted in general, that his misfortunes were owing to his having ſeen certain things which he did not dare to reveal, he at laſt would blab the ſecret. Such a fear may prompt a Monarch to make away with thoſe perſons, who are acquainted with the ſecret. It is not neceſſary that a man ſhould be endued with great penetration to form ſuch reflections, and to draw from them a leſſon of ſilence. But if the ſecret a man had been a ſpectator of was of ſuch a nature, that it might be made publick, without throwing a ſhade over the Monarch's reputation; if it was a particular he was deſirous of concealing, either from caprice, or from ſome reaſon of ſtate, and not on account of its being infamous; a man, I ſay, on ſuch an occaſion, is not ſo cautious; and will not ſcruple to complain, in general, that his misfortunes are owing to his having ſeen ſomething, which he is afraid of telling.

He

(100) Ciofanius, in Vita Ovidii, ubi ſupra, p. 27.

(101) Abbé de Marolles, in his life of Ovid, prefixed to the French tranſlation of the poem againſt Ibis, p. 4.

(102) Rem. [E], num. 7.

(103) This was alſo affirmed in a book printed anno 1697. Soli Imp. Aug. invi-ſius (Ovidius) qui de ſollicitata ſub Corrinnæ nomine Julia ſua ſuſpectum Tomos in exilium miſit. Jo. Alb. Fabricius, Biblioth. Latina, p. 35, 36.

(104) Which I cited in the remark [B].

(105) This will be my firſt reaſon hereafter.

(106) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4 cap. 71.

(107) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 4. eleg. ult. But obſerve that he erroneouſly aſcribes five years to each Olympiad.

(108) Idem, ibid.

(109) Idem, de Ponto, l.b. 4. epiſt. 13.

(110) Idem, Triſt. lib. 1. eleg. 10.

(111) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 71.

(112) Scalig. Animadv. in Euſeb. p. m. 182. See father Noris, Cenotaph. Piſana, p. 202.

(113) To know the ſtrength of this, ſee citat. 105, above.

exile about 671 (f): accordingly it has been obſerved, that the puniſhment was inflicted a (f) See remark [K] citat. (108).

He is ſenſible that the Prince is very ſure, that let what will happen, his glory cannot ſuffer by the indiſcretion of ſuch a perſon as we are now ſpeaking of.

III. My third reaſon is taken from Ovid's inſinuating, that he would ſpeak out, and juſtify himſelf, did not his ſtation of life appear ſo inconſiderable, as not to merit his reviving the Emperor's affliction.

Alerius facti culpa ſilenda mihi.
NAM NON SUM TANTI, ut renovem tua vulnera, Cæſar,
Quem nimio plus eſt indoluiſſe ſemel (114).

(114) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 208.

The ſenſe is,

" Another's heavy guilt I muſt conceal;
" My ſelf too worthleſs to recal your woes,
" For Oh! to grieve you once, is once too much.

Now would Ovid have expreſſed himſelf in this manner, had he hinted at an inceſtuous commerce, and his catching Julia with her grandfather, who was ſeventy years of age? Is this a circumſtance that might be revealed in certain caſes, I mean by a perſon who might fancy himſelf to be of conſequence? Is not this a crime of ſuch a nature, as ought abſolutely and unreſervedly to be buried in eternal oblivion?

IV. My fourth argument is drawn from Auguſtus's not getting Ovid inſtantly and ſecretly diſpatched, which he might very eaſily have done. Could he poſſibly have enjoy'd eaſe of mind, had he certainly have known that, with regard to ſo horrid a ſecret, as that in queſtion, he was at the mercy of an amorous, ſparkiſh Poet? Had he not endeavoured to put it out of his power to be indiſcreet, by putting him to death, he at leaſt would have tried to win him over to his intereſt by liberality. Now Auguſtus did not take either of theſe courſes; he baniſhed him to Tomos, and there left him a prey to complaints and ſighs; without once fearing that the inclemency of the climate he was in, and the deſpair of his ever being delivered from it, would at laſt extort the ſecret from him. Let it not be objected, that the Emperor ſoftned the decree of baniſhment with ſome circumſtances of indulgence; and that this ſhew'd he was tender of Ovid, to keep him from telling tales. Such a reflection would not be juſt; for tho' he permitted our Poet to enjoy his Poſſeſſions; did not ſentence him by a decree of the Senate, and employed the word relegatus, which was leſs harſh than that of exulatus, he nevertheleſs puniſhed him in a very ſevere manner.

Cujus in eventu pœnæ clementia tanta eſt,
Ut fuerit noſtro lenior ira metu.
Vita data eſt, citraque necem tua conſtitit ira,
O princeps parce viribus uſe tuis.
Inſuper accedunt, te non adimente, paternæ,
Tanquam vita parum muneris eſſet, opes.
Nec mea decreto damnaſti facta Senatus,
Nec mea ſelecto judice juſſa fuga eſt.
Triſtibus invectus verbis (ita principe dignum)
Ultus es offenſas, ut decet, ipſe tuas.
Adde quod edictum quamvis immite, minaxque,
Attamen in pœnæ nomine lene fuit.
Quippe relegatus, non exſul dicor in illo:
Parcaque fortunæ ſunt ibi verba meæ (115).

(115) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 125. See alſo Triſt. lib. 5. eleg. 9. & de Ponto, lib. 1. epiſt. 7.

The ſenſe is,

" So mild your puniſhment for all my crimes,
" Your anger was far lighter than my fears.
" To your auſpicious ſmile I owe my life;
" O Prince, with mildneſs you your power employ.
" My patrimony, too, you let enjoy,
" As tho' beſtowing life was no great boon.
" Nor did th' aſſembled Senate ſign my doom;
" Nor ſolemn Judge to baniſhment condemn.
" You in a ſpeech of juſt ſeverity
" Reveng'd the injury as became a Prince.
" Farther, tho' the decree was too too harſh,
" Yet, gentle words my puniſhment declar'd.
" Since, relegation, and not exile's us'd;
" And in ſoft words my wayward fate's expreſt.

He baniſhed Ovid to a country which was a kind of hell to that unhappy man (116.) Can any thing be more deplorable than the condition he was in, at his leaving Rome (117)?

(116) Read the Poems which Ovid wrote during his exile.

Some perhaps may think it a ſtronger objection, to ſay, that ſince Auguſtus was unmov'd at all the pathetic adulating ſupplications which Ovid cauſed to be preſented to him; his anger muſt neceſſarily have been grounded on the ſhame of his having been catched in ſome very obſcene action. To this I anſwer: Firſt, that it is pretended Auguſtus was at laſt wrought upon; and that he would have re-called Ovid from his baniſhment, had he not been ſnatched away by death.

(117) See Ovid. de Triſt. lib. 1. eleg. 3.

Cæperat Auguſtus deceptæ ignoſcere culpæ,
Spem noſtram terras deſeruitque ſimul (118).

(118) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 6. ver. 15.

The ſenſe is,

" Auguſtus now felt pity for my fault,
" When he was ſnatch'd from earth and from my hopes."

Secondly: That as the Emperor declared, that one of the reaſons why he baniſhed this Poet was, the ſcandalous verſes he had written, he found his account in not recalling him. He hereby made a merit with regard to the Senate, and with all perſons of a grave character, and zealous for the reformation of manners. He would have overlooked this conſideration, had he wanted Ovid either for the cabinet, or the head of his troops: but having no occaſion for him on thoſe accounts, he was very glad to ſhew, that he would not treat thoſe who corrupted the morals of the people with the leaſt indulgence. I know not whether Tiberius, who let Ovid die in baniſhment, had not the ſame political views. The Poet did not neglect to make his court after Auguſtus's death; he invoked the new God (119), and endeavoured to make the moſt of the worſhip he paid the new Emperor.

(119) See remark [M] citation (125).

It would be very difficult to ſatisfy thoſe who ſhould deſire to know the reaſon wherefore Auguſtus was ſo highly exaſperated againſt Ovid, that he ſought for ſevere terms, in order to expreſs, in the decree of baniſhment, his indignation, and reſentment for the offence he imagined had been done him.

Triſtibus invectus verbis (ita principe dignum)
Ultus es offenſas, ut decet, ipſe tuas (120).

(120) Idem, Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 133.

The ſenſe is,

" You in a ſpeech of juſt ſeverity
" Reveng'd the injury as became a Prince."

But it would not be difficult to ſuppoſe incidents, without including any diſcovery of an inceſtuous commerce, or even a ſcene of mere gallantry, which might exaſperate him highly againſt the unexpected ſpectator. Suppoſe that, Auguſtus having diſcovered a diſagreeable intrigue in his family, had retired to ſome ſolitary apartment to grieve and weep in ſecret; or to queſtion his grand-daughter, to chide, threaten, or even correct her, if it were neceſſary. Suppoſe that having taken a female confident apart, he was endeavouring to extort the truth from her either by threats or blows. Suppoſe that one of his free men or ſlaves had been under the ſame circumſtances; or even that Auguſtus would have had been put to the torture ſecretly; we here have three or four caſes, in which Ovid might have catched the Emperor, without exaſperating him in the higheſt degree. Was it poſſible for a Monarch, who had long attained the moſt exalted pitch of human grandeur, not to be extremely delicate or capricious on the article of injuries?

a long courſe of years after the commiſſion of the crime [L], and that he paid for the ſins of his youth in his old age: but this aſſertion does not ſuit exactly with the Art of Loving, he writing theſe pieces at the age of forty one. He was in the fifty firſt year of his age (g) when he ſet out from Rome to go to Tomos whither he was ſent away. Auguſtus employed that expreſſion in his ſentence, and not the words exile or baniſhment; this regard was accompanied by another which was more real, ſince Ovid was permitted to continue in the enjoyment of his eſtate (h). Although he could not prevail ſo far as to get himſelf recalled, nor the place of his baniſhment changed (i), he yet had always the higheſt regard for the Emperor, and continued invariably in applauding him to ſuch an exceſs as amounted almoſt to idolatry; and he even idolized him literally when advice was brought him of the Emperor's death. He not only wrote a Poem in his praiſe in the language of the Getæ, but he likewiſe invoked him, and conſecrated to him a chapel, in which he offered him incenſe, and paid him worſhip every morning [M]. This Prince's ſucceſſor and family ſhared in all this worſhip, and probably were the real cauſe of

(g) See the ſame remark, citation (107).

(h) See the proof of all this in the ſame remark, citation (115.)

(i) He at laſt requeſted no other favour. See book 1. de Ponto, epiſt. 2. and book 2. de Triſt. towards the end.

injuries? If there were occaſions in which the leaſt want of reſpect might diſpleaſe him, this doubtleſs was when any perſon preſumed to pry into his family concerns, and really diſcovered what he wiſhed to conceal. Anger, on ſuch an occaſion, would not permit him to diſtinguiſh, whether chance, or deſign, and a bold and ambitious curioſity had cauſed the diſcovery:

(121) Juvenal, 3. ver. 113.

Scire volunt ſecreta domus atque inde timeri (121).

The ſenſe is,

"Your family concerns they'd fain diſcover;
"In hopes thereby to gain an empire o'er you."

He was too much offended at the unlucky diſcovery in queſtion, not to look upon it as an offence that deſerved puniſhment.

By the way, our modern authors are not the only ones who declare, that Ovid ruined his fortune, by his having been the ſpectator of an inceſtuous commerce; Cœlius Rhodiginus has quoted ſome fragments of one Cæcilius Minutianus Apuleius, in which this circumſtance is mentioned. Pulſum quoque in exilium (Ovidium) quod Auguſti inceſtum vidiſſet (122), i. e. "Ovid was ſent into baniſhment, for having been "the ſpectator of Auguſtus's inceſtuous commerce."

(122) Cæl. Rhodigin. Antq. Lect. lib. 13. cap. 1. p. m. 659.

[L] It has been obſerved, that the puniſhment was inflicted very long after the commiſſion of the crime.] Here follows the manner, in which he deſcribes the long time he had been permitted to go unpuniſhed, in an addreſs to Auguſtus himſelf; and after having given a long catalogue of authors of laſcivious books, who had not been puniſhed.

Nos quoque jam pridem ſcripto peccavimus iſto,
Supplicium patitur non nova culpa novum.
Carminaque edideram, cum te delicta notantem
Præterii toties irrequietus eques.
Ergo quæ juveni mihi non nocitura putavi
Scripta parum prudens, nunc nocuere ſeni.
Sera redundavit veteris vindicta libelli,
Diſtat & à meriti tempore pœna ſui (123).

(123) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 539.

The ſenſe is,

"Long ſince by melting, amorous verſe, I ſinn'd;
"The puniſhment is new, though old the crime.
"I publiſh'd verſes (when a Roman Knight)
"Which you diſprov'd, and yet I ſcribbled on.
"Thoſe bold looſe lines I wrote in blooming youth,
"And wrote uninjur'd, hurt me now I'm old.
"I'm puniſh'd now, for works I've wrote long ſince,
"And the chaſtiſement follow'd at a diſtance
"The crime, which I committed."

[The cauſe of Ovid's baniſhment is unknown; becauſe he was himſelf unwilling further to provok the Emperor, by aſcribing it to any other reaſon, than what was pretended by Auguſtus, which was the laſciviouſneſs of his Elogies, and his Art of Love. 'Tis true, they are not to be excuſed in the ſeverity of manners, as being able to corrupt a larger Empire, if there were any, than that of Rome; yet this may be ſaid in behalf of Ovid, that no man has ever treated the paſſion of love with ſo much delicacy of thought and of expreſſion, or ſearched into the nature of it more philoſophically than he. And the Emperor who condemned him, had as little reaſon as another man to puniſh that fault with ſo much ſeverity. . . . . There is another gueſs of the Grammarians, as far from truth as the firſt from reaſon; they will have him baniſhed for ſome favours, which they ſay he received from Julia the daughter of Auguſtus, whom they think he celebrates under the name of Corinna in his Elegies: but he who will obſerve the verſes, which are made to that Miſtreſs, may gather from the whole contexture of them, that Corinna was not a woman of the higheſt quality: if Julia were then married to Agrippa, why ſhould our Poet make his petition to Iſis, for her ſafe delivery, and afterwards condole her miſcarriage; which, for ought he knew, might be by her own huſband? Or indeed how durſt he be ſo bold to make the leaſt diſcovery of ſuch a crime, which was no leſs than capital, eſpecially as committed againſt a perſon of Agrippa's rank? Or if it were before her marriage, he would ſure have been more diſcreet, than to have publiſhed an accident, which muſt have been fatal to them both. But what moſt confirms me againſt this opinion is, that Ovid himſelf complains that the true perſon of Corinna was found out by the fame of his verſes to her: which, if it had been Julia, he durſt not have owned; and beſide, an immediate puniſhment muſt have followed. He ſeems himſelf more truly to have touched at the cauſe of his exile in thoſe obſcure verſes;

Cur aliquid vidi, cur noxia lumina feci? &c.

Namely, That he had either ſeen, or was conſcious to, ſomewhat, which had procured him his diſgrace. But neither am I ſatisfied that this was the inceſt of the Emperor with his own daughter: for Auguſtus was of a nature too vindictive to have contented himſelf with ſo ſmall a revenge, or ſo unſafe to himſelf, as that of ſimple baniſhment; but would certainly have ſecured his crimes from publick notice, by the death of him who was witneſs to them. Neither have hiſtories given us any ſight into ſuch an action of this Emperor: Nor would he (the greateſt politician of his time) in all probability, have managed his crimes with ſo little ſecrecy, as not to ſhun the obſervation of any man. It ſeems more probable, that Ovid was either the confident of ſome other paſſion, or that he had ſtumbled by ſome inadvertency upon the privacies of Livia, and ſeen her in a bath; for theſe words,

Sine veſte Dianam,

agree better with Livia, who had the fame of chaſtity, than with either of the Julias, who were both noted for continency. The firſt verſes which were made by him in his youth, and recited publickly, acccording to the cuſtom, were, as he himſelf aſſures us, to Corinna: his baniſhment happened not till the age of fifty, from which it may be deduced, with probability enough, that the love of Corinna did not occaſion it: nay, he tells us plainly, that his offence was that of error only, not of wickedneſs: and in the ſame paper of verſes alſo, that the cauſe was notoriouſly known at Rome, though it be left ſo obſcure to after-ages *. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

* Dryden's preface to the tranſlation of Ovid's Epiſtles. London 1736, 12mo.

[M] He not only wrote a Poem in Auguſtus's praiſe, in the language of the Getæ, but he likewiſe invoked him, and conſecrated to him a chapel, in which he offered him incenſe, and paid him worſhip every morning.] Here follows what he wrote to his friend Carus.

Nec

of it (k) ; yet this was of no ſervice to Ovid, the Court being as inexorable under Tiberius as before, ſo that he died in baniſhment in the fourth year of that Emperor's reign, or the year of Rome 771, being about threeſcore years of age [N]. He had writ his Metamorphoſes before his misfortunes ; but when he ſaw himſelf condemned to baniſhment, (k) See the remark [M].

Nec te mirari, ſi ſunt vitioſa, decebit
Carmina, quæ faciam pæne pœta Getes.
Ah pudet, & Getico ſcripſi ſermone libellum,
Structaque ſunt noſtris barbara verba modis.
Et placui (gratare mihi) cœpique pœtæ
Inter inhumanos nomen habere Getas.
Materiam quæris ? laudes de Cæſare dixi.
Adjuta eſt novitas numine noſtra Dei.
Nam patris Auguſti docui mortale fuiſſe
Corpus ; in ætherias numen abiſſe domos (124).

(124) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 13. ver. 17.

The ſenſe is,

" Since I am almoſt grown a Getic Poet,
" You muſt not wonder if my verſe is rude.
" I bluſh to own that I've a book compos'd
" In this harſh language ; that I tun'd my lyre
" To barbarous ſounds, which ſhock a Roman ear.
" My verſe yet pleas'd, and ev'n the barbarous Getæ
" Gave high encomiums, and the name of Poet.
" You aſk the ſubject ? 'Twas fam'd Cæſar's praiſe ;
" His mighty Godhead aiding the new lays.
" I taught that Rome's great ſire, indeed, was mortal,
" But that his ſoul to heavenly regions flew.

He deſcribes, in another Epiſtle, his devotion to Auguſtus, and employs the following words (125) :

(125) Idem, ibid. epiſt. 9. ad Græcinum, ver. 105.

Nec pietas ignota mea eſt : videt hoſpita terra
In noſtra ſacrum Cæſaris eſſe domo.
Stant pariter natuſque pius, conjuxque ſacerdos,
Numina jam facto non leviora Deo.
Neu deſit pars ulla domus ; ſtat uterque nepotum :
Hic aviæ lateri proximus, ille patris.
His ego do toties cum thure precantia verba,
Eoo quoties ſurgit ab orbe dies.
Tota, licet quæras, hoc me non fingere dicet,
Officii teſtis Pontica terra mei.
Pontica me tellus quantis hac poſſumus ora,
Natalem ludis ſcit celebrare Dei.
Nec minus hoſpitibus pietas eſt cognita talis,
Miſit in has ſi quos longa Propontis aquas.
Is quoque, quo levior fuerat ſub Præſide Pontus,
Audierit frater (126) forſitan iſta tuus,
Fortuna eſt impar animo, talique libenter
Exiguas carpo munere pauper opes.
Nec veſtris damus hæc oculis, procul urbe remoti :
Contenti tacita ſed pietate ſumus.
Et tamen hæc tangent aliquando Cæſaris aures.
Nil illum toto quod ſit in orbe latet.
Tu certe ſcis hæc ſuperis adſcite, videſque
Cæſar, & eſt oculis ſubdita terra tuis.
Tu noſtras audis inter convexa locatus
Sidera, ſollicito quas damus ore preces.
Pervenient iſluc & carmina forſitan illa,
Quæ de te miſi cælite facta novo.
Auguror his igitur flecti tua numina, nec tu
Immerito nomen mite parentis habes.

(126) That is, Lucius Pomponius Flaccus, who was Conſul the year of Rome 770. See Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 9. ver. 60.

The Senſe is,

" My piety is known, this foreign land
" Sees Cæſar's temple here, beneath my roof.
" Alſo his pious ſon, his ſacred conſort,
" Claim equal homage and devotion from me,
" To fill my noble choir, I add his grandſons ;
" One next his grandmother, and one his father.
" To theſe I offer, each returning morn,
" The tribute due of incenſe and of prayer.
" All Pontus is a witneſs to the truth
" Of theſe aſſertions, and will vouch for Ovid.
" Pontus well knows her ſtores, I all collect,
" To ſolemnize his natal day, with games.
" Nor is my piety leſs known to thoſe
" Who thither come from long Propontis' ſhores.
" Theſe things, perhaps, have reach'd your brother's ear ;
" He, who rules Pontus with ſo mild a ſway.
" Fortune's unequal to my tow'ring mind,
" But what I offer is ſincere, though little.
" All theſe I dedicate remote from Rome,
" Content to pay my ſacred vows in ſilence.
" And yet at laſt they'll come to Cæſar's ear ;
" Nought, in the univerſe, from him's conceal'd.
" Cæſar, theſe things are ſurely known to thee ;
" Thou, whoſe far-ſeeing eyes ſurvey'ſt the world.
" High ſeated mid the ſtars, with Gods ſurrounded,
" With kind regard thou hear'ſt our humble prayers.
" Perhaps the heavenly bands will hear this verſe,
" Which on thy Apotheſis I've made.
" I fondly hope that theſe will move thy Godhead,
" And that thou'lt prove, to me, a gentle Parent."

We here find, that he hopes his prayers and praiſes will reach the ear of Cæſar deified, and that they will meet with a reward ; but we alſo find that he extends his worſhip to the living, and flatters himſelf with the hopes that Tiberius will know it. This was his chief aim ; and to this were owing thoſe artful turns, which are obſerved in that paſſage where he ſpeaks of his Getic verſes. He feigns that one of the Getæ, who heard them repeated, was of opinion that the elogiums of Tiberius, with which the verſes in queſtion are interſperſed, would procure the Author's return from baniſhment.

Eſſe parem virtute patri, qui fræna rogatus
Sæpe recuſati ceperit imperii.
Eſſe pudicarum te Veſtam, Livia, matrum,
Ambiguum nato dignior, anne viro.
Eſſe duos juvenes firma adjumenta parentis,
Qui dederint animi pignora certe ſui.
Hæc ubi non patria perlegi ſcripta Camæna,
Venit & ad digitos ultima charta meos ;
Et caput & plenas omnes movere pharetras,
Et longum Getico murmur in ore fuit,
Atque aliquis, Scribas hæc cum de Cæſare, dixit,
Cæſaris imperio reſtituendus eras.
Ille quidem dixit, ſed me jam, Care, nivali
Sexta relegatum bruma ſub axe videt.
Carmina nil profunt (127).

(127) Idem, ibid. epiſt. 13. ver. 27.

The Senſe is,

" His virtues emulate thoſe of his father,
" Who often call'd to empire, oft' declin'd it.
" Livia's a ſhining pattern to all matrons,
" Worthy of ſuch a ſon, of ſuch a huſband.
" His two deſcendants well ſupport his name,
" And give great tokens of their future worth.----
" Whilſt theſe I read, writ in a foreign tongue,
" And my laſt letters bring ungrateful news ;
" The circling natives ſhake their heads and quivers,
" And Getic murmurs echo all around.
" Even ſome one ſaid ; Since thus you Cæſar praiſe,
" He ſurely will reſtore you to his favour.
" Ah no ! dear friend, for ſix dark freezing winters
" Have o'er ſad Ovid ſhed their baleful influence.
" Verſe nought avails.——"

[N] He died . . . . under Tiberius . . . . being about threeſcore years of age.] This is the date we meet with in Euſebius's chronicle, with Scaliger's approbation (128). Since therefore Ovid was ſent into baniſhment, at a little more than fifty years of age, anno Romæ 761 (129), he muſt have died at about ſixty, and have been about nine or ten years in baniſhment, in caſe he lived till the fourth year of Tiberius's reign ; for this fourth year anſwers to the year of Rome 771 ; and it is to be obſerved, that ſome ſay Ovid

(128) Scalig. in Euſeb. p. 182, ad num. 2033.

(129) See remark [K], citation 108.

ment, he threw them into the fire, either out of indignation, or becauſe he had not finiſhed them [O]. Some copies which had before been taken of it prevented poſterity from being deprived of that noble compoſition (l). He deſired, in caſe he ſhould die among the Getæ, to have his aſhes carried to Rome, and the epitaph he wrote for himſelf

(l) Lactant. Inſt. Divin. lib. 1. cap. 5. p. m. 13, calls it præclarum opus.

Ovid died the firſt of January (130). Aldus Manutius (131) ſuppoſes that he was ſent into baniſhment about the 52d year of Auguſtus; that he died the 5th year of Tiberius, and conſequently that his exile laſted eight years and ſome months. But this calculation is not exact. Auguſtus died in the fifty-eighth year of his reign; and therefore he muſt have lived above five years after Ovid's diſgrace, in caſe that happened about the 52d year of his reign. As therefore our Poet, according to Aldus Manutius, lived till the fifth year of Tiberius, it follows that his exile continued about ten years. Ciofanius (132) goes upon another ſuppoſition. He declares that Ovid left Rome the 10th of December, being aged fifty years, ſeven months, and twenty-one days. He died (adds Ciofanius) the firſt of January, aged fifty-ſeven years, nine months and eleven days; having been in exile ſeven years and twenty-one days. To rectify the miſtakes in this account, we need only put eight months inſtead of ſeven, after Ovid's fifty years. This doubtleſs was Ciofanius's deſign, who ſuppoſed, with Manutius (133), that Ovid was born the 19th of March 711. He ought to have reckoned from this day to the 10th of December, eight months and twenty-one days; but he ought to have counted from the 19th of December, to the 1ſt of January, thirteen days, and not eleven. However this be, he imagined that Ovid died the 1ſt of January 769, at which time Tiberius had reigned but a little more than 14 months, which is a ſuppoſition very different from that I followed. De Tillemont ſuppoſes that our Poet continued but ſeven years in baniſhment (134); and theſe he fixes from the 54th of Auguſtus, to the 4th of Tiberius (135). According to this calculation, Ovid would have been ſent into exile at fifty-three years of age; and not, as he himſelf affirms (136), at fifty, employing the round number, and omitting the months over and above it. But he would not have omitted two or three years in this manner, had he really been ſo much older than fifty. Scaliger, who declares him guilty of this omiſſion (137), is leſs exact in ſo doing, than in making him die the ninth year of his exile. The calculation of Abbe de Villeloin (138) is quite erroneous. He declares that Ovid, baniſhed the 52d year of Auguſtus, and living in exile ſeven years and twenty-one days, and dying the 4th year of Tiberius, lived fifty-ſeven years, nine months and eleven days. I muſt not omit Moreri, who ſays, that Ovid died the 1ſt of January, in the 199th Olympiad, as if a period of four years had but one 1ſt of January. Seth Calviſius ſpeaks of this Poet's death, a little before he mentions the 199th Olympiad, which is fixing it about the cloſe of the 198th Olympiad. He gives us to underſtand, that Ovid died in the beginning of the year of Rome 769, and of the conſulate of Cælius Rufus and Pomponius Flaccus; but the reaſon he gives for this is a very bad one. Ovidius circa hæc tempora mortuus eſt, meminit ENIM in penultima Elegia de Ponto (139) hujus Flacci futuri conſulis in calendis Januarii (140). i. e. "About this time Ovid left the "world; he obſerving in the laſt elegy but one de "Ponto, that the Flaccus in queſtion was to be "Conſul in the calends of January." How! becauſe Ovid obſerves, that this Flaccus ſhould enter upon the conſulſhip the 1ſt day of January following, muſt it be concluded that he died the beginning of this conſulſhip? What a way of arguing is this! I fancy that Calviſius had another meaning; he intended to ſay, in my opinion, that ſince Ovid's verſes contained nothing of a later date, than this nomination of the conſulate of Pomponius Flaccus; we therefore ought to conclude, that his death happened a little after. This argumentation, tho' much better than the former, is yet not very juſt; for a long fit of ſickneſs, or the indignation to ſee that he had employed ſo many verſes to no purpoſe, might have ſilenced Ovid's muſe.

It would be almoſt endleſs to give a liſt of all thoſe Writers, who affirm that he died the ſame day with Livy, and that this was on New-year's day. I don't know what they ground their aſſertion upon; for it is true indeed, that Euſebius's chronicle makes this great Poet, and the great Hiſtorian in queſtion, die the ſame year; but the day is not mentioned. The date we are ſpeaking of was, in all probability, borrowed from the Cœcilius Minutianus Apuleius of Cœlius Rhodiginus; for he ſays that Ovid died the 1ſt day of January, after ſpending ſeven years in baniſhment, and that Livy died the ſame day (141).

(130) Ciofanius, in vita Ovidii.

(131) In vita Ovidii.

(132) Idem, ibid.

(133) Aldus Manutius, in vita Ovidii, p. 16.

(134) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. Tom. 1. p. m. 111.

(135) Ibid. p. 66 & 111.

(136) See remark [K], citation (107).

(137) Scalig. in Euſeb. p. 182. num. 2033.

(138) Ovid's Life, by Abbot de Marolles.

(139) He ſhould have ſaid in nona Elegia, lib. 4. 'Tis not the laſt but one, this book containing but 16.

(140) Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. Mundi 3966. p. m. 414.

(141) See Cœlius Rhodiginus, lib. 13. Antiq. Lect. cap. 1. p. m. 659.

[O] He threw his Metamorphoſes into the fire, either out of indignation, or becauſe he had not finiſhed them.] He himſelf informs us of this circumſtance; and the account he gives, will not, I flatter myſelf, be judged diſagreeable in my Commentary.

Carmina mutatas hominum dicentia formas:
Infelix domini quod fuga rupit opus.
Hæc ego diſcedens, ſicut bona multa meorum,
Ipſe mea poſui mœſtus in igne manu.
Utque cremaſſe ſuum fertur ſub ſtipite natum
Theſtias, & melior matre fuiſſe ſoror;
Sic ego non meritos mecum peritura libellos
Impoſui rapidis viſcera noſtra rogis.
Vel quod eram Muſas, ut crimina noſtra, peroſus:
Vel quod adhuc creſcens, & rude carmen erat.
Quæ quoniam non ſunt penitus ſublata, ſed exſtant;
(Pluribus exemplis ſcripta fuiſſe reor)
Nunc precor ut vivant, & non ignava legentem
Otia delectent, admoneantque mei.
Non tamen illa legi poterunt patienter ab ullo:
Neſciat his ſummam ſi quis abeſſe manum.
Ablatum mediis opus eſt incudibus illud:
Defuit & ſcriptis ultima lima meis.
Et veniam pro laude peto, laudatus abunde
Non faſtiditus ſi tibi lector ero.
Hos quoque ſex verſus, in prima fronte libelli.
Si præponendos eſſe putabis, habe:
Orba parente ſuo quicunque volumina tangis,
His ſaltem veſtra detur in urbe locus.
Quoque magis faveas, non hæc ſunt edita ab illo,
Sed quaſi de domini funere rapta ſui.
Quicquid in his igitur vitii rude carmen habebit,
Emendaturus, ſi licuiſſet, erat (142).

(142) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 1. eleg. 6. ver. 13. See alſo ibid. lib. 3. eleg. 14. ver. 20.

The ſenſe is,

" My poem, which of transformations treats,
" (By its ſo ſad Author, when diſgrac'd, abandon'd;)
" Was at his leaving Rome, with other things,
" With this right hand committed to the flames.
" And as Althæa's log her ſon conſum'd,
" (A cruel mother ſhe, but better ſiſter)
" So I, the guiltleſs offspring of my brain,
" Threw on the flaming pile, and burnt to aſhes;
" Either becauſe my muſe was odious to me
" (My guilty muſe) or was but newly ſketch'd.
" As this exiſts, in ſpite of all my care,
" (For many copies were in private hands)
" E'en let it live; delight the attentive reader;
" And to his memory, recal its parent.
" But none will e'er have patience to peruſe it,
" Who knows not, that my laſt hand it ne'er receiv'd,
" My work was ſnatch'd, unfiniſh'd, from the anvil,
" And wants the file to give the perfect form.
" Forgiveneſs is the only praiſe I ſeek;
" Enough commended if I'm not deſpis'd.
" The ſix ſucceeding lines, if you think proper,
" May in the front be plac'd, to grace my writings.
" Whoever ſhall this orphan-work peruſe,
" (This ſurely cannot be forbid your city)
" Shall know (to gain good will) that 'twas as ſnatch'd,
" From the wide-flaming pile that burnt its author.
" If then theſe verſes ſhall unpoliſh'd ſeem,
" Excuſe the writer, 'cauſe he wanted leiſure.

The reader may alſo conſult the paſſage (143), where he beſeeches the Emperor to hear ſome parts of that work.

(143) Idem, lib. 2. Triſt. ver. 555.

ſelf engraved on his tomb [P]. He met not only with great humanity from thoſe Barbarians, but likewiſe great civility. They loved Ovid; paid him ſingular honour, and iſſued publick decrees as a teſtimony of their eſteem. However, they were not pleaſed with the dreadful deſcription he gave of their country, and therefore complained to him about it, and he endeavoured to excuſe himſelf [Q]. He boaſts of a thing, which would prove that he had quite left off all commerce with the fair during his exile; he affirming, that no perſon, of either ſex, or of any age, had the leaſt cauſe to complain of him (m). This ſhews that he did not ſpend his time in making love; and that even after he had learnt

(m) See, towards the beginning, of the remark [Q].

[P] He deſired . . . . . to have his aſhes carried to Rome; and the epitaph he wrote for himſelf engraved on his tomb.] He dreaded the immortality of the ſoul, and wiſhed for its mortality; for he was not willing to have his ſhade wander among thoſe of the Sarmatians; therefore he was deſirous of having, at all events, a ſepulchre in Rome. Here follows what he wrote to his dearly beloved wife on this occaſion.

Atque utinam pereant animæ cum corpore noſtræ,
Effugiatque avidos pars mea nulla rogos.
Nam ſi morte carens vacuas volat altus in auras
Spiritus, & Samii ſunt rata dicta ſenis;
Inter Sarmaticas Romana vagabitur umbras,
Perque feros Manes hoſpita ſemper erit.
Oſſa tamen facito parva referantur in urna.
Sic ego non etiam mortuus exſul ero,
Non vetat hoc quiſquam: fratrem Thebana peremptum
Suppoſuit tumulo rege vetante ſoror.
Atque ea cum foliis & amoni pulvere miſce:
Inque ſuburbano condita pone loco.
Quoſque legat verſus oculo properante viator,
Grandibus in tumuli marmore cæde notis:
Hic ego qui jaceo tenerorum luſor amorum,
Ingenio perii Naſo poëta meo.
At tibi qui tranſis, ne ſit grave, quiſquis amaſti,
Dicere, Naſonis molliter oſſa cubent (144).

(144) Idem, lib. 3. Triſt. eleg. 3. ver. 59.

The Senſe is,

" I wiſh the ſoul could with the body die,
" And every atom be a prey to flames.
" For if Pythagoras's doctrine's true,
" Immortal, ſhe aloft will wing her flight.
" Thus mine muſt wander in Sarmatian climes,
" And be a ſtranger amid ſavage ghoſts.
" But let the peaceful urn bring back my aſhes,
" That I, when dead, may ceaſe to be an exile.
" This none prohibits: the fam'd Theban ſiſter,
" Her brother buried, ſpite of Creon's fury.
" Let leaves and ſpices mix with my remains,
" And lay them in ſome peaceful, rural ſeat:
" And, on the marble, let theſe words be grav'd,
" To ſtrike each paſſenger's admiring eye.
" Here Ovid lies, a Poet form'd by love,
" Who died a victim to his tow'ring wit.
" Let every gazer, who has felt love's pangs,
" Wiſh that my aſhes may lie unmoleſted."

He there mentioned the opinion of Pythagoras very improperly; it being contrary to the doctrine he ſuppoſes, that ghoſts flit and wander about graves.

[Q] Theſe Barbarians loved Ovid, and paid him ſingular honour . . . he endeavoured to excuſe himſelf . . . for the dreadful deſcription he gave of their country.] Here follows a paſſage from one of his epiſtles.

Nec ſumus hic odio, nec ſcilicet eſſe meremur,
Nec cum fortuna mens quoque verſa mea eſt.
Illa quies animi eſt, quam tu laudare ſolebas,
Ille vetus ſolito perſtat in ore pudor.
Sic ego ſum longe, ſic hic, ubi barbarus hoſtis,
Ut fera plus valeant legibus arma, facit.
Rem queat ut nullum tot jam Græcine per annos
Fœmina de nobis virve puerve queri.
Hoc facit, ut miſero faveant adſintque Tomitæ,
Hæc quoniam tellus teſtificanda mihi eſt.
Illi me, quia velle vident, diſcedere malunt:
Reſpectu cupiunt hic tamen eſſe ſui.
Nec mihi credideris: exſtant decreta, quibus nos
Laudat, & immunes publica cera facit.
Conveniens miſeris & quamquam gloria non eſt,
Proxima dant nobis oppida munus idem (145).

(145) Idem, de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 9. ver. 89.

The Senſe is,

" Hatred I find not here, nor once deſerve it,
" Nor has my evil fortune chang'd my mind.
" That calm you prais'd in me, I ſtill enjoy,
" And all my words their wonted chaſtneſs boaſt.
" Here, far remote, I waſte the tedious hours,
" Begirt with hoſtile foes who laws contemn.
" So harmleſs I theſe tedious years have paſt,
" That not one Tomian can complain of me.
" To this is owing the kind aid they give,
" Of which the whole inhabitants are witneſs.
" They wiſh me gone, becauſe myſelf I wiſh it;
" And yet, ſo well they love me, urge my ſtay.
" You'll ſcarce believe that they have paſt decrees,
" Which praiſes and immunities indulge.
" Though fame and glory ſuit not wretched me,
" The towns adjacent join in theſe high honours."

Thus the reader ſees that they granted him exemptions; and here follows another paſſage which ſhews that this, among them, was an extraordinary favour, and that they crowned him publickly."

Adde quod Illyrica ſi jam pice nigrior eſſem,
Non mordenda mihi turba fidelis erat.
Molliter à vobis mea ſors excepta, Tomitæ,
Tam metes Grajos indicat eſſe viros.
Gens mea Peligni, regioque domeſtica Sulmo,
Non potuit noſtris lenior eſſe malis.
Quem vix incolumi cuiquam ſalvoque daretis,
Is datus à vobis eſt mihi nuper honor.
Solus adhuc ego ſum veſtris immunis in oris;
Exceptis, ſi qui munera legis habent.
Tempora ſacrata mea ſunt velata coronâ,
Publicus invito quam favor impoſuit.
Quam grata eſt igitur Latonæ Delia tellus,
Erranti tutum quæ dedit una locum;
Tam mihi cara Tomis, patria quæ ſede fugatis,
Tempus ad hoc nobis hoſpita ſida manet.
Di modo feciſſent placidæ ſpem poſſet habere
Pacis, & a gelido longius axe foret (146).

(146) Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 14. ver. 45.

The Senſe is,

" Add, though I blacker were than blackeſt pitch,
" I ne'er cou'd ſatyrize this courteous people.
" O Tomians, you ſo kindly ſooth my ſorrows,
" You ſeem not ſavages but gentle Greeks.
" Not Sulmo, when I firſt drew vital air,
" Cou'd pour more healing balms into my wounds.
" Lately, ſuch honours you on me beſtow'd,
" As happieſt Tomians are thought to merit.
" Solely, I bleſt immunities enjoy,
" Which are to Magiſtrates indulg'd.
" My temples with a ſacred crown you bind,
" Though often I the glorious gift refus'd.
" Grateful as Delos was to fam'd Latona,
" Where the ſad wandring fair found an aſylum,
" To me is Tomos, where, a hapleſs exile,
" I meet with friendly treatment that conſoles me.
" Ye Gods! cou'd Tomians laſting peace enjoy,
" And ſee the pole from far, I ſhould be happy."

Theſe laſt words point out what things were diſagreeable to him in the place of his exile: he there was expoſed to the rigours of cold, and near a nation who were making incurſions perpetually (147). This could not ſuit very well with an Italian, thin, and of a delicate conſtitution.

(147) See epiſt. 3. lib. 1. de Ponto, & paſſim alibi.

Sufficiunt: graciles ſed non ſine viribus artus:
Pondere, non nervis, corpora noſtra carent (148).

(148) Ovid. Amor. lib. 2. eleg. 10. ver. 23. See hereunder the paſſage of epiſt. 10. in lib. 1. de Ponto, ver. 21.

learnt the Getic language, he did not make love to the daughters or wives of the Tomians, for had he done this, their fathers and husbands would certainly have exclaimed againſt him. But as to his coldneſs and indifference, if it was not agreeable to them, they yet were forced to ſtifle their complaints. This part of his conduct is the more worthy of praiſe, as it muſt have been extremely difficult for one of his complexion to be regular in that reſpect, ſince he had, for a long time, led a quite different way of life (n). Some Chriſtian Poets (o) have reſembled him in other reſpects, but who, being baniſhed on account of their religion, did not diſcontinue their lewd practices. He wrote a great many Poems in his exile, a circumſtance we are not to wonder at, for the Muſes, who are naturally very talkative, are particularly ſo in adverſity; and as he was in want of proper perſons to converſe with, and was not a lover of the bottle or of gaming [R], the Muſes muſt have been his only conſolation. Had he met with perſons, to whom he could have read his poetical compoſitions, he would have indulged his vein with greater ſatisfaction

(n) Molle cupidineis nec inexpugnabile telis,
Cor mihi, quodque levis cauſſa moveret, erat.
Cum tamen hoc eſſem, minimoque accenderer igni.
Ovid. Triſt. lib. 4. eleg. 10. ver. 65.

(o) Clement Marot, for inſtance.

an Italian who had ſpent his life in delicacy and pleaſure (149).

(149) See eleg. 10. of lib. 4. de Triſt.

We will alſo ſee the anſwer he made to the complaints of the inhabitants of Tomos. He proteſted that he had never ſlandered them (150), and had inveighed only againſt their climate.

(150) 'Twill be difficult to reconcile this with elegy 7 and 10, of lib. 5. de Triſt.

In medias Syrtes, mediam mea vela Charybdin
Mittite, præſenti dum careamus humo.
Styx quoque, ſi quid ea eſt, bene commutabitur Iſtro:
Si quid & inferius, quam Styga, mundus habet.
Gramina cultus ager, frigus minus odit hirundo;
Proxima Marticolis quam loca Naſo Getis.
Talia ſuccenſent propter mihi verba Tomitæ,
Iraque carminibus publica mota meis.
Ergo ego ceſſabo nunquam per carmina lædi?
Plectar & incauto ſemper ab ingenio?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Sed nihil admiſi: nulla eſt mea culpa Tomitæ,
Quos ego, cum loca ſim veſtra perorſus, amo.
Quilibet excutiat noſtri monumenta laboris;
Littera de vobis eſt mea queſta nihil.
Frigus & incurſus omni de parte timendos,
Et quod pulſetur murus ab hoſte, queror.
In loca, non homines, veriſſima crimina dixi.
Culpatis veſtrum vos quoque ſæpe ſolum.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
At malus interpres populi mihi concitat iram,
Inque novum crimen carmina noſtra vocat.
Tam felix utinam, quam pectore candidus eſſem.
Exſtat adhuc nemo ſaucius ore meo (151).

(151) Ovid. epiſt. 14. lib. 4. de Ponto, ver. 9.

The Senſe is,

" On Lybia's ſands, or fierce Charybdis' gulph
" I'd rather be than in this horrid region.
" I'd change the Danube for the Styx, if real;
" Or any lower place, however dreadful.
" The plough-ſhare hates the graſs, the ſwallows cold,
" But Ovid's hate for the curſt land is greater.
" The friendly Tomians take ſuch words unkindly,
" And, one and all, expreſs their high diſpleaſure.
" What, muſt the Muſe be ever fatal to me?
" Still muſt I ſuffer from unguarded wit.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" But, Tomians, I am innocent and clear;
" I hate your clime, but ſtill I love your perſons.
" Search all my works, examine every line,
" And you'll not find a word that ſtrikes at you.
" Oft of the cold, indeed, I have complain'd,
" And of the enemies who hem you round.
" The climate I've accus'd, but not the people;
" And this, O Tomians, you yourſelves have done.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" But ſome curſt wretch interprets wrong my verſe,
" And ſpies out malice where no ill's intended.
" Would I were happy as I'm free from guilt:
" No line envenom'd ſtains my guiltleſs page.

[" Ovid had a ſhip of his own in the Bay of Co-
" rinth, on which he made his voyage to the Euxine,
" and then performed the reſt of his journey on " foot, to a place the utmoſt and moſt inhoſpitable
" of any that a Roman had ever been confined to.
" He complains of the dangers and miſeries of " his paſſage; and the injuſtice of his companions
" and ſervants: but reſolved that his ſpirit ſhould
" not ſink under his misfortunes, he made uſe of his
" reſolution to overcome them, and prevailed ſo far
" as to conquer his temper that had been too much
" given up to eaſe; and began to paſs his days in
" ſome content by means of thoſe verſes which he " made for his own ſatisfaction, without any hopes
" of their coming to the peruſal of others. And in " this adverſity of the Poet his character appears
" with the greateſt luſtre: here he ſhews a courage
" undaunted, a ſpirit not to be caſt down, a con-
" ſtancy of love to the partner of his bed, and a
" friendſhip inviolable to thoſe perſons of honour he
" had confided in, many of whom were the conſu-
" lar dignity *. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

* Preface to Dr. King's Art of Love, ubi ſupr.

[R] He wrote a great many Poems in his exile (152), a circumſtance we are not to wonder at . . . . he was in want of proper perſons to converſe with, and was not a lover of the bottle or of gaming.] Here are many cauſes why his Muſe ſhould be prolifick, but the principal one is not ſet down, which was, that his Muſe brought forth without labour, and never troubled herſelf any farther about bringing up the offſpring; ſhe being very little ſolicitous about correcting her productions (153). Her caſe muſt therefore have been like that of moſt married women who never nurſe their children; they breeding ſooner than ſuch as do. Here follows ſome paſſages which ſhew that Ovid's Muſe was every thing to him.

(152) Beſides the 5 books de Triſt. and the 4 de Ponto, now extant, he wrote many verſes in that country, which he committed to the flames. See his 12th eleg. of lib. 5. de Triſt.

(153) See the cloſe of this remark.

Hic ego finitimis quamvis circumſonor armis,
Triſtia, quo poſſum, carmine fata levo.
Quod quamvis nemo eſt, cujus referatur ad aures;
Sic tamen abſumo decipioque diem.
Ergo quod vivo, duriſque laboribus obſto,
Nec me ſollicitæ tædia lucis habent;
Gratia Muſa tibi, nam tu ſolatia præbes,
Tu curæ requies, tu medicina venis:
Tu dux & comes es: tu nos abducis ab Iſtro,
In medioque mihi das Helicone locum (154).

(154) Ovid. Triſt. lib 4. eleg. 10. ver. 3. See alſo lib. 5. eleg. 7.

The ſenſe is,

" Here, though ſurrounded with war's dreadful ſound,
" My cares I ſoften with the tuneful lyre.
" And though no auditor applauds my verſe,
" Yet thus I while my tedious hours away.
" Therefore to thee, kind Muſe, I owe my life;
" To thee I owe my firm, unſhaken mind,
" And every hour of comfort I enjoy.
" By thee my cares are ſooth'd, my wounds are heal'd;
" Thou, ſhining guide, who lead'ſt me from the Danube
" To Helicon, amid the Muſes choir.

He complains of his having neither books nor auditors.

Non hic librorum, per quos inviter alarque,
Copia: pro libris arcus & arma ſonant.
Nullus in hac terra, recitem ſi carmina, cujus
Intellecturis auribus utar, adeſt (155).

(155) Idem, il id. lib. 3. eleg. 14. ver. 37.

The

faction to himſelf; he owning that it is the ſame thing to walk in the dark, as to write verſes that are to be read by nobody (p). Among other good qualities he poſſeſt, one was, his not having the leaſt propenſion to ſatyr; and yet he was very able to write ſatyrical

(p) See the rem. [R], citat. 151.

The Senſe is,

" No books are here, to ſooth and feed my fancy,
" All places echoing with war's dreadful ſound.
" And ſhould I verſe compoſe, no man I meet with
" Can underſtand it, and give due applauſe."

And he deſires that this may plead his apology, in caſe his verſes are not found good. His genius, enfeebled by adverſity, is not fir'd by the hopes of applauſe.

Contudit ingenium patientia longa laboris,
Et pars antiqui magna vigoris abeſt.
Sæpe tamen nobis, ut nunc quoque ſumpta tabella eſt,
Inque ſuos volui cogere verba pedes:
Carmina ſcripta mihi ſunt nulla, aut qualia cernis,
Digna ſui domini tempore, digna loco.
Denique non parvas animo dat gloria vires,
Et fœcunda facit pectora laudis amor.
Nominis & famæ quondam fulgore trahebar,
Dum tulit antennas aura ſecunda meas.
Non adeo eſt bene nunc, ut ſit mihi gloria curæ:
Si liceat, nulli cognitus eſſe velim.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
At puto, ſi demens ſtudium fatale retentem.
Hic mihi præbebit carminis arma locus.
Non liber hic ullus, non qui mihi commodet aurem,
Verbaque ſignificent quid mea norit, adeſt.
Omnia barbariæ loca ſunt, vociſque ferinæ:
Omnia ſunt Getici plena timore ſoni (156).

(156) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 5. eleg. 12. ver. 29.

The Senſe is,

" My countleſs evils have depreſs'd my genius,
" And all my former fire is quite extinguiſh'd.
" Yet oft, (as now) the pen I reaſſume,
" And ſtrive to place each foot in its due order,
" Such verſe I only write as thoſe you ſee;
" Verſes that ſuit their author and the place.
" Glory adds ſtrength to the luxuriant fancy,
" And a fond love of praiſe, exalts it high.
" Fame's dazling ſplendors once my eye attracted,
" Whilſt ſmiling fortune ſwell'd the ſpreading ſails;
" But now, alas! fair fame no more invites,
" And all I pant for is to be forgot.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" Yet, ſhould I now reſume theſe fatal ſtudies,
" Say, can this place afford materials for them?
" Books I have none, nor can I find a man
" Who underſtands the language which I write in.
" All places here with barbariſm abound,
" And every Getic ſound ſtrikes inward horror".

He repeats the ſame reflection, and extends it in another place, where he declares that he is diſcouraged from writing verſes; and that he would have quite left off this employ, had he not been deprived of every other kind of amuſement.

Da veniam faſſo, ſtudiis quoque frena remiſi,
Ducitur & digitis littera rara meis.
Impetus ille ſacer, qui vatum pectora nutrit,
Qui prius in nobis eſſe ſolebat, abeſt.
Vix venit ad partes, vix ſumptæ Muſa tabellæ
Imponit pigras pæne coacta manus:
Parvaque, ne dicam, ſcribendi nulla voluptas
Eſt mihi: nec numeris nectere verba juvat.
Sive quod hinc fructus adeo non cepimus ullos,
Principium noſtri res ſit ut iſta mali:
Sive quod in tenebris numeroſos ponere geſtus,
Quodque legas nulli, ſcribere carmen, idem eſt,
Excitat auditor ſtudium, laudataque virtus
Creſcit, & immenſum gloria calcar habet.
Hic mea cui recitem, niſi flavis ſcripta Corallis,
Quaſque alias gentes barbarus Iſter habet?
Sed quid ſolus agam? quaque infelicia perdam
Otia materia, ſurripiamque diem?
Nam neque me vinum, nec me tenet alea fallax,
Per quæ clam tacitum tempus abire ſolet.
Nec me, quod cuperem, ſi per fera bella liceret,
Oblectat cultu terra novata ſuo.
Quid, niſi Pierides, ſolatia frigida reſtant,
Non bene de nobis quæ meruere, deæ (157).

(157) Idem, de Ponto, lib. 4. epiſt. 2. ver. 23. See alſo lib. 1. epiſt. 5. ver. 10.

The ſenſe is,

" I'm tir'd, and therefore would I plead excuſe,
" If I no more my wonted toils purſue.
" The ſacred fire which warms the Poet's breaſt,
" (Once felt by me) is now extinct and gone,
" Deaf to my call, the Muſe, but rarely comes;
" And with regret ſhe ſtrikes the mournful ſtrings.
" To mould the numbers, and the verſe refine,
" (Once ſo delightful) now no pleaſure gives.
" Whether, becauſe it no advantage brought,
" And was the ſource of all my dire misfortunes;
" Or, 'cauſe to write, what no one ever reads,
" Is juſt as vain as writing in the dark.
" An Auditor excites; applauſes fire;
" And glory is the mind's moſt noble ſpur.
" The only Auditors I meet with here,
" Are barbarous nations near the Danube ſeated.
" But loneſome as I am, this dull employment
" Beſt ſooths my widow'd hours, and calms my ſoul.
" Gaming and wine, which charm the thoughtleſs herd,
" To me are taſteleſs, and no joys diſpenſe.
" Nor me (which yet, would furious wars allow,
" I'd try) the pleaſures of the plough delight.
" The Muſes therefore, now, are all my comfort;
" And ſtill I love 'em, tho' by them undone.

I will cite one paſſage more, in which he declares that his thin complection was not owing to any rioteous exceſs, ſince he ſcarce drank any thing but water; and that his circumſtances did not make him liable to any danger from the paſſion of love.

Is quoque, qui gracili cibus eſt in corpore, ſomnus,
Non alit officio corpus inane ſuo.
Sed vigilo, vigilantque mei ſine fine dolores,
Quorum materiam dat locus ipſe mihi.
Vix igitur poſſis viſos agnoſcere vultus,
Quoque ierit, quæras, qui fuit ante, color.
Parvus in exiles ſuccus mihi pervenit artus,
Membraque ſunt cera pallidiora nova.
Non hæc immodico contraxi damna Lyæo:
Scis, mihi quam ſolæ pæne bibantur aquæ.
Non epulis oneror, quarum ſi tangar amore,
Eſt tamen in Geticis copia nulla locis.
Nec vires adimit Veneris damnoſa voluptas,
Non ſolet in mæſtos illa venire thoros.
Unda locuſque nocent, & cauſſa valentior iſtis
Anxietas animi, quæ mihi ſemper adeſt (158).

(158) Idem, lib. 1. de Ponto, epiſt. 11. ver. 21.

The ſenſe is,

" Sheep, the beſt food to thin, enfeebled bodies,
" To me no wholeſome nouriſhment affords.
" My woes ſtill keep my weeping eyes awake,
" And every object here foments my ſorrow.
" You'd ſcarcely know my face, 'tis ſo much chang'd,
" For long the roſes have forſook my cheek.
" Life's ſprightly tide has left my ſhrivel'd nerves;
" More pallid, now, my hue, than virgin-wax.
" Not wine, you're ſenſible, produc'd theſe ills;
" My thirſt unquench'd but at the flowing brook.
" Banquets I've none; nor was I fond of dainties,
" Wou'd theſe dark regions once indulge my wiſhes.
" Nor is my ſtrength by luſtful joys enfeebled,
" For Venus comes not to the mourner's bed.
" The ſoil, the water's noxious; and my grief
" (More noxious ſtill) fits ever brooding o'er me.

I will ſpeak a word or two with regard to the manner tyrical verſes, as is manifeſt from his Poem againſt Ibis [S]; no gaul being ever more bitter than what he threw out on that occaſion, nor more grievous curſes or execrations. He wrote it a little after his baniſhment.

manner, in which he ſays he uſed to correct his works. He confeſſes himſelf very negligent and idle on thoſe occaſions; and confeſſed that the people in Rome had juſt reaſon to criticize him, for repeating continually the ſame things, in the poems written by him during his baniſhment (159). He was ſenſible of his committing that fault, and he endeavoured to avoid it; but the fire which animated him in his firſt compoſition, failing when he came to reviſe his poems, he found it too painful a taſk to correct, and accordingly abandoned it. This is but one of his excuſes. This is certainly the caſe with many Authors. They compoſe with pleaſure and fire, and by that means diſplay all their ſtrength; but they flag in the reviſal of their work; their firſt fire does not return; and a certain calm ariſing in their imagination, their pen moves extremely ſlow: 'tis a boat that will not go forward without being rowed. If the Reader is deſirous of knowing what Ovid obſerves concerning the correcting of his writings, he may peruſe the following lines.

(159) Idem, de Ponto, lib. 3. epiſt. 9. ver. 39.

Judicium tamen hic noſtrum non decipit error,
Nec quicquid genui, protinus illud amo,
Cur igitur ſi me video delinquere, peccem;
Et patiar ſcripto crimen ineſſe, rogas?
Non eadem ratio eſt, ſentire, & demere morbos.
Senſus ineſt cunctis, tollitur arte malum,
Sæpe aliquod verbum cupiens mutare relinquo:
Judicium vires deſtituuntque meum.
Sæpe piget (quid enim dubitem tibi vera fateri?)
Corrigere, & longi ferre laboris onus:
Scribentem juvat ipſe favor, minuitque laborem,
Cumque ſuo creſcens pectore fervet opus:
Corrigere at res eſt tanto magis ardua, quanto
Magnus Ariſtarcho major Homerus erat.
Sic animum lento curarum frigore lædit,
Ut cupidi ſi quis fræna retentat equi (160).

(160) Idem, ibid. ver. 9.

The Senſe is,

" No partial fondneſs e'er miſled my judgment,
" And made me idolize whate'er I write.
" Why then (will you object) do you offend,
" And not correct thoſe errors you perceive?
" To feel and cure an ill are different things;
" All can perceive, but all cannot refine.
" Oft when I'd change ſome weak or trifling word,
" My judgment fails me, and I'm quite bewilder'd.
" Frequent (from you I'll not conceal my failings)
" I dread the labour; flag, and can't go on.
" Compoſing pleaſes, and beguiles the toil;
" Gay fancy brightning with the riſing lines.
" Correcting, is a more laborious taſk;
" And claims a Homer, not an Ariſtarchus.
" This tedious toil quite checks th' uneaſy mind,
" As when the courſer feels the wounding curb.

[S] Among other good qualities he poſſeſt, one was, his not having the leaſt propenſion to ſatyr . . . . no gall was ever more bitter than what he threw out . . . in his Poem againſt Ibis.] He boaſts that he had never attacked any perſon in ſatyrical lines; and repreſents this to the Emperoor, that if his Muſe had offended him in other reſpects, it yet deſerved encouragement for having ever been exempt from a ſpirit of ill nature.

Non ego mordaci diſtrinxi carmine quemquam,
Nec meus ullius crimina verſus habet,
Candidus à ſalibus ſuffuſis felle refugi:
Nulla venenato littera miſta joco eſt.
Inter tot populi, tot ſcripti millia noſtri,
Quem mea Calliope læſerit, unus ero (161).

(161) Ovid. Triſt. lib. 2. ver. 563.

The Senſe is,

" I ne'er took up ſharp ſatyr's furious pen,
" Nor one foul crime to open day reveal'd.
" Candid, my wit was ever free from gall;
" My lines with baſe, envenom'd jokes unmix'd.
" In all my works, ſo various and diffus'd,
" Me only they ſhall hurt, me only wound.

Thus he ſpeaks in a Poem written by him ſince his baniſhment. I yet am of opinion that his ſatyr againſt Ibis was written then; for ſince he declares himſelf to be but fifty in the beginning of the Poem in queſtion, he doubtleſs compoſed it a little after his arrival in Tomos; and upon his receiving the firſt news that a certain perſon had declared himſelf his enemy.

Tempus ad hoc, luſtris mihi jam bis quinque peractis
Omne fuit Muſæ carmen inerme meæ:
Nullaque, quæ poſſit, ſcriptis tot millibus, exſtat,
Littera Naſonis ſanguinolenta legi.
Nec quemquam noſtri, niſi me, læſere libelli:
Artificis periit cum caput arte ſua.
Unus (& hoc ipſum eſt injuria magna,) perennem
Candoris titulum non ſinit eſſe mei.
Quiſquis is eſt (nam nomen adhuc utcumque tacebo)
Cogit inaſſuetas ſumere tela manus.
Ille relegatum gelidos Aquilonis ad ortus,
Non ſinit exſilio delituiſſe meo:
Vulneraque immitis requiem quærentia vexat:
Jactat & in toto nomina noſtra foro:
Perpetuoque mihi ſociatam fœdere lecti
Non patitur miſeri funera flere viri (162).

(162) Ovid. in Ibin. init.

The Senſe is,

" The ſun has run full fifty times his courſe,
" And free from ſatyr has my verſes found.
" Among the many thouſand I've compos'd,
" Not one is ſeen, of a ſatyric caſt.
" My works hurt no man but their hapleſs author,
" Whoſe art has brought deſtruction on himſelf.
" But now the treatment of a worthleſs wretch
" Will force me to take up the ſharpeſt pen.
" This wretch (for ſtill I ſhall ſuppreſs his name)
" Obliges me to wield unuſual weapons.
" Though ſent to climes where froſt eternal reigns,
" Yet thither his fell malice ſtill purſues me.
" Barbarous, the wound I'd heal, he opens wider;
" And makes my griefs the jeſt of all the world;
" Nor will he let the partner of my bed,
" Bewail my fate, and ſhare my endleſs ſorrows.

Had he been fifty two years of age, or upwards, he would have taken notice of this circumſtance, in order to magnify his merit, for not having writ any thing of a ſatyrical caſt during ſo long a courſe of years. This eſſay was a maſter-piece in that kind. Ovid there (163) collects all the torments which are found in hiſtory or fable, to wiſh them as ſo many curſes to his treacherous enemy, which he takes from two hundred and thirty nine examples. A learned profeſſor (Stephanus Richardus Nivernenſis) in the univerſity of Paris, who lived about a hundred years ago (164), digeſted them under forty two kinds, of which he intended to make ſo many chapters (165). The beſt Commentary on this Satyr is that of Mr. de Boſſieu (166); which was printed at Lyons, Sumptibus Antonii Pillehotte, anno 1633, 4to (167). Abbé de Marolles, who firſt tranſlated this Poem of Ovid's into French, added to it ſome very large notes, the beſt of which are extracted from Mr. de Boiſſieu's Commentary. This tranſlation was printed at Paris in 1661, 8vo.

[After his (Ovid's) diſmiſſion from court, he had occaſion to make uſe of a ſatyrical ſtyle, which he always before had induſtriouſly avoided; but it was upon high provocation; and yet he does it under the concealed name of Ibis. He is ſuppoſed to have wrote it in full paſſion, either in his voyage, or as ſoon as he came to the Euxine ſhore, againſt a perſon that took occaſion from his misfortunes to ſcandalize and reproach him; to make his wife uneaſy; to endeavour to reduce him to the utmoſt poverty by depriving him of his eſtate, which Auguſtus had entirely left him; for which clemency in many excellent verſes the Poet is not ungrateful. He profeſſes to have imitated Callimachus, who falls upon Apothonius Rhodius, in a Poem under the ſame title. There can nothing include more of the antient fable and hiſtory than this ſmall work, eſpecially of ſuch as have come to any fatal miſchance *. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(163) Abbé de Marolles, in the argument to the French tranſlation of the poem againſt Ibis.

(164) This Abbé wrote thus in 1661.

(165) This Abbé gives the titles of theſe chapters.

(166) Dionyſius Salvagnius Boeſſius.

(167) The Abbé de Marolles did not know this; he ſaying, p. 67, that this work of Meſſire Denys de Salvaing, Lord of Boiſſieu, was printed at Lyons in 1638.

* Preface to Dr. King's Art of Love, ubi ſupr. p. 27, 28.

OWEN

☞ OWEN (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh Epigrammatiſt in the 17th Century, was born at Armon in Caernarvonſhire (a), and educated at Wykeham's ſchool near Wincheſter, under Dr. Thomas Bilſon, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter. In 1584, after two years probation, he was admitted perpetual Fellow of New College in Oxford (b); and May 2, 1590, he took the Degree of Bachelor of Civil Law (c); and the year following leaving his Fellowſhip, taught ſchool at Trylegh near Monmouth; and afterwards, about the year 1594, ſucceeded Mr. Thomas Hall in the maſterſhip of the ſchool at Warwick, founded by King Henry VIII. He generally laboured under very neceſſitous circumſtances; but was ſupported for ſeveral years by his countryman and kinſman Dr. John Williams, Biſhop of Lincoln, and Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England (d). His Epigrams [A] gained him a very conſiderable reputation; but were put in the Index Expurgatorius by the order of the Romiſh Inquiſitors, on account of ſome paſſages in them, eſpecially the two following Verſes:

An Petrus fuerit Romæ, ſub judice lis eſt:
Simonem Romæ nemo fuiſſe negat.

For which Verſes, and others of the ſame kind, our Author's uncle, who was a Papiſt, ſtruck his name out of his laſt Will and Teſtament. He died in 1622 (e), and not in 1623, as was ſaid in Mr. Wood's Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis; and he was interred in the cathedral of St. Paul's at London, at the expence of Biſhop Williams, who erected a monument to his memory on a pillar next to the conſiſtory ſtairs, with his Buſt in braſs, crowned with laurel, and ſix Latin Verſes under it [B]. Borrichius (f) highly commends his Epigrams, but cenſures the obſcenity of ſome of them, and tells us that he would have been ſuperior to Martial, if he had not reſembled him in that point; but that he is ſometimes miſtaken in the quantity of his ſyllables and the purity of his ſtyle; though he ſufficiently atones for theſe defects by his great excellencies. Caſpar Barlæus (g) ſays, that many of his Epigrams are ingenious, but ſome of an inferior ſtamp. Lorenzo Craſſo (h) ſtyles him one of the moſt eminent Latin Epigrammatiſts of his age, but he repreſents him as ſometimes faulty with regard to his diction. And Monſieur Baillet (i) ſpeaks of him to the ſame purpoſe. We have an Epigram to our Author among John Stradling's Epigrams (k); and another among thoſe of John Dunbar (l).

(a) Moreri erroneouſly aſſerts that he was born at Oxford.

(b) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 1. p. 143. & Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 470, 471. 2d edit.

(c) Ibid. Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 139.

(d) Ibid. Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) De Poetis, p. 55.

(g) Epiſt. 888.

(h) Elogii d'Huomini Letterati.

(i) In his Jugemens des Savans.

(k) Lib. 4. p. 159.

(l) Cent. 4. n. 66. edit. Lond. 1616.

[A] His Epigrams.] He publiſhed at firſt but three books under the following title: Epigrammatum Libri tres ad Mariam Neville, Comit Dorceſtriæ filiam. London 1606, in 8vo. Re-printed the ſame year. He afterwards publiſhed Epigrammatum liber unus, ad doctiſſimam Heroinam, D. Arabellam Stuart. Epigrammatum libri tres; ad Henricum Principem Cambriæ duo; ad Carolum Eboracenſem unus. Epigrammatum ad tres Mecænates libri tres: ad Carolum Noel Equitem & Baronettum unus: ad Gulialmum Sedley Equitem & Baronettum alter: ad Rogerum Owen Equitem auratum tertius. Monaſticha quædam Ethica & Politica veterum ſapientum. All theſe came out as ſucceſſive additions to the ſeveral Editions of the three firſt books of Epigrams, and were at laſt publiſhed in one volume in 8vo, and 12mo, both in England, and beyond the ſeas. In 1619, Mr. John Vicars, Uſher of the ſchool of Chriſt's Hoſpital in London, publiſhed at London in 8vo, an Engliſh Tranſlation of ſelect Epigrams out of this collection. Mr. Thomas Pecke, of the Inner-Temple, likewiſe tranſlated ſix hundred of theſe Epigrams into Engliſh verſe, which were printed with Martial de Spectaculis, or of the Rarities to be ſeen in Rome, and with the moſt ſelect Epigrams of Sir Thomas More; to which is annexed, a Century of Heroic Epigrams. &c, all printed under the general Title of Parnaſſi Puerperium, at London 1659, in 8vo. And laſtly, Mr. Thomas Harvey tranſlated moſt or all of our Author's Epigrams into Engliſh; but of his performance can give no account. There was a French tranſlation printed at Paris in 1709, in 12mo, under this Title, Les Epigrammes d'Owen, traduites en Francois, par M. le B. [Brun]. This Title ſeems to promiſe a tranſlation of the whole collection, but actually contains only a ſelect number. There is a Spaniſh tranſlation of Owen's Epigrams, printed under the following title, Agudezas de Juan Owen traduzidas par Fr. de la Torre. Madrid 1674 and 1682, in 4to, two volumes.

[B] Six Latin verſes under it,] They are as follow:

Parva tibi ſtatua eſt, quia parva ſtatura, ſupellex
Parva, volat parvus magna per ora liber.
Sed non parvus Honos, non parva eſt gloria, quippe
Ingenio haud quicquam eſt majus in orbe tuo.
Parva domus texit, Templum ſed grande: Poetæ
Tum verè Vitam, cum moriuntur, agunt. H.

☞ OZANAM (JAMES), an eminent French Mathematician [A], was born in 1640 in the ſovereignty of Dombes (a). His father was in very opulent circumſtances, and poſſeſſed of ſeveral eſtates. His family was of Jewiſh extract, but had been long converted to the Chriſtian Religion, and profeſſed the Roman Catholick Faith, and was likewiſe diſtinguiſhed for ſeveral offices, which it had held in the Parliaments of Provence. Our Author was the youngeſt ſon; and by the laws of that country the eſtate belonged to the eldeſt; and therefore his father reſolved to repair this diſadvantage by giving him an excellent education. He deſigned him for the Church, in order that he might enjoy ſome ſmall benefices, which belonged to the family. But our author found no inclination to the eccleſiaſtical State; and ſome mathematical books, which fell into his hands, inſpired him with a love for that ſcience. Though he had no maſter to inſtruct him, he made ſo great a progreſs in it, that at the age of fifteen years, he wrote a piece in mathematicks, which

(a) Fontenelle, Elege de M. Ozanam, printed in the Hiſt. de l'Academie de Sciences, ann. 1717, & Europe Savante, Tom. 2. p. 275.

[A] An eminent French Mathematician.] This appears ſufficiently from his writings, which are as follow: I. La Geometrie-pratique, contenant la Trigonometrie theorique & pratique, la Longimetrie, la Planimetrie, & la Stereometrie. Paris 1684, in 12mo. II. Tables des Sinus, Tangentes, & Secantes, & des Logarithmes des Sinus & des Tangentes, & des nombres depuis l'unité juſqu' à dix mille, avec un traité de Trigonometrie, which was never printed, but contained things which he thought proper to inſert in the works which he afterwards publiſhed. He ſtudied divinity four years, rather out of obedience than inclination; but upon his father's death he quitted that ſtudy, and applied himſelf wholly to the mathematicks. He afterwards went to Lyons, where he taught that ſcience for a ſupport, and though this was no very conſiderable one, he gave himſelf up for ſome time to a paſſion for gaming, and acted upon occaſion in a very generous manner. Two Foreigners, whom he taught the mathematicks at Lyons, having expreſſed to him their uneaſineſs at not receiving the Bills of Exchange, which they expected, in order that they might go to Paris, he aſked them what money they wanted, and being told fifty Piſtoles, he lent them the ſum immediately without accepting a note. Theſe Foreigners, when they came to Paris, giving an account of this to Monſieur Dagueſſeau, father of the Chancellor, that Magiſtrate being touched with ſo generous an action, engaged them to ſend for Mr. Ozanam to Paris, with a promiſe to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power. Ozanam determined therefore to leave Lyons. Upon the road thither, a perſon unknown told him, that if he would renounce play, he might raiſe himſelf a fortune at Paris, gain a great reputation, and marry at thirty five years of age, with ſome other particulars, which were juſtified by the event. He was ſcarce arrived at Paris, when his mother falling ſick deſired to ſee him; upon which he haſtened to her, but found her dead. She had deſigned to make him her heir, but his elder brother prevented her intentions. Our Author returned therefore to Paris, and broke off all correſpondence with a family, of which he enjoyed nothing but the name. He abandoned his inclination to gaming, and devoted himſelf intirely to the Mathematicks. He was young, handſome, and ſprightly, and this expoſed him to ſome affairs of gallantry. A woman, who pretended to be a perſon of condition, and who lodged in the ſame houſe with him, ſtrongly tempted his virtue. He aſked her, whether ſhe had occaſion for money, which ſhe aſſenting to, he gave her ſeveral Louis D'or's. This adventure engaged him to think of matrimony, and accordingly he married a woman with almoſt no fortune, who had inſpired him with a paſſion for her by her good nature, modeſty, and virtue; and he was not deceived in theſe appearances. He had twelve children by her, the greateſt part of whom died young. In the time of peace, when Paris is full of ſtrangers, his teaching of mathematicks was a good income to him; but it was greatly diminiſhed during the war; for the French gave him but little aſſiſtance, becauſe he had diſguſted them by preferring Foreigners. In 1701, at the age of 61 years, he loſt his wife, and with her all the repoſe and ſatisfaction of life. The war, which was occaſioned ſoon after by the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, deprived him of all his ſcholars, and reduced him to a very melancholy ſtate. It was at that time he was admitted in the Royal Academy of Sciences in quality of an Eleve; a quality, which it was proper to do honour to by giving it a perſon of his age and merit. He had ſuch a preſentiment of his death, though without any ſickneſs, that he refuſed to accept of ſome foreign Noblemen for his ſcholars, alledging, that he ſhould ſoon die; as he actually did April 3, 1717, of an apoplexy in leſs than two hours, being then 77 years old. He knew too much of aſtronomy to give into judicial aſtrology; and obſtinately refuſed all that was offered him to engage him to calculate nativities. Once indeed he ſubmitted to the importunity of a Count of the Empire, whom he had ſufficiently warned not to believe him. He drew up by aſtronomy the ſcheme of his nativity, and then without employing the rules of aſtrology foretold him all the inſtances of good fortune, which came into his head. The Count at the ſame time procured his horoſcope to be taken by a phyſician, who was greatly infatuated with aſtrology, and who followed exactly all the rules of that art. Twenty years after the Count informed Mr. Ozanam, that all his predictions were come to paſs, and that none of the Phyſician's had their effect. This account gave him a very different ſatisfaction from what was intended. The Count thought to compliment him upon his ſkill in aſtrology, and he was confirmed by it in his perſuaſion of the falſity of that pretended ſcience. He was of a chearful temper amidſt his metrie, par de nouvelles demonſtrationes & des pratiques tres faciles. Paris 1685, in 8vo. There was a new Edition with Additions, in 1710. III. Traitè des 'Lignes du premier genre, de la conſtruction des équations, & des lieux Geometriques, expliquées par une Methode nouvelle & facile. Paris 1687, in 4to. IV. L'uſage du Compas de proportion expliqué & demontré d'une maniere courte & facile, & augmenté d'un Traité de la diviſion des champs. Paris 1688, in 8vo, pagg. 138. There was a new edition in 1700. V. Uſage de l'inſtrument univerſel pour reſoudre promptement & tres-exactement tous les problémes de la Geometrie-pratique ſans aucun calcul. Paris 1688, in 12mo. Reprinted in 1700. VI. Dictionaire Mathematique, ou Idée generale des Mathematiques. Paris 1690, in 4to. VII. Methode Generale pour tracer des Cadrans ſur toutes ſortes de plus. Paris 1685, in 12mo. This book has been printed ſeveral times. This edition, which is the ſecond, is larger than the firſt, printed in 1673, in 12mo. VIII. Cours de Mathematiques, qui comprend toutes les parties de cette ſcience les plus utiles & les plus neceſſaires. Paris 1693, five volumes in 8vo. IX. Traité de la Fortifications, contenant les methodes anciennes & modernes pour la conſtruction & défenſe des Places, & la maniere de les attaquer, expliquées plus au long qu'elles n'on juſqu' à preſent. Paris 1694, in 4to. X. Recreations Mathematiques & Phyſiques, qui contiennent pluſieurs problémes utiles & agréables de l'Arithmetique, de Geometrie, d'Optique, de Gnomonique, de Coſmographie, de Mechanique, de Pyrotecnie, & de Phyſique, avec un Traité des Horloges élementaires. Paris 1694, in 8vo, two Tomes. There was a new edition with additions, at Paris 1724, in 8vo, four Tomes. XI. Nouvelle Trigonometrie, où l'on trouve la maniere de calculer toutes ſortes de Triangles rectilignes, ſans les tables des Sinus, & auſſi par les Tables des Sinus, avec un Application de la Trigonometrie a la meſure de Lignes droites acceſſibles & inacceſſibles ſur la terre, Paris 1699, in 12mo. XII. Methode facile pour arpenter ou meſurer toutes ſortes de ſuperficies, & pour his greateſt diſtreſſes; of a very generous diſpoſition, great ſimplicity of manners, irreproachable conduct, and the moſt ſtrict and exemplary devotion. He would not allow himſelf to know more of religion than the common people. He uſed to ſay, that "it "was the buſineſs of the doctors of Sorbonne to diſpute, of the Pope to decide, and of "a Mathematician to go to Heaven in a perpendicular line."

pour toiſer exactement la Maçonnerie, les Vuidanges des terres, & tous les autres Corps, avec le toiſé du bois de charpente & un traité de la Separation des Terres. Paris 1699, in 12mo. There was a new edition with corrections in 1725. XIII. Nouveaux Elemens d'Algebre, ou Principes generaux pour reſoudre toutes ſortes de problêmes de Mathematiques. Amſterdam 1702, in 8vo. Mr. Leibnitz in the Journal des Savans, of the year 1703, ſpeaks thus of this work of our Author: "Monſieur Ozanam's Al-"gebra, ſeems to me greatly preferable to moſt of "thoſe, which have been publiſhed a long time, and "are only copies from Des Cartes, and his Commen-"tators. I am well pleaſed, that he has revived part "of Vieta's precepts, which deſerve not to be for-"gotten." XIV. Les Elemens d'Euclide, par le P. Dechales. Nouvelle Edition corrigée & augmentée. Paris 1709, in 12mo, and re-printed in 1720. XV. Geometrie-Pratique du Pieur Boulanger, augmentée de pluſieurs notes & d'un Traité de l'Arithmetique par Geometrie, par M. Ozanam. Paris 1691, in 12mo. XVI. Traité de la Sphere du Monde, par Boulanger, revû, corrigé, & augmenté, par M. Ozanam. Paris in 12mo. XVII. La Perſpective Theorique & Pratique, ou l'on enſeigne la maniere de mettre toutes ſortes d'objets en perſpective, & d'en repreſenter les ombres cauſées par le Soleil, ou par une petite Lumiere. Paris 1711, in 8vo. XVIII. Le Geographie & Coſmographie, qui traite de la Sphere, des Corps celeſtes, des differens Syſtêmes du Monde, du Globe, & de ſes uſages. Paris 1711, in 8vo. XIX. In the Journal des Sçavans, our Author has the following pieces; 1. Démonſtration de ce Theoreme; que la ſomme ou la difference de deux quarré-quarrez ne peut être un quarré-quarré. Journal of May 20, 1680. 2. Réponſe à un probleme propoſé par M. Comiers. Journal of Novemb. 17, 1681. 3. Démonſtration d'un problême touchant les racines fauſſes imaginaires. Journal of the 2d and 9th of April 1685. 4. Methode pour trouver en nombres la racine cubique, & la racine ſurſolide d'un binome, quand il y en a une. Journal of April 9th, 1691. XX. In the Memoires de Trevoux, he has this piece: Réponſe aux principaux Articles, qui ſont dans le 23 Journal de Paris de l'an 1703, touchant la premiere partie de ſon Algebre: inſerted in the Memoires of December 1703, p. 2214. H.

P.

P.

PACARD (GEORGE) took the ſurname of Soguſian in the title of one of his books, which makes me believe that he was born in the Lyonois or in that neighbourhood. He lived in the 16th Century. He was, I think, Miniſter at La Rochefoucaut in the year 1574, when he dedicated his natural Theology to Count de la Rochefoucaut. We read in Du Verdier Vauprivas's Bibliotheque, that this book, which contains ſeveral Arguments drawn from the Contemplation of Nature againſt the Epicureans and the Atheiſts, was printed at Rochelle in 1579, in 8vo. There is a ſecond edition of it reviſed by the Author and with additions [A]. It was printed at Niort 1606, in 8vo. The Manuſcript of this work did George Pacard a great ſervice on a certain occaſion [B].

[A] A ſecond Addition reviſed by the Author and with additions.] The Author left out of it a chapter concerning Antichriſt, which was in the former edition. He had publiſhed a Treatiſe on purpoſe upon that ſubject at Niort two years before (1).

(1) See the Advertiſement to the Reader, prefixed to the 4th book.

[B] The Manuſcript of this work did George Pacard a great ſervice on a certain occaſion.] Here follows what he obſerves in his dedication concerning this particular. Being got out of priſon, where I had been kept about a year at Grenoble, I was told by a Gentleman, the Sieur de Bonpar, who had procured my liberty, that I had been preſerved and ſaved from death, which eight perſons of our party ſuffered, by the means of a copy of this collection, which I had by me, when I was taken priſoner, and which had been peruſed by ſeveral Members of the Parliament of that city.

PACHECO (ALVAREZ), a Spaniſh Colonel, related to the Duke of Alva (a), ſerved under him in the Low Countries, and was ſent to Fluſhing, both to command in the place, and to forward the building of a fort there in the year 1571; but before he could get on ſhore, the Spaniſh Garriſon had already been driven out of the city. He was therefore in a maze when he found himſelf in the enemy's power. They hanged him without mercy, and without hearkening to the remonſtrance he made them, that conſidering he was a Nobleman, they ſhould behead him, ſince they would not grant him his life for the price he offered. Treſlon, who was exaſperated againſt the Duke of Alva (b), would come to no terms; Pacheco was forced to make his exit with two other Spaniards. Meurſius has given a pretty full account of this ſtory, but he miſtakes our Pacheco for a famous Engineer (c), whom the Duke of Alva had brought with him from Italy, and whoſe name was Paciotti: he ſuppoſes that the perſon who was hanged was call'd Paciottus. Monſieur du Maurier takes notice of ſome other miſtakes concerning our Spaniard [A], who was probably of the ſame family with the Cardinals Pacheco, mentioned by Moreri.

(a) Strada, Dec. 1. lib 7. ad ann. 1572.

(b) Becauſe the Duke had put to death this Treſlon's brother, in the year 1568.

(c) Se maxime Albanum lædere exiſtimabat, ſi munitionum artificem tam inſignem, belli egregium miniſtrum & propinquo ſanguinis nexu, tempore tam alieno eriperet. i. e. "He imagined "he ſhould "greatly vex the "Duke of Alva, by depriving him at "that juncture "of time, of a "moſt able Engineer, and "uſeful Officer, "who was alſo "related to him." Meurſ. Guil. Auriac. lib. 6.

[A] Monſieur du Maurier takes notice of ſome other miſtakes concerning our Spaniard.] He ſpeaks thus (1). "With regard to Pacheco, I cannot ſufficiently wonder at the different opinions I met with in the "moſt celebrated hiſtorians, who have given an account of the tranſactions in the Low-countries: "for Grotius aſſerts, that he was a native of Savoy, "though Bentivoglio, Strada, Meurſius, and Emmanuel van Meteren, agree that he was a Spaniard. "Cardinal Bentivoglio ſays that he was beheaded, "and the others write that he was hanged. Further, "Meurſius calls this relation of the Duke of Alva, "who was capitally puniſhed, Paciotty, though all "the other call him Pacheco: but Meurſius miſtakes "this Pacheco for Francis Paciotty of Urbino, Count "de Montefabro, who did ſo excel in the art of "fortifications, and in all warlike engines (2), that "having built the citadel of Antwerp, one of the "five baſtions of it was called by his name, at the "Duke of Alva's command, that the name of that "great man might be preſerved for ever. The other "four Baſtions were called, the Duke, Ferdinand, "Toledo, and Alva, after that Duke's different "names; and none of them were called by the name "of his maſter King Philip. Laſtly, to return to "this Pacheco, Emmanuel van Meteren, notwithſtanding he is a very accurate hiſtorian, calls him "Peter Pacheco, though Famiano Strada, who was "better informed, calls him Alvarez." To ſpeak accurately, one cannot place Grotius amongſt the hiſtorians, who aſſert that Pacheco was hanged. Secuti Hollandiæ oppidum, ſays he (3), Fliſſingani quos ſurgentis arcis aſpectus & præſidium adventans commoverat; Pacieco Allobroge, operum Albanicorum peritiſſimo curatore ad ſupplicium rapto, in cauſam deſcendunt, i. e. "Thoſe of Fluſhing, followed the example of that "city of Holland *, for being exaſperated at the "ſight of the fort that was building, and at the news "of the ſupply that was coming, they declared for "the common cauſe, having firſt put Pacieco to "death, who was come from Savoy, and who was "one of the Duke of Alva's beſt Engineers." Did not Grotius call Pacieco Allobrox (a man come from Savoy) becauſe he read that the Duke of Alva had obtained him from the Duke of Savoy? Impetraverat à Duce Sabaudiæ Franciſcum Paciottum Urbinatem, Montisfabri Comitem arcium bellicarumque machinarum peritiſſimum (4), i. e. "He obtained from the Duke "of Savoy Paciotti of Urbino, Count of Montefabro, "a man who excelled in the art of fortifications, and "in all warlike engines." Thuanus affords us a new variation; for he aſſerts that Peter Paciottus was killed in an inſurrection, and that his head was put on the top of a pole, and afterwards fixed on the walls of the city (5). Who knows but he imagined it was the ſame Engineer, whom he called Paciottus Allobrox (6), when he mentioned the citadel of Antwerp? He tells us that this Paciotus had built lately the citadel of Turin, under the direction of the Duke Emmanuel Philibert. It is perhaps from hence Grotius took the epithet of Allobrox, which does not belong to that famous Engineer; for he was of Urbino. One of Strada's brethren calls the perſon who built the citadel of Antwerp Iſidorus Paciottus (7), and obſerves that he left two ſons, who were excellent Engineers; the one, named Vido Ubaldus, was killed at the taking of Calais, in the year 1596: the other, named Frederic, was at Amiens the next year, when the French re-took that city (8).

(1) Du Maurier, Memoires, p. 48.

(2) Du Maurier has extracted this from Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 7.

(3) Annal. lib. 2. p. 50. edit. in 12mo. ann. 1658.

* Namely of Briel.

(4) Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 7.

(5) Petro Pacioto, quem Albanus arci exſtruendæ præfecerat, in tumultu occiſo, cujus caput conto præfixum & pro mœnibus ſtatutum eſt. Thuanus, lib. 54.

(6) Thuanus, lib. 41.

(7) Angelus Galluccius, de Bello Belg. part 1, lib. 8. Thuanus, lib. 116. p. 747. calls him Iſidorus.

(8) Galluc. ibid. lib. 9.

PADILLA (MARY DE), Miſtreſs to Peter the cruel King of Caſtile, was educated in Alfonſus of Albuquerque's family, and was there when the King of Caſtile fell in love with her during his expedition of Aſturias. One of the King's brothers had taken up arms againſt him in that country; as that rebellion, which was ſupported by another brother in Arragon, might have been attended with dangerous conſequences, the Court judged it proper to put an immediate ſtop to it: The King marched in perſon with an army towards Aſturias (a). Don Alfonſus of Albuquerque's wife was of that journey. Mary de Padilla, one of the maidens who waited upon her, went with her, and by her beauty made a deep impreſſion of that Monarch's ſavage heart. She did not ſuffer him to languiſh long; for they lay together during that journey (b). John de Hiniſtroſa, the Lady's uncle by the mother's ſide, had been their mediator and confident (c). This happened in the year 1352. The Prince was already betrothed to Blanche of Bourbon, daughter of Peter I. of that name Duke of Bourbon (d), and ſiſter to the King of France's daughter-in-law (e). But though his bride was as beautiful as his miſtreſs, and of an infinitely more illuſtrious family [A], he had not the leaſt impatience to conſummate his marriage, and took it ill that Albuquerque ſhould preſs him upon that article (f); Albuquerque, I ſay, who feared leſt Padilla's relations ſhould riſe to the higheſt degree in the King's favour. At laſt the nuptials were celebrated in the beginning of June 1353, without any pomp (g). It was then ſome time ſince the miſtreſs had been delivered of a daughter (h). The King ſoon conceived a great diſguſt for his Conſort; for even the third day after his nuptials he reſolved to go after his miſtreſs, whom he had left in a Citadel on the banks of the Tagus. The Queen his mother, and Princeſs Eleanor his aunt, having notice of his deſign, entreated him earneſtly not to behave himſelf thus, and repreſented to him the bad conſequences ſuch a conduct might be attended with [B]. Their prayers and their arguments proved ineffectual; he only denied he had ſuch a deſign, and immediately ſet out ſecretly. Several Courtiers followed him, being determined to humour him in his paſſion. However, there were ſome who endeavoured ſeriouſly to perſuade him to return to his wife: they prevailed upon him: but as ſoon as he had paſt two days with her, the power of his paſſion carried him back again to his Concubine (i). Some thought there was witchcraft in the caſe; others imagined that he ſuſpected his wife of adultery [C], and that this was the reaſon why he could not bear her. He added daily ſome new affront to the ill uſage he gave her, and at laſt he came to that exceſs as to have her poiſoned in the year 1361 (k). All the world lamented the fate of that Princeſs, who was thus ſnatched away at the age of (a) Mariana, ubi infra.

(b) Eo in itinere Regis animus Mariæ Padilliæ, quæ in Albuquerquii familia educabatur, eximia pulchritudine captus, cum ea ad S. Facundi oppidum ſtupri conſuetudinem habere cæpit, ſponſæ immemor, novisque amoribus amens. Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. 16. p. m. 80. ad ann. 1352.

(c) Internuncius, pravæque conſuetudinis conciliator. Mariana, lib. 16. cap. 17. p. 80.

(d) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Geneal. p. 260.

(e) She had married King John's ſon, who was afterwards Charles V.

(f) Mariana, ib. cap. 17. p. 81.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Idem, ibid. p. 80.

(i) Mariana, lib. 16. cap. 18.

(k) Idem, ibid. lib. 17. cap. 4.

[A] Though his bride was as beautiful . . . and of a more illuſtrious family.] Here follow Mariana's words: Vix Caſtellæ Rex nuptiarum celebritate peracta, novam nuptam faſtidivit, in Padillæ amorem effuſus, ſi regiæ ſtirpi compararetur, ignobilis, neque majori formæ pulchritudine. Tanti plerumque eſt præpoſteræ animum libidini mancipari (1). He obſerves in another place, that ſhe was very beautiful, and very virtuous and modeſt (2), and that the King's Embaſſadors choſe her amongſt ſix daughters of the Duke of Bourbon, as the moſt worthy to be his wife: E ſex quas habebat, eam expetituri quam regio toro idoneam fore maximè judicarent, Blanca concedente patre delecta (3). Obſerve, that this Duke of Bourbon had ſeven daughters: but as the eldeſt was already married (4), Mariana is not to blame for mentioning but ſix: nor ought we to cavil at him, becauſe all the other ſiſters of Blanch were not marriageable (5): for this reaſon would not have prevented the Embaſſadors from chuſing one of the youngeſt before all the reſt, had they thought her more handſome and beautiful.

(1) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. 16. cap. 18. init. p. m. 81.

(2) Lectiſſima forma, ſanctiſſimis moribus, prudentiaque. Idem, ib. lib. 17. cap. 4. p. 100.

(3) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. 16. cap. 17. p. 79.

(4) She was married in the year 1337 with Charles of France, afterwards King Charles V. See Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Geneal. p. 260.

(5) Mariana, lib. 17. cap 4. obſerves that Blanche was poiſoned in the year 1361, at the age of 25. She was therefore but 16, when the Embaſſadors of Don Pedro King of Caſtile choſe her in the year 1352, whence it follows, that ſome of her younger ſiſters were not yet marriageable at that time.

(6) Mariana, lib. 17. cap. 18. p. 81.

[B] His mother, and . . . his aunt . . . repreſented to him the bad conſequences of ſuch a conduct.] They told him that he run the danger of loſing, not only his reputation, but even all his dominions; that the French would declare war againſt him, to revenge the injury done to his conſort; that this would give the Caſtilians an opportunity to revolt; and that men do not ſcruple to attack thoſe, whom they imagine heaven forſakes, becauſe of the crimes they have commited. This is but a faint repreſentation of Mariana's thoughts; let us therefore tranſcribe his own expreſſions. Regina mater, Eleonora amita, regis conſilio indicato, eum remotis arbitris per omnia numina & quidquid in terris ſanctum eſt, ne ſe, regnum, fortunas, nominis exiſtimationem præcipiti temeritate perditum eat, profuſis lacrimis obteſtantur. Quid orbi ſermonem, Gallis arma injuriam non laturis, civibus diſſidiorum materiam daret? Ignorare videlicet integra probitatis fama humana imperia conſtare, quos deſtitui à numine, quibus infenſum cælum eſſe, ſemel fuerit perſuaſum, in eos homines mala omnia quaſi facto agmine impetum dare (6).

[C] Some thought there was witchcraft in the caſe, others imagined that he ſuſpected his wife of adultery.] It was ſpread abroad, that Don Pedro had been bewitched, and that a girdle enchanted by the magical arts of a Jew appeared to that Prince under the figure of a dragon. Non amplius biduo apud eam (Blancam) ſubſtitit, tanto impudici amoris impatientia væſaniaque ut injectam carminibus amentiam fama vulgaverit: zona Judæi cujuſdam arte medicata draconis ſpecie regiis oculis objecta (7). Some ſuſpected that the King did not conceive an averſion for his wife, without a juſt cauſe; ſince ſhe had ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by Frederic, Don Pedro's brother, by whom ſhe got a ſon, who became the ſtock of the family of the Henriques. Mariana explodes theſe two opinions, and looks upon the ſecond as a moſt raſh and impudent aſſertion (8). Neutrum nobis veriſimile viſum eſt; ac credam potius ubi tetri amoris flamma pectori inſederit, non alia philtra amatoria quærenda, neque alias offenſionis cauſſas præpoſtere excogitandas, ut juvenis animus in furorem agi & de poteſtate mentis exiiſſe videretur (9). He is in the right to obſerve that this Prince's love for Padilla was ſufficient to turn his brains, and ſo inſpired him with hatred for his Conſort, without having recourſe to love potions, or to any other fictitious cauſe. Such a diſorder as his love for Padilla was a fruitful ſpring, from which a thouſand other irregularities could ariſe. I wonder Mariana forgot to mention what has been obſerved concerning that girdle. The King abuſed Blanche a thouſand ways, at the inſtigation of a Lady he kept, whoſe name was Padilla. She made him believe that the Queen, out of ſpite againſt her, had cauſed a Jew, who was a Magician, to make a girdle adorned with gold buttons, but ſo enchanted, that as ſoon as he ſhould have it about his waiſte, he ſhould loſe all his ſtrength and his underſtanding: that falling thus into his wife's power ſhe might for the future govern him, and the whole kingdom after her own fancy (13). The author of the hiſtory of the Favorites (11, or miſtreſſes of Princes, has taken great liberties in paraphraſing that fine ſtory. He aſſerts, that the next day after the nuptials, the Queen gave the King a girdle ſet with jewels of a great price, and of a curious workmanſhip (12), that Mary de Padilla knowing from whom Don Pedro had it, aſked for it in order to have another made after that model; that to ſecure herſelf againſt the King's inconſtancy, ſhe practiſed upon a Jew, who was a notorious magician, and who by his black and abominable art committed crimes as horrid as his own ſoul. To this ſcholar of the devil's, continues that Author, ſhe committed Don Pedro's girdle, who ſo bewitched it, that when the King would put it on, he imagined he was

(7) Mariana, lib. 16. cap. 18. p. 82.

(8) Quibuſdam ſuſpicio fuit temeraria ſane & impudens regem non ſine cauſſa à Blanca uxore repente alienatum: vitiumque illi à Friderico fratre illatum. Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Paul. Emilius, Lib. 9. in the Life of Charles V. p. m. 548. of John Regnart's French tranſlation.

(11) Printed at Amſterdam 1697.

(12) Hiſtoire des Favorites, p. 8.

of twenty five years (l). The Miſtreſs died ſoon after at Seville (m), and was buried in a Monaſtery which ſhe had built (n). Her obſequies were celebrated throughout the whole Kingdom, as though ſhe had been a lawful Queen, and her children were educated as heirs apparent to the Crown (o) [D]. She had enjoyed a full power during her favour [E]. Her brother Diego de Padilla was promoted to the poſt of Lord Chamberlain in the year 1353, and the next year to the dignity of Grand Maſter of the Order of the Calatrava (p). John de Padilla, another of her brothers, was made Grand Maſter of the Order of San Jago in the year 1354, in the room of Don Frederic the King's brother (q). His marriage did not prevent his being promoted to that maſterſhip, though there was no inſtance of its having ever been given to a married man. However, let us not imagine, that Padilla enjoyed the King's favour without the leaſt mixture of grief; let us remember that in the year 1357 another Miſtreſs appeared more lovely than ſhe in the eyes of Don Pedro the cruel. That Prince conceived ſuch a paſſion for Alfonſa Coronella (r), that he quite forgot our Mary de Padilla (s). It is eaſy to imagine what a grief this was for the firſt Miſtreſs. What ſhall one ſay of the uneaſineſs ſhe muſt have been under whilſt Don Pedro was ſo deeply in love with a beautiful widow, that he made her believe he was a ſingle man, and could marry her: and indeed he married her [F], and if he forſook her ſoon after, it was not without having filled the heart of his Concubine with the greateſt uneaſineſs. I do not refer my reader to the hiſtory of the Favourites (t) printed in the year 1697, for the account which is given there of our Padilla is adulterated with a thouſand romantick ſtories. It is not in ſuch works we ought to look for truth, but in ſuch Authors as Mariana. Obſerve that he owns, Padilla wanted nothing but chaſtity to deſerve a Crown. Fœminæ, ſays he (u), præter injuriam pellicatus magnis animi et corporis dotibus, dignæque imperio, i. e. "A woman, who excepting the diſgrace of her proſtitution, was "adorned with all the good qualities of body and mind, and deſerved to be a Queen."

(l) Idem, ibid.

(m) Idem, ibid. cap. 5.

(n) In Studilli Monaſterio. Idem, ibid.

(o) Idem, ibid.

(p) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 18.

(q) Idem, ibid. cap. 20. p. 86.

(r) Mariana, lib. 17. cap. 1. p. 94.

(s) In ea Urbe (Hiſpali) Alfonſæ Coroneliæ amoribus ita indulſit ut præ illa Padillia contemptui eſſet. Idem, ibid.

(t) At Amſterdam, for Paul Marret.

(u) Mariana, lib. 17. cap. 5. p. 101.

girt about and ſtung by a ſerpent, which made him ſhriek in the moſt frighful manner. There was no occaſion for ſuch wicked artifices to ruin a Queen, who was already ſo unfortunate. Mary de Padilla and all her creatures told the King, that this preſent of his wife was a deadly favour, which ſhe had not poiſoned in one day only. This diſcourſe, and the dreadful effect of the girdle, encreaſed his averſion for the Queen to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to avoid her company for ever (13). I would not have tranſcribed ſo long a paſſage from the hiſtory of the Favourites, had I not known that the ſame ſtory is related in a mere hiſtory, I mean in a work, the author of which does only tranſcribe the hiſtorians, without pretending to adorn their account with the flouriſhes of his imagination. Read the following paſſage. "Diego de Valera writes, that among "ſeveral jewels, which Queen Blanche had brought "with her from France, there was a rich girdle, of "which ſhe made her huſband a preſent, and that "Mary de Padilla having got it into her own hands, "ſent for a Jew, who being a magician, enchanted it "ſo, that when the King would put it on, he imagined "he had an adder about his waſte, and that having "complained of it to his favourites, moſt of whom "were Mary de Padilla's relations, they made him "believe it was a pernicious preſent from the Queen, "which encreaſed his averſion for her, and raiſed "his contempt to the higheſt degree (14)."

(13) Ibid. p. 9.

(14) Hiſt. Genealogique d'Eſpagne, par Made.  Tom. 2. p. 272, 273, of the Rotterdam edit. 1694.

[D] Her children were educated as heirs apparent to the crown.] This is what Mariana relates. Filii regio cultu et in ſpem paterni regni educati (15). She had, I think, but one ſon and three daughters. The ſon was called Alfonſus, and was born at Tordeſilla, in the year 1359. The King extremely rejoyced at his birth, but his joy was ſoon changed into grief, for the child did not live long. Garſias of Toledo, grand maſter of the Order of San Jago, was to have educated that ſon (16). Beatrix, the eldeſt of the children, was born at Corduba in the year 1353 (17). Conſtance the ſecond daughter was born the next year, and married the Duke of Lancaſter, the King of England's ſon (18). The third daughter was named Iſabella, and was born at Tordeſilla in the year 1355 (19).

(15) Mariana, lib. 17. cap. 5.

(16) Idem, ibid. cap. 3.

(17) Idem, ibid. lib. 16. cap. 17.

(18) Idem, ibid. cap. 18. p. 84.

(19) Idem, ibid. cap. 21. p. 90.

[E] She had enjoyed a full power during her favour.] Her brothers and her relations were raiſed to high dignities, and had very great credit at Court (20). Nothing was done in the whole Kingdom but according to their ſchemes. The Grandees, and even the King's own brothers, endeavoured to inſinuate themſelves into the Miſtreſs's favour, and for that purpoſe they ſpared neither preſents nor humble addreſſes. Omnino ſe Rex & rempublicam Mariæ propinquis gubernandum tradiderat: eorum arbitratu belli & pacis conſilia gerebantur: proceres ipſique Regis fratres tempori ſervire, atque ad fortunæ motum ſe movere: ad Mariæ gratiam donis, officiis, aſſentatione aditum certatim captare (21). In this woman's behalf the moſt antient cuſtoms were broken through and trod under foot, even when they were nearly connected with the principles of Religion. Was it not for her ſake that the poſt of Grand Maſter of the Order of San Jago was made conſiſtent with a married life (22)? This was indeed a great diſorder, and could not but give offence to the people, and create a great diſcontent amongſt them. They who read ſuch particulars are leſs offended at them, than moſt of thoſe who are eye-witneſſes to them. But take notice, that I make an oppoſition here between thoſe who read much, and thoſe who read almoſt nothing. The latter imagine that the corruption of their times is ſomething extraordinary: and it is this, that makes them murmur moſt: whereas the former, who know from hiſtory that the diſorders of their time are more or leſs common to all ages and nations; the latter, I ſay, are patient, they are uſed to ſuch diſorders, and hardened againſt all ſubjects of offence. The Government of the Concubines of Princes does not raiſe their indignation, becauſe they know many inſtances of it. But they, who do not uſe to read much, are terribly offended, when they ſee that a proſtitute miſtreſs becomes the idol of the Courtiers, becauſe ſhe is the diſpoſer of all favours. See the article of Diana of POITIERS (23).

(20) See Mariana, lib. 16. cap. 18.

(21) Idem, ibid. p. 82, 83.

(22) Joannem Padillum Villageræ regulum in Friderici locum D. Jacobi Magiſtrum ſubſtituendum curavit, & quidem conjugem, contra ſuperioris temporis exempla. Novum exemplum legibus moribuſque validius fuit: ab eo quoque initium ſuſceptum at conjuges iidem & Magiſtri eſſent. Mariæ ingratiam, quæ novi magiſtri ſoror erat, majorum inſtituta violata. Mariana, lib. 16. cap. 20. p. 86.

(23) In the remark [N].

[F] Don Pedro was ſo deeply in love with a beautiful widow, that . . . . he married her.] Her name was Joan de Caſtro; ſhe had been married with Don Diego de Haro (24). Her beauty and her chaſtity were uncommon (25). The King fell in love with her, and as he had no hopes to gratify his paſſion but under the title of an huſband, he pretended he was not married, and alledged ſeveral proofs of the reluctancy with which he had married Blanche of Bourbon. Two Biſhops were conſulted, and declared that marriage void. After which ſentence Don Pedro made haſte to marry the widow; he was ſoon tired of his new wife; and continued but a few days with her: ſome even ſay that he left her the very next day after the nuptials (26). And yet ſhe proved with child, and had a ſon, who was her comfort, but who met with a very unſettled fate. Copia faſtidium ut antea faciente, paucis apud novam nuptam diebus moratus, ſunt qui una tantum nocte dicant. . . . . Joannes filius ex iis nuptiis procreatus eſt, matri ſolamen, fortunæ ludibrium futurus (27).

(24) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. 16. cap. 18.

(25) Viduæ cui forma comparari nulla poterat, inſigni pudicitiæ laude viduitatis incommoda ſuſtentabat. Idem, ibid.

(26) Idem, ibid.

(27) Idem, ibid.

PADILLA (JOHN DE) one of the ringleaders of the ſedition which aroſe in Caſtile in the year 1520. His wife is ſaid to have engaged him in that rebellion, in which ſhe had engaged herſelf, becauſe in a dream ſhe had ſeen him raiſed to the dignity of Grand Maſter of San Jago [A]: it is added that ſhe had a maid ſervant, who pretended to witchcraft [B], and foretold her that ſhe ſhould be raiſed to great honours. However it be, there was no Lord in that confederacy, who ſhewed more zeal than his Lady, to deprive Charles V. of the Crown [C]. She plundered the Churches, that ſhe might have money enough to keep up the Rebellion: but ſhe committed that ſacrilege very devoutly [D]. The

[A] His wife is ſaid to have engaged him in that rebellion, . . . becauſe in a dream ſhe had ſeen him raiſed to the dignity of Grand-maſter of San-Jago.] Let us ſee what Anthony de Guevara wrote to her. I know very well that the firſt aſſembly met at your houſe, where that fire was kindled, which you have always blowed and kept in ever ſince. Wherefore I have often enquired, what might be your reaſon for thus diſturbing the whole Kingdom; to which I was anſwered by your relations and friends, that it was your dreaming and imagining, that you ſaw your huſband Grand-maſter of the Order of San-Jago: which if true, was a great folly in you, and no leſs an impertinence, for perhaps, inſtead of giving him that Commandry, or the Order, which is a Croſs, we ſhall lay another croſs upon him (1). Is it not a deplorable thing, that a woman's dream ſhould have been capable to occaſion ſo many diſorders, and ſuch ſacking and plundering throughout an whole Kingdom? The firſt who began that great rebellion, was Don Ferdinand d'Avalos: he gain'd the Lady we ſpeak of; ſhe engaged her huſband, who having prevailed upon Don Pedro Giron to join with them, carried things to ſuch a height, that men talked already of erecting every conſiderable city in Caſtile, into a particular Commonwealth (2). Ferdinand d'Avalos was the firſt Author of the rebellion; and I am well informed that it was promoted at your houſe; ſo that he piled up the wood, but you ſet fire to it (3). This civil war was therefore one of thoſe which have but trifling cauſes.

(1) Epiſtres dorées, Liv. 1. p. m. 186. That letter is dated March the 10th, 1522. The ſame thing is to be met with in a letter of the 3d book, p. m. 21. dated January the 15th 1522.

(2) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. 1. p. 173. He has extracted this from Guevara's letter, p. m. 172. Liv. 1.

(3) Guevara, Liv. 3. p. 21.

[B] . . . that ſhe had a maid, who pretended to witchcraft.] This is what Guevara charges her with (4). We have been told in theſe quarters, that you have a ſlave who is a great witch, and who told you for certain, that you would ſoon be a Queen, and your huſband a King; that you would ſucceed to Don Charles and Donna Iſabella, King and Queen of Spain. If it be ſo, that you really give credit to ſuch idle fancies, which I cannot believe, beware of the Devil, and of his artifices and cunning devices. In another letter he ſpeaks to her thus (5). It is ſaid further, that you have a white ſlave, or a mad ſlave, who is a great witch; and that ſhe told you for certain, that within a little time people would call you your Excellency, like a Princeſs, and that your huſband would be ſtiled his Highneſs. So that you pretend to ſucceed our Sovereign Lady the Queen, and your huſband hopes to be raiſed to Charles the Fifth's dignity.

(4) Ibid. Liv. 1. p. 187.

(5) Ibid. Liv. 3. p. 28.

[C] None . . . . ſhewed more zeal than that Lady, to deprive Charles V. of the crown.] This is ſaying a great deal; for Don Antonio de Acugna, Biſhop of Zamora, was ſo ardent in that rebellion, that at the age of threeſcore and ten, he acted as the youngeſt and moſt reſolute Brigadier in the army could have done. Don Antonio de Guevara wrote him a letter, of which the Reader will not be diſpleaſed to find ſome extracts here. To make ſoldiers turn prieſts, ſays he (6), is a thing that may be ſuffered; but to make prieſts turn ſoldiers, is a moſt ſcandalous action, which I ſhall not ſay you ſuffered, my Lord, but you committed yourſelf; ſince you took with you above three hundred prieſts from Zamora, to fight at Tordaſillas: and like a good Prelate you led them thither in Lent, to begin that war at a time when they ſhould have been employed in hearing people's confeſſions. In the attack which the Knights and Governors of the Kingdom made againſt your party, I ſaw with my own eyes a prieſt, who being hid behind a battlement, ſhot eleven of our men dead on the ſpot with an Arquebuſs; but the cream of the ſtory is, that whilſt he was levelling his piece at them, he croſſed and bleſſed them with the barrel, and then diſpatched them with the bullet. I ſaw alſo, that before the battle was finiſhed, this honeſt prieſt was ſhot through the head, ſo that his death was ſo ſudden, that he had not time to confeſs his ſins, much leſs to croſs himſelf . . . (7). I have often ſeen you with an halberd on your ſhoulder, but never with a book in your hand, nor with a ſtole about your neck: but I muſt not forget to obſerve, that you uſed to ſay to the ſoldiers, who were ſtorming the fort of Ampudia, and tumbled down, Courage, my friends, courage, up, up again, mount, mount, fight bravely, like ſtout fellows; if you dye in the engagement, let my ſoul be lodged with yours, ſince your cauſe is ſo juſt, and your undertaking ſo holy. Now, you know very well, my Lord Biſhop, that the ſoldiers who died there, were excommunicated by the Pope, traitors to the King, diſturbers of the Kingdom, guilty of ſacrilege, robbers, enemies to the Commonwealth, and the abettors of rebellion. Whence it is plain that the Biſhop, who held ſuch diſcourſes, had not a very tender conſcience, and was not much concerned for the loſs of his ſoul, ſince he choſe to dye like a ſoldier; nor do I wonder that a man ſhould chuſe to dye like a deſperate ſoldier, who had not the leaſt value for his character. The Lady Mary de Padilla (8) muſt have been prodigiouſly paſſionate in this cauſe, if her fury came up to that of this Prelate. There were ſome other women who joined with this faction, and who were the moſt eager in it, ſays Brantomè (9), as we have alſo ſeen in our civil wars of the League; nor can one give any reaſon for it, unleſs it be that they were deceived by the ſermons and perſuaſions of ſome preachers and ſeducers. Mind theſe laſt words, and obſerve that the Biſhop of Zamora was at laſt taken and ſtrangled (10).

(6) Ibid. Liv. 1. p. 170.

(7) Ibid. p. 171.

(8) Thus Guevara calls her. Others name her Donna Maria Pedrecco, as we learn from Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. 1. p. 174. Guevara called her probably after her husband's name. Count de la Roca, Hiſt. de Charles-Quint, p. 55. calls her Mary Pacheco, and to that name we ought to keep.

(9) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. 1. p. 174.

(10) Count de la Roca, Hiſt. de Charles-Quint, p. 56.

[D] . . . ſhe committed that ſacrilege very devoutly.] Let us ſee how Brantome relates this. "There is "ſuch another, and even a more pleaſant ſtory told "of Donna Maria de Padilla, one of the genteeleſt "Ladies in Spain, and who was very zealouſly affect-"ed for the rebellion which aroſe in Spain in the "beginning of the Emperor Charles's reign, as Don "Anthony Guevara relates. That Lady wanting mo-"ney to pay her ſoldiers, took all the gold and ſil-"ver of the relicks at Toledo: but ſhe did it with "a holy and pleaſant ceremony: ſhe entered the "church on her knees, her hands joined, covered "with a black veil, or rather, with a wet ſack, as "Rabelais calls it, grieving, whining, beating her "breaſt, ſighing, and crying, having two large "lighted torches before her: after ſhe had cleverly "finiſhed her plunder, ſhe went back with the ſame "ceremony, thinking, and firmly believing, that "this ſad ceremony, or rather hypocriſy, would "ſcreen her againſt God's anger and reſentment. "It would make a man laugh heartily, to ſee the "ſame ſcene acted over again. But the cream of "the jeſt is, (as the ſtory goes) that whereas rob-"bers, when they ſteal any thing, do it with great "joy and cheerfulneſs, and cry when they are pu-"niſhed; this Lady, on the contrary, cried whilſt "ſhe robbed, and if ſhe had been puniſhed, ſhe ought "conſequently to have laughed, contrary to what "is cuſtomary with other robbers (11)." It appears from the firſt words of this paſſage, that the Author had been ſpeaking of another ſtory of the ſame kind. Every curious Reader will be deſirous to know what that ſtory is; I ſhall therefore relate it here, in behalf of thoſe who may not have an opportunity to conſult Brantome immediately. Anthony de Leve being at the ſiege of Pavia, and wanting money to ſatisfy and pay his ſoldiers, the Lanſquenets having already mutinied, he bethought himſelf of an artifice, which the Hiſtorians mention, though I do not relate it yet; but what was moſt comical is, (as the Spaniards relate) que tomò toda la plata conſagrada de los Templos, prometiendo todas vezes con voto ſolemne à los ſantos, que ſi quedava vencedor, coſas harto majores que las que tomava, de hizo batir dinero groſamente. That is to ſay, he took the conſecrated plate from the churches, promiſing, however, with a ſolemn vow to the ſaints, that he would give more conſiderable things than thoſe he took, if he ſhould return conqueror: and then he cauſed

(11) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. 1. p. 127, 128. He extracted this from a letter which Don Antonio de Guevara wrote to that Lady. It is in the firſt book of that Author's Epiſtres Dorées, p. 184 of the French tranſlation, printed at Antwerp, in the year 1591.

The behaviour of a Curate towards Padilla deſerves to be related [E]. This man's Rebellion and his wife's got more ground at Toledo than any where elſe (a). They were both of a very illuſtrious family. The huſband had but very little merit: nor was the wife a very deſerving woman, though ſhe valued herſelf very highly; for ſhe was extremely proud and arrogant (b). Padilla was routed near Villalar *, and fell into the Conqueror's hands. He was beheaded two days after (c). His wife made her eſcape into Portugal (d). Her maiden name was Mary Pacheco; ſhe was Tendillos de Mendoza's daughter, if we may believe Paul Jovius, who obſerves alſo that ſhe was learned (e).

(a) Count de la Roca, Hiſt. de Charles-Quint, p. m. 40.

(b) Idem.

* It ſhould be perhaps Villa-Real.

(c) Count de la Roca, Hiſt. de Charles-Quint, p. 54.

(d) Ibid. p. 56.

(e) Quum Maria Paceca Tendilii Mendocii filia eruditi ingenii & virilis animi mulier Padillæ conjugis vexillum ne concitatæ multitudini deeſſet dux gerendo bello ſuſtuliſſet. Paul. Jovius, Hiſt. lib. 19. folio m. 7 verſo.

that plate to be rudely coined. But he practiſed ſoon after that proverb, paſſato il pericolo, gabbato il ſanto, when the danger was over, the Saint is laughed at; for he never reſtored a peny of it. A fine pay-maſter indeed! It was ſtill ſaid in my younger days at Pavia, that he left it to the Emperor to pay the debt and to accompliſh the vow, ſince it was for his ſervice the plate had been borrowed, and the vow made (12).

(12) Brantome, ibid. p. 126.

[E] The behaviour of a Curate towards Padilla deſerves to be related.] Let us again tranſcribe Brantome's words. "A Curate of Mediana . . . had ſo great an "affection for Don Juan de Padilla, one of the ring-"leaders of the rebellion, that he never failed every "Sunday after ſermon to ſay a Pater-noſter, and an "Ave-Mary for him, and for the holy ſedition, for "which he was very zealous: he continued theſe "prayers a whole month, after which it happened "that Padilla's troops paſſed through the Curate's "village; they devoured all his poultry and his ba-"con, drank his wine, and what was worſe, took "away with them his chamber-maid. The next "Sunday he made his complaint in his ſermon, re-"lated what damage they had done him, and parti-"cularly their carrying off his maid Katy, whom "he named by her own name; he warned the peo-"ple not to follow any longer Padilla's party, but "the King's; ſending Padilla and all his followers "to the Devil, and entreating his audience to cry, "long live the King, and down with Padilla, which "was done accordingly, all the reſt being ſent to "ten thouſand Devils. We have been witneſſes to "many ſuch ſtories, during our wars with the "Leaguers, when the reſentment and ſpite of thoſe "who had been plundered, made them curſe that "holy League and ſacred confederacy like the de-"vil (13)." That the Reader may judge whether or not Brantome took too much liberty, either when he abridged or enlarged the accounts he tranſcribed, I ſhall ſet down here Guevara's account word for word, according to the tranſlation of Guttery the Phyſician. "A Curate of Biſcay, "half mad, had ſo great an affection for John de "Padilla, that every Sunday in his ſermon, he uſed "to ſpeak thus: Brethren, I charge you to ſay a "Pater-noſter, and an Ave-Mary, for the holy ſediti-"on, and popular inſurrection, that it may never "ceaſe: I deſire you to ſay another Pater-noſter for "his Majeſty King John de Padilla, that God may "proſper him, and another for the Queen his Con-"ſort: for to be plain with you, theſe are our true "and lawful Kings: all the others, who have reign-"ed till this time, have been Tyrants. Theſe "prayers continued very near three weeks; after "which John de Padilla happened to paſs through "that village with his troops: and as the ſoldiers, "who were lodged at the Curate's houſe, took a-"way his chamber-maid, drank his wine, and eat "all his poultry and all his bacon, he told his flock "the next Sunday, You know, brethren, how laſt "week John de Padilla paſt through this place; "and I imagine you are not ignorant how the ſol-"diers, who lodged at my houſe, left me not one "ſingle hen, eat all my bacon, and drank my four "half hogſheads of wine: but above all, theſe wick-"ed creatures took from me, as you know, my "poor Katy. I tell you this, my friends, that for "the future you may not pray for him any more, "but for the King Don Charles, and for the Queen, "Lady Jane his mother, who are our lawful Sove-"reigns (14)."

(13) Brantome, Capitaines Etrangers, Tom. 1. p. 175. He borrowed this from Guevara's Epiſtres Dorées, Liv. 1. p. m. 173.

(14) Guevara, Epiſtres Dorées, Liv. 1. p. 173.

PADILLA (LOUISA), Counteſs of Aranda, in the 17th Century, was extremely commended by the Spaniards, as will appear from a paſſage of Don Juan de Laſtanoſa, which I ſhall tranſcribe [A].

[A] In a paſſage . . . which I ſhall tranſcribe.] "I "have heard of two kinds of Readers complain of "Balthazar Gratiano's works. Some find fault with "the ſubject, others with the ſtile. The former, "becauſe they have a very great eſteem for his "works; and the latter, becauſe they wiſhed his "writings were of a little more uſe to them. The "former, amongſt whom is this Phœnix of our age, "the learned Counteſs of Aranda *, whoſe name is "wrote down for poſterity by ſix immortal pens, "takes it ill, that ſuch ſublime ſubjects, which are "proper only for hero's, ſhould be made common by "being printed; ſo that the meaneſt citizen may "have for a crown, things, which by reaſon of their "excellency, cannot be well in ſuch hands (1)." This complaint calls to my mind, thoſe who found fault with Monſieur Du Pin, for publiſhing in our language (French) a new Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Authors. See the laſt page of his preface, and the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (2).

(1) Juan de Laſtanoſa, preface to Gracian's treatiſe, entitled the Diſcreet. See Monſieur Amelot de la Houſſaie's preface to the Homme de Cour, or the Courtier.

* Donna Luiſa de Padilla.

(2) For June 1686, article 4. p. 658.

PAGEAU (N.) one of the moſt illuſtrious Advocates of Paris, died in July 1683, being ſtill pretty young (a). His Elogy, extracted from a manuſcript, intitled, Portraits des Avocats, i. e. The Characters of the Advocates, is inſerted in the Mercure Galant (b), and in a work of Father Bouhours (c).

(a) Mercure Galant, for July 1683, p. 128.

(b) Ibid. p. 128, &c.

(c) Intitled, Maniere de bien penſer dans les Ouvrages d'Eſprit, p. 395, &c. of the Dutch edit.

PALEARIUS (AONIUS), a man of the greateſt probity, and one of the good writers of the 16th Century, was born in Veroli (a), an Epiſcopal City in Campagna di Roma [A]. He acquired great knowledge in the Latin and Greek languages, and was not only well ſkilled in polite Literature, but alſo in ſound Philoſophy and Divinity; and, to improve himſelf ſtill more, he viſited the greateſt part of Italy, ſtudying under the ableſt authors he could meet with in that country. He ſpent ſix whole years in Rome, before the city was taken by the army of Charles V. and returned to it ſeveral times after it

(a) Hence he is named Verulanus.

[A] An Epiſcopal City in Campagna di Roma.] I do not underſtand theſe words of the Preface, which I ſhall cite hereunder: Natus eſt Aonius Verulis (oppidum id eſt Latii Epiſcopalis); and I conjecture that the perſon who writes in this manner, had a book before him, in which was writ urbs Latii Epiſcopalis; and that having put oppidum inſtead of urbs, he forgot to write epiſcopale inſtead of epiſcopalis.

[B] He

it had suffered that calamity (b). He gave a publick testimony of the progress he had made, by a noble Poem he wrote on the immortality of the Soul (c), and gained the esteem of the men of wit and learning of that time [B]. Retiring to Tuscany, he made choice of the city of Sienna for his fixed abode ; and being there appointed professor of polite Literature, he got a great number of pupils. He also married at thirty four years of age, when living in that city, a young gentlewoman for whom he had a passionate affection so long as he lived, and who brought him four children (d). The tranquillity he enjoyed was a little disturbed by the contests he had with one of his collegues, who was exasperated to see his reputation eclipsed by the splendor of that of Palearius : but Peter Aretin soon silenced that envious man [C]. But a much more dreadful storm broke out soon after. Anthony Bellantes, a Nobleman of Sienna, being impeached of several misdemeanours, was cleared by the excellent defence Palearius made for him. Some time after, he accused some Monks of robbing his Grandmother ; and again employed Palearius's eloquence to assert his right. The defendants making oath that they had not defrauded the old Lady in any manner, were acquitted by the Court ; but they harboured a strong resentment against their opponent's pleader, and had recourse to their usual artifices in order to ruin him ; and accordingly they aspersed him as an impious wretch, and represented him such in their Sermons. However, Palearius defended himself with so much strength and eloquence, that the accusation was laid aside. But at last he grew tired of the vexatious prosecutions to which he saw himself exposed, and therefore left Sienna and went and settled at Lucca [D], whence he remov'd some years after to Milan.

(b) Palear. Epist. 4. lib. 1. p. 406.

(c) See the remark [F].

(d) Two boys and two girls.

He

[B] He gained the esteem of the men of wit and learning of that time.] We are told the names in the Preface to the new edition of Aonius's works, of several persons who loved and esteemed him. Summo in honore fuit Palearius apud viros ætatis istius principes : Petrum Bembum, Jacobum Sadoletum, Franciscum Sfondratum, Ennium Philonardum, Ecclesiæ Romanæ Cardinales ; Janum Benedictum Lampridium, Marcum Antonium Flaminium, Andream Alciatum, i. e. " Palearius was greatly respected by the most emi- " nent men of that time ; such as Peter Bembus, " James Sadoletus, Francis Sfondratus, Ennius Phi- " lonardus, Cardinals : James Benedictus Lampri- " dius, Mark Anthony Flaminius, and Andrew Al- " ciatus." Those who are desirous of knowing the names of several others of his friends, need but cast their eye on the catalogue annexed to the last edition of his letters, where the names are given of those who wrote to him, and to whom he wrote. In the edition in question, after the Preface, we meet with an excellent character which several learned men have given him ; but since the following verses of Baptist Pigna are not inserted, I thought it would not be improper to cite them here :

Aoni decus Aonum sororum,
Quos mihi dedit aureos libellos
Riccius tuus, aureos libellos
Qui desiderium omnibus relinquunt
Quo magis relegunt magis legendi,
Intentis oculis libenter hausi.
Immortalem animam probas in ipsis.
Ipsi secula sempiterna, & esse
Immortalem operam tuam probabunt (1).

(1) Jo. Baptista Pigna, Carmin. lib. 3. p. m. 81.

The Sense is,

" Aonius, glory of the tuneful nine,
" The golden volumes which thy Riccius gave me,
" Attentively I've read : and those who once
" Peruse them, can but wish to oft repeat
" The pleasing task, and read them ten times over.
" Therein you prove the soul to be immortal.
" These books eternity will fully prove,
" And that themselves shall last to endless ages."

[C] Peter Aretin soon silenced that envious man.] If I mistake not, Aretin was prompted to this in order to revenge his own cause, or to gratify his own detracting humour, and not for the sake of revenging Palearius. Senis primum exagitari cœpit insanis contentionibus nescio cujus professoris, (ipse Machum Blateronem vocat) qui putabat tantum decedere de suo honore, quantum Aonii virtutibus & meritis dabatur. Quamquam hunc morionem ignobilem brevi compescuit mordax ingenium Petri Aretini, qui stolidum pecus omnium ludibriis sanniscque exposuit in fabula quadam vulgari idiomate conscripta, & Venetiis publico spectaculo exhibita (2), i. e. " He first began to be molested in " Sienna, by the stupid contention of I know not " what professor, whom he himself calls Machus the " babbler, who fancied that his fame and reputation " were diminished in proportion, as Aonius's virtue " and merit were applauded. However, this mean " wretch was presently silenced by Peter Aretin's " sharp pen ; this writer making the silly fellow in " question a laughing-stock to the whole work, in a " Play he wrote in Italian, and which was exhibited " publickly in Venice." Palearius makes great complaints of this enemy ; and represents him as a mere ignorant wretch, who was so little skilled in the Latin tongue, that he was utterly despised by the scholars in Sienna whom he taught it. At the time that Palearius wrote this, the person in question taught in Lucca ; and endeavoured to prevent his adversary from coming to that city, by his slanderous reports (3) ; but the reader will find by the following remark, that all his efforts proved abortive. Machus Blatero, is de quo hominibus nostris fabula data est ab Aretino, lepidè & festivè scripta, homo impudentissimus, & puræ veræque Latinitatis tàm ignarus, quàm ii qui trans Taurum incolunt : Senis quamdiu fuit, magnas mihi turbas fecit, veritus ne munus interpretationis scriptionum Latinarum mihi demandaretur : in qua cum ille infeliciter multos annos laborasset, apud eruditiores juvenes nihil aliud fuerat assequutus, quàm turpissimum infantiæ nomen : Is nunc Lucæ est : utinam tàm cognitus, quàm Venetiis, ubi & fabula acta est, & Machus ludibrio habitus (4), i. e. " Machus " the babbler, he on whom Aretin wrote a very " witty facetious Play, is a very impudent fellow, " and as ignorant of correct, just Latin, as those na- " tions who dwell beyond mount Taurus. He mo- " lested me very much during my abode in Sienna, " being afraid lest the professorship of the Latin " tongue should be bestowed on me : in which hav- " ing toiled unsuccessfully for many years, the only " thing he acquired among the more learned scho- " lars was, the most ignominious name of babe. He " now is in Lucca ; but would to God he were as " well known in that city as in Venice, where the " Comedy is exhibited, and Machus made a laugh- " ing-stock."

(2) Præfat. Operum Aonii Palearii, edit. 1696.

(3) Palearius, epist. 17. lib. 3. p. 500.

(4) Ibid. p. 499.

[D] He went and settled at Lucca.] He was invited hither by the Magistrates, in order to teach polite Literature ; and he did not accept of that employment from a love for teaching, but because he had not means sufficient to defray the expences of his family. Cum Lucenses homines honestissimi propositis præmiis invitarent me singulorum dierum unius horæ usurâ ad interpretandum, accepi conditionem duram mihi & asperam, & vero etiam odiosam (5), i. e. " " The very " worthy Magistrates of Lucca inviting me, with " the offer of a handsome gratuity, to teach an hour " every day ; I accepted the proposal, which indeed " was harsh, grievous, and even odious to me."

(5) Ibid. epist. 4. lib. 4. p. 509.

He had been invited thither by the Magiſtrates, who gave him ſeveral marks of their eſteem, by granting him (e) ſeveral privileges, and a conſiderable ſtipend. Unhappily for him, a Cardinal, who had been a Dominican, and a ſevere inquiſitor, was raiſed to the Papal Throne (f) after the death of Pius IV. He was deſirous of ſignalizing, by the execution of ſome famous Hereticks, the beginning of his pontificate; for which reaſon he ordered the re-hearing of Palearius's cauſe. Upon this, our learned man was ſeized at Milan, and carried to Rome, where it was not found a difficult matter to convict him of having ſpoke in favour of the Lutherans and againſt the inquiſition [E]. He was condemned to be burnt, and the ſentence accordingly was put in execution in the utmoſt rigour in 1566 (g) [F]. He wrote ſeveral pieces both in proſe and verſe. The beſt

(e) Anno 1559.

(f) Under the name of Pius V.

(g) Extracted from the preface to Palearius's works. Amſterdam edit. 1696.

His wife loved parade, his children were no enemies to oſtentation; whence he was obliged to turn preceptor, though againſt his inclination; fearing, at the ſame time, that this employment would damp his genius, and leſſen the ſtrong propenſion he had for ſtudies of a more exalted nature. But he is not the only man who has been forced to undertake that province, and whom family expences have reduced to the neceſſity of groaning under the heavy burthen that is neceſſarily formed by the explaining and hearing leſſons. Here follow our Author's words, who expreſſes himſelf finely on this occaſion; he declaring, that his teaching Latin and Greek was a taſk ſo ungrateful, that he thought himſelf in a houſe of correction, to which neceſſity, and not an unadviſed conduct had driven him. That he had ever thought that ſuch genius's degraded themſelves very much, who were forced to teach, when they were capable of exerting themſelves in nobler things. But that as his circumſtances were narrow, his wife ſumptuous, and his children of a lofty diſpoſition, and he was therefore at a conſiderable expence; he was forced to make himſelf a ſlave to occupations, which he had always abhorred. Moriar ſi non me angunt puditiſſimæ interpretationes meæ, ſive Græcæ, ſive Latinæ, in quas veluti in piſtrinum detruſi me, non tàm imprudentiâ, quam neceſſitate. Ego enim, ut ex meis ſtudiis noſſe potuiſti, ſemper judicavi obſcurum & ſordidum iis, quorum ingenio aliquid fieri poteſt illuſtrius, ſi interpretandis ſcriptis aliorum humiles ac demiſſi, quaſi ſervitia ancillentur. Sed cùm mihi res domi eſſet anguſta, uxor lauta, liberi ſplendidi, & propterea magnos ſumptus facerem, mancipavi propè me iis ſtudiis, à quibus ſemper abhorrui (6).

(6) Ibid.

[E] He was convicted of having ſpoke in favour of the Lutherans, and againſt the inquiſition.] The Friars, who endeavoured to ruin him in Sienna, exclaimed againſt him as a heretick, becauſe he declared plainly enough that he diſapproved certain ſuperſtitious practices: and they alſo did not approve of the book he compoſed on Chriſt's death (7). In the apology he was obliged to make, he did not ſcruple to ſay that thoſe German Doctors, who followed Luther, deſerved commendation on certain accounts, and that the inquiſition was inſtituted to put men of learning to death. His affair was amicably concluded; and it was agreed, that all the copies of his apology ſhould be burnt (8). Nevertheleſs, three were preſerved, one of which he kept, his adverſary kept another, and the third was that which Peter Victorius had (9). The copy which remained in the accuſer's poſſeſſion was employed to convict Aonius, he there writing as follows in favour of the Proteſtants. Germanos vocas Oecolampadium, Rotherodamum, Melanchthonem, Lutherum, Pomeranum, Bucerum, & cæteros qui in ſuſpicionem vocati ſunt? Ego verò ex Theologis noſtris tam ſtupidum arbitror eſſe neminem, qui non intelligat & fateatur, permulta eſſe in his quæ ab illis ſcripta ſunt, digna prorſus omni laude: ſunt enim graviter, accuratè & ſincerè ſcripta, repetita vel ex patribus illis primis, qui præcepta nobis ſalutaria reliquerunt: vel ex commentationibus Græcorum, & noſtrorum hominum (10), i. e. "Do you call Oecolampadius, Eraſmus, Melancthon, Luther, Pomeranus, Bucer, and other perſons who have been ſuſpected, Germans? 'Tis really my opinion that none of our Divines are ſo ſtupid, as not to know and acknowledge, that a great many things in their compoſitions deſerve the higheſt applauſe: for they are written with gravity, accuracy, and ſincerity; being extracted either from thoſe antient fathers who have left us ſalutary precepts, or from the Commentaries of the Greeks and of our Divines." Here alſo follows what he relates concerning the Inquiſition. Quòd niſi indicto concilio ſpes bonis injecta eſſet, negotium felix & ſalutare à Pontificibus, à Cæſare, à Regibus unà ſuſceptum iri, ut magnis concurſibus omnium gentium, omnium nationum celeberrimi conventus peragantur, deſperaremus omnino tantarum perturbationum finem ullum unquam futurum: deſperaremus poſſe fieri, ut ſica iſta diſtricta in omnes ſcriptores de manibus eorum extorqueatur, qui vel leviſſimis de cauſis crudeliſſimè ferire didicerunt: à quibus appetitus fuit aliquando vir omnium ſanctiſſimus & integerrimus, Sadoletus meus (11), i. e. "But if men of probity had not "reaſon to hope that, by the ſummoning of a Council, "a propitious and moſt beneficial work would be undertaken, in concert, by the Pope, the Emperor, and "Kings, in order for the holding a moſt auguſt aſſembly of perſons of all nations; we might quite "deſpair that ſuch diſturbances as theſe could ever "be ſuppreſſed: we might deſpair of ever ſeeing "that poniard, which is levelled againſt all Authors, "forced out of the hands of a ſet of people, who "have learnt to wound in the moſt barbarous manner, "and that on the moſt trifling accounts: and by "whom my excellent friend Sadoletus, the moſt pi-"ous, and moſt worthy man that ever lived, was "ſome time ſince attacked." At the time that Palearius drew up this apology, Ochinus had made his eſcape but a little before (12); and conſequently we may ſuppoſe that it was writ about the year 1542 or 1543. Palearius was a good Proteſtant at that time, but did not ſay all he thought. In 1596 a book was found, in his own hand writing, entitled, Teſtimonium ad gentes & nationes quæ invocant nomen Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti, to which a larger treatiſe is annexed, entitled, Actio ex declaratione teſtimonii in Pontifices Romanos & eorum Aſſeclas. Ad Principes Chriſtianos, & Præfectos Concilio, in quibus habitat Spiritus Dei. He wrote this work a little before the opening of the Council of Trent; he intending to get the Emperor's Embaſſadors to preſent it to that aſſembly. 'Tis a regular plea in defence of the Proteſtants, and was not publiſhed till the year 1606 (13). We therein find two doctrines which are not approved by them; one, that marriage is a ſacrament; the other, that a Chriſtian ought not to ſwear, not even before a judge (14).

(7) This work, written in Italian, is loſt. See the plan of it in Palearius's 3d oration, p. 90, 91.

(8) Præfat. Operum Palearii.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Palearius, Orat. 3. p. 83.

(11) Ibid. p. 91.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Neither the year, nor the place where printed, are expreſſed in the title; but we are informed by the Acta Eruditor for January 1696, p. 44. that it was printed at Leipſic in 1606.

(14) See the Advertiſement to the Reader.

[F] He was condemned to be burnt . . . (α) . . . . in 1566.] The perſon, who publiſhed Actio in Pontifices, anno 1606, informs us that Palearius was burnt at Rome about the year 1558, and that he made a publick declaration of his faith. Circiter annum Domini 1558 (ut ejus amicus quidam mihi narravit) Mediolani captus, vinctus, & Romam miſſus eſt; ubi fidei ſuæ confeſſione fortiter edita, flammis adjudicatus eſt (15). However the editor in queſtion is miſtaken with reſpect to the time. The Author of the Preface to the new edition ſhews plainly that we muſt follow Thuanus, who ſays that this learned man was burnt in 1566 (16); by which Simler is refuted, who ſays (17), that this Martyr was beheaded in 1570, which is an error in chronology, and one alſo with regard to the kind of puniſhment. I have been told, that he was burnt on account of his book concerning the immortality of the Soul, but this is a falſity; but there is nothing in that noble Poem which the Roman Catholicks can condemn. Some perſons in a letter writ from Italy to Mark Velſerus, declared that this work was not writ by Aonius Palearius: but I don't know what anſwer was made to Velſerus, who immediately aſked what Author it ſhould therefore be aſcribed to (18). I have ſhewn above, that Pigna applauds Palearius, as Author of that Poem, and all the Bibliographers declares it to be his. I find by Geſner's epitome, that it was printed at Lyons in 1536. James Sadoletus,

(15) Actio in Pontifices.

(16) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 39. p. m. 779.

(17) In Epitome Biblioth. Geſneri.

(18) See Velſerus's letters, p. 878.

best edition is that of Wetstein, at Amsterdam, anno 1696.

letus, Bishop of Carpentras (Carpentoralte) wrote a letter to Gryphius (19), to exhort him to print it. He also wrote a letter to the Author (20), and therein bestows high encomiums on that work. Palearius had sent him a copy of it, of an edition that was far from correct, and desired him to prevail with Gryphius to reprint it (21). It would be impossible for a work to be more strongly recommended to a printer, than Sadoletus recommends this to Sebastian Gryphius. I here transcribe only part of the Elogium. Numerus porro carminis is est, ut videatur Lucretium velle imitari, redolet enim antiquum illud; sed ita sapore humanitatis conditus est, ut asperitate demissa, vetustatis tamen autoritas salva remaneat. Atque hæc in universum. Illa jam partium singularium propria, nihil non Latine dictum, nihil non accuratè, quove judicium & diligentiam adhibitam esse non pateat: multaque præterea ubique nitentia ingenii & venustatis luminibus, et, quod ego pluris quam reliqua omnia facio, Christiana mens, integra, castaque religio, erga Deum ipsum honos, pietas, studium; in eo libro vel maximè, non solum docere mentes errantium, sed etiam animos incendere ad amorem puræ religionis possunt (22), i. e. "Further, he seems to have endeavoured to "imitate Lucretius in the harmony or numbers of "the verse, it resembling that antient piece; but it "is so finely seasoned with sweetness and elegance, "that it retains all the strength without the harshness "of antiquity. So much for the general character "of the work in question. With regard to particular parts, every thing is expressed in correct Latin; "with accuracy; and shews that the greatest judgment and application had been used; not to mention that several things in it shine with wit and "elegance. But the circumstance for which I chiefly "value it is, the Christian disposition, the pure, "uncorrupt Religion, the reverence, piety, and affection towards God it exhibits; all which may not "only conduce to instruct the minds of such as are "in an error, but also to inspire them with a love for "true Religion."

§ (α) He was hanged and strangled before his body was committed to the flames. See the new Menagiana, Paris Edit. 1715. Tom. I. p. 217, 218. REM. CRIT.

(19) His letter is inserted in the edition of Aonius Palearius, 1696, p. 564.

(20) 'Tis found, ibid. p. 562.

(21) See Letter 2. lib. 3. of Palearius, p. 434.

(22) Sadoletus, Epist. ad Gryph. p. 565. Oper. Palear. edit. 1696. It is also in Sadoletus's Epistles, p. 184. edit. Lugd. 1554.

Here follow some few additions to this Article.

☞ PALEARIUS (AONIUS) was baptised by the name of Anthony, but changed it afterwards for that of Aonius, pursuant to the custom of those times. The names of his father and mother, who sprung from noble and antient families, and whom he lost young, are known to us only by the epitaph hereunder [A]. He declares in one of his Epistles (a), that he would have been glad, at that time, to travel into France, Germany, and even Greece; but that the narrowness of his circumstances would not let him indulge his wishes in that particular. He was prompted to reside in Sienna, because of the pleasantness of the situation, and the sprightly and sagacious genius of the inhabitants; and accordingly he sold the possessions he had in Veroli, his native place, which he resolved to leave for ever; and that without the least regret, he himself confessing that he was not beloved there. He purchased a country-house, in the neighbourhood of Sienna, called Ceciniano, which he fancied had formerly belonged to Cecina, whom Cicero defended, in order to retire thither on his leisure days, and accordingly embellished it as much as possible. We have taken notice above of his being seized at Milan, carried to Rome, and executed there [B]. Here follows a compleat list of his works [C] (b).

(a) Epist. 4.

(b) From the preface to Palearius's works, &c.

[A] By the epitaph hereunder.] 'Twas written some years after by our Palearius; and, by his order, inscribed on their monument. Matthæo Paleario, & Claræ Janarillæ, optimis parentibus; & Elysæ, Franciscæ, Janillæ Palleariis, sororibus honestissimis Aonius Palearius posuit mutato solo (1).

(1) Niceron, Hommes Illustres, Tom. 16. p. 53. Paris 1731, 12mo.

[B] . . . . and executed there.] He was condemned to be burnt, and the sentence was accordingly executed in 1566, according to Thuanus. The Editor of Actio in Pontifices in 1606, fixes his execution about the year 1558; but this cannot be exact, since Pope Pius V. was not elected till 1566. John James Frisius, in his continuation of Gesner's epitome, is also mistaken in putting it as far back as the year 1570. Bayle, who ascribes this error to Simler, did not observe that the latter did not continue Gesner, but from the year 1545 till 1555, and consequently that he could not speak of things that happened since. Palearius was burnt, but not alive, as is inserted by Thuanus; but after having been hanged and strangled, as Latinus Latinius, who was in Rome at the time of his execution, affirms, in the Iambicks he wrote against him, to which he was prompted by a very odd whim. Having seen a letter of James Sadoletus, addressed to him, and directed to Antonio Palearo Verulano, he imagined that Palearius had, from an impious consideration, preferred the word Aonius, in which the letter T, (the figure of the cross) is not found; and imputed this to him, as a crime, as tho' he thereby gave an indication of his giving up the sign of Christianity; not foreseeing (adds this Writer) that his contempt of this cross would one day bring him to a fatal and infamous punishment. A childish thought, and unworthy of a man of sense (2)!

(2) Idem, ibid.

[C] Here follows a complete list of his Works.] 1. De immortalitate Animorum libri tres. Lugduni. Gryphius 1536, in 16°. Palearius was so well pleased with this edition, that he wrote a letter of thanks to Gryphius, which is inserted among his epistles. This poem has born several impressions since; and is in the collection of Palearius's works, which I shall mention hereafter. Some have imagined, but falsely, that this book brought him to the stake, since there is not one erroneous tenet in it; so far from it, that he therein very well establishes the doctrine of the soul's immortality, in opposition to Lucretius, for which reason Daniel Pareus annexed it to his edition of that Poet, published by him at Frankfort in 1631, 8vo. There are five imperfect hemisticks in the course of these three books. Palearius perhaps left them so, to imitate Virgil; but if this was his design, he imitated that famous Poet in nothing else, his versification being no ways Virgilian. 2. Epistolarum libri 4. Orationes, & de Animorum immortalitate libri tres. Lugduni. Sebast. Gryphius 1552, 8vo. It. Basileæ. It was printed twice in that city. It. Bremæ 1619, 12mo, and published by Matthias Martinius. There are 14 orations. The letters, though of no great importance, do nevertheless contain certain particulars of Palearius's life. 3. Actio in Pontifices Romanos & eorum assectas ad imperatorem Romanum, reges & principes Christianæ reipublicæ, summos Oecumenici Consilii præsides conscripta, cum de Concilio Tridenti habendo deliberaretur. 'Tis not known whether this piece made part of his accusation, and contributed to his condemnation. 4. Poematia. This consists of some poems, printed at Paris in 1576. 5. Aonii Palearii opera. Ad illam editionem, quam ipse autor recensuerat & auxerat excusa, nunc novis accessionibus locupletata. Amstelodami 1696, 8vo. This edition contains all the pieces abovementioned; and the editions consist only of two letters of Palearius, extracted from other collections, with five other letters written to him. The Editor has also given a preface, wherein a circumstantial account is given of the Author's life. Ead. Opera Recensuit & Dissertationem de vita, fatis & meritis Aonii præmisit Frid. And. Halhaver. Jenæ 1728, 8vo (3). I also meet with the following title; Dialogo intitulato il Grammatico overo delle false Esercitazioni delle scuole (da Aonio Paleario.) Perugia 1717 (4).

(3) From Palearius's works, and Niceron, ib.

(4) Bibliotheca Menckeniana, p. 750. Lipsiæ 1727, 8vo.

PALINGE-

PALINGENIUS (MARCELLUS) is very well known by a Poem divided into twelve books, and entitled Zodiacus vitæ [A]. He employed ſeveral years in compoſing it, and dedicated it to Hercules II. of Eſte, Duke of Ferrara. Opus noſtrum . . . . . in duodecim libros digeſtum, multoſque per annos elaboratum, Celſitudini tuæ donamus (a). Some ſay that he was phyſician to this Prince [B]. Others rank him among the learned Lutherans, to whom the Dutcheſs of Ferrara, Renata of France, gave a reception in her Court, and honoured with her protection (b). 'Tis certain that Palingenius ſpoke with prodigious freedom againſt the Friars, and the abuſes of the Church, which is the reaſon of his being inſerted in the Index Librorum prohibitorum (c), as a Lutheran Heretick of the firſt claſs. ['Tis expreſt as follows in the Index. Marc. Palingenius, natione Italus, poeta Lutheranus. Now this relates to his perſon, and not directly to his work, which abounds with reflections that ſavour much more of impiety than of hereſy. Theſe words of Bayle, A Heretick of the firſt Claſs, confine too much the true title of this firſt claſs, which extends to impious books, as well as thoſe of an heretical caſt. For inſtance, we therein ſee the works of Rabelais, &c. and the title is as follows; Authorum damnatæ Memoriæ opera *.] This even related that his body was dug up and burnt, upon pretence of his being a Heretick [C]. [Lilius Giraldus, the only eye-witneſs to the incident in queſtion, does not ſpeak of hereſy but of impiety: Poſt ejus mortem in ejus cines ſævitum eſt ob impietatis crimen †.] Nevertheleſs, he declared himſelf a good Catholick in the cloſe of his Dedication; he ſubmitting all his opinions to the cenſure of the Church [D]. They are of ſuch a nature that all of them cannot be pleaſing to the Proteſtants. He ſometimes carries too far the objections ſtarted by the ſcoffers at Religion, and exhibits them in ſuch a manner as ſhews he did not condemn them. This circumſtance excepted, his Zodiac contains good things; and is a truly philoſophical ſatyr againſt immorality and falſe prejudices

(a) Epiſt. Dedic.

(b) See Seckendorf, Hiſt. Luther. lib. 2. p. 122. num. 5. ad ann. 1528. He cites Schultetus's Annals, p. 148.

(c) Page 765. edit. 1667, folio.

* From the remarks to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dictionary, Tom. 4. p. 969.

† Idem, ibid.

[A] He is very well known by a poem divided into twelve books, and entitled, Zodiacus vitæ.] Hoc eſt de hominis vita, ſtudio, ac moribus optime inſtituendis, libri XII. Each of theſe books is intitled from one of the ſigns of the Zodiac. I doubt not but this is the reaſon why our author calls himſelf Poeta Stellatus. [This is a miſtake, Palingenius aſſuming the name of Stellatus, becauſe he was born in Stellada, in the Dukedom of Ferrara *.] The elder Scaliger (1) has ſtrongly cenſured, and, in my opinion, very juſtly, the little conformity there is between the ſubjects of each book, and the qualities of the ſigns of the Zodiac, which is the title of the work. I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that Barthius wrote a Poem (2) in imitation of that in queſtion; and he entitled it, Zodiacus vitæ Chriſtianæ; Satyricon pleraque omnia veræ ſapientiæ myſteria ſingulari ſuavitate enarrans. He has divided it into twelve books, each of which is entitled from one of the ſigns of the Zodiack. He did not trouble himſelf to obſerve any conformity between the ſubjects of each book, and the virtue of which is aſcribed to each of thoſe twelve conſtellations.

* From the rem. Tom. 4. p. 969. added to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict.

(1) Julius Cæſar, Scalig. Poet. lib. 6. p. m. 731, 732.

(2) Printed at Franckfort, in 1623, 8vo.

[B] Some ſay that he was phyſician to this Prince.] This is affirmed by Scævola Sammarthanus (3), which I dare not deny; but ſhall content myſelf with ſaying, that our Poet was not known to the Duke of Ferrara, when he dedicated his book to him; he declaring in his Dedication, that fame informing him of this Duke's erudition, he had preſumed to wait upon him, after the hopes, which Braſavolus had given him, of meeting with a favourable reception. Quid mihi cum principe qui alienis oculis videt? ore loquitur alieno? illum volo qui per ſe poſſit curvum diſcernere recto: cui non auſint maligni homines dicere candida de nigris, & de candentibus atra. Talem igitur cùm te eſſe omnes prædicent, Dux illuſtriſſ. audacter ad te profectus ſum: eo maximè quòd Antonius Muſa Braſavolus, vir ſingulari doctrina integritateque conſpicuus, qui excellentiam tuam fideliſſimè colit, mihi de te ſpem optimam attulit: quippe qui doctrinam, humanitatem, liberalitatemque tuam mirifice apud me commendavit. Cujus verbis tantum habeo fidei, quantum dici poſſit. Ego igitur ſuadente, &c. (4), i. e. "Wherefore ſhould I addreſs a "Prince, who ſees with other's eyes, and ſpeaks with "other's ears? I want a Prince who is able, of himſelf, to diſtinguiſh right from wrong; and in whoſe "preſence ſpiteful men dare not call black white, "and white black. As therefore, moſt illuſtrious "Duke, you are univerſally proclaimed to be ſuch, "I have made bold to wait upon you; and was "eſpecially prompted to it, becauſe Antonius Muſa "Braſavolus, a Gentleman famous for his learning "and probity, who has the moſt faithful reſpect "for his excellency, gave me reaſon to hope that "my addreſſing you would not be diſagreeable; he "beſtowing the higheſt elogiums on that learning, "humanity, and munificence; and 'tis certain that "no one can be more fully perſuaded of the truth of "his words than I am. I therefore, &c." I am to obſerve that he is not in the catalogue of phyſicians who have been Poets, compiled by Bartholinus.

(3) In the title of his French tranſlation of ſome paſſages from Palingenius, cited by Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Françoiſe, p. 842.

(4) Paling. Epiſt. Dedicat.

[C] 'Tis even related that his body was dug up and burnt, upon pretence of his having been a Heretick.] I have read this in Melchior Adamus: Edidit præterea, ſays he (5), ſpeaking of Chriſtopher Wirſungus, Marcelli Palingenii Stellatenſis (cujus cadaver, propter pietatis doctrinam in Italia exhumatum concrematumque fuit) poëmata doctiſſimis adjectis commentariis, i. e. "We likewiſe publiſhed, with very learned notes, "the Poems of Marcellus Palingenius, whoſe body, "on account of his doctrines, was dug up in Italy "and burnt."

But I have a more authentick teſtimony than this; Gyraldus, who lived in that age, and in the country where this ſcene paſſed, affirms that the aſhes of this Poet met with cruel treatment: Poſt ejus mortem in ejus cineres ſævitum eſt, ob impietatis crimen (6).

(5) Melchior. Adam. in Vitis Philoſophor. p. 253.

(6) Gyrald. de Poet. ſuor. tempor. Dial. 2. p. m. 569.

[D] He ſubmitting all his opinions to the cenſure of the Church.] He confeſſes that, having cited the opinion of the Philoſophers, he perhaps had exhibited falſities, but that he is not reſponſible for this. 'Twill be better to hear his own words. Si tamen in tanto opere aliquid fortè reperitur quod à noſtra religione aliquantum diſſentire videatur, mihi minimè imputandum cenſeo. Nam dum aliquando de rebus Philoſophicis loquor, diverſorum philoſophorum opiniones refero, præſertim Platonicorum. Quæ ſi falſæ ſunt, non ego, ſed ipſi reprehendi debent: cùm mea ſit intentio, à Catholica fide nunquam declinare. Quo circa in omnibus quæ ſcripſi, orthodoxæ Eccleſiæ me humiliter ſubjicio: ejuſque cenſuram, ut virum Chriſtianum decet, libenter accipio (7), i. e. "Nevertheleſs, if any particulars ſhould be found, "in ſo large a work, that may ſeem to differ in "ſome little meaſure from our religion, methinks "this ſhould not be imputed to me. For ſometimes, "in treating of philoſophical ſubjects, I cite the "opinions of various Philoſophers, particularly of "the Platoniſts: but if theſe are falſe, it is not I "who ought to be reproved, but they; it being my "intention, never to deviate from the Catholick "Faith. Hence I willingly ſubmit whatever I have "writ to the orthodox Church; and receive with "willingneſs, and in ſuch a manner, as becomes a "Chriſtian, its cenſure." The inquiſition, after ſuch a declaration, could not juſtly proſecute his perſon, nor declare him a Heretick: this ſtigma dies (d). This Poem has born a numberleſs multitude of impreſſions [E]; but I do not find that any perſon was acquainted with that which Chriſtopher Wirſungus publiſhed, with a Commentary (e). 'Tis a little ſtrange, that a Poet of ſo much merit ſhould be ſo little mentioned in the great number of elogiums which the Italians have publiſhed on the writers of their nation; but this probably is owing to his having been thought a heretick. However this be, his life is but little known. He was Naudæu's favourite author.

(7) Paling. Epiſt. Dedicat.

(d) See Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poetes, num. 1259.

(e) See the rem. [C].

A certain learned man is of opinion, that Marcellus Palingenius is a fictitious name, under which Marſillius Ficinus is diſguiſed. [" Bayle ſhould have ſaid without the leaſt " heſitation, that the learned man hinted at by him was ſtrangely miſtaken. Ficinus, " born in 1433, died 1499. Palingenius dedicated his Zodiacus vitæ to Hercules of " Eſte, the ſecond of that name, Duke of Ferrara, who had not that title till 1534. " Beſides, he there mentions Clement VII. viz. at the cloſe of the tenth Book:

..... " Sed nunc ſummus parat arma Sacerdos
" Clemens, Martinum cupiens abolere Lutherum."] * Idem ibid.

He ſtrengthens his conjecture from a paſſage in which Ficinus declares he had two fathers, viz. Ficinus a phyſician, and Coſmo de Medicis, and that he ſprung from the former, and was regenerated by the latter: Se duos habuiſſe patres, Ficinum Medicum, & Coſmum Medicen; ex illo natum, ex iſto renatum (f). I could eaſily believe that Palingenius is not the name of the family of the Author of Zodiacus vitæ, but a name turned into Greek after the cuſtom of thoſe times. However, I cannot think that the work in queſtion was writ by Ficinus, on account of the proſecution which Gyraldus informs us was carried on againſt the aſhes of the author of this Poem (g.)

(f) Ficinus, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Laurent. Medicen in Libr. de Vitâ, Tom. 1. p. m. 482.

(g) See the remark [C].

ought to have fallen, at moſt, on his doctrine; for a man is condemned for obſtinacy, not error. [" Had the " affair related only to ſome particular tenet or opi- " nion, with regard to which Palingenius had declared " before-hand, that he ſubmitted to the Church. " Bayle's reflection might be juſt: but we have rea- " ſon to conſider, as fallacious, the ſort of ſubmiſ- " ſion made by a man who teaches impiety, &c. " Bayle himſelf does not deny but that he was juſtly " ſuſpected of impiety. He ſometimes, (ſays he) car- " ries too far the objections ſtarted by the ſcoffers at " Religion, and exhibits them in ſuch a light as ſhews he " did not condemn them. To this I add, that he de- " livers, without the leaſt ſcruple, the doctrine of " Epicurus. in this third book, and elſewhere. Ni- " cholas Bourbon † the Poet, having read Palinge- " nius's Zodiac immediately after its publication, " ſoon diſcovered the impious principles of the au- " thor; and for this reaſon he ſays, in the verſes he " addreſſed to him (ad Palingenium Poëtam:)

" Quid ſentiam dicam: ingenium admiror tuum,
" Et laudo diligentiam;
" Sed eſt aliquid, quod ſcire ex te, quod & tibi
" Dixiſſe in aurem pervelim."

† A Poet who lived in the 16th century.

" See Bourbon's Nugæ, Lib. VIII. (131. of Gry- " phius's edition of 1538.")

[E] † This poem has born a numberleſs multitude of impreſſions.] The Authors of Index Librorum prohibitorum, quote that of Baſil 1537, and obſerve that it followed that of Italy; but do not inform us either of the year, or the place where this was printed (8). I make uſe of that of 1569, 8vo, where we neither have the Printer's name, nor the name where printed. There is a large index, which had been printed before in the edition of 1537, as Geſner obſerved (9). [" Bayle wrote in too indeterminate a " manner, in ſaying, this poem has borne a number- " leſs multitude of impreſſions. By the way, the firſt " edition is rather of 1536; the ſecond taken notice " of by Bayle, is of 1537. The Author ſeems not " to have lived much after that date, as appears " from what Gyraldus ſays, who wrote about 1543. " (x)]" His Epitomiſer does not mention Wirſungus's Commentary, neither under the word Palingenius, nor Wirſungus. Moreri affirms, that this work has been tranſlated into French, and other languages. La Croix du Maine obſerves only, that Scævola Sammarthanus having publiſhed a tranſlation of part of this Author, promiſed to do the whole. His words are as follow: As he has ſhewn by his finely poliſhed imitations of the learned Italian poet Marcellus Palingenius, whom he has tranſlated in ſo graceful a manner, that this has kept many from ſetting about it, who before had reſolved to give a verſion of it in our language. He promiſes to continue the whole tranſlation of Palingenius's Zodiac; but has hitherto printed only part of it, with the reſt of the French poems, which he has entitled, His firſt Works, containing four books of imitations and tranſlations, collected from various Greek and Latin Poets, printed in Paris by Frederick Morel, anno 1569 (10). Du Verdier agrees with this; he ſaying, that Scævola Sammarthanus publiſhed a collection of ſeveral diſcourſes, extracted from the Zodiacus of the life of Marcellus Palingenius, Phyſician to the Duke of Ferrara, and tranſlated, by him, into French verſe (11). Moreri would have been a little puzzled, had any perſon aſked him which were the reſt of the poems of this Italian Author (12). [I have met with the following edition of Palingenius's poem; Palingenii, Marcelli, Zodiacus vitæ, emendatus & auctus. Rotterdam 1722 (†)].

(9) In Bibliotheca, folio 492.

(*) From the remarks Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. ubi ſupra.

(10) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotheque Francoiſe, p. 842.

(11) Du Verdier, Vau Privas, Bibliotheque Francoiſe, p. 453.

(12) He wrote ſome poems, and one among the reſt entitled Zodiacus vitæ. Moreri, under the word Palingene.

† Addition by the Tranſl.

† From the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict.

(8) The ſame may be ſaid of Geſner and his Epitomiſers.

PALLAVICINO (FERRANTE) author of ſome ſatyrical writings, which occaſioned his loſing his head on a ſcaffold. I have nothing to add to what Moreri ſays of him, except that we find an abridgment of his life, prefixed to the new tranſlation of his Divortio Celeſte (a).

(a) Printed at Amſterdam 1696, and writ by a gentleman of great wit and merit (α).

(α) Mr. Brodeau d'Oyſeoille, then Counſellor in the parliament of Metz, and afterwards Lieutenant-General in the Bailiwick of Tours, grandſon of the Commentator of Louet. He undertook this tranſlation, as a ſpecimen of the progreſs he had made in the Italian, which he had been learning ſome months. REM. CRIT.

Here follows the life of this Author, extracted immediately from the Italian.

☞ PALLAVICINO (FERRANTE) a witty writer in the 17th Century, was the ſon of Marquis Pallavicino, a Nobleman of conſiderable diſtinction, and of an illuſtrious family [A] in Piacenza (a) in Italy. He gave, from his infancy, the ſtrongeſt indications of

(a) Placentia.

[A] Whoſe family was illuſtrious.] An Author of his life obſerves, that the family of the Pallavicini is ſo well known, that it wants no encomiums; and that, perhaps, one of its leaſt prerogatives, is, its having been

of an exalted genius. Having made a great progreſs in the elements of learning, he was ſent by his parents (more perhaps for the intereſt of his family than from his own inclination) to a Monaſtery, where he improved very much in learning and piety, and raiſed the higheſt expectations of himſelf [B]. But afterwards engaging, by his own inclination, and the ſollicitation of others, in compoſitions of a dangerous kind, that were unworthy of his family and profeſſion, he paved the way to vice [C]. The firſt cauſe of his diſgrace was an intrigue in which he was engaged with a girl in Venice [D]. About this time, more for the ſake of lucre, than from a love for writing, (the bookſellers paying a high price for his manuſcripts) he compoſed ſeveral works, and among others his Corriero Svaligiato, or the Courier robbed of his Mail [E]. He at laſt got an opportunity of travelling into Germany, with Duke Amalfi, under the character of his Chaplain. He lived near ſixteen months with this Duke; and imbibed by the great liberty allowed in that country, a greater freedom, both in his life and writings. Being returned to Venice, (from Germany) very much diſguiſed in his face by the Evil, contracted either by the ſtoves of that country, or his intrigues with the women, he reſolved to new model his Corriero Svaligiato, and enlarge it with many new letters and diſcourſes [F]. But, giving his manuſcript to Francis Picenini a bookſeller, he was betray'd, and ſoon thrown into priſon [G], where he lay ſix months; and being releaſed from it, threw off the religious habit, and ſkulked privately up and down. The Nuncio Vitelli, prompted either by revenge, or at the inſtigation of his ſuperiors, got Pallavicino to leave Italy [H] with one been incorporated among the Venetian Nobility, merely on account of its merit. Ne' ci fermeremo punto à teſſer encomii alla nobilità del ſuo naſcimento, eſſendo coſì divulgati i faſti della illuſtriſſima Caſa Pallavicina, che l'eſſere i chiariſſimi Antenati di Ferrante aſceſi per ſolo merito d'opere eccelſe all'acquiſto della Nobiltà Venetiana, e forſe una delle ſue minori eccellenze e prerogative (1).

(1) Opere ſcelte di Ferrante Pallavicino, Di nuovo riſtampato, &c. In his Life prefixed, p. 1. (the pages are not marked.) Villa franca, 1673, 12mo.

[B] Raiſed the higheſt expectations of himſelf.] Here he paſſed his life very happily, and with great applauſe: and was thought to bid very fair for making a conſpicuous figure in eloquence (2).

(2) Ibid. p. 2.

[C] . . . to devote himſelf to vice.] Being now immerſed in the pleaſures of ſenſe, and paſſionately fond of fame, it is no wonder that the fire of his youth ſhould hurry him on to deſtruction. And being often forewarned of this by an intimate friend, he uſed to excuſe himſelf, by ſaying, that Venus had naturally a mighty aſcendant over great genius's. And with regard to the licentiouſneſs of his writings, he uſed to aſcribe it to the caſt of the age, and of his friends; as though it would not have been poſſible for him to regulate his inclinations agreeably to the dictates of reaſon; and to indulge his thirſt after fame, and pleaſe his friends, without endangering his own life (3).

(3) Idem, ibid.

[D] An intrigue in which he was engaged with a girl in Venice.] He had obtained leave, from his General, to go into France, and pretended to ſet out for that country; but ſo far from it, he did not once leave the city abovementioned (inchanted by the love of a young woman) but lived privately there; and having too ready a talent at inventing fictions, he impoſed upon his friends, to whom he often wrote letters, containing feigned relations of his travels thro' the provinces of France; informing them, at the ſame time, of the ſeveral things tranſacted in that court, which he learned from the advices of many conſiderable perſons, with whom he then correſponded. Haveva egli ottenuto licenza dal ſuo generale di paſſare in Francia; ma come quello, che viveva incatenato dall' amor d'una giovane in Venetia, non mai partì da quella citta (nella quale ſi trattenne allora quaſi incognito) non che dall' Italia, come che eſſendo di felicisſimo ingegno nell' inventar delle favole, faceſſe trauvedere la religione, e'l mondo ſcrivendo continue lettere à diverſi Amici, co' quali s'intendeva, con la favoloſa relatione de' ſuoi finti viaggi per tutte le provincie di Francia; e con veri e certi anviſi de' ſucceſſi di quella gran Corte, chegli venivano ſuggeriti da' fogli ſegreti di Perſonnaggi qualificati, cò quali teneva allora corriſpondenza e domeſtichezza (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 3.

[E] His Corriero Svaligiato.] This is a collection of letters, moſtly of a ſatyrical kind, the hint of which was ſuggeſted to him, and which proved the chief cauſe of his ruin. He, at firſt, gave this work ſuch a caſt, as could not give much offence, except to the Spaniards, againſt whom he was exaſperated, either from his own inclination, or the ſuggeſtions of others; or from a ſpirit of rivalſhip with Count della Rocca, Embaſſador from his Catholic Majeſty, who being a Gentleman of wit and fine parts, uſed to take a delight in engaging in literary diſputes with the learned Italians; he keeping a preſs in his own houſe, where he uſed to print both the challenges and anſwers (5). This work in queſtion was licenſed by the Inquiſitors; but falling into the hands of the Secretary of the Republic of Venice, who at that time was the Licenſer of books, he could not be prevailed upon to give his imprimatur, though great intereſt was employed for that purpoſe, but would never return the manuſcript; which exaſperated our Pallavicino to ſuch a degree, that he would have then ruined himſelf, by his raſh deſigns, had he not been reſtrained by his friends (6).

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[F] . . . to new model his Corriero Svaligiato.] As he ſtill harboured the ſtrongeſt reſentment againſt the Secretary of the Republick, for not returning him his manuſcript; and was diſguſted at the Barbarini *, at that time all powerful in Rome, becauſe they endeavoured, at the inſtigation of the Jeſuits, to cauſe all his manuſcripts to be forbid the preſs; he took this fatal opportunity to diſcharge his rancour againſt his ſuppoſed enemies (7).

* Pope Urban VIII. and his nephews.

(7) Idem, ibid.

[G] . . . giving his manuſcript to Francis Picenini.] This Bookſeller undertook to get the manuſcript printed ſecretly, by a brother of his; but at the ſame time he was betrayed by a learned Italian who pretended to be his friend. This man, being a ſpy, informed againſt him to the Arch-biſhop Vitelli, then the Pope's Nuncio in Venice, juſt as the work was finiſhed at preſs. At the ſame time he went to the Bookſeller, to whom he repreſented the great hazard he ran in keeping thoſe books by him; and thereupon bought the whole impreſſion, which he after ſold with very great profit to himſelf. Upon the complaints made by the Nuncio abovementioned, Pallavicino was impriſoned (8).

(8) Ibid. p. 4.

[H] He got Pallavicino to leave Italy.] In the mean time, a war broke out between the Barberini and the Duke of Parma; when Pallavicino, either to recover the favour of that Prince, who was diſpleaſed at ſome things our author had publiſhed in 1636, or to revenge himſelf on thoſe whom he imagined had cauſed his impriſonment, wrote the Bacinata per le Api Barberini, or tinkling inſtrument, to call together the Barbarine Bees. This piece was written on occaſion of Pope Urban VIII. his declaring war againſt the Duke of Parma; and by the date of the Dedication appears to have been compoſed in 1642. Our author was ſo imprudent as to dedicate it, in terms of the higheſt contempt, to the Nuncio Vitelli; who finding that little notice was taken of his complaints againſt Pallavicino, employed, by means of a conſiderable bribe, one Charles Morfu, a Frenchman, of a vile character, but who pretended to paſs for a Gentleman, to inſnare him. And now the traitor uſed his utmoſt endeavours to inſinuate himſelf into Pallavicino's friendſhip, and at laſt exhorted him to go with him to France, where he declared that one Morfu, who ſet out firſt for Geneva, to the great ſatisfaction of his deluded companion, who intended to get ſome of his works printed in that city [I]: but inſtead of conducting him to Paris, he went towards Avignon, where, croſſing a little river, they were ſeized by a company of Sbirri *, upon pretence of their carrying contraband goods, and confined: however, the traitor was diſcharged ſoon after, and rewarded in a very liberal manner. As for Pallavicino, he was thrown into priſon; and being ſtrictly examined with regard to ſome compoſitions of his found upon him, he made a very artful defence. However, neither his cunning, nor the arguments he employed could avail, the ſentence of his condemnation being already come from Rome; ſo that he was to be brought to a trial only for form-ſake. Pallavicino was confined in a dark dungeon; but he ingratiated himſelf ſo well into the goaler's favour, that he allowed him wax candles from time to time, that he might amuſe himſelf with reading. But our Author, who had another deſign in view, getting together a great many of thoſe tapers, one night ſet fire to the priſon-door, in hopes of thereby having an opportunity of eſcaping; but not ſucceeding, he was confined much cloſer than before, and treated with greater inhumanity than he deſerved. When he had been impriſoned about a year, he was brought out; and having defended himſelf with great ſtrength, imagined he ſhould be ſet at liberty, and had begun a whimſical piece on Melancholy: yet ſo unhappy was his fate, that he was ſentenced to die, and accordingly loſt his head on a ſcaffold, in the flower of his age [K]. Hereunder is a catalogue of his ſelect works [L]. He was a fine genius, and had a great facility in writing [M]. Notwithſtanding the fame of his works, he uſed yet to ſpeak modeſtly enough of himſelf; but could never be prevailed upon to flatter any great man, upon his compoſitions. His own works were frequently tinctured too ſtrongly with envy, malice, and gall. He made but a mean figure in converſation; and, when in company of perſons of worth and diſtinction, he often would retire to a corner of the room, and ſeem quite wrapt up in thought; he never exerting his wit and humour, after his return from Germany, but when in company with ſome mean woman. A circumſtance which ſtaggered him in his principles, was, his diſputing upon the Chriſtian Religion and Divine Providence, with a German officer who was broke upon the wheel. The author from whom theſe particulars are extracted, affirms that our Pallavicino did not write Il Divortio Celeſte [N]. We that his fortune would be made, by means of the uncommon encouragment which, he ſaid, Cardinal Richelieu gave to men of letters. The better to colour the deceit, he ſhewed our author feigned letters from this Cardinal; inviting him to France, and expreſſing a deſire he had to eſtabliſh in Paris, an Academy for the Italian tongue, under the direction of Pallavicino, who being at that time, as indeed he generally was by his great profuſeneſs, without money, accepted the propoſal, upon Morfu's advancing him ſome money. And now Pallavicino, faſcinated by the proſpect of future gain, ſuffered himſelf to be guided like an ox to the ſlaughter, whitherſoever the traitor thought proper. He left Venice very much againſt the advice of all his friends, and went to Bergamo, where he ſpent a few days with ſome of his relations, by way of giving ſome recreation to Morfu. Allaciato il Pallavicino dalle funi de queſta compitezza di tratto, e liberalità di mano, ſi laſciò tranſportare, quaſi pecora al macello, dou'egli volle. Riſolvette per tanto con diſguſto di tutti i ſuoi Amici, à quali non piaceva punto queſta ſua prattica, la partenza da Venetia, & paſſato à Bergamo vi ſi trattenne qualche giorne appreſſo alcuno ſuoi parenti per dare un poco di ricreatione, e oſſervare i ſuoi audamenti à Carlo (9).

* Officers under the Prevôt.

(9) Ibid. p. 5.

[I] To get ſome of his works printed at Geneva.] He had not been permitted to print them in Italy, either from the indignation which the Eccleſiaſticks conceived againſt him, or on account of the ſubjects of them. Theſe pieces were la Bucata, le Lettere delle beſtie, i ragionamenti dè Beati, la riſpoſta all' Antibacinata del Padre Tomaſo, with ſome centuries of love letters, and other compoſitions; but theſe, and their author, periſhed in Avignon.

[K] Loſt his head . . . . . on a ſcaffold.] Such was his end, an end unworthy of his birth and profeſſion, which yet had always been foretold him by his intimate friends (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 7.

[L] A catalogue of his works.] They now lie before me, and conſiſt of two volumes in 12mo, printed at Villafranca in 1673. Vol. I. contains, La Pudicitia Schernita. La rettorica delle puttane. Il Divortio Celeſte. Il Corriere ſvaligiato, and the continuation of it. In Vol. II. are, La Bacinata. Il Dialogo trà due ſoldati del Duca di Parma. La Diſgratia del Conte d'Olivarez. La Rete di Vulcano. L'Anima. Vigilia I. and II^a. and a letter written by our author during his laſt impriſonment.

[M] He was a fine genius, and had a great facility in writing.] Till he corrupted himſelf by the commerce of mean, leud women, and the evil practices of wicked perſons of the other ſex, he wrote pieces worthy of immortality. Though he did not ſpend much time and pains in compoſing, or reviſing what he had writ, (he frequently ſending to preſs the firſt exertions of his fancy) yet nature had given him ſo noble a vein of eloquence, which he had greatly improved by the peruſal of the beſt authors in his juvenile ſtudies, and by converſation, that his firſt thoughts were equal to the moſt laboured compoſitions. Era veramente Ferrante per natura, e per arte un grande ingegno, e in fino à che non ſi ſutò dietro gli amori de femine vulgari, e le cattive prattiche di perſone di poco buona conſcienza ſcriſſe opere degne dell' immortalità della fama. Che ſe bene egli non v' applicaſſe gran fatto, nè ſtudio in comporle, nè fatica in ripuliarle, mandando egli ſovente alle ſtampe i primi abbozzi della ſua fantaſia; era nondimeno così fortemente imbevato di una eloquenza naturale, accreſciuta dalle oſſervationi dè buoni Autori aſſaggiati nè primi anni dè ſuoi ſtudii, e raſſodata dalla pratica delle coſe del Mondo, che anche i ſuoi abbozzi riuſcivano pregiabili al pari delle altrui piu limate compoſitioni (11).

(11) Idem, ibid.

[N] Did not write Il divortio celeſte.] The author in queſtion obſerves, that this work was publiſhed during Pallavicino's impriſonment in Avignon. He declares farther, that though he frequently ſatirized the actions of the eccleſiaſticks, he yet never ſpake any thing derogatory to their dignity, or the doctrines of the Church of Rome. 'Tis ſurprizing (continues he) that ſome perſons ſhould be ſo ignorant or ſo much prejudiced, as to believe it to have been written by our author, when there is as wide a difference between Pallavicino's works, and thoſe of the author in queſtion, as between a living maiden in the bloom of life, and a painted carcaſs. But the publick, who are guided by opinion rather than judgment, ſeeing this work aſcribed to him by the author of his ghoſt (Animi di Ferrante) greedily ſwallowed down that falſhood. Nay, ſome people have been ſo ignorant, as to believe that many mean and infamous books, publiſhed ſome years after his death, were written by him. E veramante una maraviglia,

We ſhall here give ſome account of this work [O]. He was of a mixed character [P]; but a favourite of the Fair, one of whom was a great friend to him, during hisi mpriſonment in Venice [Q].

viglia, che ſi trovino perſone, ò tanto ignoranti ò così male impreſſionate, che poſſano darſi ad intendere una così evidente falſità; mentre frà lo ſtile (per tacer d'altro di quello abbominato Divortio) e le opere di Ferrante ſi vede quella differenza, che ſarebbe trà una giovane Donna viva e una cadavero dipinto. Ma il mondo, che vive d'opinione più che di giudicio, veduto che l'autor dell' Anima di Ferrante, che tanto gli ſi profeſſa partiale, gli hà toſta (così trattano gli Amici moderni) una macchia sì enorme ſul volto della riputatione, ſi l'hà agevolmente bevuta queſta menzogna ſenza farvi ſopra conſideratione alcuna. Anzi è tranſcorſa tanto oltre la traſcuraggine, e la impertinenza di molti ignoranti, che d'altre opere ancora ſcandaloſiſſime, che alcuni anni dopò la ſua morte ſono ſtate compoſto e publicato, vogliono crederlo e predicarlo Autore (12).

(12) Ibid. p. 9.

[O] Some account of this work.] Jeſus Chriſt obſerving that the Church of Rome, his ſpouſe, was become a proſtitute to the luſts of many Roman Pontiffs, and particularly to Urban VIII. reſolves to divorce himſelf from her, and to cohabit no longer with an adultereſs. The motives which prompt him to this ſeparation are, her having leſſened his honour in the opinion of mankind; her conſuming perpetually her ſubſtance, merely to ſatiate the rapacious appetites of thoſe who commit adultery with her; and for the daily contempt brought on him, by the diſſolute actions which are committed in the moſt barefaced manner in his own family; Rome being degenerated to a publick brothel. Divine juſtice being fully perſuaded of the validity of theſe reaſons, reſolves upon the divorce. However, in order to proceed with its uſual circumſpection, and as an example to mankind, it reſolves firſt to cauſe an exact enquiry to be made into the conduct of the ſpouſe in queſtion, and thereupon commands St. Peter to deſcend upon earth. Accordingly St. Peter viſits Lucca, Parma, Venice; and laſtly, the Eccleſiaſtical State, and the city of Rome, where being an eye-witneſs to the abuſes, and hearing, by the complaints of multitudes, of the diſſoluteneſs of the Church, he returns to heaven; where the complaints of Chriſt being fully proved, the divorce is ſolemnly pronounced. From this ſeparation of Chriſt from his ſpouſe it follows, that no more lawful ſons are born, that is, men ſincerely good and holy; as, on the contrary, by the commerce in which ſhe had been engaged with adulterers, chriſtian baſtards ſprung, that is hypocrites, among whom are included the Jeſuits and others, who, under a ſpecious appearance of ſanctity, are the moſt wicked and perverſe generation upon earth. Immediately upon the publication of this divorce, Luther, Calvin, and others, go and offer their reſpective Churches to Chriſt, as a ſpouſe for him; but Chriſt, calling to mind the injuries he had received from his Romiſh ſpouſe, reſolves to lead a life of celibacy, rather than marry among perfidious mortals. The whole is divided into three parts. The firſt treats of the diſſolute practices of the adultereſs; the ſecond of the baſtards of the Church of Rome; and the third of the aſſembly of the other Churches at the Nuptials of Chriſt (13). We are to obſerve, that only the firſt book is publiſhed. Mr. de la Monnoye affirms, that thoſe who aſſert that Ferrante Pallavicino is the author of the Divortio Celeſte, are certainly miſtaken. See Colomeſius's Bibliotheque Choiſie. Edition of 1731. p. 364*.

(13) See Il Divortio Celeſte, in vol. 1. of Pallavicino's works.

* From the remarks of the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. 1734. Tom. 4. p. 969.

[P] He was of a mixed character.] He was of ſo careleſs and profuſe a temper, that had he poſſeſſed an immenſe eſtate, he would have ſpent it all. He was never engaged in a virtuous paſſion; being inflamed to a prodigious degree with the love of the meaneſt proſtitutes. On the other ſide, no one could be more ſincere and faithful in his friendſhips. No man was ever a greater prey to treachery: inſomuch that when, upon his releaſe out of priſon in Venice, he was told that a wretch had betrayed him, he could never be prevailed upon to believe it, but cried; "How can this be; ſince he declared himſelf my friend, and I made him privy to all my concerns? Come può eſſer queſto, ſe mi faceva l'Amico, e io gli communicava tutti i miei intereſſi (14)?" 'Twas his cuſtom, whilſt he wore a religious habit, to ſtudy or write two or three hours in bed every morning. The reſt of the day he uſed to ſpend either in the company of his male friends, or with ladies (15).

(14) His Life prefixed to his works, p. 9.

(15) Ibid. p. 10.

But after he had entirely left the monaſtick life, upon pretence of ſecuring himſelf from the artifices and ſnares of his enemies, he lived in a very irregular manner; he diſcovering either through neceſſity or caprice, a ſilly taciturnity or inflexibility that ſavoured more of the Stoick than the Chriſtian: whence it is difficult to determine, whether vice or virtue were moſt predominant in him: ſo true it is, that nothing is perfect in this world; it being often found, that perſons of a ſuperior genius act worſe than the reſt of mankind, to the great ſcandal of weak minds. Così è pur vero, che non ſi trovi in queſta vita mortale coſa alcuna intieramente compita; e avenga ſovente, che quelli, che poſſiedono migliore ingegno degli altri huomini rieſcano nelle proprie attioni, con ſcandalo de' ſemplici, peggiori de gli altri huomini (16).

(16) Ibid. p. 10.

[Q] One of his miſtreſſes was a great friend to him during his impriſonment in Venice.] Though his conduct was far from amiable, yet his prodigality and licentiouſneſs even won him the affection of a great number of women. The miſtreſs in queſtion, ſeeing him, when confined, abandoned by moſt of his friends and patrons, not only ſupported him; but was the firſt who found means to convey letters to him, by which ſhe gave him ſuch informations as enabled him to make a proper defence, and to recover his liberty (17).

(17) Idem, ibid.

I.

PANORMITA (ANTHONY), a native of Palermo in Sicily (a), and deſcended from the family of the Beccatelli (b), which had long been renowned in Bologna (c), was one of the moſt learned men of the 15th Century. Being a perſon valuable for his regularity and knowledge, he went and offered his ſervice to Philip Duke of Milan, who received him with great teſtimonies of friendſhip and munificence. He inſtructed him in hiſtory, and read publick Lectures, for which he had an annual ſtipend of eight hundred crowns. He afterwards was ſecretary to Alphonſo King of Naples, and his principal man of letters [A]. The literary quarrels, in which he was engaged with Laurentius Valla,

(a) Hieron. Raguza, Elog. Siculorum, p. 33.

(b) Jovius. Elogior, cap. 12. p. 33.

(c) Hence he is called by ſome writers, Antonius Bononia.

[A] He afterwards was Secretary to Alphonſo King of Naples, and his principal man of letters.] This we may gather from the following words of Paulus Jovius; Panhormita Alphonſo adhæſit, ſecretioris ſcrinii magiſter, & ſtudiorum, expeditionumque omnium terra marique perpetuus comes (1) i. e. "Panormita devoted himſelf to Alphonſo, whoſe Secretary he was, and the companion of his ſtudies; and attended him perpetually in all his expeditions both by ſea and land." See the remark [C] of the article of that Prince (2); and add to it, if you judge proper, the following paſſage of Jovianus Pontanus: Rex Alfonſus ſtatim poſt prandium, vel Antonium Panhormitam, vel è doctis aliquem audiebat, ut qui dignum judicaret animum quoque cibo ſuo poſt paſtum corporis reficiendum eſſe (3), i. e. "It was the cuſtom for King Alphonſo to hear immediatly after dinner, the diſcourſes of Anthony Panormita, or of ſome other learned man; he being of opinion, that the mind ought to be indulged its proper nouriſhment, after the body had been fed." I muſt obſerve, that this Prince gave Panormita letters of naturalization, and made him a denizon of Naples; he likewiſe appointed him his Counſellor, and Preſident of the Royal Chamber (4).

(1) Paulus Jov. elog. cap. 12. p. 33.

(2) Citation (24) of the article NAPLES (Alphonſo.)

(3) Jov. Pontanus, de Conviv. p. 143. apud Leonard Nicodemum, Addiz. alla Bibliot. Napolet. p. 21, 22.

(4) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliot. Napoletana, p. 24.

[B] He

Valla, drew a numberleſs multitude of injurious invectives from both parties, which gave great diverſion to their common enemies. He did not marry till he was in years [B], when he took to wife a beautiful maiden, for whom he had an extreme affection, and had children by her who left poſterity (d). He was a very good humoured man (e); and made the porch or piazza in Naples famous [C], where many perſons of wit and learning uſed to meet, in order to converſe on a numberleſs multitude of ſubjects with him. He was the beſt Poet of his time; and received, from the Emperor Sigiſmund, the poetical Crown, with the antient ceremonies [D]. Beſides, he was ſkilled in the Civil Law; wrote

(d) Jovius, Elogior, cap. 12. p. 33.

(e) Imprimis facetus. Facius, de Rebus geſtis Alfonſi, lib. 3. p. 103.

[B] He did not marry till he was in years.] This is obſerved by Paulus Jovius; Senex, ſays he (5), uxorem duxit Arcellam ſibi magnopere dilectam, liberoſque ſuſcepit quorum honeſta ſoboles Neapoli viſitur, i. e. "He "married in his advanced years, Arcella, whom he "tenderly loved; and had children by her, who "left a virtuous poſterity." The King being informed that Panormita was going to marry, was, at firſt, diſpleaſed with this deſign; he ſuppoſing that it would not be poſſible for his Secretary to devote himſelf, at the ſame time, to his wife and his books, and by that means would no longer delight in ſtudy; but hearing that the woman in queſtion was virtuous and handſome, he changed his opinion, imagining, that the ſweets of marriage would compenſate for thoſe of ſtudy. Panormita himſelf informs us of this particular. Cùm audiſſet Rex me uxorem eſſe ducturum, primò improbavit, arbitratus de cætero literis ſimul & uxori me operam dare non poſſe, ac proinde vera ſolidaque literarum voluptate cariturum. Sed cum mox audiſſet, me Leonoram Aureliam virginem probam, nobilem ac formoſam duxiſſe, approbavit, literarum commoda, & honeſti conjugii ſuavitatem in æquo ponens (6). I am of opinion that Aureliam is an error, either of the Tranſcriber or Printer, and that we muſt read Arceliam; for this woman's epitaph in Jovianus Pontanus's Poems, is preceded by the following title, Lauræ Arceliæ uxoris Antonii Panhormitæ (tumulus) (7). i. e. "The monument of Laura Arcelia, wife of Anthony "Panhormita." I don't know whence Varillas extracted the following particulars, Anthony of Palermo .... had been very temperate during the firſt ſeventy years of his life; but in the ſeventy firſt, a beautiful young maiden of Naples, named Marcilla, fired him with a paſſion, and turned his thoughts to marriage. He had ſeveral children by her; and died, ten years after, with ſo little pain and diſtraction of mind, that he wrote his own epitaph a little before he died (8). Varillas does not give us the true name of Panormita's miſtreſs; and ſpoils, by too bold an hyperbole, what Paulus Jovius ſays, with regard to the time in which Panormita wrote his own epitaph: æger vitæque diffidens in ſupremo morbo hoc carmen compoſuit (9). This ſignifies no more than this, that Panormita wrote it in a fit of ſickneſs, which he judged would be fatal to him, and which accordingly was ſo. If it be true, as Jovianus Pontanus ſeems to hint (10), that Panormita and Theodorus Gaza died almoſt at the ſame time, we may ſuppoſe that Varillas is not miſtaken, with regard to Panormita's age; but he would be miſtaken, with reſpect to the duration of the marriage, ſince it is certain that Panormita married in Alphonſo's life time; and that this Prince died in 1458, and Theodorus Gaza, twenty years after. [This is a miſtake, Theodorus Gaza dying in 1475 *.]

(5) Jov. Elogior, cap. 12. p. 34.

(6) Panormita, de Dictis & Factis Alfonſi, lib. 3. num. 27. p. 63. edit. Hanov. 1611.

(7) Jovian. Pontanus, Tumulor, lib. 2. folio m. 83 verſo.

(8) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 165.

(9) Jovius, Elog. cap. 12. p. 34.

(10) See the laſt remark, num. 7.

* From the remarks to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. 1734. vol. 4. p. 969.

[C] He was a . . . man . . . who made the porch or piazza in Naples famous.] Jovianus Pontanus, his diſciple, introduces in one of his dialogues, a Sicilian, who aſks an inhabitant of Naples where this porch is; quænam quæſo bone civis Antoniana eſt porticus (11)? The other anſwers, Antonium ne hoſpes requiris, an eam quæ ab illo porticus Antoniana dicitur? i. e. "Stranger; do you want Anthony, or the porch "which is called from him?" Here follows the reply made by the Sicilian, in which the Reader will ſee the genius and caſt of Panormita's converſations, they reſembling thoſe of Socrates. Et porticum ipſam noſſe, & Antonium videre cupio, audio enim pomeridianis horis illic conventum haberi literatorum hominum. Ipſum autem Antonium quanquam multa dicit, plura tamen ſciſcitari quàm docere ſolitum: nec tam probare quæ dicantur, quàm Socratico quodam more invidere differentes. Auditores verò ipſos magis voluptatis cujuſdam eorum quæ à ſe dicantur plenos domum dimittere, quàm certos verum earum quæ in quæſtione verſentur (12). i. e. "I ſhould "be glad both to know the porch and to ſee Anthony; for I am informed, that men of learning aſſemble there every afternoon. Anthony himſelf, "though he ſays many things, it is yet his cuſtom to "aſk queſtions, rather than to teach others: and "that, after the manner of Socrates, he laughs at "thoſe who converſe, rather than approves of whatever is advanced: That the auditors return to their "houſes more pleaſed with the things ſaid, than "perſuaded of the truth of thoſe matters which are "diſputed upon." I will add to this, a fragment of the Neapolitan's reply. Hæc, illa eſt porticus, in qua ſedere ſolebat ille ſenum omnium feſtiviſſimus. Conveniebant autem docti viri, nobileſque item homines ſanè multi. Ipſe quòd in proximo habitaret, primus hic conſpici, interim dum Senatus, ut ipſe uſurpabat, cogeretur, aut jocans cum prætereuntibus, aut ſecum aliquid ſuccinens, quod animum oblectaret (13). i. e. "This is the "porch, in which that pleaſant old man uſed to ſit. "Men of learning, and likewiſe a great number of "perſons of diſtinction uſed to meet here. As he "lived near this place, he always came to it firſt; "and, till ſuch time as the aſſembly was met, he "uſed either to joke with thoſe who paſt by, or hum "over a tune, to divert himſelf." As Panormita was a facetious man, and a great lover of witty ſayings, I believe we may ſay, that had it been uſual, in this age, to make collections in ana, as has ſince been the cuſtom (14), we ſhould have had a book, entitled, Panormitaniana, which would acquaint us with a great number of particulars. The aſſemblies of this porch were doubtleſs like to thoſe of Menage. If the Reader is deſirous of having a proof, that Panormita uſed to ſay witty things, he may conſult Pontanus de Sermone, and he will meet with ſeveral; and, among others, one that is grown very common, viz. in order that a good harmony may be kept in a family, it is neceſſary that the wife ſhould be blind and the huſband deaf. Antonius Panhormitæ ſuavis admodum vir interrogatus ad rem uxoriam jucunde concorditerque agendam, quibuſnam maximè opus eſſe duceret? ſumpto argumento à frequentia moleſtiarum ac magnitudine, quæ in vita contingeret conjugali: duobus tantum opus eſſe reſpondit, vir ut aurium ſurditate teneretur, uxor verò ut oculis eſſet capta: ne altera videlicet inſpiceret quæ à marito intemperanter fierent plurima, alter ne audiret obgannientem aſſiduo domi uxorem (15). i. e. "Anthony Panormita, a man of a moſt de"lightful converſation, being aſked, what circum"ſtance was moſt neceſſary, in order for the making "the ſtate of wedlock pleaſant and eaſy; the ſub"ject of the diſcourſe being on the repeated and "great ſtrife that is found in families; anſwered, "that two things only were required, viz. that the "huſband ſhould be deaf, and the wife blind; in or"der that the latter might not be able to ſee her "huſband's many wild pranks, and the former "unable to hear his wife's perpetual din."

(11) Jovian. Pontanus, in Dialogo Antonius, initio.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. 1196.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 1198. See alſo de Sermone, lib. 6. cap. 4. p. 1741.

(14) I write this in 1697.

(15) Jovian. Pontan. de Sermone, lib. 3. cap. 17. p. 1645, 1646.

[D] He was the beſt Poet of his time; and received .... the poetical Crown, with the antient ceremonies. He is conſidered as the firſt reſtorer of Latin poetry: Obliteratam nedum langueſcentem in Italia poëticam reſtituit in antiquam pene formam (16). And here follows the compliment which Faccius made him in the perſon of Guarini: Quod in cæteris partibus te antecedam, in eo tibi planè non aſſentior, præſertim cum tu Juriſconſultus & Eques ſis: cumque plures Rhetores his temporibus inveniantur ſatis clari; Poëta autem illuſtris præter te nullus, qui quidem à Sigiſmundo Imperatore propter optimum de te judicium, conſenſu omnium excitatum, laurea corona more majorum donatus ſis, quæ res uſque adhuc noſtrum contigit neminì (17), i. e. "I cannot "directly agree with you, when you affirm that I am "ſuperior to you in other reſpects, particularly as "you are a Civilian and a Knight; and notwith"ſtanding

(16) Idem, de Sermone, lib. 6. cap. 4. p. m. 1738.

(17) Barthol. Faccius, de hum. vitæ Felicitate, circa init. p. m. 108.

(f) Facius de Rebus geſtis Alfonſi, lib. 3. p. 103.

wrote well in proſe, and was a good orator (f). He was employed in State Affairs, as well becauſe of his abilities, as the great fame of his wiſdom [E]. King Alphonſo deputed him to the Venetians in 1451, to requeſt of him Livy's arm-bone (g), which was granted. Panormita ſold an eſtate to purchaſe this hiſtorian [F]. He wrote an epitaph for himſelf, which is, at one and the ſame time, a proof of his preſumption and orthodoxy [G]. He ſubmitted, with great reſolution, to the tedious pains which the ſtrangury brought upon him, and reaſoned admirably well on adverſity and proſperity [H]. Some of his writings have been publiſhed (b), but his Latin Poem entitled Hermaphro-

(g) See the article LIVY.

(b) There was printed at Venice in 1553, five books of his Epiſtles, two Orations, and ſome Verſes. See the laſt remark.

" ſtanding that there are many famous Rhetoricians " in this age, yet you are the only eminent Poet, " on whom Sigiſmund the Emperor, excited by the " advantageous opinion which the whole world en- " tertains of you, beſtowed the laurel crown, after " the manner of our anceſtors; an honour that has " not been ſince paid to any of our Literati." Voſſius did not rightly underſtand theſe words; he imagining they ſignified, that no man had received the poetical crown before Panormita. But this is a miſtake; and had Faccius meant this, he would have advanced an egregious falſhood; for what man is ignorant of the ſolemnity of Petarch's poetical coronation? But Guarinus's compliment was this. The Emperor has crowned you after the manner of our anceſtors, and none of us (Literati) have obtained this honour ſince that time. This ſenſe is very different from that of Voſſius, whoſe words are as follow: Panormita hic à Bartholomæo Faccio initio lib. de humanæ vitæ felicitate poeta atque eques præclarus nominatur: & mox, clarus & ſingularis poeta & juriſconſultus. Ac paullò poſt ait Sigiſmundo Imp. laurea donatum coronâ, more majorum, quæ res uſque ad id tempus contigiſſet nemini (18). i. e. " Bartholomew Facci- " us, in the beginning of his book De humanæ vitæ " felicitate, calls Panormita a renowned poet and " knight; and afterwards, an illuſtrious and extra- " ordinary poet and civilian. A little after this, he " relates, that the Emperor Sigiſmund, purſuant to " a cuſtom, anciently uſed, beſtowed on him the " laurel crown, which no man had been honoured " with till that time."

(18) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. lib. 3. p. 593.

[E] He was employed in ſtate affairs, as well becauſe of his abilities, as the great fame of his wiſdom.] Peruſe the following words of Faccius: Miſit igitur Otolinus ad Alphonſum, qui peteret ad ſe mitti quempiam ex iis quibus fidelioribus uteretur, qui cum de deditione ageret, & nominatim Antonium Panhormitam, quem Poetam non inſuavem Mediolani apud Philippum in magna gratia & dignitate cognoverat: cumque non tantum propter prudentiam, ſed multo etiam magis propter æquitatis opinionem, & quod illum ab Alphonſo apprime diligi acceperat (19). i. e. " Otolinus therefore ſent a meſſage to Al- " phonſo, deſiring that ſome truſty perſon might " come to him, to treat concerning a ſurrender; and " Anthony Panormita in particular, whom he knew " to have been a delightful Poet in Milan, and in " very great favour with Philip, not only on ac- " count of his wiſdom, but much more from the ad- " vantageous idea he entertained of his equity, and " becauſe of his being told that Alphonſo had a ve- " ry great affection for him." In the hiſtorian cited by me, is inſerted the ſpeech which Panormita made to the inhabitants of Gaeta in Alphonſo's name, and that made by him to the Venetians, to congratulate them on the peace.

(19) Faccius, de humanæ vitæ Felicitate, p. 102, 103, apud Leon. Nicodem. Addiz. alla Bibliotheca Napolet. p. 22, 23.

[F] Panormita ſold an eſtate to purchaſe Livy.] " It " is well known, that Beccatelli (called Bologna) of " Palermo, was obliged to ſell an eſtate, in order to " purchaſe a Livy, in the hand-writing of Poggius " the Florentine, who laid out the money ariſing " from the ſale of his book, in another eſtate " near Florence, about the year 1455 (20)." Theſe are Baillet's words, who quotes for it p. 154, of Gallois, Traité des Bibliotheques (Treatiſe of Libraries.) I have looked into this treatiſe, and found a French tranſlation of the letter, which was written on this ſubject to King Alphonſo. It is as follows; May it pleaſe your Majeſty, you have informed me, from Florence, that Livy's works, written in a beautiful hand, are to be ſold, and that the price is an hundred and twenty crowns. I beſeech your Majeſty to let this Author, whom we commonly entitle the King of books, be ſent to me, and I will not fail to ſend the money demanded for it. I intreat you, out of your great wiſdom, to let me know, whether Pog-

(20) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, Tom. 1. ch. 14. § 1.

gius or I act the moſt prudent part; whether he who, to purchaſe a farm near Florence, diſpoſes of Livy, or I, who, to buy that Author in his hand-writing, ſell my eſtate. Your goodneſs and modeſty prompt me to aſk you this familiar queſtion. Farewel and triumph (21). If the Reader is deſirous of ſeeing Gallois's reflections, he may peruſe what follows (22): " In my opinion, " it was beneath the dignity of ſo great a King, to " let ſo worthy a man diſpoſe of his eſtate to pur- " chaſe Livy; but he ought, as became a generous " Prince, to have ſent it him by way of gift. And " I am of opinion, that Peccatel (23) ought not to " have blamed Poggius for ſelling his Livy, ſince " he might have two copies of that Author in his " poſſeſſion; or, might have read it over ſo often, " that he had not any further occaſion for it."

(21) Gallois, traité des Bibliotheques, p. 154, 155.

(22) Ibid. p. 155.

(23) He ſhou'd have ſaid Beccatel.

I ſhall make three ſhort remarks on this occaſion. 1. Panormita does not ſay that he was to purchaſe this manuſcript from Poggius; on the contrary, he intimates very evidently, that Poggius's Livy was already ſold, and that the monies ariſing from it, had been already laid out in the purchaſe of a farm. But I will tranſcribe the Latin letter, that the Reader may ſee how unfaithfully the French Tranſlator has acted on this occaſion. Significaſti mihi nuper ex Florentia extare Titi Livii opera venalia, literis pulcherrimis, libro pretium eſſe 120 aureos. Quare Majeſtatem tuam oro, ut Livium, quem Regem librorum appellare conſuevimus, emi meo nomine, ac deferri ad nos facias. Interim ego pecuniam procurabo quam pro libri pretio tradam. Sed illud à prudentia tua ſcire deſidero, uter ego an Poggius melius fecerit; is ut villam Florentiæ emeret, Livium vendidit quem ſua manu pulcherrimè ſcripſerat: ego ut Livium emam fundum proſcripſi. Hæc ut familiariter à te peterem ſuaſit humanitas & modeſtia tua. Vale, & triumpha (24). 2. It is falſe to ſay, that Panormita blames Poggius; he leaving it to the wiſdom of King Alphonſo to determine, whether it be more prudent to ſell a book to purchaſe an eſtate, than to ſell an eſtate to buy a book; but he himſelf pronounces nothing on this occaſion. 3. The excuſe that Poggius might have read Livy ſo often, that he had occaſion for it no longer, is altogether chimerical. A man, though he often reads ſuch a work, does not learn it by heart; and it cannot be uſeleſs to him, unleſs he knows it almoſt by heart.

(24) Anton. Panormita, Epiſtol. lib. 5. cited by Naudæus, Addit à l'Hiſt. Louis XI. p. 88.

[G] He wrote an epitaph for himſelf, which is at one and the ſame time a proof of his preſumption and orthodoxy.] It was contained in the four verſes following:

Quærite, Pierides, alium qui ploret amores,
Quærite qui regum fortia facta canat.
Me pater ille ingens, hominum ſator atque redemptor,
Evocat, & ſedes donat adire pias.

That is, O Muſes, ſeek for another Poet to write amorous verſes, and ſing the mighty acts of Kings; for I am going to Paradiſe, whither I am called by the great God, the Creator and Redeemer of Mankind. Gyraldus conſideredt his epitaph only on its unfavourable ſide; he taking notice of the Author's arrogance, and not ſeeing his orthodoxy. Senex diem obiit, hocque ſibi moriens Epitaphium arrogantiæ plenum condidiſſe legi (25). I am of opinion that he did not diſcover any principle of Heterodoxy in it, upon pretence that purgatory was excluded from it.

(25) Gyrald. de Poet. ſui tempor. Dialog. 1.

[H] He ſubmitted, with great reſolution, to the tedious pains, which the ſtrangury brought upon him, and reaſoned admirably well on adverſity and proſperity.] Jovianus Pontanus, his diſciple, ſhall be my voucher on this occaſion, he ſpeaking, as having been an eye-witneſs. Vidimus Antonium Panhormitam multos annos tormina & urinæ difficultatem tam ſedate ferre, ut etiam diſſimulare videri poſſet ægritudinem (26). i. e. " I " ſaw, for many years, Anthony Panormita bear the " cholic

(26) Jovian. Pontanus, de Fortitudine, lib. 2. folio, m. 51.

Hermaphroditus is ſtill in manuſcript. This piece is ſtuffed with ſo many obſcenities, that Poggius himſelf diſapproved it [I]. Moreri has not committed many conſiderable errors

" cholic and ſtrangury with ſo much patience, that " one would have judged he did not labour under a- " ny infirmity." He obſerved, in another book, that Panormita was always chearful, whether his circumſtances were happy or unhappy; it was his maxim or principle to refer all things to God; and to ſuppoſe that the cauſes of infelicity and happineſs are hid from us; and that many accidents are looked upon as unhappy, which are not ſo, ſince they are ſo many opportunities which Providence gives us to diſplay our conſtancy and reſolution. Quid erat lætis in rebus Antonio jucundius? quid rurſus in turbatis atque aſperis gratius? Incredibilis quædam in ejus oratione vis inerat res humanas contemnendi, ferendique fortuitos caſus æquo animo, quippe cum omnia referret ad Deum, diceretque latêre nos & honorum, & malorum cauſas. Pleraque autem videri quæ non eſſent mala, ut quæ objecta nobis eſſent à Deo, quò humana in iis conſtantia fortitudoque enitesceret. Quotum enim fortem inveniri, ſi quieta & ſecura omnia nobis forent? natos eſſe homines ad comparandam virtutem, ad excolendos animos, neminem autem ſine laboribus plurimis poſſe hoc aſſequi, ſed decipi opinione, nimiſque demiſsè, ac molliter nobiſcum nos ipſos agere: quæ fluant aquas ſalubriores eſſe, magiſque probari: quæ verò reſtagnent, noxias ac peſtilentes eſſe. . . . . Optimo itaque & fortiſſimo cuique labores ac moleſtias offerri à Deo, eamque veluti materiam præberi in qua ſeſe exerceat, cum excellentia hominum cæterorum. Tum Imperatores ipſi quos præcipuè ament, & quorum virtus eſt proſpectior, iis graviſſima & periculoſiſſima quæque demandent. Atque hanc quidem ipſam, non quæ prædam quæritaret, maximè illuſtrem militiam eſſe. Et verò ignavi eſſe, imbecilli, deſidis, odiſſe labores, fugitare moleſtias, velleque in ocio, ac ſub umbra marceſcere (27). i. e. " What man could be gayer in proſperity, " than Panormita; or, on the other ſide, more chear- " ful in adverſity? His diſcourſes were indued with " a ſurpriſing force, for exciting men to deſpiſe all " ſublunary things, and to bear misfortunes with pa- " tience and reſignation; he referring all things to " the Almighty, and ſaying that the cauſes of good " and evil are concealed from us. That many things " appear as evils in our eye, which are not ſo in " themſelves; but that they are ſo many opportu- " nities given us by God, to make our patience and " reſolution the more conſpicuous. If we were " never ruffled by adverſity, what man would be " found ſteddy and reſolute? Men came into the " world to acquire virtue, and to improve and adorn " their minds, and none can do this without great " pains and labour; but our opinions miſlead us, and " we act in too mean and effeminate a manner " with ourſelves: running ſtreams are more ſalubri- " ous and pleaſant; but ſuch as ſtagnate are noxious " and peſtiferous. . . . . The Almighty therefore of- " fers, to every good and virtuous man, toils and ca- " lamities, as ſo many opportunities for him to ex- " erciſe and diſtinguiſh himſelf above the reſt of " mankind. Generals ſend the braveſt, and thoſe " who are deareſt to them, upon the moſt difficult " and moſt hazardous attempts; and, to ſay the " truth, this is the nobleſt warfare, and not that " whoſe object is ſpoil and rapine. But it is the in- " dication of a mean and daſtardly ſoul, to hate la- " bour, to fly from trouble, and to languiſh in eaſe " and indolence." Nothing can be finer than theſe common places; and they are very juſt, according to the ſtate mankind is in; but it muſt be confeſſed at the ſame time, that they ſuppoſe it a ſtrange and odd ſtate; for what can be more aſtoniſhing and incomprehenſible, than to ſee man reduced to ſuch a condition, that, to avoid greater evils, he muſt be unhappy? Why is he not conducted from one ſtage of good or virtue to another, till he attain the ſummit of perfection? Why muſt uneaſineſs, pain, and miſery, be the leaſt diſadvantageous path he can ſtrike into? The Heathens could not make one ſolid objection to this difficulty, and were ſo ſtupid as to ſcarce think once about it; but it may be ſolved by revelation.

(27) Idem, in Dialogo Antoninus, initio, p. m. 1197.

[I] His Hermaphroditus is ſtuffed with ſo many obſcenities, that Poggius himſelf diſapproved it.] It was dedicated to Coſmo de Medicis, who cauſed ſeveral copies to be made of it, ſome of which are ſtill in St. Laurence's library (28). The reaſon of its being dedicated to this great man was, becauſe, regardleſs of the opinion of the vulgar, he took a pleaſure in reading this laſcivious piece. The Author himſelf makes this remark, he beginning as follows: Hermaphroditi libellus incipit ad Coſmum Florentinum ex illuſtri progenie Medicorum virum clariſſimum. Quod ſpreto vulgo libellum æquo animo legat, quamvis laſcivum & ſecum una priſcos viros imitetur (29). Magliabecchi has a manuſcript copy of this poem (30). Many letters were wrote, at this time, upon this poem. Guarinus of Verona (31) wrote one to John Lamola, in which he beſtows high encomiums on the Hermaphrodite, and its Author; the original letter is in Magliabecchi's poſſeſſion. Giraldi thinks it ſtrange that this poem ſhould have been applauded: Legi, ſays he, ejus ætatis quorundam Epiſtolas, quibus Hermaphroditus illius multis laudibus commendatur, ſed quare neſcio. Dicam ego vobis ſanè quid ſentio, nec is mihi Poeta bonus, nec bonus Orator; quæ enim ſoluto & pedeſtri ſermone ejus ſcripta legi, luxuriantis magis quam bonæ frugis referta videntur, ut impudicas & proſtitutas ejus Muſas mittam. i. e. " I have peruſed the letters " of ſome perſons of that age, in which high enco- " miums are beſtowed on his Hermaphroditus, but for " what reaſon I know not. I'll tell you my ſincere " opinion; he does not appear to me either a good " Poet or Orator. Such proſe pieces of his, as I " have read, ſeem to me of a luxuriant, rather than " of a ſolid caſt; to ſay nothing of his looſe, pro- " ſtitute muſes." By this it is plain, that he not only deteſts the laſciviouſneſs of this piece, but alſo deſpiſes the verſification. Poggius did not extend his critique ſo far. He had applauded the invention, the wit, and the embelliſhments of the work in queſtion; but he condemned the obſcene touches with which it is interſperſed; and adviſed the Author to employ himſelf, for the future, in works that were more ſuitable to a Chriſtian. Delectatus ſum, me hercle, varietate rerum & elegantia verſuum: ſimulque admiratus ſum res adeo impudicas, adeo ineptas, tam venuſtè, tam compoſitè à te dici, atque ita multa exprimi turpiuſcula, at non enarrari ſed agi videantur: nec ficta à te jocandi cauſa, ut exiſtimo, ſed acta exiſtimari poſſint. Laudo ego doctrinam tuam, jucunditatem carminis, jocos ac ſales . . . . pro charitate tamen qua omnibus debitores ſumus, unum eſt quod te monere & debeo & volo, ut ſcilicet deinceps graviora quidem mediteris, hæc enim quæ adhuc edidiſti, vel ætati concedi poſſunt, vel licentiæ jocandi . . . . ſcis enim non licere idem nobis qui Chriſtiani ſumus, quod olim Poetis qui Deum ignorabant (33). Panormita anſwered Poggius; and alledged a great many reaſons, to juſtify or excuſe himſelf (34). Poggius replied to him; and aſſerted, that a man ought to practiſe virtue, not only in his actions, but alſo in his writings (35): whence we may infer, that he repented his having employed his pen in laſcivious compoſitions during his youth. Dal che comprehende ch' eſſo ſi pentiſſe delle facezie, e dell' altre coſe meno oneſte che in gioventu ſcritte avea (36). I will conclude with the following words of a Dutch Writer, who has peruſed the obſcene poem of Panormita: de Hermaphrodito quod dicit (Gyraldus) non eſt de nihilo: ego enim legi manu deſcriptum, (neque enim unquam eſt typis excuſus) adeo ſpurcum, adeo abominabilem, ut nihil ſupra. Verſus deinde ipſi vix ſunt tolerabiles, tantum abeſt ut laudem aliquam mereantur. Inſcribitur autem Hermaphroditus, eo quod utriuſque ſexus membra genitalia utriuſque libelli omnem materiam faciant. Hæc qui patienter legit, næ illum oportet eſſe hominem frugi (37). i. e. " Gyraldus had reaſon to ſpeak as he does of " the poem called Hermaphroditus. I myſelf have " read it in manuſcript (it having never been print- " ed;) and it is certain that no piece was ever more " filthy and abominable. Then, as to the verſifica- " tion, it is ſo far from deſerving applauſe, that it " is ſcarce tolerable, It is entitled Hermaphroditus, " becauſe the privities of both ſexes form the whole " ſubject of both books. He who can read them " with any patience, muſt be a man of great temper."

(28) Leon. Nicodemo, Addiz. alla Biblioth. Napolet. p. 21.

(29) See Nicodemo, ibid. p. 20.

(30) Idem ibid.

(31) In this manner I correct Gravino Veroneſe, in Nicodemo, ibid.

(32) Lil. Gregor. Gyraldus, de Poetis ſui tempor. Dialogo 1. p. 385, apud Nicodemum, ibid.

(33) Pogg. Epiſt. p. 131, 132, apud Nicodem. ibid. p. 21.

(34) Nicodem. ibid.

(35) Idem, ibid.

(36) Nicodem. ibid.

(37) Author Anonymus Notarum ad Poemata Sannazari, p. 202, 303. edit. Amſtelod. 1689. [N. B. This anonymous Author was Janas Broukuſius. Remark by the Tranſl.]

[K] Moreri

errors [K] ; and thoſe of Varillas are not ſo numerous. See then in the note [B].

[K] Moreri has not committed many conſiderable errors.] 1. Inſtead of ſaying, as he has done, that Panormita was a native of Bologna, and of a family which came originally from Sicily, he ſhould have ſaid the direct contrary. Varillas alſo declares him to have been a native of Bologna (38). 2. He ſhould not have affirmed, that Philip, Lord of Milan, prevailed with him to come to his Court : but ought rather to have affirmed, that Panormita made an offer of his wit and talents to Philip Duke of Milan. Quum Philippo Mediolanenſium principi fertilis ingenii induſtriam obtuliſſet, tanta liberalitate ſuſceptus eſt ut, &c. (39). Theſe are the words of Paulus Jovius, and of the authors cited by Moreri. 3. Why does he ſay that Panormita did not devote himſelf to the King of Naples, till after the Duke of Milan's death ? Does not Paulus Jovius inſinuate the direct contrary ? Verum eo (Philippo) graviſſimis bellis occupato, Panhormita Alfonſo adhæſit (40). 4. I have ſhewn elſewhere (41) the falſity of theſe words of Moreri ; he wrote the hiſtory of this King with care. Now this pretended hiſtory is only a collection of apophthegms and certain memorable actions of Alfonſo, De Dictis & Factis Alfonſi Regis Aragonum Libri quatuor *. This Monarch gave the Author a thouſand crowns by way of recompence (42). 5. 'Tis a miſtake to aſſert, that there are many editions of this hiſtory, with commentaries and remarks, by Æneas Silvius ; for theſe pretended commentaries and remarks are only a collection of actions or ſentences like to thoſe of Alfonſo, ſpoken or performed by other Princes. I muſt take notice, by the way, of an error of Voſſius. He imagined that Panormita's piece, and that of Silvius, had been always printed ſeparately, till Marquard Freherus publiſhed them as parallels. Utrumque opus SEORSIM antea excuſum παραλλήλως atque emendatius in Germania prodiit (Hannoviæ, anno 1611) cura Marquardi Freheri (43). This is a miſtake which he might have avoided, by conſulting Geſner's Bibliotheca ; where he might have found that, in the edition of Baſil, anno 1538. Panormita's things are interwoven, chapter by chapter, with Æneas Silvius's collections. Cum Æneas Silvii commentariis quæ capitatim cum Alphonſinis contendunt (44). Paul Jovius was not ignorant of this : he ſaying, ſpeaking of Panormita's book, quem pius Pontifex exemplis paribus INTERTEXTIS nobiliorem reddidiſſe videtur (45). i. e. " Which the pious Pope ſeems to have greatly " improved, by interweaving parallel examples " I don't find fault with the word Commentariis, which Voſſius employs, ſpeaking of Æneas Sylvius's book ; that word, in Latin, being of a much more extenſive ſignification than the word Commentaire, in French. 6. Since none of the three authors cited by Moreri ſay this, he himſelf ſhould have ſaid, viz. that it is certain Panormita ſurvived King Alphonſo, who died in 1458 ; and that it is probable he did not die till after the year 1460. 7. This probability is not well proved, alledging a letter written to Panormita by Philephus in 1458 ; for he doubtleſs received a great many letters the ſame year that he died. Obſerve, that I do not mean to deny, but that he lived till after the year 1460 : I only condemn an author, as being too haſty and raſh, in affirming particulars which his vouchers do not. The reaſon why I think that Panormita lived after the year 1460 is this. 'Tis obſerved, in the ſame dialogue, where 'tis ſaid that he was but lately dead ; Nuper paucos antequam morbo aggravaretur dies † (46) ; that Theodore the Greek had not been long dead ; Et Theodorus Græcus qui diem nuper obiit (47.) Now I am of opinion that this Greek is the ſame perſon with Theodore Gaza, who died in 1478 (48) ; and I therefore do not alledge what we find in the ſame dialogue, that a little above an hundred years before ; (Centum ante annis aut paulo amplius (49) ;) a conflagration had broke out in the iſland Ænaria ; Pontanus's calculation not being accurate, this irruption of fire happening in 1301 (50). 8. He ſhould have cited Miræus in Auctario and not in Aug. but I aſcribe this error to the correctors of the preſs ; but that, of citing Miræus, muſt be charged to the author. 'Twas to no purpoſe to cite him, ſince the few particulars he ſays of Panormita are found in Paulus Jovius. I alſo might criticiſe the place given to our Panormita, viz. under the word Antonius, which is not proper.

(38) Varill. Anecdotes de Florence, p. 165.

(39) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 12. p. 34.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) In the text of the article NAPLES (Alphonſo King of)

* Note [C] in the additions to this article below.

(42) Jovianus Pontanus de Liberalitate, folio m. 97.

(43) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 593.

(44) Geſn. Bibl. folio 62 verſo.

(45) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 12. p. 34.

† See the cloſe of the Text of the additions to this article, below.

(46) Pontanus, in Dialogo Antonius, p. 1198.

(47) Idem, ibid. p. 1237.

(48) Geſner, in Biblioth. folio 611 verſo.

(49) J. Pontan. in Dialogo, Antonius, p. 1231.

(50) Scipio Mazzella, de Balneis Puteolan, p. m. 255.

☞ PANORMITA (ANTHONY) went commonly by the name of Antonio Bologna Beccadelli Palermitano, or ſimply Panormita. He was born in 1393, of Henry Beccadelli, ſurnamed Bononia, becauſe of the place of his birth ; he having been knighted by Martin King of Sicily, and ſeveral times commandant of Palermo. After going thro' his ſtudies in his native country, he went to Bologna, where he ſtudied the law, and took his Doctor's degree [A]. The Duke of Milan did not only procure him the profitable employment above-mentioned (a), but alſo permitted him to quarter the ſerpent, (the arms of Milan) with his own. He alſo was greatly eſteemed and rewarded by Alphonſo King of Naples [B], and no leſs by King Ferdinand his Succeſſor ; he being in very flouriſhing circumſtances till his death. He died the 6th of January 1471, aged 78 years, and was buried in St. Dominick's Church, in Naples (b). He was the firſt who founded the Academy of Naples, ſince ſo famous under the name of Pontanus's Academy (c). Here follows a complete catalogue of his works [C].

(a) In the text of the article above.

(b) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 9. p. 48 & ſeq. Paris 1729, 12mo. Remarks to the Paris edit. (1734) of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 969.

(c) Niceron, p. 58.

PARACLET,

[A] . . . . took his Doctor's degree.] So great were his vivacity and the compaſs of his genius, that he could not confine himſelf merely to the ſtudy of the Law, but applied himſelf to divinity, hiſtory, and poetry. Polite Literature, which was his chief delight, employed the greateſt part of his time ; and it was in the view of improving himſelf in it, that he viſited ſeveral cities of Italy, and among others Pavia, Piacenza, Padua, &c (1).

[B] . . . . Rewarded by Alphonſo King of Naples.] This Prince ſent him, ſeveral times, as his Embaſſador to the Emperor Frederick III. to the republicks of Venice, Florence, and Genoa, and to ſeveral Princes of Italy ; in all which he diſcharged his duty to ſo much advantage, as gained him ſtill more the favour of his Sovereign, and freſh marks of diſtinction ; Alphonſo permitting him to quarter his arms with thoſe of Naples ; the inſtrument of which grant is ſigned by the King's own hand, and dated the 5th of February 1450 (2).

[C] Here follows a complete catalogue of his works.] 1. De dictis & factis Alphonſi Regis Aragonum libri quatuor Commentarii in eoſdem Æneæ Sylvii, quo capitatim cum Alphonſinis contendit. Adjecta ſunt ſingulis libris ſcholia per D. Jacobum Spiegelium Baſileæ, 1538, in 4to. It. Cura Davidis Chytræi Wittembergæ 1585, 4to. and Roſtochii 1590, 4to. It. Hannoviæ 1611, 4to. It. Tranſlated into Spaniſh by John Molina, at Burgos 1553, 4to. Panormita, when he had finiſhed this piece, ſent it to Æneas Sylvius, who added to every chapter ſome action or ſentence like that of Alphonſo, ſaid or done by other Princes, and theſe were printed together in all the editions of this work. 2. In Coronatione Frederici III. Imperatoris oratio, Romæ habita, anno 1452. This ſpeech, of which there is a very antient edition in Venice, 4to, was inſerted by Marquard Freherus in the third volume of the Hiſtorians of Germany. Hannoviæ 1611, folio. 'Tis likewiſe a collection entitled Principum & illuſtrium virorum Epiſtolæ, of which there are many editions in Venice, Straſburg, and laſtly at Amſterdam, in 1644, 12mo. 3. Ad Januenſes contra Venetos in bellum exhortatio. He delivered this ſpeech in Genoa, whither King Alphonſo had deputed

(1) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, p. 48, 49. Tom. 9. Paris 1729, 12mo.

(2) Ibid. p. 50, 51.

PARACLET, an Abbey of Maidens, the foundation of which is owing to Peter Abelard. That learned man having turned Monk in the Abbey of St. Denys, when Heloiſe's relation had cauſed him to be baſely mutilated, fell out more than once with his brethren; and at laſt he had reaſon to fear leſt they ſhould deliver him up to the Civil Power, becauſe he had aſſerted, that St. Denys the Areopagite did not convert the French nation to the Chriſtian Religion. He took ſanctuary in the territories of Theobald, Count of Champagne, and lived near Provins, in a cell depending on the Monks of Troyes. Some time after he got leave from the Abbot of St. Denys to retire into ſuch hermitage as he ſhould chooſe, provided it did not depend upon any Monaſtery; ſo that he choſe a very ſolitary retirement in the Dioceſe of Troyes [A]. He built there a little cottage * on a ſpot of ground that was given him, and with the Biſhop's leave, he turned that cottage into an oratory, which he conſecrated to the Trinity (a). His ſcholars being acquainted with it, flocked from every part to that deſert, where they built little huts, being content to live upon greens and roots, and to be in a manner reduced to bread and water, if they could but hear the lectures of that celebrated Profeſſor. He could not dig the ground, and was aſhamed to beg; he thought it therefore proper to live by his tongue, by returning to his antient profeſſion, ſince his ſcholars were willing to furniſh him with the neceſſaries of life. They did more, for they enlarged the oratory, and built it up with wood and ſtones. It was then Abelard gave it the name of Paraclet (the Comforter) to preſerve the memory of the conſolations he had met with in that deſert. Albericus of Rheims, and Ludolphus of Lombardy had a long while entertained an envious jealouſy againſt him; which revived and raged moſt furiouſly in their breaſts, when they knew how many ſcholars were gone to hear him, and ſettled about him, notwithſtanding the inconveniencies of the place, and in contempt of the other maſters they could moſt eaſily meet with in the cities. Albericus therefore and Ludolphus took hold of all the opportunities they could to vex him: nor would they let that opportunity ſlip, which the title of Paraclet furniſhed them with. They ſaid it was a novelty, and that it could not be more lawful to conſecrate Churches to the Holy Ghoſt, than to God the Father. This provoked a great number of people againſt him: but the perſecution proved infinitely more terrible, when theſe two perſons had won over to their party, St. Bernard and St. Norbert, who pretended to a great zeal, and to a ſpirit of reformation. It was not poſſible to hold out againſt ſuch adverſaries: Abelard was forced to give way to them; and retired into lower Britany, where the Monks of the Abbey of St. Gildys of Ruys had choſen him for their Abbot. The Paraclet continued uninhabited, till the Abbot of St. Denys had driven the Nuns of Argenteuil out of their convent. Heloiſe their Prioreſs, not knowing which way to turn herſelf, was extremely glad that her huſband was willing to yield the Paraclet to her. Pope Innocent II. confirmed that donation in the year 1131 (b), and this is the origin of the Abbey of the Paraclet. Heloiſe was the firſt Abbeſs of it. There were conſiderable eſtates given to it in a little time (c). The Abeſſes, who ſucceeded Heloiſe, were pretty often of the moſt antient families in the Kingdom. You will meet with a liſt of them in Abelard's words (d), from the firſt foundation, which happened in the year 1130, to the year 1615. But they did not think proper

* Or Thatch-houſe.

(a) Ibi a quibuſdam terra mihi donata, aſſenſu Epiſcopi terræ Oratorium quoddam in nomine Sanctæ Trinitatis ex calamis & culmo primùm conſtruxi. Abælard. Oper. p. 28.

(b) Taken from Abelard's letter, which contains an account of his misfortunes.

(c) Plus ut arbitror uno anno in terrenis commodis ſunt multiplicatæ, quam ego per centum ſi ibi permanſiſſem. Idem, p. 34. i. e. "They got "more riches in "one year, than "they would "have done, "if I had ſtaid "there an hundred years."

(d) Not. Andr. du Cheſne in Hiſt. Calamit. Abelardi.

puted him, to excite that Commonwealth to take up arms againſt the Venetians, with whom he was then engaged in war. 'Tis inſerted in the book, entitled, Summa oratorum omnium, &c. printed under the direction of Albert de Eyb, in Rome, 1475, folio. 4. Orationes duæ ad Cætunos & ad Venetos de Pace. Theſe two ſpeeches are in Bartholomew Facio's hiſtory De rebus geſtis Alphonſi. The firſt, in the third book; and the ſecond, in the ninth. 4. Epiſtolarum Libri. 5. Orationes duæ & Carmina. Venetiis 1553, 4to. The firſt four books contain the letters he wrote whilſt he was in the Duke of Milan's ſervice; and the fifth, thoſe he wrote whilſt he lived in King Alphonſo's Court. The firſt of the two ſpeeches is, Ad Alphonſum regem; the ſecond, entitled, Ad Genuenſes contrà Turcas, is the ſame, a few particulars excepted, with that cited in N°. III. above, Ad Januenſes contrà Venetos. The poetical pieces were wrote in his juvenile days. 6. In the book entitled, Regis Ferdinandi & aliorum Epiſtolæ ac orationes utriuſque militia, Viſiæquenſi 1586, 8vo; are many letters of Panormita, which are not in the collection abovementioned.

He has wrote ſome other works which were never printed; ſuch as Hermaphroditus (3). This Poem is in manuſcript in the Great Duke of Tuſcany's library. It gave, during the author's life time, ſo much offence on account of its great licentiouſneſs, ſeveral manuſcript copies of it having got abroad, that two famous preachers in that age, Bernardi di Sienna, and Robert di Lecce, (ſo well known under the name of Licio) after having inveighed againſt the Author, burnt them in the great ſquares at Bologna, Ferrara, and Milan. Poggius himſelf, who has publiſhed ſuch looſe ſtories, and was Panormita's friend, being diſpleaſed at the obſcene pieces, admoniſhed him, twice, of the injury this did to his reputation. Albert de Eyb, in his Marguerite Poetique, which is a collection, both in proſe and verſe, extracted from Authors antient and modern, has extracted about thirty verſes, Ex Joanne Antonio Hermaphrodita, as he ridicuouſly calls the author; corrupting in this manner Anthony Panormita's name and the title of his book (4).

(3) See the Note [I] of the preceding article.

(4) La Monnoye, Menagiana, Tom. 4. p. 329.

[A] In the Dioceſe of Troyes.] I ſhall add here, in behalf of thoſe who love to have a particular account of things, that the Paraclet was built in the pariſh of Quincey, on the banks of the little river of Arduzon, near Nogent upon the Seine. Moſt of theſe particulars are mentioned in Pope Innocent the Second's letter to Heloiſe. Heloiſæ Abbatiſſæ cæteriſque ſororibus in Oratorio quod in pago Trecenſi, in Parrhochia Quinceii, ſupra fluvium Arduconem ſitum eſt (1). In William de Nangis's Chronicle are theſe words, Conſtruxerat Monaſterium in Epiſcopatu Trecenſi juxta Nogentum ſuper Sequanam, in quodam prato ubi legere ſolitus fuerat (2). i. e. "He built a Monaſtery in "the Biſhoprick of Troyes, near Nogent upon the "Seine, in a certain field, where he uſed to read "Lectures." This laſt particular is inconſiſtent with Abelard's own account (3), according to which it is certain that he did not teach in the place where he built

(1) Du Cheſne, Not. in Hiſt. Calamitatum, Abelardi, p. 1177.

(2) Apud eund. ibid.

(3) See his letter, intitled, Hiſtoria Calamitatum.

proper to obſerve there, that Jane Chabot, who died June the 25th 1593, did publickly profeſs the Proteſtant religion, but yet without marrying, and without throwing off her Nun's habit, which ſhe always wore, though they had driven her from her Abbey (e). Let us obſerve that there is a difficulty, which is looked upon as ſomething of conſequence: namely, whether we muſt ſay Paraclet, or Paraclit [B]. The Nuns of that Convent are uſed to perform Divine Service in the Greek tongue on Whitſunday, that they may never forget, that Heloiſe was well acquainted with that language (f).

(e) Maimb. Hiſt. du Calvin, p. 464.

(f) Aub. Miræus, in Scholiis ad Henr. Gandavenſ. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 165.

built his Oratory, till after he had built it. We may, I think, reckon three ſtations of Abelard in the territories of Theobald Count of Champagne: for in the firſt place he retired thither with the Monks of St. Denys's leave, and read lectures there to a great number of ſcholars. This was interrupted by the Anathema, which the Council of Soiſſons thunder'd againſt him in the year 1121. Being ſent back to his Convent, where he brought himſelf into trouble, on account of Dionyſius the Areopagite, he made his eſcape in the night-time, and retired to Provins, where he lived in a cell, till he had made up his difference with the Monks of St. Denys: after which, having got leave to retire to ſuch deſert as he ſhould chooſe, he went to the place where he built his Oratory. It being ſoon known that he lived there very retired, the ſcholars flocked thither (4), and he began again to read lectures. It does not at all appear, that he retired to the ſame place the firſt and the third time. It may even be inferred from his own narration, that theſe two places were at ſome diſtance from each other. So that William de Nangis may have been miſtaken.

(4) Oratorium quoddam in nomine Sanctæ Trinitatis ex calamis & culmo primum conſtruxi. Ubi cum quodam Clerico noſtro latitans, illud vere Domino poteram decantare, ecce elongavi fugiens & manſi in ſolitudine. Quod cum cognoviſſent ſcholares, cœperunt undique concurrere. i. e. "I built an Oratory in the name of the bleſſed Trinity with ſtraw and holm; where being hid with one of our Clerks, I might very well ſing to the Lord, I wandered far off, and remained in the wilderneſs. Which when my ſcholars heard, they began to flock to me from all places." Abælard. Oper. p. 28.

[B] There is a difficulty . . . . whether we muſt ſay Paraclet, or Paraclit.] This queſtion would not have been much controverted, had not that word been inſerted in the divine ſervice. This has been the ground of the diſpute; ſome aſſerting that we muſt pronounce Paracletus, others declaring for Paraclitus. The latter have gained a complete victory. Paſquier relates a particular, which is pretty curious. The common people, out of ignorance, called it Paraclit (5); as I have alſo ſeen in my younger days, that in the churches the Holy Ghoſt was called Paraclytus, and not Paracletus, two words of a quite different ſignification, for the former ſignifies a Flatterer, and the latter a Comforter. Nay, ſoon after I came to Paris, John Sabelat, Canon of Chartres, and a man well ſkilled in polite literature, pronouncing Paraclet, and not Paraclit, when he celebrated maſs, was for that reaſon ſuſpended a divinis (from his holy functions) by the Biſhop, from which he appealed as from an abuſive ſentence, and publiſhed in his own defenſe a very learned manifeſto or caſe, which I have had ſome time by me. The matter was afterwards made up between them by ſome of the Biſhop's friends, that he might not be a laughing-ſtock to the people (6). There are two things to cenſure in that paſſage of Paſquier. 1. It is falſe that they, who do not pronounce Paracletus, pretend to pronounce Paraclytus. They pretend to pronounce Paraclitus, and mean the ſame thing with thoſe who pronounce Paracletus. The queſtion is only about this grammatical difficulty, whether the η of the Greeks, ought to anſwer the e or the i of the Latins. 2. Παράκλητος (Paraclytus) does not ſignify a Flatterer, but in general, a man of an ill reputation. Garaſſe was ſure not to ſpare Stephen Paſquier on this occaſion; he abuſed him with his wonted haughtineſs: he aſſerted againſt him, that there is no ſuch word as Paraclytus in the Greek tongue; and that if that word could be compoſed by Analogy, it would not ſignify a Flatterer, but an infamous Man, or a man honoured above his deſert (7). Paſquier's Apologiſt acted but a very indifferent part in his reply to this cenſure; for inſtead of acknowledging that his Client was miſtaken, he undertook to defend him, and could not even invent ſo much as a ſhew of argument. He aſſerted, that we find in the great Etymologicon, and in Scapula, that Paraclytos, with a Greek υ ſignifies a Flatterrer (8). I have by me a Scapula in folio, printed at Baſil in the year 1605. I find there Παράκλητος in page 810, which refutes father Garaſſe: but then I find there alſo, that that word ſignifies infamis, famoſus, infamous, notorious, which refutes Stephen Paſquier's apologiſt. But to return to the general controverſy, let us obſerve, that Monſieur Thiers wrote a treatiſe, de retinenda in Eccleſiaſticis libris voce PARACLITUS, (of continuing the word Paraclitus in the church books), in which he acquaints us with a great many curious particulars; as for inſtance, that "as early as the 9th century, that queſtion was "debated by the Biſhops of France and Germany; "the occaſion of it was, that a certain Greek, "who came to court, and heard the people ſing in "the King's chapel Paraclitus Spiritus Sanctus, re-"preſented that they ought to pronounce Paracletus "(9)." His remonſtrance proved unſucceſsful. They did not dare to alter any thing in the pronunciation of that word, becauſe it was the cuſtom to read it thus, and one muſt not make the leaſt innovation (10). Monſieur Thiers adds, that in the year 1526, the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, cenſuring the works of Eraſmus, condemned him, among other reaſons, for aſſerting that one ought to write Paracletus.

(5) He ſpeaks of Abelard's Oratory.

(6) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, Liv. 6. chap. 17. p. m. 511.

(7) Recherche des Recherches, Liv. 3. ſect. 12.

(8) Defenſe pour Etienne Paſquier, p. 795.

(9) See the Journal des Savans, for December the 16th, 1669.

(10) Ibidem, ex Haimone Epiſcopo Alberſtad.

PARAVICIN (VINCENT), a Miniſter of God's word in the country of the Griſons, lived in the 17th Century. He tranſlated out of the French into Italian Meſtrezat's Treatiſe of the Communion with Jeſus Chriſt in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. That tranſlation was put in the Index expurgatorius at Rome, in the year 1640. There is ſome probability that he was of the ſame family with Peter Paul Paravicin, a Phyſician of Como, and author of a letter printed in the year 1545, in 4to, with this title, De Maſinenſium & Burmenſium Thermarum hactenus incognitarum ſitu, natura, & miraculis (a), i. e. "Of the ſituation, nature, and wonders of the hot Baths, called Maſinenſes "and Burmenſes, hitherto unknown."

(a) See Lindenius renovatus, p. 902.

PARE' (AMBROSE), in Latin Paræus, was born at Laval, in the Dutchy of Maine. I ſhall add but three particulars to the article, which Moreri has given of him; namely, that he was of the Proteſtant Religion, that he was ſpared in the ſlaughter of St. Bartholomew's Day, by the particular favour of Charles IX. [A], and that he had great

[A] He was ſpared in the ſlaughter of St. Bartholomew's day by the . . . favour of Charles IX.] What Brantome relates concerning this particular, is too remarkable not to be inſerted here. The King, as ſoon as it was day-light, looked out of the window, and obſerving ſome perſons in the ſuburb called St. Germain, who made haſte to run away, he took a great hunting Arquebuſs, which he had by him, and ſhot many times at them, but to no purpoſe, for his Arquebuſs did not carry ſo far: he cry'd continually, kill them, kill them; nor would he ſave one ſingle perſon, except Ambroſe Paré, his firſt Surgeon, and the moſt eminent in Chriſtendom: he ſent for him, and bid him to ſtay in his chamber and wardrobe, charging him not to ſtir out of it: he ſaid it was not reaſonable that a man, who might be uſeful to a whole little world, ſhould be thus murthered (1).

(1) Brantome, Memoires, Tom. 4. Diſcours de Charles IX.

[B] He

great difficulties to overcome when he would have publiſhed his medical works [B]. The reaſon was that he had made uſe of too obſcene expreſſions.

A modern writer relates two particulars: the one, that Ambroſe Paré being ſurgeon to Francis II. owned as a ſecret to Admiral de Coligni, that that Prince's ear-ach was extremely dangerous (a); the other, that he was ſuſpected of having put poiſon into that King's ear, when he dreſſed it (b). The author who relates theſe two particulars, mentions many others; let who will believe them: for my part, I met with nothing like them in any good hiſtorian: I know only that Beaucaire mentions the ſuſpicion of the poiſon. Spondanus relates them after him (c), but he does not ſeem to give any credit to that report.

(a) Vie de Caſpar de Coligny, p. 220. of the edit. printed in the year 1686.

(b) Ibid. p. 221.

(c) Spond. ad ann. 1560, num. 20.

[B] He had great difficulties to overcome, when he would have publiſhed his medical works.] I do not alter a word in the expreſſions of the Author, who acquaints me with this particular. Ambroſe Paré, ſays he (2), Surgeon to three Kings one after another, a learned and experienced man, who publiſhed many noble and uſeful works, was ſome time before he could get them printed, becauſe the college of the learned Phyſicians at Paris objected to them, not on account of any errors they obſerved in them, with regard to the art he treated of, but becauſe there were ſome paſſages in his book of Generation, in which, through inadvertency, he had expreſſed himſelf a little too freely: but after he had corrected them, he met no longer with any oppoſition.

(2) Louis Guyon, diverſes Lecons, Tom. 2. Liv. 2. chap. 8. p. 298.

PAREUS (DAVID), a celebrated Proteſtant Divine, was born at Francoſtein in Sileſia, December 30, 1548. His father John Wængler, who was the ſon of a rich countryman (a), made him firſt ſtudy at Francoſtein, and then put him prentice to an Apothecary, and afterwards to a ſhoemaker. But that child was not born for ſuch mean things, and, as the author of his life obſerves, that God, who preſides over the Muſes, did not give him over to the ill homour of a ſtep-mother, who was the cauſe of that ſhameful uſage. The good old man John Wængler made him ſtudy again, in the year 1564, and ſent him to Hirſchberg in the neighbourhood, where there was a college, of which a learned man, named Chriſtopher Schilling (b), was principal. It was there our young ſtudent got the name of Pareus, taken from the Greek, by an alluſion to the name of his family [A]. This was pretty much the cuſtom of thoſe times, and eſpecially of Schilling. The Step-mother's ill humour was no doubt a little appeaſed, becauſe there was now no board to pay for David; for he maintained himſelf by means of a tutorſhip]B], and with the money he received from one of the chief inhabitants of that place (c), every time he preſented him with a copy of verſes. His maſter did not only change his ſurname, but made him alſo change his Religion, which was Lutheraniſm, by making him, as well as his other ſcholars, hear reaſon with regard to the real Preſence. This proved a great detriment both to the maſter and to the pupil; the former was driven from his College at the requeſt of the Miniſter of that place, and the latter was like to be diſinherited by his father, from whom he had all the trouble imaginable to get leave to go into the Palatinate, though he urged an argument, which ſeldom fails of being effectual; and which was, that by that means he ſhould be able to finiſh his ſtudies, without being at his family's charge. Having at laſt got that leave, he followed his maſter, who was choſen by Frederick III. Elector Palatine, to be Principal of the new College at Amberg. His father gave him ſo little money for his journey, that he was ſometimes obliged to beg on the road. Soon after his arrival at Amberg in the year 1566, he was ſent with ten of his ſchool-fellows to Heidelberg, by their common maſter, who recommended them ſo effectually, that they were all admitted into the College of Wiſdom, of which Zachary Urſinus, Profeſſor of Divinity, was Director. The Univerſity of Heidelberg was at that time in a moſt flouriſhing condition, with regard to every faculty; ſo that our Pareus wanted nothing to make a conſiderable progreſs in the languages, in Philoſophy, and in Divinity. He was admitted a Miniſter in the year 1571, and in May he was ſent into a Village named Schlettenbach, where he found himſelf in great perplexity, becauſe there was a great miſunderſtanding between the Proteſtants

(a) Who lived above an hundred years, and ſaw himſelf a father of 20 children all living. Philip. Pareus, in vita Davidis Parei.

(b) We ſhall give an account of him in his proper place.

(c) Albertus Kindler, Lord of Zackenſtein, who was afterwards Governor of Luſatia.

[A] The name of Pareus, taken from the Greek, by an alluſion to the name of his family.] His father's name was Wængler. Now Wange in the German tongue, ſignifies the ſame thing with παρειὰ in Greek, that is to ſay, the cheek. Παρειὸς therefore was formed ἀπὸ τῆς παρειᾶς, quaſi dicas GENIUS Wængler. Pareus's ſon, from whom I have extracted this remark, obſerves that his father oppoſed that alteration of his name as much he could; but at laſt he was obliged to conſent to it, when Zachary Urſinus had given his approbation to it (1). He obſerves, that moſt people write Pareus, which is wrong, becauſe the ει of the Greeks is always expreſſed by a long e in Latin, and not by an æ. Quia, ſays he, τὸ ει Græcorum tranſit in ē longum apud Latinos, ut ἠλείοις Elei, αἰνείας Æneas, ἀλφειὸς Alphéus, λύκειον Lycéum, μουσεῖον Muſéum, πρυτανεῖον Prytanéum, & id genus alia non pauca. As to the chriſtian name David, it was given to his father, ſays he, becauſe he was born December the 30th, which is a day conſecrated to David, and his parents were determined to give their children the names of the Saints, whoſe feſtival happened on the day they were born. Penultima Decembris die quæ DAVIDI eſt ſacra . . . . & parentibus ſic placuiſſet liberis ſuis, quotquot illis naſcerentur ea imponere nomina quæ præ ſe ferrent ſolemnes faſti ad ipſum nativitatis diem. All men do not know that there is a day of St. David in the Calender.

(1) Philip Pareus, in vita David. Parei, p. m. 5.

[B] He maintained himſelf by means of a Tutorſhip.] The Hiſtorian has not been very accurate in this part of his account. He aſſerts that David Pareus continued two years at Hirſchberg, three months at his father's charge, and the reſt of the time a Tutor in the family of an honeſt Citizen, whom he names (2). We are told afterwards, that the Lord of Zackenſtein was very generous to him, and maintained him gratis, on account of the verſes which this young man wrote on the death of that Lord's eldeſt ſon (3), and that afterwards he gave him money for every poem he charged him to write. The ſame Hiſtorian mentions a letter of that Lord, in which he deſires to know, whether the Pareus, who lodged at his houſe

(2) In ea ſchola vixit biennium, trimeſtri ſpatio ſumptibus parentis, reliquo tempore pædagogi officio functus apud civem honeſtum Jacobum Schilderum. Idem, ibid. p. 8. ad ann. 1564.

(3) Convictum, quod filio defuncto epicedio carmine parentaſſet, gratuitum facile dedit. Ibid.

tants and the Roman Catholicks [C]. However, he was going to be married then before the winter came on, when he was called back to Heidelberg to teach the third form there. This call made his whole project of marrying vaniſh away. He acquitted himſelf ſo well of his employment, that after two years he was promoted to the ſecond form; but he reſigned it at the end of ſix months to take again upon him the functions of a Miniſter, which he went to perform at Hemſbach, in the Dioceſe of Worms. Being tired of living in a publick houſe, he married four months after his arrival the Siſter of John Stibelius, Miniſter of Hippenheim (d). The nuptials were celebrated January the 5th, 1574. He loſt that living in the year 1577, becauſe, after the death of the Elector Frederick III. his ſon Lewis, who was very zealous for the Lutheran Religion, eſtabliſhed Lutheran Miniſters throughout his Dominions, in the room of the Reformed. Pareus retired into the territories of Prince John Caſimir, that Elector's Brother, and was three years Miniſter at Ogerſheim near Frankentale, and then at Winzingen near Neuſtat [D]. What rendered that neighbourhood moſt uſeful and acceptable to him was, that Prince Caſimir had founded an illuſtrious ſchool at Neuſtat, in the year 1578, and had ſettled there all the Profeſſors who were baniſhed from Heidelberg. The Elector Lewis dying in the year 1583, Prince Caſimir was left ſole Guardian to his Nephew Frederick IV. and Adminiſtrator of the Palatinate. The Reformed Miniſters were now reſtored, and Pareus was appointed ſecond Profeſſor in the College of Wiſdom at Heidelberg. This happened in September 1584. He began two years after to ſet up for an Author, by publiſhing his method Ubiquitariæ Controverſiæ. In the year 1589, he publiſhed the German Bible at Neuſtat with Notes, which occaſioned a hot controverſy between him and a Lutheran of Tubingen, named James Andreas. Pareus was appointed firſt Profeſſor in the College of Wiſdom, in January 1591, and Counſellor in the Eccleſiaſtical Senate, in November 1592. The next year he commenced Doctor of Divinity in a moſt ſolemn manner. He had already been engaged in ſeveral controverſies with the writers of the Augſburg confeſſion: but that of the year 1596 was one of the moſt conſiderable. It occaſioned a vindication of Calvin, who was charged with favouring Judaiſm in his expoſition of ſeveral paſſages of the Scripture. Two years after Pareus was honoured with the title of Divinity Profeſſor for the Old Teſtament in the ſame Univerſity: whereby he was delivered of the dreadful toil he had been obliged to undergo during fourteen years, in managing the youth who were educated in the College of Wiſdom (e); a toil ſo terrible, that that good man Zachary Urſinus thought himſelf happy that he was baniſhed houſe twenty five years ago, quem ante annos 25 hoſpitem domeſticum habuiſſet (4), was the ſame, by whoſe care the German Bible had been printed. Is not this putting a body in two different places at once? David Pareus was ſent to Hirſchberg in the year 1564, he received that Lord's letter in the year 1589, whence it follows, that he lodged at his houſe in the year 1564: he was not therefore twenty-one months a Tutor in James Schilder's family. We meet every where with ſuch blunders.

(d) See in the remark [C] of the article URSINUS (Zachary) a miſtake of Thuanus, concerning this Stibelius.

(e) Haud omnino invitus eam in ſe ſuſcepit, pertæſus ſcilicet Siſyphiarum moleſtiarum quas in annum decimum quartum æruminabili prorſus cura in collegio volviſſet, effrenem juventutem gubernando. Philip. Pareus, in vita David. Parei, p. 53. edit. in 8vo. Gen. 1641. cum Comm. in Matthæum.

(4) Ibidem, p. 45.

[C] There was a great miſunderſtanding between the Proteſtants and the Roman Catholicks.] It had been neceſſary to uſe main force to aſſert the Elector Palatine's claim againſt the Biſhop of Spire's; the latter maintained, that the right of collating to the livings in the Corporation of Alfeſtad belonged to his Chapter: the Elector confeſſed it; but he aſſerted, that ſince he had the right of Patronage, the Collators were obliged, according to the peace of Paſſaw, to preſent ſuch Paſtors to him, whoſe religion he approved. By virtue of that right, he eſtabliſhed the reformed religion in that corporation, and ſent Pareus into the pariſh of Schlettenbach. The Roman Catholicks ſhut the church doors againſt him; but they were broke open, and the ſtatues and altars were afterwards pulled down. Pareus's next perplexity was, how to get the church cleaned: for no man would take the trouble to get the rubbiſh away, each putting off that labour to the other (5). The Rector of the Univerſity hints all this in his Programma for Pareus's funeral. Ad paſtoratum, ſays he (6), Schlettenbacenſem . . . . miſſus, ibidem cum ſtatuis & altaribus atri duello primus conflictatus. Pareus was alſo the firſt Paſtor at Hemſbach, but he met there with a much more tractable congregation; for when the Elector Palatine, who, as the Patron of that pariſh, reſolved to reform it, had cauſed the church doors to be broke open, Pareus took care to have all the images taken down, and had them burnt with the people's conſent (7). This is what the Rector's Program refers to in theſe words. Hinc anno 73 Eccleſiæ Hemſbacenſis (& hic iconomachus futurus LEO non imperator ſed Paſtor) Miniſter præfectus (8). i. e. "Hence he was ſent to be Miniſter of the Church "of Hemſbach, where he was alſo to be an Icono-"claſt, not like the Emperor Leo, (or like a lion,) "but like a true Paſtor." The occaſion, which mov'd the Prince to eſtabliſh the Reformation in that place, is very remarkable. The Curate, who had been drinking all the night before Eaſter, was ſleeping himſelf ſober at the time of divine ſervice. Being waked at laſt by the Sexton, he goes to church, and after ſinging, gets into the pulpit, delivers his preamble, and according to cuſtom, kneels down to ſay the Lord's prayer (9), and falls aſleep. The people imagine that his being ſo long on his knees, is owing to a very great zeal; but as it continued too long, the Sexton pulls the Prieſt by his gown. He gets up half aſleep, and cries out with a great oath, that he cannot preach: ich kan beym Sacrament nicht predigen. Per ſacramentum non poſſum concionari (10), i. e. "By the Sacrament (which is the common oath "of the Germans) I cannot preach." The Biſhop of Worms, having notice of this ſcandalous action, ſends the Curate to priſon, and puts another in his ſtead, who had ſeven baſtards. Pareus's nuptials, which were celebrated publickly in the church, were a ſight, which had never been beheld in the pariſh of Hemſbach; as for concubines and baſtards of the Prieſts, as many as you pleaſe; it was not a ſight, which like the other, had ſomething wonderful in it. However, the people were eaſily reconciled to that new practice, being made acquainted with what St. Paul teaches concerning the Biſhop's marriage. Celebratæ ſunt nuptiæ d. 5. Januarii Hemſbaci: ubi antehac nullus Eccleſiæ Miniſter ſponſus vel maritus fuit. Portenti igitur ſimile habebatur matrimonium Paſtoris Eccleſiæ eo loci, ubi nunquam niſi ſacrificulorum concubinas, coquillas, & ſcortilla viderant. Verum percepta in Concionibus doctrina Apoſtoli *: Oportet Epiſcopum eſſe unius uxoris virum: Et † Epiſcopus ſit unius uxoris vir, liberos habens fideles: & vernaculis Sacramentorum liturgiis auditis, matrimonium & miniſterium novi Paſtoris cuncti approbaverunt (11).

(9) It ſhould be the Ave-Mary: Pareus, the ſon, may be miſtaken in ſome other trifling particulars, for want of knowing the ceremonies of the Roman Catholick Church.

(10) Ibid. p. 26.

* 1 Tim. iii. 2.

† Tit. i. 17.

(11) P. Pareus, in vita D. Parei, p. 32.

[D] Winzengen near Neuſtat.] Paul Freherus aſſerts, that David Pareus was Miniſter at Neuſtat (12). But Philip Pareus, who gives him a living only in the neigbourhood of Neuſtat, deſerves more credit

(12) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, p. 413.

(5) Expurgationem ruderum ab his & ab illis ſruſtra quærebat novus Paſtor. P. Pareus, in vita D. Parei, p. 24.

(6) Ibid. p. 96.

(7) Nemine refragante e plebe quæ ſeſe omnimodis docilem præbuit: idola templi conſentiente populo removit & Vulcano obtulit. Ibid. p. 27.

(8) Ibid. p. 96.

niſhed by the Lutherans, ſince by his baniſhment he was delivered from that wretched employment [E]. In the year 1602 Pareus was promoted to the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity for the New Teſtament, vacant by the death of Daniel Toſſanus. His reputation encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that many ſtudents came upon his account from the remoteſt part of Hungary and Poland. He publiſhed ſeveral Commentaries on the Holy Scripture, and among others one on St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans, which was extremely diſliked in England]F], becauſe it contained ſome maxims, which were a little anti-monarchical. In the year 1617 they ſolemnized at Heidelberg the Evangelical Jubilee for three days following, during which there were continual orations, diſputations, poems, and ſermons, on the bleſſing which God had beſtowed on his Church an hundred years before, when he delivered her from the yoke of Popery. Pareus publiſhed alſo ſome writings upon that ſubject, which were cenſured by the Jeſuits of Mentz, whom he was obliged to anſwer; but this was not the moſt troubleſome of all the controverſies, in which he was engaged (f). The next year they would ſend him to the Synod of Dort, at the requeſt of the States General: but he deſired to be excuſed becauſe of the infirmities of old age under which he laboured (g), which did not ſuffer him to undertake a long journey, nor to expoſe himſelf to a new kind of nouriſhment: but he would have been otherwiſe a very proper perſon to vote in that aſſembly, for he was a great enemy to all Novelties in point of Doctrine [G]. After that time this venerable old man enjoyed but little tranquillity. He apprehended beforehand the fate which the Elector his maſter met with, for having accepted the Crown of Bohemia. He diſturbed himſelf with a thouſand bad omens, grounded upon ſeveral things, which he had ſeen either awake or aſleep: for he

(f) See the rem. [H].

(g) Idem, ἱμπόδισμα ſenem emaciatum longinquioris itineris exoticæque diætæ impatientem D. Pareum in Academia domi ſervavit. P. Pareus in vita D. Parei, p. 66.

credit than the continuator of Boiſſard quoted by Freherus; he deſerves, I ſay, more credit, both with regard to this particular, and with regard to the honours, which John Wængler, David Pareus's father, enjoyed. According to Freherus, John Wængler was Preſident or Fore-man of the Sheriffs or Aldermen in his native place. But according to Philip Pareus, he was only one of the Sheriffs or Aldermen, aſſeſſor Scabinatus.

[E] He was delivered from that wretched employment.] Philip Pareus makes uſe of very ſtrong and emphatical expreſſions upon this occaſion. Quantumvis pauper & debilis ſim, & non proſpiciens ullum peregrinationis aut exilii portum, tamen gaudebo me dimitti ex meo ergaſtulo. Non poſſum amplius δυσμεταχείριτον & ἀχάλινον illam juventutem regere. Defeſſus enim ſum & infirmus factus (13). i. e. "How poor and weak ſoever I be, "and though I know of no ſanctuary where I may "end theſe travellings and this baniſhment, yet I "ſhall rejoice to get out of my priſon. I can no "longer rule that untractable and head-ſtrong youth. "I am become quite heartleſs and infirm."

(13) P. Pareus, in vita D. Parei.

[F] His Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans . . . . was extremely diſliked in England.] King James cauſed it to be burnt by the common hangman; the Univerſity of Oxford condemned it in the moſt diſgraceful manner: ſee their proceedings in a book of Grotius, intitled, Votum pro pace Eccleſiaſtica. Konig refers us to page 754, of an abridgment of Univerſal Hiſtory (14), in which I find but 544 pages, though my edition be the third, and printed in the year 1661. I have obſerved there an error in the index, which under the word David Pareus refers us to the pages 715, 745, and 755. I cannot tell whether this may not have miſled Konig. However it be, the paſſages, in which David Pareus is mentioned, and which are in the pages 509, 535, and 536, do not contain a word of the diſgracing or condemnation of his Commentary on the Epiſtle to the Romans. There was an Engliſh Divine named David Owen, who refuted it. Philip Pareus anſwered, and endeavoured to vindicate his father. See Monſieur Baillet's Auti's (15), and Monſieur Arnaud's Apology for the Roman Catholicks (16), in which we are told that David Pareus was vindicated, among other methods, by that which the Jeſuits make uſe of, when they are charged with corrupting the Chriſtian Morality: they ſhew that they are neither the firſt nor the only perſons, who taught ſuch or ſuch a Doctrine.

(14) That of John Lætus. He publiſhed it for the firſt time, in the year 1642. I have found upon examination, that the 1ſt edition has more pages than the 3d.

(15) Num. 128.

(16) Chapter the 4th of the 1ſt part.

[G] He was a great enemy to all Novelties in point of Doctrine.] See what we ſhall obſerve in the next remark concerning his antipathy againſt the followers of Ramus. That diſpoſition of mind engaged him in an intimate friendſhip with a Divine of Franeker, named Sibrand Lubbertus, who reſiſted vigorouſly the promoters of the new ways of ſpeaking and teaching. Pareus uſed to call him his ſoul, and did not give him a bad example (17), for he would not ſuffer any man to ſwerve a jot from the Catechiſm of his Profeſſor Urſinus, as I know not what Divines had done, who added no leſs than three ſorts of imputations to what Urſinus had ſet down concerning our juſtification before God; namely, the imputation of Jeſus Chriſt's death, the imputation of his righteouſneſs, and habitual holineſs (18). There aroſe alſo controverſies in the year 1604, about a queſtion of that ſame Catechiſm of Heidelberg: it is the 76th, which treats of the efficacy of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Pareus, like a brave Champion for the eſtabliſhed Doctrine, would not ſuffer it to be altered in the leaſt. Thoſe innovations were, according to him, a removal of the boundaries of truth, which ought to be ſacred and immoveable (19); for thoſe which ſeparate men's lands are ſo: he imagined that the alterations, which ſome would make in the Catechiſm, forebode an approaching deſolation, which he expreſſed in theſe two lines.

(17) Animam ſuam appellavit. Amavit autem eam præcipue ob rotundum ingenium in tuenda ἐρδοδοξία: quippe qui non paſſus fuerit à ſciolis mutari terminos doctrinæ receptos, intrepidoque animo iis ſeſe oppoſuerit qui in conſueta forma loquendi ac docendi quicquam mutare præſumerent. P. Pareus, p. 106.

(18) P. Pareus, in vita D. Parei, p. 102.

Aula ruit: Politia ruit: ruet & Catecheſis;
Ante fores noſtram quis jam neget eſſe ruinam (20) ?

(19) Theologos illos qui καινοδοξίαν aut καινοτομίαν in dogmatibus vel phraſibus affectarent, nec ſervarent ex præcepto Apoſtoli ὑποτύπωσιν ὑγιαινόντων λόγων, dicere ſolebat movere veritatis terminos qui debeant eſſe immobiles atque ſacroſancti. Ibid. p. 101.

i. e. "The Court falls to ruin, the Polity falls to "ruin, the Catechiſm will meet with the ſame fate: "who then can deny but our own ruin is near at "hand?"

In vain would one object that Pareus eſtabliſhed thereby the principle of authority, inſtead of that of examination; and that it was playing the engines of Popery againſt his own brethren, after he had cried them down as ſomething abominable: in vain would one complain that ſuch a conduct is like the ſtratagem of the Trojans:

(20) Ibid. p. 103.

Mutemus clipeos, Danaumque inſignia nobis
Aptemus. Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat (21) ?

(21) Virg. Æn. lib. 2. ver. 389.

That is,

"Then change we ſhields, and their devices bear,
"Let fraud ſupply the want of force in war."
DRYDEN.

In vain, ſay I, ſhall we exclaim thus, and ground on ſuch a conduct a thouſand reproaches of inconſiſtency; they who know what powerful efficacy there is in a diſtinguo, they who remember the diſtingue tempora & conciliabis ſcripturas (diſtinguiſh the times, and you may reconcile the Scripture with itſelf;) they who have conſidered that there are ſome maxims, which may be of no uſe at a certain time, but which at laſt muſt be urged again; and that the ill uſe of a thing does not abrogate the uſe of it, will let all theſe declaimers ſtorm and bluſter as much as they pleaſe. Imagine a circle ſuſpended before an houſe, half within it and half without; make it he had a great faith in dreams [H], and when he ſaw men at work to improve the fortifications of Heidelberg, he uſed to ſay, it is ſo much labour loſt. Calling to mind the books he publiſhed againſt the Pope, he looked upon it as the moſt dreadful calamity to fall into the hands of the Monks: he followed therefore the advice that was given him to provide in time for his ſecurity: he choſe for his ſanctuary the town of Anweil in the Dutchy of Qweybrak, near Landaw, and arrived there in October 1621. He left it ſome months after to go to Newſtat, and thence he would return again to Heidelberg, choſing to dye in his Pareanum [I], and to be buried near the Profeſſors of the Univerſity, rather than in any other place. He enjoyed that comfort: for he died at his houſe June the 15th 1622, at the age of near threeſcore and fourteen years, and was buried with all the funeral honours, which the Univerſities in Germany are uſed to beſtow on their Members. His Exegetical works have been collected in three volumes in folio. He publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes againſt Cardinal Bellarmin. He left a ſon named Philip, of whom I ſhall give an account hereafter, and who wrote the life of his father, from which I have extracted the particulars mentioned in this article. I have not met there with any thing concerning his controverſy with the Jeſuit John Magirus [K].

PAREUS

turn on its center, you will ſee that at the ſame time one half gets out of the houſe, the other half gets into it. So it happens with regard to ſome principles amongſt men; it is an abſolute neceſſity; and after all the greateſt intolerancy is not that of the civil Magiſtrate, but of thoſe reſtleſs and turbulent men, who untimely ſet up for reformers. Our Pareus uſed to ſay with Luther of ſuch men: A Doctore glorioſo, & Paſtore contentioſo, & inutilibus quæſtionibus liberet Eccleſiam ſuam Dominus (22), i. e. "From a vain-glo- "rious Doctor, from a litigious paſtor, and from "uſeleſs queſtions, deliver thy Church, good Lord."

(22) P. Pareus, in Vita D. Parei, p. 103.

[H] He had a great faith in dreams.] His ſon tells us that he found in his father's diary an account of ſeveral dreams, and other augural obſervations. Here follows an inſtance of them. Pareus wrote in his Diary under the 26th of December 1617, that he had dreamt a cat had ſcratched his face, and that it was certainly an ominous dream; ſine dubio ominoſum (23). Having received two days after the firſt ſheet of a book that was printing at Mentz, he ſaid that was the cat which ſcratched him, and ſet down that explication of his dream in his Journal. It is certain, that the Jeſuits of Mentz wrote moſt outrageouſly againſt him. But what he had to ſuffer from Scaliger was much more grievous (24). He had done much better not to try his ſtrength with ſuch a Chronologer, impar congreſſus Achilli, who was too ſtrong for him: but his weakneſs was, that he would meddle with too many ſubjects. However, he was a little comforted, when he ſaw his adverſary ſuffer a retaliation. This awaked his muſe, which brought forth the following epigram.

(23) Ibid. p. 65.

(24) Eo conflictu non ſolum optimo patri ſed omnibus paſſim viris doctis, ſi palpones & canes venaticos alios excipias, nihil unquam ægrius indigniuſve accidiſſe probe recordor. Ibidem, p. 107.

Nobiliore canum jactans ſe ſtirpe Moloſſus,
Forte viatorem dum petit ore minax,
A cane degenere incautus miſer ipſe recatur:
Hanc Nemeſin juſtam quis neget eſſe Διὸς (25)?

(25) Ibid. p. 108.

i. e. "A maſtif boaſting of his noble deſcent, was "barking at a paſſenger, when lo, he was miſera- "bly killed by a dog of a baſtard breed: who is "there but muſt acknowledge his ſentence is juſt?"

He hints here at the ill uſage Scaliger met with from the wicked Scioppirs; whereupon it is proper to hear alſo Philip Pareus. Nactus præterea fuit, ſays he (26), nobilem adverſarium in ſtudiis Chronologicis, ſuperciliioſiſſimum criticum JOSEPHUM SCALIGERUM Julii Cæſaris a Burden filium, qui ſatyrica protervia erga PAREUM uſus jure ἀντιπεποθότος eo ipſo tempore infamiæ notam pene indelibilem ab Apoſtatico quodam Alaſtore coactus fuit ſubire (27). i. e. "He met, beſides, "with a moſt noble adverſary in his chronological "labours, namely, that moſt haughty critick, Joſeph "Scaliger, ſon of Julius Cæſar Scaliger, who having "abuſed Pareus in his ſatyrical writings, met with "the retribution he deſerved, having been at that "very time branded by an indelible mark of infa- "my by a certain wicked apoſtate." We muſt not forget to obſerve, that Philip Pareus repreſents his father as a man of a very mild and moderate temper. And it muſt be confeſſed, that he was none of thoſe untractable Divines, who will not yield the leaſt thing for the ſake of peace: the Irenicum he publiſhed proves the contrary. But then, to pretend that he did not write on ſeveral occaſions in a paſſionate ſtyle, abounding with opprobrious language, is certainly to be deluded by a fantaſtical imagination, which is but too common. Every one fancies that there are no ſmart reproaches, but ſuch as are ſaid to himſelf or to his friends. Pareus was a great enemy to the leaſt innovations, as it has been obſerved in the preceding remark: now though to the leaſt ſwerving from the opinions commonly received, be often the cauſe of great evils in matters of religion, yet it will never be ſaid that they who are ſo extremely watchful againſt the moſt trifling errors, have a great ſtock of toleration, whatſoever elogies one may otherwiſe beſtow on the importance of their ſervices. Pareus could not bear Ramus, becauſe he had dared to remove the boundaries of our anceſtors (28), and here follows the epigram he wrote againſt him.

(26) Ibid. p. 107.

(27) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, Tom. I. p. 182, 183.

(28) Novellam artem quæ à Ramo ſectario nomen jactat perpetuo rejecit. Huic nimium quantum ſuccenſuit ideo quod per eam diceret antiquos artis terminos moveri, nihil ſuo loco relinqui, ingenia juventutis ad αὐθάδειαν καὶ φιλονικίαν traduci. P. Pareus, in Vita D. Parei, p. 21.

Quæ mutas perdis, dixit Democritus, & quæ
Servas in phyſicis ſunt, Epicure, mea.
Nonne idem Ariſtoteles in Ramum maſtiga dicat
Quæ mutas, perdis: quæ retines mea ſunt (29)?

i. e. "What you alter in natural Philoſophy, ſaid "Democritus to Epicurus, you ſpoil; and what you "keep is mine: might not Ariſtole ſay the ſame to "that rogue Ramus; what you alter, you ſpoil, and "what you keep is mine."

(29) Ibid. p. 22.

Laſtly, Pareus had to write againſt ſo many perſons, that it was almoſt impoſſible for him not to contract a habit of uſing opprobrious language. They who know what it is to fence in the Republic of Letres, cannot but underſtand my meaning.

[I] In his Pareanum.] Having bought an houſe in the ſuburb of Heidelberg, in the year 1607, he built there in the garden, an apartment to lodge his library in, and to make a ſtudy of, and this he called his Pareanum; which was afterwards the name of the whole houſe, all the city calling it thus. The Elector would have that houſe to enjoy ſeveral privileges and immunities. Pareus cauſed two inſcriptions to be put on the frontiſpiece of it, the one in Latin, and the other in German (30). Now ſince his ſon hopes that notwithſtanding the devaſtations made in the Palatinate by the troops of the Catholick league, that houſe will ſtill keep the name of Pareanum (31), we ought to believe that it was left entire. I do not know what is become of it ſince; but I think it muſt be quite ruined at preſent; the poor city of Heidelberg had been laid waſte in ſuch a terrible manner by the armies of France in the years 1689 and 1693, that there is no likelihood Pareus's houſe ſhould be ſtill in being. Let us obſerve by the by, that one would think ſome cities were built under a malignant conſtellation. They are equally unfortunate, which turn ſoever the publick affairs take. Is not Heidelberg an inſtance of it, which was ruined both for declaring againſt the Emperor, and for being loyal to him?

(30) Ibid. p. 55.

(31) Quo nomine incolis civitatis ſtatim innotuit, & à poſteris, ſi bene ominor, eam gratiam retinebit. Ibidem. He wrote his father's life in the year 1628.

[K] His controverſy with the Jeſuit John Magirus.] Pareus delivered an oration at Heidelberg, March the

PAREUS (PHILIP) (a), ſon of the preceding, was born at Hemſbach in the Dioceſe of Worms, May the 24th, 1576. He was one of the moſt laborious Grammarians Germany ever produced. He began his ſtudies at Neuſtat, continued them at Heidelberg, and afterwards in foreign Univerſities, at the Elector Palatine's charge (b). He viſited the Univerſity of Baſil in the year 1599, whence he went to Geneva, where he continued above a year. He ſaw ſome other Univerſities in his journey, and was much conſidered every where, both on account of his own learning, and on account of the great veneration men had for his father. He was very kindly received at Paris by the celebrated Caſaubon (c). He was made principal of the College of Neuſtat, in the year 1610, and enjoyed that poſt, till the Spaniards, who took that city in the year 1622, commanded him to leave the country immediately (d). His library was plundered. He had already publiſhed ſeveral books [A], which are a proof of his prodigious application, and of his particular inclination for Plautus's Comedies [B]. But what proved a bad example, was that there aroſe a terrible quarrel between him and John Gruterus, Profeſſor at Heidelberg, with regard to Plautus [C]. I have already obſerved (e), that our Pareus took in hand the cauſe of his late father againſt David Owen, who had publiſhed an Anti-Pareus at Cambridge, in (a) He uſed to take the name of John Philip in his firſt works.

(b) Theatr. Freheri, p. 501.

(c) Daniel Pareus, Not. in Muſæum. ver. 1.

(d) P. Pareus, in Vita D. Parei.

(e) In the rem. [F] of the preceding article.

the 23d, 1602, De Jeſuitarum ſtrophis circa Canonem Sacræ Scripturæ, i. e. "Of the Jeſuit's evaſions with "regard to the Canon of the Holy Scriptures." He held alſo a diſputation in the year 1603 on the Canonical authority of the Scripture, and on the Church's infallibility, and invited the Jeſuits of Spires to be preſent at that diſputation. None of them came; but Magirus having wrote a letter to Pareus September the 7th, 1603, this gave riſe to a controverſy, of which the writings on both ſides have been printed. Here follows the ſuperſcription and beginning of Magirus's Letter. Clariſſimo viro Domino D. Pereo Doctori & Profeſſori Facultatis pro tempore Decano in Academia Heidelbergenſi. Nudius tertius venit ad Collegium noſtrum adoleſcens, ingenio præfervido, moribus linguaque protervus: is ita narrabat à te miſſum ſe eſſe ut & diſputationem primam de S. S. authoritate adverſus Jeſuitarum impoſturas quam examinandam propoſueras ad diem 26. Auguſti nobis redderet, ſimulque ad eam diſputationem nos humaniter invitaret. i. e. "To the moſt eminent man D. Pereus, Doctor "and Profeſſor, and at this time head of the faculty "in the Univerſity of Heidelberg. The day before "yeſterday came to our College a young man, of a "very paſſionate temper, and very ſaucy both in his "manners and in his diſcourſes; who told me he was "ſent by you, to preſent us with your Diſſertation "on the authority of the Holy Scripture, againſt the "Jeſuits, upon which a publick diſputation was to "be held the 26th of Auguſt, to which he invited "us civilly in your name." He ſubſcribed his letter thus, Salutis tuæ cupidus Joannes Magirus, i. e. "John Magirus, who wiſhes you ſalvation." Pareus anſwered, and made uſe of the following ſuperſcription. Clariſſimo viro Domino Joanni Magiro Societatis Jeſu dictæ Concionatori apud Spirenſes, amico ſuo in Chriſto, i. e. "To John Magirus of the Society, "called the Society of Jeſus, preacher at Spires, his "friend in Chriſt." He complained that Magirus abuſed him in his Sermons with ill language; and he made an obſervation on that Jeſuit's naming him Pereus inſtead of Pareus. Si amanuenſis ſphalma eſt, tranſeat: ſi ſtudium tuum ut pereundi verbo me pungeres, illiberale eſt, ac ſi quis pro Magiro Megarum dicerat. i. e. "If it be only an error of your Amanuenſis, "or tranſcriber, let it paſs: but if you dictated it ſo "on purpoſe to vex me by hinting the likeneſs there "is between my name and the verb to periſh, it is "unhandſome in you; it is as though one ſhould "call you Megarus, alluding to the name of one of "the furies, inſtead of Magirus." That work of Pareus was printed in the year 1604, Typis Voegelianis, and contains Diſceptatio Epiſtolaris Joannis Magiri Jeſuitæ Concionatoris, & Davidis Parei Chriſtiani Theologi, de authoritate Divina & Canonica S. S. deque abſoluta Eccleſiæ Infallibilitate. De S. S. Authoritate adverſus Jeſuitarum impoſturas. Exegeſis Diſputationis de Authoritate Divina & Canonica, &c. adverſus Jeſuitarum ſtrophas & impoſturas, i. e. "A controverſy by "letters between John Magirus a Jeſuit, and a "preacher, and David Pareus a Chriſtian Divine, "concerning the divine and canonical authority of "the Holy Scripture, and the abſolute authority of "the Church, againſt the cavils and impoſtures of "the Jeſuits: with a diſſertation upon the ſame "ſubject." Monſieur Bachelier des Marets (32) has furniſhed me with all that I have been obſerving in this Remark.

(32) Who is alſo mentioned above, quotation (3), of the article EPPENDORF.

[A] He had already publiſhed ſeveral books.] Beſides thoſe of which I give the titles in the following remark, he had publiſhed in the year 1616, Calligraphia Romana, ſeu Theſaurus phraſium Linguæ Latinæ, i. e. "A collection of Latin phraſes:" and in the year 1615, Electa Symmachiana, Lexicon Symmachianum, Calligraphia Symmachiana, and ſome other works at ſeveral times.

[B] His inclination for Plantus's Comedies.] He did not only publiſh them with notes in the year 1609, he publiſhed alſo a Lexicon Plautinum in the year 1614; the Analecta Plautina in the year 1617, a treatiſe De Imitatione Terentiana, ubi Plautum imitatus eſt, i. e. "Of Terence's imitating Plautus, and where "he has imitated him;" in the year 1617: a ſecond edition of Plautus in the year 1619, and of the Analecta Plautina, in the year 1620. I muſt clear up what I have obſerved concerning the laſt edition of Plautus. I know that it has the year 1610 in the title page: but ſince among the thanks or elogies, which were ſent to the author for that work, there are ſome dated in the year 1609, we cannot doubt but the year 1610 is one of thoſe anticipations, which are not uncommon with booksellers. If they were confined themſelves to this only, they would not create ſo much trouble to thoſe who make collections of the ſeveral editions. But how often do they take the liberty of reprinting the title page of their books, to make them paſs for new? Nay, ſometimes they even dare to print in the title page, that it is a new edition, which prodigiouſly multiplies in people's notion, and even in the catalogues of libraries the editions of the ſame work. Pareus publiſhed the third edition of his Plautus at Franckfort, in the year 1641. The Prolegomena, which it contains on that Poet's life, the character of his verſification, and the nature of his railleries, have been prefixed entire to the Plautus in uſum Delphini.

THE DISORDERS occaſioned by the Bookſeller's reprinting the Title-Pages of books.

[C] There aroſe a terrible quarrel between him and John Gruterus . . . . with regard to Plautus.] Gruterus having attacked Pareus, the latter ſoon publiſhed his anſwer, in the year 1620, with this title; Provocatio ad Senatum Criticum pro Plauto & Electis Plautinis, i. e. "An Appeal to the Critical Senate, in behalf "of Plautus, and of the extracts from that Poet." They grew both more and more hot in the quarrel; nor could the conſideration of the evils, which were like to befal them by the ruin with which the whole Palatinate was threatened, inſpire them with the leaſt moderation, ſo eaſily are theſe Gentlemen Philologers and Grammarians exaſperated, and ſo difficult is it to appeaſe them. The long preface, which our Pareus prefixed to his Analecta Plautina, printed at Francfort in the year 1623, is dated October . . . 1621, that is to ſay, that he filled it with malice and animoſity, juſt when that deſolation was near at hand, which ruined both their Univerſities and their Libraries, and reduced their very perſons to the greateſt extremities. Their baniſhment did not abate in the leaſt that paſſionate temper: for theſe Analecta, which were printed ſince their diſperſion, are interſperſed every where with the moſt abuſive language

in the year 1622. He answered him soon after in his Anti-Owenus (f). He has been Principal of several Colleges, and was still Principal of the College of Hanaw, in the year 1645 [D], as appears from the Dedication of his Lexicon Criticum, printed that same year at Nurenberg. It is only a large Octavo, but what cost the Author a prodigious labour, ærumnabili laboro congestus, as he speaks himself. He wrote also some Commentaries on the Holy Scripture, and some theological works. I shall give some account of his son Daniel in the next article.

(f) It is wanting in Monsieur Baillet's curious collection.

language against Gruterus. But this was nothing but reprisals; for Gruterus had been so outrageous, that people reckoned even 136 most shocking injuries in one of his books against Philip Pareus. It was the Jesuit James Gretserus, who took a pleasure in drawing up that list (1). We see Pareus stiled there an Ass, a Mule, a Boar, a Ram, a Goat, stercoreus Grammaticalis cellæ inquilinus, &c. i. e. "A "stinking inhabitant of the grammatical den." It was a long time since Graterus was inclined to fall out with Pareus, as appears from what he wrote to Goldast, June the 19th, 1601. Miraberis carmen tui Parei, qui me nondum invisit ex quo à vobis abiit, nuper autem factus est Rector scholæ civitatis sic satis magnæ, ut alios regat scilicet qui se non potest (2). i. e. "You "will admire your Pareus's poem, who has not yet "visited me since he left you: he has lately been "made Principal of a College in a pretty large city; he must govern others truly, who cannot rule "himself."

(1) See Theop. Raynaud, Erotemat. p. 115.

(2) See the collection of the letters written to Goldast, printed at Francfort, in the year 1688, p. 73.

[D] He was Principal of the College of Hanaw in the year 1645.] This shews that Paul Freherus was mistaken, when he said that Pareus died about the year 1643 (3). Witte, in the 2d part of his Diarium Biographicum, did in all likelihood only abridge Freherus's account of our Philip Pareus; at least he agrees with him in placing his death under the year 1643. If they had cast an eye on the Lexicon Criticum, they would have seen the Author's picture prefixed to it, as he looked at the age of threescore and ten; whence they might have inferred, that he did not die at the age of threescore and seven, as they both assert; and if they had consulted the latter part of the dedication, they would have seen that he was still living the 24th of August 1645. It is strange, that he should appear less ugly in his picture of the year 1645, than he does in that of the year 1641, which is prefixed to the third edition of his Plautus. Rivetus, in a book which he wrote in the year 1646 (4), mentions him as a man who was still living. Nay, he was not yet dead in the year 1647, as appears from the dedications of his father's Exegetical works, which he published that year at Francfort, in three volumes in folio.

(3) Theatr. p. 501.

(4) Rivetus, Grot. Discuss. Operum, Tom. 3. p. 1163.

PAREUS (DANIEL), son of the preceding, followed the steps of his father, and applied himself with all his heart to the study of polite Literature. He was pretty well versed in the Greek tongue, and published some books [A]. He was unfortunately murthered by some Highwaymen [B] in his father's life time. Vossius had a great esteem for him, and applied himself to find him booksellers who would undertake the printing of his works [C].

[A] He published some books.] In the year 1627, he published Musæus's poem on the amours of Hero and Leander, with notes stuffed with quotations and phrases in Greek, or extracted from the most obsolete Latin writers. He published also the same year, a large volume in quarto, which he dedicated to the University of Oxford, and which he intitled Mellificium Atticum. It is a collection of sentences referred to some general heads, and extracted from the Greek Authors. In the year 1633, he published another work, intitled, Medulla Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ (1), and notes, with a Lexicon on Lucretius. But he is not the Author of the Life of Lucretius, which he added to it; he omitted something out of that, which Gifanius wrote. If the scholiast, who published the Lucretius in usum Delphini, had took notice of this, he would not have confined himself to Daniel Pareus, as to the first Author of that Life, which he prefixed to his Commentary on that poet; he would have gone back to Gifanius himself. There is in some editions of Quintilian, a Fabianarum Notarum Spicilegium subcisivum of Daniel Pareus, which he sent in the year 1628, to Henry Featherstone, Bookseller at London.

(1) See the rem. [F] of the article ALTING (Henry).

[B] He was murdered by some highwaymen.] William Prey acquaints us with this particular, in the verses he wrote on Philip Pareus's Lexicon Criticum. Cessit avus fatis, says he, furum scelerata nepotem, trajecit mediis cuspide turma viis. Others affert, that he was killed at the taking of Keiserslauteren in the Palatinate. See Gisbert Voetius, in the 3d volume of his Politica Ecclesiastica, p. 164, 165.

[C] Vossius had a great esteem for him, and applied himself to find him Booksellers . . . . for the printing of his works.] This appears from a letter he wrote to him (2), when there was a report in Holland that several cities would found Academies (3), after the example of Amsterdam. He gave him to understand, that if this proved true, one might procure him a Professorship. He made him again the same offers to serve him some time after, and gave him an account of the pains he had taken, and would take again, to find him a printer for the History of the Church (4): it was a work of Daniel Pareus. He confesses to him, that le Maire had refused to print it, because, said he, he did not know how big it was, and because his printing presses were very much employ'd. Le Merium convenit ipse, ac postea idem filius fecit. Sed nihil promittere voluit, qui nesciret de magnitudine libri. Solet ille magis capi iis, quæ minoris sunt molis: addebat jam prælum fervere multis & variis (5). He gives him hopes, that in case Le Maire continues to refuse it, after the declaration made to him, that it was not required he should print it immediately, others will be glad to print the book. But yet he acquaints him, that there is no country in the world, where it is more difficult to find a man who will print a book, than in Holland, unless in two cases, namely, first, if the Author will bear all the charges; secondly, if it be a work of controversy, or upon some trifling subject: for these are the books that sell best (6). Quod si is difficilem se præbeat, non deerunt, ut spero, alii, qui lubenter id facient. Dissimulare tamen non possum, nusquam difficilius esse typographum reperire, quam apud nos, nisi quis suis sumptibus librum edat. Fit hoc ob rerum omnium summam caritatem, quam causat grave & diuturnum bellum, quod nobis est cum hoste potentissimo. Sola excipio lexicia, & nugalia, quibus nihil vendibilius, ut ipsi non dissimulant typographi (7). He observes here, that the reason why the Booksellers did not care to print books at their own expence was, that every thing was extremely dear in Holland, because of the long and expensive war in which the nation was engaged, with a most powerful enemy. This letter of Vossius acquaints us also, that Pareus was soon to be Tutor in the Count of Isemburg's family. Consult the letter 321; you will see there, that our Pareus dedicated a book to Vossius (8).

(2) It is the C. p. 135. edit. Londin. 1693.

(3) If we were to translate word for word the Dutch expression, we should say Illustrious or Noble Schools.

(4) See his letter 317, p. 307.

(5) Vossius, Epist. 317, p. 307.

(6) Idem, ibid.

7 If Vossius had wrote at this time, as I do, namely, in the year 1696, he would have had still more reason to speak thus. The Booksellers may be vindicated, as above, in the article CRATERUS, remark [A].

(8) He dedicated his Lucretius to him.

PARISET (LEWIS), was of Reggio in Italy, and lived in the 16th Century. He is the Author of three Orations, De Divina in hominem benevolentia et beneficentia, i. e. "Of God's goodness and beneficence towards man;" they are very long (a), and written ten in a pretty good Latin ſtyle. He dedicated them to Pope Julius III. They were printed at Venice in the year 1553, in 8vo, by the ſons of Alders Manutius (b), who printed alſo ſeveral of his Latin Poems (c).

(a) They contain 239 sheets in 8vo.

(b) Epitome Bibliothecæ Geſneri, p. 557. The edition I make uſe of, is of the year 1559.

(c) His Theopœia in ſix books, in the years 1550, and 1553; and his Epiſtles in ſix books, in the year 1553, in 8vo. Epitome Bibliothecæ Geſneri, p. 557.

☞ PARKER (MATTHEW), Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was ſon of Mr. William Parker, a Citizen of Norwich, and by trade a Calender of Stuffs, by his Wife Alice, of the Worſhipful Family of the Monnins of Suffolk. He was born in the Pariſh of St. Saviour's in Norwich, Auguſt 6, 1504, and educated in Grammar learning in that city, and thence ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was admitted into Corpus Chriſti (now Bennet) College, in the beginning of September 1520, being maintained there at firſt by his mother, his father dying in 1516. But on the 20th of March 1521, he was choſen a ſcholar of that College, called a Bible-clerk (a), and in 1523 (b) took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts. The next year he was made Sub-Deacon, and in April 1527 ordained Deacon, and June following Prieſt; and in September the ſame year, created Maſter of Arts, and choſen Fellow of the College. He had now diſtinguiſhed himſelf to ſuch advantage by his knowledge in Divinity, the Fathers, and Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that he was one of thoſe, who were invited from Cambridge, to go to ſupply that magnificent Foundation of Cardinal Wolſey's (now Chriſt Church) College in Oxford; but by the perſuaſion of his friends, he ſtayed at Cambridge. In 1533 he preached his firſt Sermon to the Univerſity, and continued to preach in the neighbourhood with great applauſe; upon which Archbiſhop Cranmer granted him a licence to preach throughout his Province, and King Henry VIII. confirmed it by his Patent. For Mr. Parker, by his converſation with Latimer, Bilney, and others, had been inſtructed in the Proteſtant Faith. In 1533 or 1534 he was appointed Chaplain to Queen Anne Bolen, who eſteemed him ſo highly for his learning, piety, and prudence, that not long before her death ſhe gave him a particular charge to take care of her daughter Elizabeth, that ſhe might not want his pious and wiſe counſel. July 14, 1534 (c), he commenced Bachelor of Divinity; and November the 4th following was preſented by Queen Anne Bolen to the Deanry of Stoke-Clare in Suffolk [A]. March 1, 1537, he was made one of the Chaplains to the King; and during the Rebellion, which broke out that year, he preached at Eaſter, at Clare near Stoke, when inveighing againſt ſome of the Romiſh ſuperſtitions, articles were drawn up againſt him by ſome of his Popiſh enemies; but he was vindicated by the Lord Chancellor Cromwell, who appointed him to preach at Paul's Croſs. July 1, 1538, he was created Doctor of Divinity, and after that preached ſeveral times before Prince Edward and the Lady Elizabeth. In October 1541, he was inſtalled Prebendary of the ſecond Stall in the Cathedral of Ely, by the collation of his Majeſty; and in 1542 was preſented to the Rectory of Aſhen in Eſſex, which he held not full two years, but reſigned it April 20, 1544; and the next day he was preſented to the Rectory of Birlingham All-Saints in Norfolk. December 4, 1544, he was made Maſter of Corpus Chriſti College by the King's Letters commendatory [B]; and January the 25th following was choſen Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity. September 22, 1545, he obtained the Rectory of Landbeach in Cambridgeſhire, a living whereof his College was Patron, and to which he was admitted December 1. April 1, 1547, he reſigned the Deanry of Stoke-Clare, which College was then diſſolved; but in conſideration of his merits, he had an annual penſion of 40*l.* ſettled on him in lieu of it, and a promiſe of the Deanry of Lincoln. June the 24th the ſame year, he married Margaret, the daughter of Robert Harleſtone, of Matſall in Norfolk, Gent. who proved an excellent wife to him, and by whom he had ſeveral children [C]. February the 7th, 1542, he was again choſen Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity; and the Lent following Archbiſhop Cranmer ſent for him to preach at Court. About this time he wrote two learned diſcourſes in Latin, one defending the marriages of Prieſts, and another againſt alienating the profeſſions of the Church

(a) Life of Archbiſhop Parker. By John Strype, M. A. p. 2. edit. London 1711, in folio.

(b) Idem, ibid. It was 1524, according to an old Regiſter of the Univerſity. See Le Neve's Lives of the Proteſtant Biſhops, vol. 1. part 1. p. 3.

(c) Strype, p. 8. The old Regiſter above-mentioned, ſays it was in 1535. See Le Neve, ubi ſupra, p. 4.

[A] Preſented by Queen Anne Bolen to the Deanry of Stoke Clare in Suffolk.] Here he founded a Grammar-School, and conſtituted a yearly ſtipend for a ſchool-maſter, and ſeveral other teachers, not only of Grammar, but all other ſtudies of humanity; or, as his own papers relating to this College teſtify, he erected and built a Grammar-ſchool in the North part of the College near the gate, and adorned the old houſe called the Cellerer's Hall, for an hall for the Dean, Prebendaries, and Vicars. He paved it, and decked it with hangings. And to purge the College the more from abuſes and ſuperſtitions, and to make it ſerviceable to the Realm, he cauſed new ſtatutes to be made for it, conſtituting Queen Anne Bolen foundreſs (1).

(1) Strype's Life of Archbiſhop Parker, p. 8.

[B] Made maſter of Corpus Chriſti College by the King's Letters commendatory.] In the ſaid Letters the King ſtiled him his beloved Chaplain; and declared to the Fellows of the College, "that it was for the "zeal and love he bore to the advancement of good "letters, that he deſired to ſee them furniſhed with "ſuch a Governor, as in all points might ſeem "worthy of that place. And that therefore he "commended the ſaid Dr. Parker unto them, both "for his approved learning and wiſdom, and honeſ"ty, as for his ſingular grace and induſtry in bring"ing up youth in virtue and learning. And that he "was ſo apt for the exerciſe of the ſaid place, that "he thought it hard to find his like in all reſpects. "And that therefore his truſt was, that at the con"templation of him, they would with one aſſent "elect him for their head, whom he judged worthy "for that office: and laſtly, that he doubted not "they would have cauſe to think themſelves furniſh"ed with ſuch a maſter, as appertained."

[C] By whom he had ſeveral children.] 1. John, born May 5, 1548, who married Joan, daughter of Dr. Richard Coxe, Biſhop of Ely. 2. Matthew, who died young. 3. Another Matthew, who married Frances, daughter of Dr. William Barlow, Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and died January 28, 1574 (2).

(2) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 687. 2d edit.

[D] He

Church appointed for the publick uſe of the ſacred Miniſtry. He happened to be at Norfolk during the time of Ket's Rebellion, and went to the Camp of the Rebels, and mounting the Reformation Oak, preached to them, endeavouring to perſuade them to ſubmit and accept of the King's pardon. But while he was in his diſcourſe the rabble began to menace him with their weapons, till one Conyers, a Prieſt, who officiated amongſt them, going on with the ſervice, and ſinging Te Deum, Dr. Parker took the opportunity to retire into Norwich. June 21, 1552, he was preſented by his Majeſty to the Prebend of Corringham, in the Dioceſe of Lincoln, and in the ſame month was nominated Dean of the ſaid Cathedral. In the ſecond year of Queen Mary's reign he was deprived of all his Benefices, and lived afterwards in a very mean condition, and was often ſearched for; and one night as he fled he had a dangerous fall from his horſe, of which he never perfectly recovered. During his retirement, he wrote a book in defence of Prieſts marriages, againſt Thomas Martin, and tranſlated the Pſalms into Engliſh Verſe (d). Upon the acceſſion to the Throne, he was nominated to the vacant See of Canterbury, which he accepted of, though with great reluctance, and accordingly was conſecrated to it in the Chapel at Lambeth, December 17, 1659. While he was Archbiſhop elect, he endeavoured to ſtop the Queen's exchanging the Temporal Revenues of vacant Biſhopricks, with impropriations, &c. as ſhe was impowered to do by Act of Parliament, becauſe he found theſe impropriations were not of equal value; and urged her Majeſty to remove all images out of Churches [D]. In 1561 he was extremely uneaſy to find the Queen averſe to the marriage of the Clergy [E]. In 1563 he viſited his Dioceſe, and found the Clergy prodigiouſly illiterate [F]. He acted with vigour in order to reduce the Puritans to conformity.

(d) Idem, ibid. p. 8——34.

[D] He removed all images out of Churches] He had received a letter from the Archbiſhop of Dublin concerning a weeping Crucifix in Chriſt's Church there; which was an impoſture contrived by the Prieſts to ſtop the progreſs of the Reformation, upon the arrival of the Earl of Suſſex there, as Lord Lieutenant from Queen Elizabeth. His Lordſhip being in that Church at ſervice with the Privy Council, blood was ſeen to run down the crevices of the Crown of Thorns, and to trickle down the face of the Crucifix, The Prieſt called to the people to obſerve it; and one of the contrivers told them, that our Saviour could not but ſweat blood, ſince Hereſy was brought into the Church, alluding to the ſervice, which was then ſaid in Engliſh. This occaſioned a great tumult, the ſuperſtitious people falling down before it, beating their breaſts, and ſaying their prayers on their beads; ſo that the Lord Lieutenant and the Council withdrew for fear of miſchief. But the Archbiſhop of Dublin ordered the Sexton to ſtand up on a form to ſearch and waſh the image, and to ſee if it would bleed a freſh. Upon this the Sexton found a ſponge within the hollow of the crown, which one Leigh, a Monk, had ſoaked in blood, and put there that morning privately. This being taken, and ſhewed to the people, the worſhippers went away aſhamed, and ſome of them curſed the contrivers, who were this Leigh and three or four more, who the next Sunday were obliged to ſtand upon a table before the Pulpit, with their hands and legs tied, and their crime writ upon their breaſts, while the Archbiſhop preached from theſe words, 2 Theſſal. ii. 11. God ſhall ſend them ſtrong deluſions, that they ſhould believe a lie. And thus they were expoſed three ſucceſſive Sundays, after which they were impriſoned for a time, and then baniſhed. The diſcovery of this impoſture influenced many of the ſpectators to renounce Popery, and the Crucifix was taken down. This happened very opportunely as an argument to Archbiſhop Parker with the Queen, for removing images out of the Churches, which before this time ſhe was inclinable to have continued. But tho' ſhe granted injunctions for doing this, ſhe retained in her own private cloſet a Crucifix and lighted tapers in divine ſervice; which occaſioned the Archbiſhop to argue with her Majeſty about it with great freedom; wherein he was ſeconded by Sir Francis Knollys. But Mr. Strype is of opinion, that ſhe continued them notwithſtanding; and tells us, that another of her Biſhops was ſo much offended at it, that he could ſcarce be induced to officiate there before her.

[E] In 1561, he was extremely uneaſy to find the Queen averſe to the marriage of the Clergy.] In the ſummer of this year her Majeſty went a progreſs into Eſſex and Suffolk, and was much diſpleaſed to find ſo many women and children in Colleges and Cathedrals, alledging it to be contrary to the mind of the Founders; and iſſued out an injunction againſt it on the 9th of Auguſt 1561. Secretary Cecil ſent this order to the Archbiſhop, and to explain himſelf the better to his Grace's ſatisfaction, he told him in a letter, that the Queen was ſtrongly diſaffected to matrimony in the Clergy; that if it had not been for ſomething of dexterity in himſelf, ſhe had abſolutely forbidden Churchmen that ſtate; that he was glad to compound with her Majeſty, and propoſe this expedient to prevent her going farther. However, that he had taken care to ſend copies of the injunction only to his Grace, to the Archbiſhop of York, and to the Chancellor of each Univerſity; and that he recommended this method in order to prevent the inſtruments coming out in a more publick manner. Archbiſhop Parker ſent this injunction through his Province purſuant to her Majeſty's order, but was very much diſſatisfied with the contents. And afterwards waiting upon the Queen, he was ſurprized with her Majeſty's diſcourſe upon this ſubject, as appears by a letter of his to Cecil, publiſhed by Mr. Strype, wherein he obſerves, that he was aſtoniſhed to the laſt degree to hear ſo learned and conſcientious a Princeſs treat the holy inſtitution of matrimony with ſo much ſatyr and contempt. "Her Majeſty, "ſays he, talked of ſetting forth injunctions of ano- "ther nature; but I hope God will ſtop this motion, "and alter her purpoſe; and that as by the divine "aſſiſtance ſhe has begun a good work, ſhe will "hold on the ſame courſe. I do not queſtion but "theſe Æſtus humani, theſe ſallies of mere paſſion, "were occaſioned by miſreports; and that her Ma- "jeſty will acquit herſelf to advantage, and like "Theodoſius the Great take time for a mature deli- "beration, and not proceed to a ſudden reſolution "in things of the laſt importance. It would trouble "me, if the Clergy ſhould be forced upon any in- "compliance, and declare with the Apoſtles, that "we muſt obey God rather than men. But let thoſe, "who ſuggeſt theſe thoughts, be never ſo conſidera- "able, we have no ſmall number in our contempti- "ble party, that have courage and conſcience enough "to ſacrifice their lives in defence of their Religion."

[F] Viſited his Dioceſe, and found the Clergy prodigiouſly illiterate.] There is a remarkable inſtance of this in one Mr. Walter Tempeſt, Curate of St. Giles's Cripple, who not being able to tell the meaning of the word Function, wrote the following letter to Mr. Perſie, the Archbiſhop's Chaplain. "To the be- "loved in the Lord Jeſus Mr. Perſie. Knew you, "that whereas your maſterſhip ſaid, I know not "what this word Function meant, I being pauperes "ſpiritus, to a quick oppoſing; it may pleaſe you to "underſtand, that I take it for my utilitie. And "whereas the Prophet David, impulſus, everſus ſum "ut caderem; I may ſay for lack of good memory "and a pregnant wit, I was overſeen in making "mine conformity. He died May 17, 1575, and was ſolemnly interred June the 6th following in his own Chapel at Lambeth [G]. He was a man of great piety, charity, and hoſpitality, and an eminent patron of learned men, being an excellent ſcholar himſelf, as appears from his book De Antiquitate Britannicæ Eccleſiæ [H], and his edition of Matthew Paris, Matthew Weſtminſter, Walſingham, and the four Goſpels in the Saxon language. He founded a ſchool at Rochdale in Lancaſhire; purchaſed an eſtate for founding two Fellowſhips and thirteen ſcholarſhips in Bennet College in Cambridge; built a library for that Society, and beſides a conſiderable value in printed books, furniſhed it with a great number of curious Manuſcripts. He gave an hundred books, half of them in manuſcript to the Univerſity Library. He gave to Bennet College 310 ounces of gilt plate enchaſed, and the Advowſon of St. Mary Abchurch, in London. He made a new ſtreet from the Weſt end of St. Mary's Church to the publick ſchools at Cambridge; and he left legacies in plate to the city of Norwich, Caius College, and Trinity-Hall, where he alſo founded a ſcholarſhip.

" mine anſwer; and the Prophet ſaith furthermore " yet, Dominus ſuſcepit me, and I will pray quotidie, " that the Lord may increaſe me in my function " and great charge; for I am a Curate over 3000 " and more of God's ſheep, and therefore my function is not to ſleep and be ſluggiſh, but to wait on " my office, to diſcharge as I am charged in teaching and governing, and to exerciſe myſelf to do " my duty, if I were worthy before the Lord; for " he ſaith, Gratuito recepiſtis, gratuito date; ſo I " muſt blow the trumpet againſt the ungodly, or " elſe the Lord will require the blood of the people " at my hand, becauſe the office and function is " mine. Therefore my ſuit to my Lord's Grace and " to you is, to have a leſs thing towards my living. " Scriptus te viginti quinque die mencis Junius, Anno " 1563. Per me Walterus Tempeſt, Curatus in Eccleſiâ Sti. Egidii extra Cripplegate, Civitas Londonenſis."

[G] Solemnly interred June the 6th following, in his own Chapel at Lambeth.] It was buried at the upper end againſt the Communion Table on the South ſide; and on the Monument was the following inſcription, writen by Dr. Walter Haddon.

Sobrius & prudens, ſtudiis excultus & uſu
Integer & veræ Religionis amans;
Matthæus vixit Parkerus. Foverat illum
Aula virum juvenem, fovit & aula ſenem.
Ordine res geſſit, Rector defenſor & æqui:
Vixerat ille Deo, mortuus ille Deo eſt.

But in the year 1648, when upon the diſſolution of Monarchy by the death of King Charles I. Lambeth Houſe became the poſſeſſion of Colonel Thomas Scot, one of the Regicides, he thought fit to turn the Chapel into an hall or dancing-room, and this Monument of Archbiſhop Parker ſtanding in the way was totally demoliſhed; and out of hatred to Epiſcopacy, his body was ordered to be digged up, the lead which incloſed it ſold, and the bones buried in a dunghill, where it remained to the Reſtoration, when Sir William Dugdale hearing by chance of this tranſaction, informed Archbiſhop Sancroft of it, who cauſed theſe bones to be found and decently repoſited again near the place, where the monument ſtood; over which are theſe words ingraven: Corpus Matthæi Archiepiſcopi tandem hic quieſcit (3).

(3) Strype, p. 499.

[H] His book De Antiquitate Britannicæ Eccleſiæ.] He was aſſiſted in writing that work by his Chaplain John Joſſelin, and it was printed at London 1572. Moſt of the copies of this impreſſion which were ſold, conclude with the life of Cardinal Pole, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who died in 1558. The other copies, which remained, and were to be beſtowed on publick libraries, or elſe to be given to ſpecial friends, had in the year 1574 added to them. 1. The life of the Author Matthew Parker, containing 29 pages. 2. A catalogue of ſuch books, which he gave to the common Library at Cambridge, containing four pages. 3. A catalogue of Chancellors, Vice-Chancellors, Proctors of, and Doctors of all Faculties, who took their Degree in Cambridge from the year 1500 to 1571, containing ſix pages. To this catalogue are prefixed the arms of every College and Hall there, with the area or platform of the common ſchools, the arms and ſeal of the Univerſity, and ſeal of the Chancellor thereof. 4. A catalogue from 1500 to 1571, of all the Biſhops, who had been educated at Cambridge. 5. The titles of ſuch Charters, as have been granted to that Univerſity by divers Kings and Queens from Henry III. to the 13th or 14th of Queen Elizabeth. 6. An account of the particulars, which are ſucceſſively delivered to the Magiſtrates and ſervants of the ſaid Univerſity, when they enter into their reſpective places. 7. The foundation of each College and Hall in Cambridge, with the building of the publick ſchools, and an enumeration of the old Hoſtles. The life of our Archbiſhop above-mentioned, was, immediately after it appeared, tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed in 1574, in 4to, in Holland, with this title, The life of the 70th Archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſently ſitting, &c. Engliſhed. &c. This number of ſeventy is ſo compleat a number, as it is great pity there ſhould be one more, &c. with marginal notes very abuſive of the Archbiſhop. T.

☞ PARKER (SAMUEL), Biſhop of Oxford, was ſon of John Parker, Serjeant at Law, and one of the Barons of the Exchequer before the Reſtoration [A], and was born at Northampton, in September 1640, and educated in Grammar-learning there; and in Midſummer Term 1656, ſent to Wadham College in the Univerſity of Oxford (a), where

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 814. 2d edit.

[A] John Parker, Serjeant at Law, and one of the Barons of the Exchequer before the Reſtoration.] Andrew Marvell tells us (1), that " he was bred to the law, " and betook himſelf, as his beſt practice, to be a Sub-" Committee-man; or, as the ſtile ran, one of the " Aſſiſtant Committee in Northamptonſhire. In the " rapine of that employment, and what he got by " picking the teeth of his maſters, he ſuſtained himſelf, till he had raked together ſome little eſtate. " And then being a man for the purpoſe, and that " had begun his fortune out of the ſequeſtration of " the eſtates of the King's party, he, to perfect it the " more, proceeded to take away their lives; not in " the hot and military way, (which diminiſhes always " the offence) but in the cooler blood, and ſedentary execution of a high court of juſtice. Accordingly he was preferred to be one of that number, " that gave ſentence againſt the three Lords, Capel, " Holland, and Hamilton, who were beheaded. By " his learning in the law, he became worthy of the " degree of a Serjeant, and ſometimes to go the circuit, till for miſdemeanor he was petitioned againſt. But for a taſte of his abilities, and the " more to re-ingratiate himſelf, he printed in the " year 1650, a very remarkable book, called, The " Government of the People of England, precedent and " preſent the ſame. Ad ſubſcribentes confirmandum, dubitantes informandum, opponentes convincendum: and " underneath, Multa videntur quæ non ſunt; multa " ſunt quæ non videntur. Under that engraven two " hands

(1) Rehearſal tranſpoſed, part 2. p. 74.

where he was eſteemed a moſt zealous Preſbyterian [B]. February 28, 1659, he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). Upon the King's Reſtoration, he was for ſome time, according to Wood, at a ſtand what to do (c); but Andrew Marvell tells us (d), "that he perſiſted, as far as in him was, that is, by praying, caballing, and diſcourſing, "to obſtruct the reſtoring of the Epiſcopal Government, Revenues, and Authority. In- "ſomuch, that finding himſelf diſcountenanced on thoſe accounts, by the then Warden "of Wadham (e), he ſhifted Colleges to Trinity; and when there went away without "his Degree, ſcrupling the ſubſcription then required. From thence he came to Lon- "don, where he ſpent a conſiderable time in creeping into all corners and companies, "horoſcoping up and down concerning the duration of the Government . . . and at laſt "ſatisfied himſelf, that the Epiſcopal Government would endure as long as the King "lived; and from thenceforward caſt about how to be admitted into the Church of Eng- "land, and find the highway to his preferments." Lewis de Moulin (f) aſſerts, that he was expelled Wadham College by the Warden, Dr. Blandford; but this is a miſtake. At Trinity College, by the prevailing advice of Dr. Ralph Bathurſt, then Senior Fellow, afterwards Preſident of that College, he was reſcued, as he tells us himſelf (g), from the chains and fetters of an unhappy education. July 9, 1663, he proceeded Maſter of Arts as a grand Compounder and Member of Trinity College (b); and afterwards entering into holy Orders, "was frequently in London, and became, as it is ſaid, Chaplain to a No- "bleman, and a great droller on the Puritans, &c. (i)." In 1665, he publiſhed at London in 4to, his Tentamina Phyſico-Theologica de Deo, ſive Theologia Scholaſtica [C], dedicated to Archbiſhop Sheldon; which book introduced him to the acquaintance of that Prelate. About the ſame time he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1666, his Free and impartial Cenſure of the Platonic Philoſophie, being a Letter written to his much honoured Friend Mr. N. B. was printed at Oxford in 4to [D]. Soon after Eaſter, in the (b) Idem, Faſti, Oxon. vol. 2. col. 124.

(c) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 815.

(d) Rehearſall tranſpoſed, part 2. p. 77.

(e) Dr. Walter Blandford, afterwards Biſhop of Worceſter.

(f) Patronus bonæ fidei, p. 18. edit. London 1672.

(g) See his epiſtle dedicatory, before his Free and impartial Cenſure of the Platonic Philoſophie.

(b) Wood, Faſti, Oxon. vol. 2. col. 151.

(i) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 815.

"hands joined with the motto, Ut uniamus; "and beneath a ſheaf of arrows with this device, "Vis unita fortior; and to conclude, Concordia parvæ "res creſcunt, diſcordia dilabuntur." Mr. Wood ob- ſerves (2), that by virtue of a Return, dated 21 June, 1655, he, by the name of John Parker of the Tem- ple, one of the Commiſſioners for removing of ob- ſtructions at Worceſter-houſe in the Strand near Lon- don, was the next day ſworn Serjeant at Law, Oliver Cromwell being then Lord Protector. About the 18th of January, 1659, he was appointed by the Parliament one of the Barons of the Court of Exche- quer; but being ſoon after removed thence, before or at the Reſtoration of King Charles II. we hear no more of him, but that he was again regularly made Serjeant at Law, by the intereſt of the Lord Chan- cellor Hyde, at the firſt call of Serjeants after the Reſtoration.

(2) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 814. 2d edition.

[B] Where he was eſteemed a moſt zealous Preſbyteri- an.] Andrew Marvell informs us (3), that in a ſhort time he entered himſelf into the company of ſome young Stu- dents, who were uſed to faſt and pray weekly together, but for their refection fed ſometimes on a broth, from whence they were commonly called Gruellers; only it was obſerved, that he was wont ſtill to put more Graves than all the reſt into his porrage. And after that he had picked acquaintance, not only with the brotherhood at Wadham-College, but with the ſiſterhood too at another old Elſibeth's, one Elizabeth Hampton (4), a plain de- vout woman, where he trained himſelf up in hearing their ſermons and prayers, receiving alſo the Sacrament in the houſe, till he had gained ſuch proficience, that he too began to exerciſe in that meeting, and was eſteemed one of the pretioueſt young men in the Univerſity.

(3) Ubi ſupra, p. 76.

(4) Wood, col. 815, ſays, that ſhe lived in Ha- lywel pariſh near Wadham-college, and was an old crooked maid, that drove the trade of Laundry, who being from her youth very much given to the preſ- byterian religion, had frequently meetings for the godly party, eſpe- cially for thoſe that were her cuſtomers.

[C] His Tentamina Phyſico-Theologica de Deo, ſive Theologia Scholaſtica.] We have an account of this book in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, No. 18. It was afterwards enlarged in a Treatiſe, intitled, Diſ- putationes de Deo, &c. Theſe Tentamina were attack- ed by N. Fairfax, M. D. in his book intitled, Of the bulk and ſelvedge of the world. Andrew Mar- vell gives a very mean character of this work of our Author (5), which he ſtiles a tedious tranſcript of his Common-place-book, wherein there is very little of his own, but the arrogance, and the unparallelled cenſorious- neſs that he exerciſes over all other Writers; beſide his undutiful inveighing againſt the veſicles of the earth, for meer bubbles, as he did ſhortly after againſt his father's memory, and in his mother's preſence, before ſeveral witneſſes, for a couple of whining Fanaticks. However, he accounted it a ſafe book on all ſides, it be- ing of ſo trite and confeſſed an argument, that few judi- cious men would read it to examine the errors; and in- to rough and ſcabbed a Latin, that a man muſt have long nails, and thoſe ſharper than ordinary, to diſtinguiſh between the ſkin and the diſeaſe, the faults and the grammar; to omit his uſual volume and circumference of periods, which though he takes always to be his chiefeſt ſtrength, yet indeed, like too great a line, weakens the defenſe, and requires too many men to make it good. But the cauſe being againſt Atheiſm, he was ſecure that none would attack him. For whether there be any Atheiſts, is ſome controverſy, and he is compurgator for moſt of them; or if there be ſuch, yet they know the baſtions are all undermined, and they ſhould be blown up as ſoon as entered. But let him ſhew me any Atheiſt, that he hath reduced by his book, unleſs he may pretend to have con- verted ſome (as in the old Florentine wars) by meer tiring them out, and perfect wearineſs.

(5) Ibid. p. 79.

[D] His free and impartial cenſure of the Plato- nick Philoſophie, &c.] In this piece he declares his eſteem for the morality of the Platoniſts, 1. Becauſe, "The rules and directions it preſcribes, are ſober "and practicable; it does not flatter men with ro- "mantic degrees of happineſs, upon fond and fan- "taſtic principles, but complies with the conditions "of human life, and neither promiſes nor deſigns "greater proportions of felicity, than our preſent "capacities will allow of (6)" 2. Becauſe the Pla- toniſts, above all other Philoſophers, are remarkable for the innocent gaiety and pleaſantneſs of their humours (7). 3. Becauſe they valued good-nature, in propor- tion to its real excellence (8). "And how much, "ſays he (9), will this excellent quality recommend "them to our eſteem, when we conſider at how high "a rate our bleſſed Saviour himſelf valued it? If "we look into his laws, what are they but ſo many "injunctions to the ſeveral inſtances of good-nature, "mildneſs, patience, mercifulneſs, humility, can- "dor, ingenuity? His new and peculiar precept is, "that we ſhould love one another, and be kind, not "only to friends, but enemies. And therefore a "peeviſh ill-natured Chriſtian, is the greateſt con- "tradiction in the world; peeviſhneſs being the "greateſt reproach and weakneſs of human nature, "and moſt contrary to the temper of the divine "mind; ſo that they, who not long ſince were "wont to diſcourſe, that the ſaints or people of "God, (i. e. that ſort of people, who can be devout "and godly, without being virtuous) are indeed "peeviſh here, but in Heaven this imperfection ſhall "be removed, might as well have told us, that the "ſaints are drunkards here, but in Heaven they "ſhall be temperate; the ſaints are cheats and knaves "here, but in Heaven they ſhall be honeſt; the "ſaints are adulterous here, but in Heaven they "ſhall be chaſte. For an habitual peeviſhneſs is "as inconſiſtent with the deſign of Chriſtianity, as "the

(6) p. 4.

(7) p. 13.

(8) p. 18.

(9) p. 23.

the year 1667, he left Oxford, and the Michaelmas following was ſent for to Lambeth by the Archbiſhop, who had appointed him one of his Chaplains (k). In 1669, he publiſhed

(k) Idem, ibid.

" the ſins of an habitual diſhoneſty, drunkenneſs, " and adultery. And then if we look into our Sa- " viour's life, the unparallelled civility, and obliging- " neſs of his deportment, ſeems to be almoſt as high " an evidence of the truth and divinity of his doc- " trine, as his unparallelled miracles were. For it " is altogether unimaginable, that ſo ſweet-natured " a perſon, ſhould be ſuch a baſe and profligate " impoſtor, as he muſt have been, if he had been " one. And among all his favourites, it was the " gentle and ſweet-natured St. John, that was his " darling Diſciple, whilſt we often find him check- " ing Peter's rude and unmannerly zeal." 4. Becauſe of their readineſs and ability in the ſmaller morals; by which, ſays he (10), I mean their ſkill in the arts of behaviour and converſation. He then conſiders the Logic of the Platoniſts, and obſerves (11), that as Plato's manner of arguing is more ſuccinct than the tedious way of ſyllogiſing, ſo it is not leſs ſure and evident; for what diſcourſe can proceed with greater evidence and conviction, than after you have explained the terms of the queſtion, and agreed with your adverſary about the matter debated of, to propoſe to him ſome principles ſo clear and palpable, that they ſhall either preſuppoſe, or inforce his aſſent, and from thence to lead him by induction through a ſeries of propoſitions, depending upon, and orderly deduced from your firſt proleptic principles, till he is fairly brought, or unawares betrayed unto an unavoidable neceſſity of aſſenting to the truth you aſſert; which is the method that Plato pretends to? He afterwards diſcourſes of Plato's Natural Philoſophy, of which he ſhews the abſurdities; and then proceeds to give an account of his Theology, which he divides into Practical, or that which concerns theological virtues; and Speculative, or that which concerns ſpeculations about theological matters; " which two parts, ſays " he (12), integrate a body of divinity, not unlike to " that of King Ptolemy's man in Lucian, who was one " half perfectly black, and the other exceeding " white; ſo that part of their [the Platoniſts] the- " ology, which relates to practice, is eminently " clear and perſpicuous; whilſt that, which is em- " ployed in theory and contemplation, is monſtrouſly " dark and ſecure." He then animadverts upon the Speculative Theology of the Platoniſts (13), and objects firſt againſt their way of reſolving knowledge into its firſt and fundamental principles, in that by rejecting the teſtimony and judgment of ſenſe in matters of Philoſophy, they do but involve and perplex the principles thereof, under the pretext of a more abſtracted and intellectual diſcovery of things. For hereby the minds of men are taken off from the native evidence of plain and palpable truths, and are fain to ground all their knowledge upon nice and ſubtle ſpeculations, whereby at leaſt clear and unqueſtionable truths are reſolved into principles infinitely more uncertain and diſputable than themſelves. A ſecond objection, which he makes to them, is (14), " their ſerious endeavouring to know and define the " notions of abſtracted eſſences; for theſe pure and " ſeraphic intellectualiſts, forſooth, deſpiſe all ſenſi- " ble knowledge, as too groſs and material for their " nice and curious faculties, and diſdain to purſue " any knowledge, but what is pure and intellectual, " that is, ſuch as is ſuitable to their refined, and, " as it were, ſeparated underſtandings; and there- " fore they chiefly employ their thoughts about ob- " ſtructed and purely metaphyſical Beings; and " thence they take upon them exactly to deſcribe the " meer Eſſences of all ſorts of Beings, whether mate- " rial or immaterial, whether they belong to the " intellectual or to the ſenſible world. In order " whereto they reſolve all Beings into their ſim- " ple and unmixed ingredients, and then attempt " to aſſign their preciſe notions and differences " from each other." His third objection againſt the the ſpeculative Theology of the Platoniſts is, their affecting myſterious obſcurity and abſtruſeneſs, thereby to render their notions more ſolemn and venerable (15). His fourth is, that inſtead of pure and genuine reaſon, they abound ſo much with gaudy and extravagant fancies (16) His fifth is, that they employ much of their contemplations in things altogether uncertain and unſearchable (17). He takes notice (18) of what might be replied in behalf of Plato, viz. " That he cannot well be charged " with raſhneſs and futility, but the accuſation muſt " reach Moſes alſo and the reſt of the ſacred Pro- " phets; becauſe from them Plato borrowed his " choiceſt and ſublimeſt fancies; which, if in any " thing vain and trifling, the firſt Authors ought in rea- " ſon to bear the greateſt blame." That this is the unanimous opinion of all the learned world, who repreſent, that " Plato derived many of theſe myſte- " ries from Pythagoras, who, in his travels into " Egypt and the Eaſt, had either immediately re- " ceived them from the Jews themſelves, or from the " Egyptian Prieſts, and the Chaldean wiſemen, who " came to know them by converſe with and tradi- " tion from the Jews. And that Plato himſelf tra- " velling into Egypt in queſt after knowledge, re- " ceived his choiceſt and moſt important notices " concerning divine and ſupernatural things from the " Jews, who about that time in great flocks reſorted " thither; and from the Egyptian Prieſts, who either " derived them from the Moſaick writings, or re- " ceived them from the Jews by an oral tradition. " For, ſay they, God delivered to Moſes in Mount " Sina a twofold Law, תורה שבכתב, the written " Law, and תורה שבעל פה, the vocal Law, " which is the myſtical and ænigmatical meaning " of the former; but by reaſon of its extraordinay " ſacredneſs, was not expoſed to the rude people, " but only whiſpered and conveyed in the ſlender " pipe of auricular tradition from age to age among " the great Sanhedrim and the Prophets, down to " the time of Eſdras, by whom, and the great Syna- " gogue, of which many of the latter Prophets were " Members, it was committed to writing, leſt by " reaſon of their frequent diſputations and captivi- " ties it ſhould by ſome ill fortune periſh; which " carried its ſtream ont of the private channel, in " which it run before, and ſoon ſpread it abroad " among foreign nations, eſpecially in Egypt and " Chaldea, where great numbers of Jews reſided. " For an eminent inſtance of all which they alledge " the Doctrine of the ſacred Trinity, which, ſay " they, being one of the rareſt and choiceſt myſteries " of this vocal Cabala, was greedily embraced by " the Egyptians, from whom Plato and his Followers " received that clear and full knowledge thereof, " which appears ſo much every where in his writ- " ings." To all this our Author anſwers in the following conſiderations. 1. That it is ſo far from being matter of commendation, that it is rather a diſparagement to have been converſant in, and borrowed from the old Eaſtern and Egyptian learning. That the antient Sages of Greece and the Eaſt were acquainted with the firſt rudiments of mathematical Sciences, is evident from the moſt authentick records of antient times, and from that ſkill, which the Grecians gained amongſt them. But it is as evident, that all their theological learning was lamentably frivolous, obſcure, fabulous, uncouth, magical, and ſuperſtitious. The Scythian Taraboſteſci, the Perſian Magi, the Indian Brachmans and Gymnoſophiſts, the Egyptian Prieſts, the Bards and Druids of Gaul and Britain, and other antient Sects, have, I confeſs, made a great noiſe in the world, yet they that endeavour to celebrate them moſt, tell us ſo many ſuperſtitious and pedantick ſtories, as ſufficiently evince them to have been no very extraordinary perſons. Any one that conſiders thoſe few opinions and ratiocinations of theirs, that are ſtill extant, will eaſily conclude them to have been men of no great reaſon or judgment. Some have endeavoured to maintain the credit of this antient learning by retrieving and collecting its ſcattered fragments, and others by counterfeiting ſuppoſititious authors, ſuch as Zoroaſter, and Hermes Triſmegiſtus; but who ever will be at the pains to peruſe Zoroaſter's Oracles, and the books of Triſmegiſtus, the writings of Pſellus, and the Earl of Mirandula's Riddles, with which he challenged all the learned world, will need no other proof of the vanity of all pretences to the more abſtruſe and myſtical learning of the antients. I do not queſtion but that great and honourable perſonage I laſt mentioned, was a perſon of ſtupendous parts and learning; yet I am ſure, that thoſe

(10) p. 27.
(11) p. 34.
(12) p. 47.
(13) p. 53 & ſeqq.
(14) p. 59.
(15) p. 66.
(16) p. 73.
(17) p. 78.
(18) p. 92.

liſhed at London, in 8vo, A Diſcourſe of Eccleſiaſtical Polity [E]; and the year following a book entitled, Toleration diſcuſſed in two Dialogues: London 1670, in 4to. In June 1670, he was inſtalled Archdeacon of Canterbury, in the room of Dr. William Sancroft (k), and on the 26th of November following, had the Decree of Doctor of Divinity conferred on him at Cambridge, when the Prince of Orange was entertained there. November 18, 1672, he was inſtalled Prebendary of Canterbury, and about that time was collated to the Rectories of Ickham and Chartham in Kent. In 1673, he publiſhed at London, in 8vo, his Free and impartial enquiry into the cauſes of that very great eſteem and honour the Nonconformiſt Miniſters are in with their followers; and in 1671, his defence and continuation of the Eccleſiaſtical Polity, &c. In 1672, he prefixed to Biſhop Bramhall's Vindication of himſelf and the Epiſcopal Clergy, from the Preſbyterian charge of Popery, &c. a Preface ſhewing what grounds there was of fears and jealouſies of Popery, London in 8vo. This was immediately attacked by Andrew Marvell in his Rehearſal tranſproſed, London 1672, in 8vo. In anſwer to which Dr. Parker wrote A reproof to the rehearſal tranſproſed, in a Diſcourſe to its Author, London 1673, in 8vo. This occaſioned Mr. Marvell to publiſh the ſecond part of the rehearſal tranſproſed, at London 1673, in 8vo. In 1678, our Author's Diſputations de Deo & Providentiâ Divinâ, were printed at London in 4to [F]; as his Demonſtration of the Divine Authority of the Law of Nature, and of notions, wherewith he made the greateſt noiſe in the world, were but grand and pompous futilities. 2. He (19) p. 99, 100. tells us (19), that he does not "perceive any ſuch "clear agreement between the Platonick Philoſophy "and the ſacred Scriptures, as may give us any tole-"rable ground of ſuſpecting the one to have been "derived from the other. For moſt of the notions, "in which Plato ſpeaks moſt conſonantly to the "Scriptures, are ſo obvious and ſo univerſally ac-"knowledged, that it is eaſy to diſcern how he came "by them, without any acquaintance with the holy "writings; ſuch as are the Being of God, the Im-"mortality of the Soul, the eſſential differences be-"tween good and evil, ſome general rules of natural "and eſſential goodneſs. And then as for their "more hidden and abſtruſe myſteries, where they "ſeem to agree moſt, their difference is greater than "their agreement.... And it would not be difficult "to ſhew how theſe notions, which have the faireſt "conſonancy to Scripture, are derived from Hypo-"theſes, that have none at all." 3. As for the pre-(20) p. 104. tence of a vocal Cabala, he obſerves (20), that he can ſcarce without amazement conſider with what confidence and eagerneſs ſome learned men of late have cried up an invention ſo novel and fanciful; "for I know nothing, ſays he, more precarious "and deſtitute of tolerable pretences than theſe Ca-"baliſtical Traditions, being only a late and ſilly in-"vention of the Jewiſh Rabbins; for they are alto-"gether unknown to and unmentioned by the antient Oedip. Tom. 2. "both Jews and Chriſtians. And yet Kircher, who claſſ. 4. Præfat. "never gives out at credulity, would have every "one, that does not believe the divine original of "the Cabala to be convicted of Hereſy, as an enemy "to the divine providence. But for my part, I "cannot underſtand how any rational man can be at "all concerned for ſo vain and frivolous an inven-"tion of the modern, i. e. trifling Rabbins. But "he that could find all the learning of the world in "an Egyptian Hieroglyphic, may find all the articles "of his faith in a Rabbinical Fable. 'Tis certain, "that the Cabala was invented ſince the diſperſion of "the Jewiſh nation, there being not the leaſt foot-"ſteps of it before; but in what century or period "is uncertain, and muſt remain ſo; for from the "deſtruction of Jeruſalem there commenced, as to "the Jewiſh hiſtory, a tempus ἄδηλον, (a period al-"ways fit for Fables,) there being no records or "monuments of their condition and affairs, unleſs "ſome few relations in the Talmud. But whatever "became of them, 'tis certain, that being given up "to a vain and trifling ſpirit, they employed them-"ſelves in fooliſh and abſurd inventions; of which "making myſtical and allegorical interpretations of "Scripture is none of the leaſt, eſpecially when they "prefer them ſo much before the true and literal "meaning; for they compare the Scripture itſelf to "a candle, but the myſtical ſenſe to a jewel, for the "diſcovery whereof the candle is lighted; and the "Miſnical Doctors, (that is, they that ſtudy only the "literal ſenſe) are compared to Apothecaries, who "only prepare thoſe medicaments, which the Phyſi-"cian preſcribes; but the Cabaliſtical Doctors to "Phyſicians, who underſtand their natures, uſes, "and ſecret properties. And therefore they leave "the literal and ſuperficial ſenſe of Scripture to the "rude and ignorant people, whilſt they that are "learned, dive into the deep myſteries and depths "of the law, and by the help of fancy, fetch "ſtrange and wonderful ſecrets from words, letters, "points, from their ſeveral ſhapes, combinations, "tranſpoſitions, abbreviatures, arithmetical indica-"tions, and the like. And then with a frontleſs "impudence aſſert, that they came originally from "Adam, Abraham, and Moſes. You may ſee enough "of this cabbaliſtical traſh in a thouſand authors, "but moſt copiouſly in Reuchlin de Arte Cabbaliſtica, "and in that grand Theſaurus of learned trifles, "Kircher's Oedipus, Tom. II. Claſſ. IV. The firſt, "that produced them into the Chriſtian world, was "the Earl of Mirandula, in whoſe time the very word "Cabbala was ſo unknown, that, as Hottinger re-"lates out of Garzon, it was taken for a witch, "Vetula veneficiis dedita. And the Earl himſelf re-"lates in his Apology, that one of his greateſt antago-"niſts being aſked what this Cabbala was, replied, "that he was a certain notorious Heretick, that had "oppoſed himſelf againſt Jeſus Chriſt, and that "from him his accomplices and followers were named "Cabbaliſtæ. The Earl, when he had at a high "price purchaſed ſome ſmall fragments of it from "the Jews, thought himſelf maſter of the moſt "antient and valuable monument in the world. "The miſtake was pardonable in him, but unpar-"donable in thoſe, who ſince have had opportunity "to examine its firſt riſe and antiquity, and cannot "diſcern the leaſt traces of it beyond the Talmudical "Rabbins." 4. Having thus ſhewn the unwarrant-able raſhneſs of deriving Platonick notions from Jewiſh traditions, he proceeds laſtly to give us an account of the riſe of that ſeeming agreeableneſs between the Platonick and the Chriſtian Trinity, and to ſhew by what principles and ſteps the Pla-toniſts happened upon their Triad. To this Tract is ſubjoined another, intitled, An Account of the Nature and Extant of the divine Dominion and Goodneſs, as they refer to the Origenian Hypotheſis, concerning the Pre-exiſtence of Souls.

[E] His Diſcourſe of Eccleſiaſtical Polity, &c.] It was printed at London in 8vo. It was ſoon after attacked in a pamphlet, intitled, Inſolence and im-pudence triumphant: envy and fury enthroned: the mir-ror of malice and madneſs, in a late Treatiſe, intitled, A Diſcourſe of Eccleſiaſtical Polity, &c. on the lively portraicture of S. P. limited and drawn by his own hands, &c. being a ſhort collection of ſome of his in-temperate revilings and prophane ſatyrs, &c. London 1669, in two ſheets and an half.

[F] In 1678 our Author's Diſputationes de Deo & Providentiâ Divinâ, were printed at London in 4to.] We have a character of this Book and its Author in Dr. Henry More's Præfatio Generaliſſima to the firſt Tome of his philoſophical works, London 1679, in folio. Anthony le Grand, born at Doway in Flan-ders, of the Chriſtian Religion, was in 1681 at London, in 4to [G]. In 1681, he publiſhed a Book, entitled, The Caſe of the Church of England briefly ſtated in the three firſt and fundamental Principles of a Chriſtian Church. I. The Obligation of Chriſtianity by Divine Right. II. The Juriſdiction of the Church by Divine Right. III. The Inſtitution of Epiſcopal Superiority by Divine Right. London, in 8vo; and in 1683 another, entitled, An Account of the Government of the Chriſtian Church, in the firſt ſix hundred years: particularly ſhewing, I. The Apoſtolical Practice of Dioceſan and metropolitical Epiſcopacy. II. The Uſurpation of Patriarchal and Papal Authority. III. The War of two hundred years between the Biſhops of Rome and Conſtantinople, of univerſal Supremacy. London, in 8vo. In 1684, he publiſhed Religion and Loyalty: Or, A Demonſtration of the Power of the Chriſtian Church within itſelf, Supremacy of Sovereign Powers over it, and duty of paſſive Obedience and Non-reſiſtance to all their commands, exemplified out of Records, &c. London, in 8vo. And the year following the ſecond part of the ſame work; containing the Hiſtory of the Concurrence of the Imperial and Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in the Government of the Church, from the beginning of the Reign of Jovian to the end of Juſtinian. London 1685, in 8vo. In the beginning of the year 1685, he reſigned his Prebend of Canterbury in favour of Dr. John Bradford; and on the 17th of October 1686, was conſecrated Biſhop of Oxford at Lambeth, in the room of Dr. John Fell deceaſed, and held his Archdeaconry in commendam with that See. Auguſt the 14th he was appointed by the King's Mandate, Preſident of Magdalen College in Oxford, of which place he took poſſeſſion November the 2d following [H]. His reaſons for abrogating the teſt impoſed upon all Members of Parliament, Anno 1678, October 30. Firſt written for the Author's own ſatisfaction, and now publiſhed for the benefit of all others, whom it may concern [I], printed ders, and bred a Dominican Friar, who reſided as a miſſionary ſeveral years in London, publiſhed a defence of Des Cartes againſt Dr. Parker, in his Apologia pro Renato Des Cartes, London 1679, in 8vo.

[G] His Demonſtration of the Divine Authority of the Law of Nature and the Chriſtian Religion.] The firſt part contains a Demonſtration of the Law of Nature from the nature of things, and of the future State of Mankind from the Law of Nature. The ſecond contains a Demonſtration of the Divine Authority of the Chriſtian Religion, from the undoubted certainty of the matter of fact, and the uninterrupted tradition of the Church.

[H] Auguſt 14 he was appointed by the King's Mandate, Preſident of Magdalen College in Oxford, of which place he took poſſeſſion November the ſecond following.] Upon the death of Dr. Henry Clark, Preſident of that College, a citation was fixed up to warn the fellows to an election of a new Preſident; but before the time was come to do it, there came a Mandamus from King James II. to the Society, to elect to that office a junior Maſter of Arts, named Anthony Farmer, formerly of Cambridge, then Maſter of Arts of that College. But the Society taking little or no notice of it elected, according to their Statutes, one of their Fellows, named John Hough, B. D. now Biſhop of Worceſter, on the 15th of April 1687. The King reſenting the affair, it was tried before his Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion newly erected by him; when there were produced ſuch ſcandalous facts relating to the life and converſation of Farmer, that he was laid aſide. On the 22d of June following the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners removed Mr. Hough from the Preſidentſhip; which was notified by a paper fixed on the Weſt door of the Chapel, on the 2d of Auguſt following, ſubſcribed by the ſaid Commiſſioners. Upon this his Majeſty ſent his Mandate of the 4th of that month to elect Biſhop Parker to be Preſident; but the Fellows not being in a capacity to elect him on account of their oaths and ſtatutes, the King ſent three Commiſſioners to examine into the affair, and put his Mandate in execution. Theſe Commiſſioners having ſate in the College two days, and thrice commanded Mr. Hough to deliver up the keys of the Preſident's lodgings, which he refuſed, they inſtalled in the Chapel Mr. William Wiggins, Clerk, the Proxy of the Biſhop, Preſident, with the uſual oaths, and afterwards conducted him to the Preſident's lodgings, broke open the doors after thrice knocking, and gave him poſſeſſion October 25, 1687. On the 2d of November following the Biſhop took poſſeſſion of them in his own perſon (22).

(22) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 815, 816.

[I] His reaſons for abrogating the teſt, &c.] This Tract was licenſed by the Earl of Sunderland December 10, 1687. It is ſubſcribed Sa. Oxon. He obſerves, that the teſt ought to be repealed for theſe reaſons. 1. "Becauſe it doth not only diminiſh, but utterly deſtroy the natural Rights of "Peerage, and turns the Birth-right of the Engliſh "Nobility; ſo that what was in all former ages only "forfeited by treaſon, is now at the mercy of every "faction or every paſſion in Parliament (23)." 2. Becauſe of its diſhonourable birth and original; it being the firſt born of Oates's Plot, and brought forth on purpoſe to give credit and reputation to the perjury (24). 3. "Becauſe of the incompetent authority, by which the "law was enacted. It is a law of an Eccleſiaſtical "nature, made without the authority of the Church, "contrary to the practice of the Chriſtian world in "all ages, and indeed to our Saviour's own commiſſion, who ſettled all power of Government, and "eſpecially the legiſlative (which is the higheſt act "of it) upon the officers of his own Kingdom; ſo "that for any other order of men to aſſume the exerciſe of any ſuch authority to themſelves, is no "leſs than to depoſe him from his throne, by diſowning, neglecting, and affronting his commiſſion to his Catholick Church (25)." 4. Becauſe of the uncertainty and falſhood of the matters contained in the declaration itſelf; as firſt, That there is no tranſubſtantiation in the Sacrament of our Saviour's body and blood; and ſecondly, That the invocation of Saints, and the mother of God, is idolatry (26). Our Author then proceeds to an hiſtorical account of the riſe and progreſs of the controverſy concerning tranſubſtantiation, ſhewing how it is ſtated in the Church of Rome, and how it hath been determined in the Proteſtant Churches; and obſerves (27), that with regard to the real Preſence, "the thing it"ſelf, as far as he can diſcern, hath been owned "in all ages of the church; the Modus of it never "defined but in the ſchools; and though they have "fancied a thouſand definitions to themſelves, their "metaphyſics were never admitted into the church." And having given an account of this controverſy in all foreign churches, he remarks (28), that all parties of Chriſtendom agree in the Subſtance of the doctrine, even the Calviniſts themſelves, who, though they ſometimes attempted to deny it, had not confidence enough to be ſteady to their own opinion, but were often forced to ſubmit it to the conſent of Chriſtendom. From all theſe premiſes, adds he, it is evident, that no one thing in the world is more unfit to be ſet up for a Teſt, than Tranſubſtantiation, ſeeing all parties agree in the thing, though not in the word; and yet though they do, they again diſagree in numberleſs ſpeculations about it; and when they have done, all parties unanimouſly agree, that the Modus is a thing utterly unknown and incomprehenſible. So that take it one way, i. e. as to the thing itſelf, or the Real Preſence, the Teſt is a defiance to all Chriſtendom: take it the other way, as to the Modus, it is nothing at all, but only impoſing an unintelligible thing upon the wiſdom and honour of a nation under the ſevereſt penalties. As for the Church of England, ſhe agrees with the Tradition of the Catholic Church, both Roman and Reformed,

(23) p. 1.
(24) p. 5.
(25) p. 6, 7.
(26) p. 9.
(27) p. 27.
(28) p. 45.

printed at London 1688, in 4to, were attacked by ſeveral writers [K], and confirmed the ſuſpicion of his being inclined to the Romiſh Religion: which opinion was entertained by the Roman Catholicks themſelves. For a Jeſuit of Liege, in a letter to another at Friburg, dated February 2, 1687, writes (l), that our Author "ſeemed very much to favour the "Catholick cauſe; that he propoſed at Council, whether it was not expedient, that at "leaſt one College in Oxford ſhould be allowed Catholicks, that they might not be forced "to be at ſuch charges by going beyond the ſeas to ſtudy. That the Biſhop inviting two "[Roman Catholick] Noblemen to a Banquet, drank the King's health to an heretical "Baron there, wiſhing a happy ſucceſs to all his affairs; and he added, that the Faith "of the Proteſtants in England ſeemed to him but to be little better than that of Buda "was before it was taken; and that they were for the moſt part mere Atheiſts that de-"fended it, &c." And Father Edmund Petre, another Jeſuit, one of the Privy Council of King James II. ſays (m), in the ſame month, that "the Biſhop of Oxford has "not yet declared himſelf openly; the greateſt obſtacle is his wife, whom he cannot rid "himſelf of, his deſign being to continue Biſhop, and only change Communion, as it "is not doubted but the King will permit, and our holy Father confirm. Though I "cannot ſee how he can be further uſeful to us in the Religion in which he is, becauſe "he is ſuſpected, and of no eſteem among the Hereticks of the Engliſh Church. Nor "do I ſee, that the example of his converſion is like to draw many others after him, "becauſe he declared himſelf ſo ſuddenly. If he had believed my Counſel, which was "to temporize for ſome longer time, he would have done better; but it is his temper, "or rather zeal, that hurried him on, &c." Our Author died at his lodgings in Magdalen College, March 20, 1687-8, and was interred on the 24th of the ſame month in the South iſle, or part of the outer Chapel of that College. There was publiſhed at London 1690, his Diſcourſe ſent to the late King James, to perſuade him to embrace the Proteſtant Religion; with a letter to the ſame purpoſe. He was ſaid likewiſe to be the Author of A modeſt Anſwer to Dr. Stillingfleet's Irenicum, London 1680, in 8vo; and of a piece, entitled, Mr. Baxter baptized in blood; and Andrew Marvell reports him (n) to be the Author

(l) See the Third Collection of Papers relating to the preſent Juncture of Affairs in England, &c. publiſhed at London in Decemb. 1688. p. 11.

(m) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

(n) Rehearſal tranſproſed, part 2. p. 121.

Reformed, in aſſerting the certainty of the real Preſence, and the uncertainty of the manner of it; though the true account of it hath been miſerably perplexed and diſturbed by the oblique practices of the Sacramentarians. (29) He afterwards obſerves, that however raſh and prepoſterous it may be for perſons, that believe the Real Preſence, to abjure the word Tranſubſtantiation, yet to determine any part of divine worſhip in the Chriſtian Church, to be in its own nature Idolatry, is inhuman and barbarous. He then ſhews what is the nature of Idolatry, which he affirms to be "the worſhip of the "heavenly bodies, the ſun and moon, and the ſtars, "or any other viſible and corporeal Deity, as the "ſupreme God, ſo as to exclude all ſenſe and ap-"prehenſion of a ſpiritual and inviſible Godhead "(30)." This he endeavours to prove at large; and then remarks (31), that if we compare this antient Idolatry of the Jews, with that of late charged by ſome men upon all Chriſtians of the Roman Communion, I know not, ſays he, which will appear greateſt, the malice or the folly of the charge.

(29) p. 68.

(30) p. 71, 72.

(31) p. 125.

[K] Attacked by ſeveral Writers.] It was anſwered by Mr. Goodwin, a Diſſenting Miniſter, in a tract printed at London 1688, in 4to, under the title of, Tranſubſtantiation a peculiar Article of the Roman Catholick Faith, which was never owned by the antient Church, or any of the Reformed. In anſwer to a late Diſcourſe, called, Reaſons for abrogating the Teſt. Mr. Wake, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, publiſhed A Diſcourſe concerning the Nature of Idolatry, in which a late Author's true and only notion of Idolatry is conſidered and cenſured: London 1681, in 4to. In the title-page he quotes the following paſſage from our Author's Tentamina Phyſico-Theologica, p. 4. Si inter ſolos Pontificios verſarer, &c. i. e. "If I con-"verſed with none but Papiſts, and conſidered their "religion corrupted with old wives tales, and were "altogether deſtitute of a rule of faith, by which "to diſcern the vaſt difference between the Chriſti-"an religion, and the trifles of Popery; and laſt-"ly, if no hiſtories were extant, ſhewing how theſe "dotages crept in; if it were thus, I ſay, then I "frankly confeſs, that I ſhould very much ſuſpect "the Chriſtian Religion, nay I ſhould utterly reject "it as fooliſh and mean, and beneath the eſteem of "old Goſſips; nor ſhould I leſs hate the name of "Chriſtianity, than I do that of Popery." In the Preface (32), Mr. Wake obſerves, that it ſeemed ſtrange, that our Author ſhould think to trample upon us now for pretending, that the Church of Rome has defined Tranſubſtantiation, as it is underſtood by us, and that ſhe has eſtabliſhed an idolatrous worſhip in our communion; for not only the greateſt perſons of the reformed religion have brought this charge againſt her, but to the truth of it himſelf has ſubſcribed in his time. But it was much more amazing to find ſo new a confidence, ſupported by arguments ſo weak, that it is not without reaſon, that ſome of the Roman Communion are ſaid to complain, that they had been betrayed, rather than defended by him. How unſucceſsfully he has managed his deſign of expounding Tranſubſtantiation, has been ſhewn in a late diſcourſe, proving Tranſubſtantiation to be the peculiar Doctrine of the Church of Rome, and in the Preface to the Examination of the new Articles of the Roman Creed by Catholic Tradition. If I make it appear, that he has miſcarried as much in the point of Idolatry, his Theological part will then be conſidered; and for the reſt, we do not by any means preſume to meddle with it. Mr. Wake having confuted the Biſhop's notion of Idolatry, gives his own idea of it; and obſerves (33), that "we find two ſorts of Ido-"latry mentioned in the Old Teſtament, and (ſuch is "the misfortune of this poſitive man) both of them "utterly deſtructive of his true and only notion of it, "viz. 1. The worſhipping of the true God by a "material ſymbol or repreſentation. 2. The wor-"ſhipping of other Gods, than the God of Iſrael, "and that whether it be ſo as, 1ſt, utterly to for-"ſake the true God, and ſerve others only; or, "2dly, To worſhip other Gods together with him." Mr. John Philips, nephew to Milton, publiſhed likewiſe a piece, intitled, Samuel, Lord Biſhop of Oxford, his celebrated Reaſons for abrogating the Teſt and notions of Idolatry, anſwered by Samuel, Archdeacon of Canterbury, 1688, in 4to. There was printed alſo the ſame year in 4to, The Reaſonableneſs of the Church of England's Teſt and Juſtneſs of her Reformation aſſerted, in anſwer to the Biſhop of Oxon's fallacious Reaſons, and precarious Aſſertions againſt it. Alſo the worſhip of Images, Adoration of the Hoſt, and Invocation of Saints proved Idolatry, by the Catholic Doctrine of the Holy Scripture, the antient Fathers, and all reformed Churches. By which the Writings of the Doctors, Stillingfleet, Tillotſon, More, &c. are cleared from the charge of Anticatholic, Antichriſtian, Phanatical, &c. Dr. Gilbert Burnet likewiſe publiſhed An Enquiry into the Reaſons for abrogating the Teſt impoſed on all Members of Parliament, offered by Sa. Oxon. And A ſecond Part of the Enquiry into the Reaſons offered by Sa. Oxon, for abrogating the Teſt: Or, an Anſwer to his Plea for Tranſubſtantiation, and for acquitting the Church of Rome of Idolatry: and a Continuation of the ſecond

(32) p. 2.

(33) c. 4. p. 61.

Author of Gregory Father-Greybeard with his vizard off; or news from the Cabal in ſome reflections, &c. in a letter to our old friend R. L. from E. H. London 1673, in 8vo. In 1726, there was publiſhed at London, in 8vo, Reverendi admodum in Chriſto Patris Samuelis Parkeri, Epiſcopi non ita pridem Oxonienſis, de rebus ſui temporis Commentariarum Libri quatuor, è Codice manuſcripto ipſius Authoris manu caſtigato nunc primum in lucem editi. Two tranſlations of this hiſtory into Engliſh have been printed.

(34) See Dr. Burnet's Collection of eighteen Papers relating to the Affairs of Church and State, during the Reign of King James the Second, p. 202. edit. London 1689, in 4to.

ſecond Part of the Enquiry, &c. London 1688, in 4to. In the Enquiry, Dr. Burnet tells us (34), that "if "it had not been for the manner of the late King's "[Charles II.] death, and the papers publiſhed ſince "his death, he [Biſhop Parker] would have wrecked "his malice upon his memory; for he will never "forgive his not advancing him. And the late "King being ſo true a Judge of wit, could not but "be much taken with the beſt ſatyr of our time; "and ſaw that Bays's wit, when meaſured with ano-"ther's, was of a-piece with his virtues, and there-"fore judged in favour of the Rehearſal tranſproſed. "This went deep, and though it gave occaſion to "the ſingle piece of modeſty, with which he can be "charged, of withdrawing from the town, and not "importuning the preſs more for ſome years, ſince "even a face of braſs muſt grow red, when it is "ſo burnt as his was then; yet his malice againſt "the elder brother was never extinguiſhed but with "his life." He afterwards obſerves (35), that in the Biſhop's diſcourſe, he makes his old hatred to Calvin and the Calviniſts return ſo often, that it appears very conſpicuouſly. I believe, adds he, it is ſtronger now than ever, and that for a particular reaſon: when the Prince and Princeſs of Orange were married, he was, perhaps, the only man in England, that expreſſed his uneaſineſs at that happy conjunction in ſo clownish a manner, that when their Highneſſes paſt through Canterbury, he would not go with the reſt of that body, to which he was ſo long a blemiſh, to pay his duty to them; and when he was aſked the reaſon, he ſaid, He could have no regard to a Calviniſt Prince. Now this Calviniſt Prince has declared his mind ſo openly and fully againſt the Repeal of the Teſt, that no doubt this has increaſed Bays's diſtemper, and heightened his choler againſt the whole party. T.

(35) Ibid. p. 213.

PARRHASIUS (JANUS), born at Coſenza in the Kingdom of Naples, in the year 1470 (a), followed the practice of the Humaniſts of that time, who uſed to change their names into others, which ſavoured much more of Heatheniſm, than of Chriſtianity. He took the name of Aulus Janus Parrhaſius, inſtead of Joannes Paulus Pariſius (b). He was well ſkilled in polite Literature, and taught it at Milan with great reputation (c). He had the pleaſure to ſee among his Audience, General Trivulcio, who was at that time threeſcore years old. There was ſomething very agreeable in his delivery [A]. The liberty he took to cenſure thoſe who taught in the Colleges of the Dutchy of Milan, exaſperated them to ſuch a degree againſt him, that they entered into an horrible conſpiracy againſt his reputation: they traduced him as a man, who had a criminal love for his ſcholars. This ill report, which the people of Milan extremely diſliked, obliged him to reſign his poſt. He ſettled at Rome, where Leo the Xth appointed him publick Profeſſor of Literature [B]. He took with him thither Baſil Chalcondylas, his wife's brother, and brother of Demetrius Chalcondylas, Profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Milan. He did not long enjoy the employment which the Pope had beſtowed upon him; for being worn out with the gout, he was under a neceſſity to retire into his native place, where he died ſoon after (d). He left his library to his good friend Anthony Seripandus (e), who built him a tomb in the Convent of the Auſtin-Fryars at Naples (f). Poverty was one of the reaſons which obliged him to leave Rome (g). He has been very much commended by Henry Stephen in a dedication (b). He has been charged with quoting Authors he never read. You will meet with that imputation in a letter of Andrew Alciat, which was printed at Utrecht, in the year 1697, with ſeveral others taken

(a) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliotheca Napoletana, p. 112.

(b) Sertorio Quattromani, dell' origine e principio della Citta di Coſenſa, apud Nicodemum, Addizioni alla Biblioteca Napoletana, p. 89.

(c) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 127, p. 270.

(d) Taken from Paul Jovius, ib.

(e) Brother to Cardinal Jerom Seripandus.

(f) See Father Mabillon's Muſæum Italicum, Tom. 1. p. 110.

(g) See the words of Pierius Valerianus, in the remark [D], quotation (15).

(b) To Lewis Caſtelvetro, prefixed to Parrhaſius's book de quæſitis per Epiſtolam, which Henry Stephen publiſhed in the year 1567.

[A] There was ſomething very agreeable in his delivery.] It was chiefly in this he excelled above all the other Profeſſors. Cunctos noſtri ſeculi doctores erudito rerum omnium quæ (1) explicaret apparatu, ac una præſertim rotundæ pronunciationis gloria ſuperavit (2). i. e. "He was eminent, above all the other Profeſ-"ſors of our time, by his learned way of clearing up "all that he taught, and eſpecially by his fine deli-"very." Pierius Valerianus obſerves, that Parrhaſius's fine voice made a very great concourſe of people come to hear him (3).

(1) That is a Soleciſm, but whether it dropt from Jovius's pen, or muſt be imputed to the printers, I cannot tell.

(2) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 127. p. 270.

(3) Ad cujus jucundam vocem undique concurrebatur. Pier. Valerianus, de Infel. Literator. p. 25.

[B] An ill report . . . . obliged him to reſign his poſt. He ſettled at Rome, where . . . . he was appointed . . . Profeſſor of Literature.] Paul Jovius, whom I have followed in this account, leaves here a chaſm, which may be filled up, if we conſult an oration of Parrhaſius. We find there, that this Profeſſor left Milan to go to Vicenza, where he was offered a larger ſalary, and that when the ſtates of the Venetians were laid waſte by the troops of the League, he retired into his native country, whence Thomas Phædrus (4) would have made him come to Rome, had not the death of Pope Julius II prevented it: what was a mere project only under Julius II, became a real call under Leo X. Ut ex animo gaviſus eſt (Phædrus) ubi certior à me factus audivit, in Gallia citeriore portum jam me tenere, Mediolanique publicè conductum profiteri. Quid? quum ſequutus uberiora ſtipendia, Veicentiam commigraſſem: Germanis, Gallis, Hiſpanis, cæteriſque barbaris nationibus, infeſtis ſignis irrumpentibus in Venetiam, dii boni, quàm de nobis erat anxius! quàm non aliter ſaluti noſtræ timebat quàm ſi ipſe vocaretur in partem diſcriminis! Extant ab eo ad me tum datæ epiſtolæ, teſtes inquietis animi, quouſque reſcivit elapſum me per medios hoſtes in patriam ſeceſſiſſe. Nec ita quidem de nobis cogitandi finem fecit, auctorque Julio ſecundo fuit ut nos huc evocaret. Sed eo maturè defuncto, Leoni decimo per Janum Laſcarim, virum ad promerendum homines natum, mihi jam conciliato, calcaria ſponte currenti (quod aiunt) admovit. In urbem reverſo jàm præſto mihi fuit? &c (5). i. e. "How ſincerely did Phædrus rejoice, when he heard "from myſelf, that I was ſettled in Italy, and ap-"pointed publick Profeſſor at Milan. And when be-"ing offered a larger ſtipend, I went to Vicenza, ſoon "after which the French, Germans, Spaniards, and "other barbarous nations, invaded in an hoſtile man-"ner, and laid waſte the territories of the Veneti-"ans; good God, how uneaſy he was upon my ac-"count, being anxious for my ſafety, as though he "himſelf had ſhared part of the danger! The let-"ters he wrote to me at that time, ſhew the great "perplexity he was in, till he heard that I eſcaped "through the enemies army, and got ſafe into my "own country. Nor did he forget me then, for he "perſuaded Julius II. to ſend for me to Rome; but "that Pope dying ſoon after, he prevailed with Leo "X, who was already favourably inclined towards me, "by the recommendations of John Laſcaris, a man born

(4) Profeſſor of Rhetorick, and Canon of Lateran.

(5) Janus Parrhaſius, in Orat. ante prælectionem Epiſtol. Ciceronis ad Atticum; it is in p. 142 of the book de quæſitis per Epiſtolam, edit. 1567. See there, p. 145.

(i) Gudii Epiſt. p. 91.

(k) Ibid. p. 85.

taken from Gudius's library (i). The ſame Alciat complains (k) that he could never get again a manuſcript of Juvenal which he had lent him. We have an oration, in which our Parrhaſius makes bitter complaints againſt fortune [C]. I ſhall relate ſome other particulars in my examination of Moreri [D].

PARSONS

" born for the good of mankind; he prevailed, I " ſay, with that Pope, to call me thither, who was " already very willing to do me a favour. How " ready he was to ſerve me after my return to Rome? " &c." He had ſaid juſt before that being at Rome under Pope Alexander VI. he was like to be involved in the misfortunes of Bernardine Cajetanus, and Silius Sabellus, with whom he had had ſome correſpondence; and that Thomas Phædrus adviſed him to eſcape the danger he was in, by retiring to ſome other place.

[C] We have an oration, in which our Parrhaſius complains againſt fortune.] It is that, from which I have extracted the particulars mentioned in the preceding remark. He declares there, that Fortune never ceaſes making war againſt him, in order to force from him a confeſſion that he is vanquiſhed; but, adds he, though I be ready to ſink under my misfortunes, I ſhall not make ſuch a confeſſion. Continenter enim (ſi neſcitis) aſſiduumque mecum Fortuna bellum gerit, obnixéque contendit oppreſſo mihi victoriæ confeſſionem extorquere. Rurſus ego, tametſi cumulatis ſtragibus obrutus, extrema tamen experiri malo quàm tantulum de jure meo remittere, nedum manus dare (6). He obſerves, that as he would not apply himſelf to the law, as his anceſtors had done, he drew upon himſelf his father's indignation, who refuſed to furniſh him wherewithal to defray the expences of his ſtudies (7). He aſſerts that he loſt his library five times, that he was obliged to leave his native country, when the French invaded the Kingdom of Naples, that he loſt in a very little time his mother, his father, his two brothers, and all his children. He laments very much the loſs of Theophilus and Baſil Chalcondylas, his two brothers-in-law, who died young, and were very hopeful men (8).

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 142.

(7) Indulgentis alioqui in me patris animum depravarit (fortuna) ne ſumptus ad ocia Muſarum ſuppeditaret tanquam relicta à majoribus trita ſemita degeneri quod ut illi, leges ediſcere neglexiſſem. Idem, ibid. p. 143.

(8) See Barthius in Theb. Statii, lib. 4. p. 1008.

There is a letter publiſhed, which he wrote to Baſil Chalcondylas, ſoon after the affair of his being appointed Profeſſor at Rome was finiſhed. He mentions in that letter, two domeſtick afflictions, which had juſt befallen him. The firſt was, that his brother's widow, after refuſing, during three years following, like another Penelope, all the addreſſes of her ſuitors, had at laſt married ſecretly one Caputus, and had plundered her children's whole patrimony: Expilata penitus hæreditate parvorum liberûm (9). The other was, that his brother's daughter had ſuffered herſelf to be got with child by a Lawyer, a widower, who had been married to that girl's own ſiſter. To avoid the capital puniſhment which they had both to fear in ſuch a caſe of inceſt, they married clandeſtinely, without imparting the ſecret of their wedding to any perſon, but to the mother of the girl who was with child. But this was not ſufficient to free them from danger, unleſs the Pope would grant them a diſpenſation. Parrhaſius employ'd all his friends to obtain that favour from Leo X. and to have the expences for the diſpenſation leſſened. Itaque cum eo deducta res eſſet, ut utrique moriendum foret, conſcia tantum παρθένια matre concubitum confarreant, atque ſic honeſto nomine nefandum crimen velant. Verum ne ſic quidem, quin ferro cadant, effugient; niſi Deus aliquis eos aſpexerit, id eſt, a ſummo Pontifice veniam inceſtus inſcriptis impetraverint; ut furtivum dedecus profeſſo matrimonio diluatur. Ad hanc rem velim omnes ingenii tui nervos intendas, utariſque gratia ac auctoritate Laſcaris, Phædri, Citrariique, & omnium denique amicorum; ut exleges has nuptias, ad evitandum paratæ cædis periculum, Pontifex privilegio juſtas rataſque faciat, indicta pro copiarum facultate multa. Acceſſit hoc enim meis ærumnis, ut opes ne tantæ ſaltem ſint, quæ poſſint impendia ſuſtinere. Quas ob res abs te primum peto, ſuppliciterque (ſi pateris) oro, omni ſtudio ut cures impetrandam (quam dixi) veniam. Deinde ut quam minimum poteris impendas (10). He complains, that to all his other misfortunes is added this, namely, that he is too poor to bear the charges of that affair. He deſires therefore Chalcondylas, his brother-in-law, moſt earneſtly to uſe his beſt endeavours, that he might obtain the diſpenſation at the cheapeſt rate. He was anſwered, that the diſpenſation was granted, and that he muſt make haſte to come to Rome to enjoy the Profeſſorſhip which the Pope gave him, with a yearly ſtipend of two hundred ducats annexed to it; he was charged alſo not to forget to bring with him the ſum of money at which the diſpenſation was rated; it was added, that after his arrival, his friends would perhaps find means to get him free from ſo many expences (11).

(9) Epiſt. ad Gudium, p. 137, edit. Ultraj. 1697.

(10) Epiſt. ad Gudium, p. 137, 138. edit. Ultraj. 1697.

(11) Ex Epiſtolâ Baſilii Chalcondylæ ad Parrhaſium, ibid. p. 139.

It will perhaps be aſked why Parrhaſius inquires to what ſum the charges would amount, ſince he might have known it by the book of Rates of the Apoſtolick Chancery. But it muſt be obſerved, that beſides what is ſet down in that book, there is another ſum to pay, for which men muſt agree with the Datary (12).

(12) Et præterea componendum ſemper eſt cum Datario. Taxa Cancell. p. 4. edit. 1701.

[D] I ſhall relate ſome other particulars in my examination of Moreri.] 1. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Parrhaſius being driven from Milan, and troubled with the gout, retired to Coſenza: for when he left Milan, he went to Vicenza, to teach polite Literature there. The war made him leave that place, whence he retired into his native country, and afterwards he was Profeſſor at Rome. It is there, if we may believe Paul Jovius, that he was ſo afflicted with the gout, that it forced him to retire to Coſenza. In Urbem venit; ſed tanti ſuggeſtus honore diu perfrui non potuit, articulari morbo membra omnia ſæviſſimè deformante, unde ei maturatus in patriam reditus cum vitæ exitu contigit (13). Parrhaſius in the oration I have quoted, and which he delivered at Rome, tells us, that the year before he had been tormented with the gout more than ever: but he does not ſay that this determined him to return into his own country. Quum ſolito gravius articulari morbo torquerer anno ſuperiori, tuo hortatu, T. Phædre, incredibiles omnium membrorum cruciatus animi vigore ſuperavi: quumque mea magis intereſſet ex hoc ergaſtulo tetroque carcere primo quoque tempore emitti, in tuam gratiam penè revixi (14), i. e. " When laſt year I was more than ever tor- " mented with the gout, you encouraged me, Th. " Phædrus, to overcome by ſtrength of mind thoſe " incredible torments I ſuffered through all my " limbs: and though it had been better for me to " be immediately delivered out of this horrid pri- " ſon, yet for your ſake I did almoſt revive." I do not quote this with a deſign to diſprove what Paul Jovius aſſerts; for I know very well that the gout, together with poverty, obliged Parrhaſius to leave Rome. The wretched condition to which he was reduced, is deſcribed in theſe words of Valerianus. Is dum aſſiduis vigiliis, & longæ lectionis laboribus maceratur, in eam incidit articularis morbi truculentiam, ut per annos aliquot nil præter linguam in univerſo corpore haberet incolumem, ſiderato propemodum utroque crure, ut nullis pedum officiis uti poſſet, lacertiſque præ dolore, & contractione redditis inutilibus, magna inſuper inopia, & egeſtate oppreſſus, rerum demum omnium deſperatione ductus, relicta Roma in Calabriam cùm ſeceſſiſſet, in febrim ſubito incidit, qua diu vexatus, miſerabilique eo cruciatu ſuperatus expiravit (15), i. e. " Being worn " out by his continual lucubrations, and by the la- " bours of his conſtant Lectures, he became ſo cru- " elly afflicted with the gout, that for ſome years he " had no part of his body free but his tongue, hav- " ing almoſt loſt the uſe of both his legs, and of " both his arms; he laboured beſides under ſo great " a poverty, that he loſt all hopes of being ever in a " better ſituation; ſo that he left Rome, and returned " into Calabria, where he fell ſoon ſick of a fever, " which tormented him a long while, and at laſt " carried him off in the greateſt miſery." Obſerve that Moreri, far from filling up the chaſm, which Paul Jovius left, made it ſtill greater. 2. It is not true that Parrhaſius publiſhed but two works, if we ſuppoſe with Moreri, that he publiſhed Commentaries on Claudian, and on Ovid's Poem in Ibim: for he publiſhed ſome antient fragments, when he was Profeſſor at Milan. This is what Manutius relates (16) in the fourth book of his Grammar. It is ſomewhat ſtrange

(13) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 127. p. 271.

(14) Parrhaſius, above quotation (5), p. 145.

(15) Pier. Valer. de Literator. Infelicit. lib. 1. p. m. 25.

(16) Apud Barrium, lib. 2. de Antiquitate & ſitu Calabriæ, p. 100, quoted by Nicodemo, Add. alla Bibl. Napol. p. 88.

☞ PARSONS or PERSONS (ROBERT), an eminent Writer of the Church of Rome in the 16th Century, was born of honeſt Parents [A] at Nether-Stowey near Bridgewater in Somerſetſhire (a), in the year 1546, and inſtructed in the Latin tongue by John Hayward, a Prieſt, who had been a Canon-Regular in Devonſhire, and was then Vicar of Nether-Stowey, and having a great affection for our Author, exhibited to him at the Univerſity. In the latter end of the year 1563, he was ſent to Baliol College in Oxford, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an acute Diſputant, both in his College and the publick ſchools (b). May 31, 1568, he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and the ſame year was admitted Probationer-Fellow of his College, and afterwards Chaplain-Fellow, and ſo probably entered into holy Orders, being then a noted tutor in the College (d). December 2, 1572, he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts (c). February 13, 1573-4, he quitted his Fellowſhip of Baliol College [B]. In June 1574, he left England,

(a) Parſon's manifeſtation of the folly and bad ſpirit of certain in England, calling themſelves Secular Prieſts, c. 7. fol. 89. b. edit. 1602. in 4*to*.

(b) Wood, Athen. Oxon, vol. 1. col. 356. 2d edit.

(c) Idem, Faſti, Oxon, vol. 1. col. 102.

(d) Idem, Athen. Oxon, ubi ſupra; and Mr. Edward Gee's Introduction, p. 2. to the Jeſuit's Memorial, edit. London 1690.

(e) Wood, Faſti, Oxon, vol. 1. col. 106.

ſtrange that it ſhould be impoſſible to know by the large additions which Nicodemo made to Nicolo Toppi's Bibliotheca Napolitana, what books Parrhaſius publiſhed. We do not even find there very poſitively that he publiſhed a Commentary on Claudian (17). All the editions which Nicodemo mentions of that Critick's work were printed after his death. What is ſometimes plainly enough told is, that part of Parrhaſius's writings were publiſhed by other people's care. Bernardinus Martiranus publiſhed the Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry: this is obſerved in expreſs words in the title of the book, which title is tranſcribed by Nicolo Toppi (18), and yet that Author aſſerts that Parrhaſius himſelf publiſhed it. Nicodemo does not ſuffer that blunder to paſs unobſerved (19). 3. It is not at all probable, that Parrhaſius publiſhed a Commentary on Ovid's Ibis. No man pretends to have ſeen it: wherefore Nicodemo (20) looks upon what Paul Jovius aſſerts as a falſity: Edidit Commentarios in . . . . . Naſonis Ibin (21. John Matthew Toſcan (22), Gaddi (23), Barri (24), Moreri and ſeveral others follow here in Paul Jovius's account. I have another reaſon to think they are miſtaken, which is, that Monſieur Boiſſieu, who has very carefully enquired after all the Authors who wrote on that Poem of Ovid, does not mention Parrhaſius's Commentary, though he gives us a long liſt of other Commentators (25): but what is more ſtill, he places Parrhaſius only among thoſe Criticks, who have occaſionally corrected ſome paſſages in Ovid. Obſerve that Parrhaſius wrote a great many works, moſt of which have not been printed. Conſult Nicodemo's additions.

(17) Conſult Barth. in Stat. Th. lib. 4. p. 1007.

(18) Nicolo Toppi, Bibl. Napol. p. 112.

(19) Nicodemo, Addizioni alla Bibl. Napol. p. 87.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Jovius, Elog. cap. 137. p. 271.

(22) In Peplo Italiæ, lib. 3. p. 63, 64. apud Nicodemum, Addizion. alla Bibl. Napol. p. 88.

(23) De Scriptoribus non Eccleſiaſticis, Tom. 2. p. 182. apud eumd. ibid. p. 87.

(24) De Antiquitate & Situ Calabriæ, apud eumd. ibid. p. 88.

(25) Dionyſius Salvagnius Boiſſius, Comment. in Ibin, p. 2 and 3.

[A] Born of honeſt parents.] Mr. Wood tells us (1), that his father was a Plebeian of honeſt repute, and an enemy to the Church of Rome, but by Alexander Bryant reconciled thereto. His mother was a known grave matron, living divers years in flight and baniſhment for religion, and died therein at London, very aged, about 1599. But ſeveral Romiſh Prieſts and others, and among the reſt, Mr. Thomas Bell (2), and Dr. Thomas James (3), aſſert, that "he was baſely born, of "mean parentage at Stokerſey in Somerſetſhire; "that his ſuppoſed father was a Blackſmith, his "right father the pariſh prieſt of Stokerſey; by "means whereof he was binonymous, ſometimes cal-"led Rob. Parſons, ſometimes Rob. Cowbuck." And Mr. Edward Gee (4) remarks, that the world is not agreed either about his name or parentage; for the name of Parſons or Perſons, as he writes it himſelf, they will have it to be given him upon a ſcandalous reaſon, while the true name of his ſuppoſed father was Cowback or Cubbock.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 356. 2d edit.

(2) Anatomy of Popiſh Tyranny, lib. 2. c. 5. ſect. 1. edit. London 1603.

(3) Life of Father Parſons, at the end of the Jeſuit's Downfall, p. 52. edit. Oxford 1612.

(4) Introduction, p. 1, 2. to the Jeſuit's Memorial for the intended Reformation under their firſt Popiſh Prince. edit. London 1690, in 8vo.

[B] February 13, 1573-4, he quitted his Fellowſhip of Baliol College.] Mr. Wood informs us (5), that "he reſigned his Fellowſhip of his own accord, as "Regiſter of Baliol College, p. 125. ſays; though "certain Authors tell us, that he reſigned to prevent "expulſion." Father Parſons himſelf in his Brief Apology (6) repreſents the caſe to have been a mere voluntary reſignation. But Mr. Gee acquaints us (7), that he was turned out of his Fellowſhip and the College with diſgrace: he was not expelled indeed, but forced to reſign, with leave to keep his chambers and pupils a while longer. But this grace was quickly croſſed out, the occaſion of which the Writers of thoſe times, and of his own Society are very much divided about. Father Morus, a Jeſuit, in his Hiſtoria Miſſionis Anglicanæ Soc. Jeſu (8), will have it to be, becauſe he was not only ſuſpected of inclining to Popery, but both thought and ſpoke openly for the Romiſh Religion; and therefore that it was eſteemed an unfit and dangerous thing to truſt ſuch a man with the education of ſo many young men, as he generally had under his care. But this, ſays Mr. Gee (9), cannot be the true reaſon, ſince Father Perſons behaved himſelf as a good Proteſtant, and converſed eſpecially with ſuch men, (Mr. Squire, and Dr. Hyde, for example, then famous men and zealous Proteſtants) as might inſtruct and confirm him in the Proteſtant Religion; for which he was afterwards, when he was College-Burſar, ſo very zealous, that he changed a great many old books and manuſcripts for Proteſtant books; and did firſt put Proteſtant writers in their College Library. And after his diſgraceful putting out of the College, when an old friend of his, a Gentleman of the Inner Temple, declared to him, that he had doubts concerning his Religion, he did not only proteſt to the Gentleman, but offered to take his oath upon it, that he was no Papiſt, nor did ever intend to be: others will have his turning out of his Fellowſhip to be occaſioned by his being a turbulent and lewd man, guilty of forgery and knavery, and ſuch like crimes, as made him unfit for a Society. And Dr. Bagſhaw (who had been of the ſame College, and afterwards turned Papiſt alſo, and became a ſeminary Prieſt) affirms, that he was accuſed of falſifying his College accounts by Stancliffe his brother Burſar; and this is often objected to him by the ſecular Prieſts, who have treated him with ſeverity enough, though not with more than his pranks, after he became a Jeſuit, did deſerve. Others aſſign other reaſons of his being diſcharged the College. But to ſet aſide at once the reaſons offered by his brethren, the Jeſuits, and thoſe objected by his ſeverer adverſaries the Secular Prieſts, the matter may be truly decided by the teſtimonies of two unexceptionable witneſſes, who both knew him, and one of them was Fellow of the ſame College with Parſons, Archbiſhop Abbot, and Mr. Camden the Hiſtorian. The Archbiſhop hath written a large letter about this very buſineſs, which I ſhall tranſcribe hither, out of Mr. Foulis, who ſays he did tranſcribe it from the original, with the marginal notes upon it.

(6) Fol. 192, 193, 194, &c. edit. St. Omers, 1601, in 8vo.

(7) Ubi ſupra, p. 2.

(8) Lib. 2. p. 39.

(9) pag. 3.

"To my worſhipful loving friend, Mr. Dr. Huſſye, at "Mr. Haiden's houſe, who dwelleth at the ſign "of the Tunn in Watling-ſtreet, give theſe.

"You write unto me, to know what is in record "any way againſt Mr. Parſons; and I return you "here incloſed word for word, ſo much as is in the "Regiſter of Baliol College. In the reſignation, as "you may ſee, he had written ſponte & coactus; but "now it is ſponte non coactus, [&] being blotted out, "and [non] being ſet over *. Which I am deceiv-"ed, if it be not altered by ſomebody elſe of late, "in as much as I am verily perſuaded, that ſince "my coming to the College, I have ſeen it ſponte "& coactus; which although it carry a contradicti-"on, yet intimateth, that he reſigned againſt "his will. The particular reaſons whereof no man "can tell better than Dr. Turner, now dwelling in "Fetter-lane, or Dr. Hide † of Sarum; for, as I "take it, they were both preſent at his removing. "The cauſes and manner of giving over, as far as "I could ever comprehend, were theſe. Bagſhaw "being a ſmart young man, and one who thought "his penny good ſilver, after he had his grace to be "Bachelor of Arts *, was with ſome deſpite ſwindg-"ed by Parſons, being Dean of the College. Hoc "manet altâ mente repoſtum; and Bagſhaw afterward "coming to be Fellow, was moſt hot in perſecution

* Thus { non / & }

† In the Proctor's book, I find one Thomas Hyde proceeded Maſter of Arts the ſame year with Rob. Parſons, viz. 1573.

* Chriſtopher Bagſhaw admitted Fellow 1573, left the College 1582; was made Prieſt in France, lived a while in the Engliſh College of Rome, proceeded Doctor, ſome ſay, at Padua [A. P. Reply, p. 156] others at Paris, and was one of the faculty of Sorbonne. He was active againſt the Arch-Prieſt in the Stirs at Wisbich. He lived to be very old.

England, and went to Calais, and thence to Antwerp, where having continued for ſome weeks, he took a journey to Louvain, and there met with Father William Good his countryman, with whom he ſpent ſome days in religious exerciſes. He afterwards went to Padua, where he proſecuted his ſtudies in Phyſick, and applied himſelf likewiſe to the Civil Law. But afterwards abandoning theſe ſtudies, agreeably to Father Good's advice, he went to the Engliſh College at Rome, and was there admitted into the Society of the Jeſuits July 4, 1575, and went through the ſeveral claſſes of Divinity. In 1580, he returned to England with Father Edmund Campian and others, to promote the intereſt of the Romiſh Religion [C]. While he continued here, which was in the quality of a Superior, he travelled about the country to Gentlemen's houſes, diſguiſed in the habit ſometimes

" againſt Parſons. It was the more forwarded by Dr. " Squire's diſpleaſure, who was then Maſter of Baliol " College, and thought himſelf to have been much " bitten by vile libels, the Author whereof he conceiv- " ved Parſons to be; who in truth, was a man at that " time wonderfully given to ſcoffing, and that with " bitterneſs, which alſo was the cauſe, that none of " the company loved him. Now Dr. Squire and " Bagſhaw being deſirous of ſome occaſion to trim " him, this fell out. In the year 1572, Parſons had " been Burſar; and being joined in office with one " Stancliff, a very ſimple fellow, he took the advan- " tage of the weakneſs of his Collegue, and falſified " the reckonings much to the damage of the Col- " lege; as alſo deeply polling the Commoners " names, whereof there was ſtore in the college; " and withal, not ſparing his own ſcholars. By " all which means it was thought that he had pur- " loined one hundred marks. His office expired at " St. Luke's tide. There were ſome, that between " that and February 1573, ſcanned over the books, " being moved thereunto by the ſecret complaints " of ſome of the Commoners their ſcholars; and " finding it apparent, and alſo being now certified, " that he was a baſtard, whereas it is the firſt qua- " lity required by ſtatute, that every Fellow ſhould " be legitimo thoro natus, they proceeded to have his " expulſion ſolemnly. Where by the way, you may " add, that Parſons was not of the beſt fame con- " cerning incontinency †, as I have heard ſome " ſay, who lived in Oxon at that time. But whe- " ther that were then objected againſt him, I have " not heard. Parſons being put to this puſh in the " College-chapel, and ways ſufficient concurring to " expel him, and in truth, no man ſtanding for " him, maketh humble requeſt, that he might be " ſuffered to reſign, which, with ſome ado, was " yielded to him; and then he wrote as you have " here incloſed. Afterwards, before the Aſſembly " broke up, he intreated, that his giving over might " be concealed, by reaſon that it would be diſgrace- " ful unto him with all men, but eſpecially with his " ſcholars, and their friends; and for theſe cauſes, " humbly prayed, that he might keep his ſcholars, " chamber, &c. and be reputed as a Fellow in the " houſe, the matter being conceal'd from all the boys, " and the younger ſort in the houſe; which then in " words was yielded unto, and that other decree, which " now you ſee razed, was enacted for the time; but " afterwards was ſoon croſſed, as you may behold. " And ſoon after their coming out of the Chapel, " by Bagſhaw's means, a peal of bells was rung at " Magdalen Pariſh-Church, being the Pariſh wherein " Baliol College ſtandeth: the reaſon of which " ringing, as it was imparted to ſome few, to be " toring out Mr. Parſons; ſo generally it was not " known to the world or in the College; which gave " occaſion to this farther jeſt. When Parſons was " expelled, he was one of the Deans of the College, " and ſo by his place was to keep Corrections in the " Hall on Saturdays. The next time therefore of " Corrections, which was the day of Parſons's exclu- " ſion, or ſoon after, Dr. Squire cauſeth Parſons to " go into the Hall as Dean, and to call the Book and " the Roll: and then cometh Dr. Squire himſelf in, " and as if it had been in kindneſs to countenance " him, (but in truth more profound to deride him) " he calleth him at every word Mr. Dean, and de- " ſireth him often to have a ſtrict care to the good " government of the youth, and not only for a fit, " but all the time of his year that he was to con- " tinue in office. Some of the Commoners knew all " this pageant, and laught the more ſweetly; and " Parſons in the end ſpied how he was ſcorned, and " nothing concealed; nay, underſtanding all his " knell, which was rung out for him, for very ſhame " got him away to London; and there not knowing " what courſe at firſt to take, at length reſolved to " try his fortune beyond ſea, purpoſing, as it ſhould " ſeem, at his departure, to ſtudy Phyſic; but af- " terward, when he came into Italy, reſolving rather " to ſtudy the Civil Law, which he did for a time " at Bononia, as himſelf in that place told Mr. Da- " vers, brother to the late Sir John Davers, as the " ſaid Mr. Davers hath himſelf told me; but af- " terwards, belike, wanting means of continuance, " he turned to be a Jeſuit. Preſently, upon his de- " parture out of England, he ſent a letter, or rather " a notable libel to Dr. Squire; and he had ſo or- " dered the matter, that many copies of the letter " were taken, and abroad in the hands of others, " before the letter came to the Doctor; which was " the true cauſe, that many lewd things were falſly " reported of Dr. Squire, although in truth he was " ſuch a man as wanted not faults, &c.

† Dr. Sutcliff's Bleſſings on Mount Gerizim, p. 288.

February 1. 1601. at Univerſity College *.

" Your very loving friend,

" George Abbot."

* Whereof he was then Maſter.

The incloſed reſignation mentioned in this letter, runs thus:

Ego Robertus Parſons, Socius Collegii de Balliolo, reſigno omne meum jus & clameum, quem habeo vel habere potero Societatis meæ in dicto Collegio; quod quidem facio ſponte $\frac{non}{et}$ coactus, die decimo tertio Menſis Februarii Anno Dom. 1573. Per me,

Rob. Parſons.

The incloſed decree, about keeping his chamber and pupils, mentioned in the letter, was this:

Eodem tempore decretum eſt unanimi Conſenſu Magiſtri & reliquorum Sociorum, ut Magiſter Robertus Parſons nuperrimè Socius retineat ſibi ſua Cubicula & Scholares quouſq; voluerit, & Communia ſua de Collegio habeat uſq; ad Feſtum Paſchatis immediatè ſequentis.

With this account of Archbiſhop Abbot, Mr. Camden's exactly agrees, who ſpeaking of Parſons's and Campian's coming privately into England in 1580, gives this character of them both (9): This Parſons was of Somerſetſhire, a violent, fierce-natured man, and of a rough behaviour. Campian was a Londoner, of a ſweet diſpoſition, and a polite man. Both of them were by education Oxford-men, whom I myſelf knew, being of their ſtanding in the Univerſity. Campian being of St. John's College, bore the office of Proctor of the Univerſity in 1568; and being ordained Deacon, made a ſhew of the Proteſtant Religion, till he withdrew himſelf out of England. Parſons was of Baliol College, wherein he openly profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion, untill he was for his looſe carriage expelled with diſgrace, and went over to the Papiſts.

(9) Annal. Eliz. lib. 2. ad ann. 1580.

[C] In 1580, he returned to England with Father Edmund Campian, and others, to promote the intereſts of the Romiſh Religion.] Our Author and Campian departed from Rome on the Sunday after Eaſter 1580, with the Pope's Benediction (10). Their diſpatches were given them, before they ſet out, by Everard Mercurianus, the General of their Order (10); which father Morus (11) makes to be ſome commands about faithfully diſcharging their miniſterial function, and by no means, either by word or writing, to meddle with

(10) Gee's Introduction, p. 19.

(11) Hiſt. Miſſion. lib. 3. p. 61.

times of a Soldier, ſometimes of a Gentleman, and at other times like a Miniſter or an Apparitor (f); and being a perſon of a ſeditious and turbulent ſpirit, he excited the Roman Catholicks to endeavour to depoſe Queen Elizabeth (g). About this time Father Campian being ſeized and committed to priſon, our Author eſcaped out of England for fear of the ſame fate, and went to Rome, where he was conſtituted Rector of Engliſh College in 1587. He afterwards took a voyage to Spain, where he procured ſeveral ſeminaries for ſupplying England with Prieſts to be founded [D]; and by his great abilities in diſputing, writing, and promoting the Roman Catholick cauſe, he became known to and (f) Idem, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 356, 357.

(g) Camdeni Annales Regin. Elizabeth. ad ann. 1580.

with the publick affairs of the Kingdom of England. Acceptis ab Everardo mandatis de re Catholicâ per noſtri inſtituti miniſteria diligenter procuranda, atque non minori diligentiâ vitandâ omni rerum, quæ ad regni publici negotia pertinerent, ſeu verbo ſeu ſcripto tractatione. They paſſed through Geneva, where they had ſome converſation with Beza. Parſons firſt embarked at Calais for England, in the diſguiſe of a ſoldier, and arriving ſafe at London, waited there for Campian, who likewiſe eſcaped the ſtrict ſearch that was made for them, their pictures as well as an account of the time of their ſetting out from Rome having reached England before them. To underſtand the deſign of their coming thither, it will be proper to conſider the ſituation in which Queen Elizabeth was with regard to the See of Rome. Pope Pius IV. had attempted by fair ſpeeches to perſuade her to ſubmit to that See; and for that purpoſe ſent by his agent Parpaglia a very civil letter, giving her aſſurance of every thing, which ſhe could deſire. But this having no effect, Pius V. reſolved upon harſher methods, and contrived and encouraged plots againſt her, and publiſhed a bill of excommunication and deprivation againſt her, which he cauſed to be fixed by one Felton upon the Biſhop of London's gates; the title of which was, The ſentence declaratory of our holy Lord, Pope Pius V. againſt Elizabeth Queen of England, and the Hereticks adhering to her; wherein alſo her ſubjects are declared to be abſolved from the oath of allegiance, and whatever other duty they owe unto her; and, thoſe, which from henceforth ſhall obey her, are involved in the ſame Curſe or Anathema. But Mr. Gee obſerves (12), that as terrible as this title, and as much more terrible as the Bull itſelf was, it did no ways anſwer the Pope's expectation. It was ſo far from raiſing all the Papiſts in the nation againſt her, which was his expectation as well as his command, that it was contemned and ſlighted by moſt, and inſtead of alienating their duty and affections from the Queen, it did them from him, who was ſo ill adviſed, as by ſuch haſty, unreaſonable, and ridiculous provocations to bring the ſeverity of laws and trouble upon them, who had hitherto been ſuffered quietly to enjoy in private the exerciſe of their Religion; but now had no reaſon to expect it any longer, being made every one of them ſo obnoxious and ſuſpicious to the Government, by reaſon of this Bull againſt the Queen. The deſign of Parſons and Campian in coming to England was evidently to make this Bull effectual, and to raiſe not only the Papiſts, but all others, that they could buy into their intereſt, to depoſe the Queen, and reduce the Realm to the Pope's obedience. But as by the laſt clauſe but one of the Bull, the Papiſts themſelves were put under a curſe and anathematized, if they continued to obey the Queen, how uncapable ſoever they were at preſent to oppoſe her; the two Jeſuits obtained faculties from Pope Gregory XIII. the ſucceſſor of Pius V. to free the Romaniſts in England from the curſe of that Bull for the preſent, till things ſhould be more ripe, and a more favourable juncture ſhould offer itſelf; theſe faculties were ſeized in the hands of one of theſe two Jeſuits Accomplices, immediately after Campian's execution, and run thus: Facultates conceſſæ P. P. Roberto Parſonio & Edmundo Campiano, pro Angliâ die 14 Aprilis 1580. Petatur a ſummo Domino noſtro Explicatio Bullæ declaratoriæ per Pium Quintum contra Elizabetham & ei adhærentes, quam Catholici cupiunt intelligi hoc modo, ut obliget ſemper illam & Hæreticos; Catholicos verò nullo modo obliget rebus ſic ſtantibus ſed tum demum, quando publica ejuſdem Bullæ Executio fieri poterit. i. e. Let it be de-
" ſired of our moſt holy Lord, the explication of the " Bull declaratory made by Pius V. againſt Eliza" beth, and ſuch as do adhere to or obey her; which " Bull the Catholicks deſire to be underſtood in this " manner, that the ſame Bull ſhall always oblige her
" and the Hereticks; but the Catholicks it ſhall by " no means bind, as affairs do now ſtand, but here-
" after, when the publick execution of the ſaid Bull
" may be had or made." There followed, as Lord Burghley tells us (13), many other petitions of faculties for their further authority, which all concluded thus: Has prædictas Gratias conceſſit ſummus Pontifex Patri Roberto Perſonio & Edmundo Campiano in Angliam profecturis, die 14, Aprilis 1580, præſente Patre Oliverio Manarco aſſiſtent. i. e. " The Pope
" hath granted theſe foreſaid Graces to Father Robert
" Parſons and Edmund Campian: who are now to go
" to England, the 14th day of April 1580. Pre-
" ſent Father Oliverius Manarcus aſſiſtant." The ſecular Prieſts in their Important Conſiderations, printed in 1601, obſerve, that our Author, upon his arrival in England, ſo belaboured both himſelf and others in matters of ſtate, how he might ſet her Majeſty's Crown upon another head (as appeareth by a letter of his own to a certain Earl) that the Catholicks themſelves threatned to deliver him into the hands of the civil Magiſtrate, except he deſiſted from ſuch kind of practice. This account of his turbulent and ſeditious behaviour is confirmed by Camden, who had it from ſome of the Papiſts themſelves, and ſpeaks of it upon their own credit, that they had thoughts of delivering him into the Magiſtrates hands on this account. But notwithſtanding the intentions and threats of thoſe more peaceable Papiſts, Father Parſons went on his own way; " wherein, ſays Mr. Gee (14), he made ſo
" good progreſs, that though he came into England
" but in June that year, viz. 1580, yet before
" Chriſtmas all things ſeemed ready for an inſurrec-
" tion, the Papiſts being taught (and that under pain
" of damnation) to renounce the Queen, who had
" now no more authority over them, being depoſed
" by the ſentence of the infallible Pope of Rome;
" and the Pope's and King of Spain's countenance
" and aſſiſtance promiſed them, if they would but
" riſe and make a Rebellion.' That the Papiſts by that time were generally come over to Father Parſons's party, and looked upon the Queen as no longer their Sovereign, by reaſon of her being depoſed by Pius V. and Gregory XIII. who ſent the firſt miſſion of theſe Jeſuits into England, is plain from the confeſſion of Hart, one of their Fellows, who was taken about that time; wherein he acknowledged (15), that the Bull of Pius V. (for ſo much as it is againſt the Queen) is holden among the Engliſh Catholicks for a lawful ſentence, and diſcharge of her ſubject's fidelity, and ſo remaineth in force; but in ſome points touching the ſubjects, it is altered by the preſent Pope: for where in that bull all her ſubjects are commanded not to obey her, and ſhe being excommunicated and depoſed, all that do obey her are likewiſe innodate and accurſed, which point is perillous to the Catholicks; for if they obey her, they be in the Pope's curſe, and if they diſobey her, they are in the Queen's danger, therefore the preſent Pope to relieve them hath altered that part of the Bull, and diſpenſed with them to obey and ſerve her, without peril of excommunication, which diſpenſation is to endure but till it pleaſe the Pope to determine it otherwiſe.

[D] Where he procured ſeveral Seminaries for ſupplying England with Prieſts to be founded.] Mr. Gee remarks (16), that as he had laboured, while he was in England, in the promoting the Popiſh Recuſancy, and getting the Engliſh Papiſts to be governed by the Jeſuits; ſo after he was obliged to leave his country, he employed all his arts and intereſt to get Seminaries erected for the ſupplying England from time to time with Prieſts to keep up that Recuſancy, and to prepare the Papiſts here to join with any invaſion, which thoſe abroad ſhould procure againſt their own country. As ſoon as he came to Roan, he dealt with the

(12) Ubi ſupra, p. 22.

(13) In his Tract, intitled, Execution of Juſtice in England for Treaſon, and not for Religion, p. 12, 13.

(14) Ubi ſupra, p. 29.

(15) See his confeſſion, taken Decemb. 31, 1580, in Lord Burghley's Tract above cited.

(16) Ubi ſupra, p. 41.

and esteemed by the King of Spain. About 1597, he returned to Rome, in hopes of a Cardinal's hat; but missing it, died, as it is said, with grief, as we are informed by Mr. Wood (b). But Alegambe (i) gives us a different account of the affair, and tells us, that our Author being informed, that King Philip II. of Spain designed to procure a Cardinal's hat for him, applied himself to Pope Clement VIII. before the King's request was signified to him, and desired him with many tears not to grant it, to the great surprize of the Pope, who said that he had never any thoughts of the affair. Some blamed Father Parsons for his over hastiness in it, as if his design had been to offer himself to the Pope for preferment, or to have done himself honour by publishing the King's favourable opinion of him. But Alegambe commends him for his prudence in thus precluding the way to his advancement, since it would have been too late, when the King's desire was once made known to the Pope. Mr. Edward Gee (k) observes, that "amidst his projects "for the Spanish interest, he had hopes upon the death of Cardinal Allen to be made by "the Spanish interest a Cardinal for England; and there was set about in Flanders by "Holt the Jesuit and Worthington, a petition to the King of Spain for that purpose, "subscribed by the common soldiers, labourers, artisans, and pensioners, nay, scullions, and Laundresses, as well as by those of better rank and quality. Upon this Father Parsons makes haste out of Spain to Rome to hinder it, as the Jesuits say for him. "When he came thither, upon a day set him he waited on the Pope, and acquainted "him how the city was full of the discourse of his being shortly to be made a Cardinal; "and that Spain and Flanders rung with it too; and therefore begged of him, that he "would not think of making him a Cardinal, who might be more serviceable, in the "condition he was now in, to the affairs of England. The Pope told him, that the King "of Spain had not written a syllable to him about any such thing; and that he must not "mind foolish reports; and bid him go and mind his studies." Father Alegambe gives him a very great character for piety and integrity; but Cardinal d'Ossat in one of his letters, where he gives the King of France an account of our Author's Conference, published under the name of Doleman, concerning the next succession to the Crown of England, says, that he was a man, who regarded neither truth nor reason. And Pasquin at Rome thus exposed his factious and plotting humour (l): "If there be any man, that will buy "the Kingdom of England, let him repair to a Merchant in a black square cap in the "city, and he shall have a very good pennyworth thereof." His zeal for the Romish Religion appears from his unwearied endeavours to keep up an irreconcileable difference between

(b) Ubi supra, col. 357.

(i) Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu, p. 413. edit. 1643.

(k) Introduction, p. 54. See Watson's Quodlibet, p. 120.

Morus, Hist. Miss. Jes. lib. 6. p. 234, 235.

(l) Gee, p. 56.

the Duke of Guise to erect a Seminary for such a purpose in Normandy. He afterwards went to Spain, and prevailed with King Philip to encourage and erect such in Spain; so that in a short time they could not only boast of their Seminaries at Rome and Rheimes, but of those at Valladolid, Seville, and St. Lucar's in Spain, at Lisbon in Portugal, at Doway and St. Omer's in Flanders; in all which their youth were educated in violent prejudices against their own native country, and their minds were formed to all the purposes and designs, which Father Parsons had in his head. Father Morus, in his Historia Missionis Anglicanæ Soc. Jesu, tells us, that Father Parsons was for having the youth, who were entered into these Seminaries, to take an oath about faithfully answering the end and benefit of their education there; but he does not say one word of their being obliged to subscribe to the title of the Infanta of Spain to the Crown of England, in oppositon to that of the then King of Scots; which Father Parsons afterwards insisted upon their doing, as appears by several Roman Catholick writers. Clark, one of the secular Priests, says concerning him (17), that "as touching the Colleges and "Pensions, that are maintained and given by the "Spaniards, which he so often inculcateth, we no "whit thank him for them, as things are handled, "and occasions thereby ministred of our greater persecution at home, by reason of Father Parsons's "treacherous practices, thereby to promote the Spanish title to our countrey; and his hateful strata-"gems with such scholars as are there brought up, "enforcing them to subscribe to Blanks, and by pub-"lick orations to fortify the said wrested title of the "Infanta, meaning Isabella Clara Eugenia, daughter "to Philip II. of Spain, whose right to the English "Crown was maintained in a book by this Parsons "made, but published by him under the false name "of Doleman." Watson, another secular Priest, observes likewise, that Parsons earnestly moving the young students in Spain to set their hands to a schedule, that they would accept the Lady Infanta for Queen of England, after the decease of her Majesty [Queen Elizabeth] that now is; but finding them altogether unwilling to intermeddle with these State-affairs, belonging nothing to them, and most hurtful to both their cause and persons; used this cunning shift to draw on the innocent and simple youths, to pretend forsooth to them of Valladolid, that the students in Seville had done it already; no remedy then but they must follow. And that having thus craftily gotten their names, he shewed them to the students in Seville for an example of their fact and forwardness, which he required them to imitate. Cardinal d'Ossat also in a letter to Henry IV. of France about the designs of the Spaniards, and Father Parsons against England writes thus (18): "For this purpose also were the Colleges and "Seminaries erected by the Spaniards for the English "at Doway and St. Omer's, wherein the young Gentlemen of the best families in England are entertained; thereby to oblige them, and by them their "parents, kindred, and friends. The principal care, "which these Colleges and Seminaries have, is to catechise and bring up these young English Gentlemen in this faith and firm belief, that the late "King of Spain had, and that his children now "have, the true right of succession to the Crown of "England; and that this is advantageous and expedient for the Catholick Faith, not only in England, "but where-ever Christianity is. And when these "young Gentlemen have finished their humanity studies, and are come to such an age, then to make "them thoroughly Spaniards, they are carried out of "the Low-Countries into Spain, where there are "other Colleges for them, wherein they are instructed in Philosophy and Divinity, and confirmed in the same belief and holy faith, that the "Kingdom of England did belong to the late "King of Spain, and does now to his children. "After these young English Gentlemen have finished "their courses, those of them, who are found to be "most Hispaniolised, and most courageous and firm "to this Spanish Creed, are sent into England, to "sow this faith among them, to be spies, and to "give advice to the Spaniards of what is doing in "England, and what must and ought to be done to "bring England into the hands of the Spaniards; "and, if need be, to undergo Martyrdom, as soon "or rather sooner for this Spanish Faith, than for the "Catholick Religion."

(17) See Gee, p. 44.

(18) Part 2. lib. 7.

[E] His

between the Kingdoms of Spain and England, and to incite the former to invade England and Ireland [E]; and from his writings, which are generally of a ſeditious nature.

[E] His unwearied endeavours to keep up an irreconcileable difference between the Kingdom of Spain and "England, and to incite the former to invade England and Ireland.] He had at firſt conſulted with the Duke of Guiſe how to depoſe Queen Elizabeth, and eſtabliſh the Queen of Scots; and endeavoured for this purpoſe, as we are told (19), to make a liſt of Catholicks, who under the conduct of the Duke, were to change the State of England, under pretence of ſupporting the title of Queen Mary of Scotland; but that her Council at Paris, which underſtood the buſineſs better, were ſo ſenſible of his preſumption, that they took from him the Queen's Cypher, which he had ſtolen, and commanded never to meddle with her affairs again. It is probable, that he was diſguſted at this neglect ſhewn him by the Queen of Scot's Miniſters; and therefore in revenge attached himſelf wholly to the Spaniſh intereſt, which he eſpouſed ſo far, as not only to ſollicit and encourage the open attempts of the Spaniards againſt England in the invaſion of it, but after the ill ſucceſs of that expedition, to ſet up their pretended title to the Kingdom of England; "and laboured with the King of Spain for a "ſecond invaſion, and after that a third, plotting. "and deviſing all ways to bring the King of Spain "to it, and the Papiſts of England, both thoſe at "home, and thoſe abroad, to join and aſſiſt the King "of Spain in it. But all his pains was loſt about "theſe invaſions from abroad; and therefore he next "ſets himſelf to raiſe a Rebellion in England itſelf, "and deals with Ferdinand Earl of Derby to appear "in and head it; which becauſe he declined to do, "he was poiſoned by Father Heſketh's procurement, "who had been ſent to him by Father Parſons. But "failing here alſo of the deſired ſucceſs, the poor "Father was at a loſs what to do with this Kingdom "of England; and ſince he ſaw all miſcarried, that "he had plotted againſt Queen Elizabeth, who de"ſcended to her grave full of years and honour; his "next buſineſs was to keep out King James, who was "a Proteſtant alſo, from ſucceeding her. For this "purpoſe he wrote his Doleman or Conference about "the next ſucceſſion to the Crown of England; the "chief deſign of which was to exclude the Scot's "title, as well the Lady Arabella's, as King James's, "and to ſet up the Spaniſh Infanta (20)." He afterwards went upon ſome other deſigns for the excluſion of the King of Scots; one of which was of exciting the people to ſet up a popular form of Government, for which he had furniſhed them with principles in ſeveral of his books. Another was to engage the Pope in a deſign of making his kinſman the Duke of Parma King of England, or joining with the Lady Arabella, and marrying her to the Duke's brother, Cardinal Farneſe. Cardinal d'Oſſat gives the King of France a large account of both theſe projects in one of his letters, and in another (21) mentions a fourth, wherein himſelf had been dealt with by Parſons, then Rector of the College of Jeſuits at Rome, which was, that the Pope, King of France, and King of Spain, ſhould agree among themſelves upon a ſucceſſor for England, who ſhould be a Catholick; and that they ſhould join their forces to eſtabliſh him on the throne of England. In the firſt volume of the Memorials of the affairs of State in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and K. James I. collected chiefly from the original Papers of Sir Ralph Winwood, Knt. we have ſeveral letters mentioning Father Parſons's deſigns. In a letter of Sir Henry Neville, the Engliſh Embaſſador in France, to Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State, dated at Paris June 27, 1599. O. S. (22), we find the following paſſage. "I fynd, that there "hath growen great diſſenſion betweene our Papiſts "abroad; and that they have bin divided into two "factions, the one depending upon the Jeſuites, "whereof Parſons is now the head, whoſe courſes "have bin violent to ſeeke and wiſhe the overthrowe "of the preſent Eſtate, by conqueſt, or any other "meanes; the other conſiſting chiefly of the laymen "and gentlemen, which are abroad, whereof Charles "Paget hath bin the chiefe, who could not be "brought, as they pretend, to conſent, or concurre, "to the invaſion and conqueſt of our Kingdom by a "foraine Prince. This diviſion beganne amongſt "them ſoon after the death of the Queene of Scotts, "upon whom they did all concurre, whiles ſhe lived; "but ſince her death, could never agree upon any "courſe, eyther of conqueſt or propoſed title. And "this contention hath proceeded unto great heat "between them, inſomuch as eyther ſyde hathe la"boured to ſupplant and diſgrace the other, but e"ſpecially of late, ſince the title of the Infanta of "Spaine hath bin ſett on foote, according to the "books written by Parſons under one Doleman's name. "For the Jeſuite's ſyde promoting that title by all "means, and taking a violent courſe to urge all En"gliſhmen eyther in Spaine, or Rome, or where-els "they may prevayl with them, to ſubſcribe there"unto; Paget and his ſyde hath directly oppoſed "themſelves both by word and wryting, as I am in"formed; and they are ſo devided thereupon, as "there is an extreme hatred growen betweene them; "inſomuche as theſe men do openly inveigh againſt "Parſons and his adherents, as men ſeditious and "factious, full of treacherie, and without conſci"ence." Mr. Ralph Winwood, in a letter to Secretary Cecil, dated at Paris February 27, 1601. O. S. writes thus (23): Parſons the Jeſuite hath this laſt weeke written to the Ambaſſador of Scotland, excuſeing himſelf for the writings, which he hath publiſhed, to the prejudice of the Scot's King; and entreated (by his mediation) to fynd ſome entre into his favour and good opinion; with no want of proteſtations, that he will relinquiſh the ſervice of any other, and only adhere to him, upon the ſmalleſt ſhews, that he ſhall make of his inclination towards the favour of the Catholiques. Monſieur de Rhoſny, in the laſt ſpeech I had with him, did touch this point, that there were many practiſes to alienate the King of Scotland from the Religion, which he profeſſeth. And when I anſwered, that he was a Prince, wiſe, moderate, and diſcreet, and ſo well founded in the Religion he profeſſeth, that there was no fear that he wold ſuffer himſelfe to be ſeduced, he replyed, that ambition did know no other Religion, then that which did make way for the advancemeat of her deſſeigns. It ſeemeth, he hath received ſome advertiſements to this purpoſe from his brother, the King's Ambaſſador at Rome. The trueth is, the continuance of the Biſhop of Glaſgow in this place of Ambaſſador, and many ſollicitations, which he hath made to the Pope by letters, to make the Biſhop of Weeſmes Cardinal, have done a generall wrong to the reputation of his judgment as well as honour. In another letter of Winwood to Secretary Cecil, dated at Paris, October 17, 1602. O. S. he writes (24), that Mr. Charles Paget had acquainted him, "that "he had receaved an information, that about the "11th Day of Auguſt there departed from Rome an "Engliſh Jeſuite, whoſe name he knoweth not, of "the age of thirty years, a man of a good faſhion, "of a ſanguine complexion, a yellow beard, of a full "and quick eye, and middle ſtature; who furniſhed "by the Spaniſh Ambaſſador with a ſumme of mony "did take his courſe towards England, with purpoſe "there to attempt againſt her Majeſtie's perſon. He "[Paget] made much difficultie to name his Author; "but becauſe I urged Sir James Lindſey, who within "theſe two days arrived to this town from Rome, "he acknowledged him to be the man, but ſo that I "would promiſe to conceal his name. As he ſaith, "Sir James Lindſey hath ſeen the man, who paſſing "by him on a time, when he was walking with Par"ſons the Jeſuite, Parſons willed him to behold him "well, and aſked him whether if he ſhould meet "that man in England, he would take him for a Je"ſuite. I ſhould much fall in diſcretion, but much "more in duty, not to advertiſe this, though I have "this aſſurance, that the powerful hand of God, "will ever protect her ſacred perſon againſt all diſ"loyal practices of fury and malice." In another letter to Secretary Cecil, dated at Paris, October 20, 1602. O. S. Mr. Winwood writes thus (25): By the means of the Ambaſſador of Scotland, I have ſpoken with the partie this morning, from whom he receaved the advertiſement, which I ſent by Mr. Bridges the 29th of the laſt month. He averreth the ſame by many proteſtations to be true, and addeth moreover, that Parſons did very

(19) Jeſuit's Reaſons unreaſonable, p. 65.

(20) Gee, p. 51, 52.

(21) Part 2. lib. 3. n. 162.

(22) Winwood's Memorials, vol. 1. p. 51. edit. Lon. Lon 1725, in folio.

(23) Ibid. p. 388.

(24) Ibid. p. 442.

(25) Ibid. p. 443.

nature [F]. He died at Rome, April 15, new ſtyle, in the year 1610, and was interred in very earneſtly and often deal with him to receave that man into his company, whom above all other marks he noteth to have a high noſe, and to paſs through Scotland into England. I find by him that the Jeſuits, for their countenance, have recourſe to the Duke of Seſſe, but for their affairs and practices to one Antonio Taxis, authoriſed there by the King of Spain. By the opinion he makes, the company doth decay much in reputation in that place, and Parſons to be decryed for an impoſture. Only the faction for Spaine doth ſupport them, where ſo long they are gracious, as they by their projects do nouriſh the ambition of their pride, and augment the fury of revenge, wherewith they waſte and conſume way. And though their forces do faile, which are brought to a low ebb, yet their malice hath neither bottom nor brink.

[F] His Writings.] Some of them are publiſhed without his name, and others under the names of other perſons. They are as follow: 1. A brief Diſcourſe, containing the Reaſons why Catholicks go to Church. Said to be printed at Doway, but really at London 1580, in 8vo, and publiſhed under the name of John Howlet, and dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, with a large Epiſtle ſubſcribed John Howlet. There is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, one of the copies of this book, which was ſeized before the title-page was printed, intitled in the firſt page of the book itſelf, Reaſons that Catholics ought in any wiſe to abſtain from heretical Conventicles. The running title at the top of every leaf of the book is, A Treatiſe of Schiſm. Printed at London, by William Carter (executed for treaſon in 1584) who confeſſed, when that book was ſeized in his houſe at Tower-hill, that there had been printed 1250 copies of the ſaid book. At that time the Searchers found the original manuſcript ſent from Rheims, and allowed under Dr. William Allen's own hand to be truly Catholic, and fit to be publiſhed. This book is undoubtedly the ſame, which Anthony Poſſevinus (26) ſtiles, Nine Reaſons why Catholics ſhould abſtain from heretical Conventicles, and ſaid by him to be written by our Author. The ſame year that the Brief Diſcourſe was publiſhed, there came an anſwer to it, intitled, A check to Mr. Howlet's Schreechings to her Majeſty. 2. Reaſons for his coming into the Miſſion of England, with a profer or challenge to diſpute with the Proteſtants. This book is aſcribed to our Author in Alegambe's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jeſu: but in the anſwers to it by Dr. Meredith Hanmer and Mr. William Charke, it is ſaid to be written by Edmund Campian. 3. Brief Cenſure upon two Books of W. Charke and M. Hanmer, written againſt the Reaſons and Profer. London 1581, in 8vo. To which W. Charke made a Reply, printed in 8vo. 4. A Diſcovery of John Nichols, Miniſter, miſreported a Jeſuit. Printed in 1581, in 8vo. Anſwered by Tho. Lupton, in a book intitled, Anſwer againſt a Jeſuit's Book, intitled, A Diſcovery, &c. London 1582, in 4to. 5. A Defence of the Cenſure given upon two Books of Will. Charke and Meredith Hanmer, Miniſters, which they wrote againſt Mr. Edmund Campian, Prieſt of the Society of Jeſus, and againſt his offer of Diſputation. Printed in 1582, in 8vo. This was anſwered in a book, intitled, A Treatiſe againſt the Defence of the Cenſure, &c. Cambridge 1586, in 8vo. 6. De Perſecutione Anglicanâ Epiſtola, quâ explicantur Afflictiones, ærumnæ, & calamitates graviſſimæ, &c. Rome and Ingolſtad 1582. Printed alſo in a book, intitled, Concertatio Eccleſiæ Catholicæ in Angliâ adverſus Ang. Calvino-Papiſtas & Puritanos, &c. Triers 1583, in 8vo. p. 79. 7. A Chriſtian Directory, or Exerciſe, guiding Men to eternal Salvation, commonly called The Reſolution. Firſt printed in 1583, in 8vo. From this edition were publiſhed two others in 1584, one by a Roman Catholic Gentleman, living at Roan in Normandy, full of errors, but in ſenſe the ſame; the other by Edmund Bunney, of Merton-College in Oxford, but altered throughout to the Proteſtant uſe, as appears from Father Parſons's edition of the ſame book, in 1585. 8. A ſecond Part of a Chriſtian Directory or Exerciſe, &c. London 1591, in 12mo. Theſe two parts being printed erroneouſly at London, our Author publiſhed an edition of them, under this title, A Chriſtian Directory, guiding men to their Salvation; divided into three books: the firſt thereof pertaining to Reſolution, is only contained in this volume, and divided into two Parts, and ſet forth now again with many Corrections and Additions, by the Author himſelf, with reproof of the falſified edition lately publiſhed by Mr. Edmund Bunney. Louvain 1598, in 8vo. Mr. Wood obſerves (27), that "theſe books of "Reſolution won our Author a great deal of praiſe, "not only in the Judgment of Roman Catholics, but "of very learned Proteſtants. Yet not to heap more "praiſes upon him than he juſtly deſerves, his ene-"mies, and thoſe of the Proteſtant party ſay, that he "was but a Collector or Tranſlator at moſt; and that "the book was not of his own abſolute invention, "but taken out of other Authors. They ſay further "alſo, that his praiſe was for well tranſlating, cloſe "couching, and packing it up together in a very ſmooth "ſtile, and ſingular good method; and add, that the "platform of the ſaid Reſolution was laid to his hand "by L. de Grenada, *who gave him the principal "grounds and matter thereof; and the penning by one "*Brinkley, &c." 9. Reſponſio ad Elizabethæ Reginæ edictum contra Catholicos. Rome 1593, in 8vo. Publiſhed under the name of And. Philopater. 10. A Conference about the next Succeſſion of the Crown of England, in two parts; printed in 1594, in 8vo, under the name of N. Doleman (28). 11. A temperate Ward-word to the turbulent and ſeditious Watch-word of Sir Francis Haſtings, Knight, &c. printed in 1599, in 4to, under the name of N. Doleman. 12. A Copy of a Letter written by a Maſter of Arts of Cambridge to his friend in London, concerning ſome talk paſſed of late between two worſhipful and grave Men, about the preſent State, and ſome Proceedings of the Earl of Leiceſter, and his Friends in England, &c. Written in 1584; but the certain year when printed, is not known, unleſs in 1600. It was alſo printed in 8vo (as the other was) in 1631, and has this running title on the top of every leaf, A Letter of State of a Scholar of Cambridge. The firſt edition, (and perhaps the ſecond) was printed beyond the ſeas, and moſt of the copies being ſent into England bound, with the outſide of the leaves coloured with green, the book was commonly called Father Parſons's Green-coat. It is the ſame book with that intitled, Leyceſter's Commonwealth, conceived, ſpoken, and publiſhed, with moſt earneſt proteſtation of all dutifull good will and affection towards this Realme; for whoſe good only it is made common to many. Printed in 1641, in 8vo. There is another edition the ſame year in 4to. This book is commonly aſcribed to our Author, who is ſaid to have had the materials of it from the Lord Burghley; and it is expreſsly affirmed to be his by Dr. Thomas James (29). But Father Parſons himſelf, in his Preface to the Ward-word of Sir Francis Haſtings's Watch-word, declares, that he did not write Leiceſter's Commonwealth; and it is omitted in the liſt of his work in Pitſeus, Alegambe, Southwell, &c. At the end of the edition of this book, in 1641, is printed a poem intitled, Leiceſter's Ghoſt. 13. Apologetical Epiſtle to the Lords of her Majeſty's Council, in defence of his Reſolution in Religion. Printed in 1601, in 8vo. 14. Brief Apology or Defence of the Catholic Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy and Subordination in England, erected theſe later years by Pope Clement VIII. and impugned by certain Libels printed and publiſhed of late, &c. St. Omers 1601, in 8vo. About the year 1603, there was publiſhed againſt this, by Humphry Ely, a book intitled, Certain brief Notes upon a Brief Apology, ſet out under the name of the Prieſts united to the Arch-Prieſt. Paris, in 12mo and 8vo. 15. Manifeſtation of the Folly and bad Spirit of certain in England, calling them Secular Prieſts. Printed in 1602, in 4to. This is called a Libel, in an anſwer made to it by W. C. Printed in 1603, in 4to; and it was animadverted upon by A. C. in his Second Letter to his diſ-jeſuited Kinſman, concerning the Appeal, State, Jeſuits, &c. Printed in 1602, in 4to. 16. A Decachordon of 10 Quodlibetical Queſtions about the Contentions between the Seminary Prieſts and the Jeſuits. Printed in 1602, in 4to. 17. De Peregrinatione, lib. 1. Printed in 12mo. 18. Anſwer to O. E. whether Papiſts or Proteſtants be true Catholics. Printed 1603, in 8vo. 19. Treatiſe of the three

(26) Apparat. Sac. Tom. 2. in Rob. Parſons.

(27) Ubi ſupra, col. 358.

(28) See the article of HAYWARD (John).

(29) In the Life of Father Parſons, printed at the end of the Jeſuits Downfall, p. 55, 56, edit. 1612.

in the Chapel belonging to the Engliſh College there, where he had a Monument erected to his Memory.

three Converſions of Paganiſm to Chriſtian Religion. Publiſhed under the name of N. D. i. e. Nicholas Doleman, in three volumes in 8vo. The firſt volume, which contains two parts of the ſaid treatiſe, was printed at St. Omers in 1603. The ſecond volume, which contains the third part of the ſaid Treatiſe, and an Examen of the Kalender or Catalogue of the Proteſtant Saints, Martyrs, and Confeſſors, deviſed by John Fox, &c. for the firſt ſix months, was printed at the ſame place in 1604. And the third volume, which contains alſo the third part of the Treatiſe, and an Examen of Mr. Fox's Kalender, for the laſt ſix months, was printed at the ſame place in the ſame year. 20. A Relation of a Tryal made before the King of France in the year 1600, between the Biſhop of Eureux and the Lord Pleſſis Mornay, about certain points of corrupting and falſifying Authors, whereof the ſaid Pleſſis was openly convicted. St. Omer's 1604, in 8vo. publiſhed under the initial letters of N. D. 21. A Defence of the precedent Relation of a Conference about Religion; printed with the Relation of a Tryal, &c. 22. Review of ten public Diſputations or Conferences held within the Compaſs of four Years under King Edward and Queen Mary, concerning ſome principal Points in Religion, eſpecially of the Sacrament and Sacrifice of the Altar. St. Omres 1604, in 8vo, under the name of N. D. 23. Fore-runner of Bell's Downfall; or an Anſwer to Tho. Bell's Downfall of Popery; printed in 1605, in 8vo. 24. An Anſwer to the fifth Part of Reports, lately ſet forth by Sir Edw. Cooke, Knt. the King's Attorney General, &c. St. Omer's 1606, in 4to, publiſhed under the name of a Catholic Divine, 25. De Sacris alienis non adeundis Quæſtiones duæ: ad uſum praximq; Angliæ breviter explicatæ. St. Omer's 1607, in 8vo. 26. Treatiſe tending to mitigation towards Catholic Subjects in England, againſt Tho. Morton; printed in 1607, in 4to. This Morton was afterwards Biſhop of Durham. 27. The Judgment of a Catholic Gentleman concerning King James his Apology for the Oath of Allegiance. St. Omer's 1608, in 4to. 28. Sober Reckoning with Mr. Thomas Morton; printed in 1609, in 4to. 29. Diſcuſſion of Mr. Barlowe's Anſwer to The Judgment of a Catholic Engliſhman concerning the oath of Allegiance. St. Omer's 1612. This book being almoſt finiſhed before our Author's death, was afterwards compleated and publiſhed by Tho. Fitzherbert. 30. The Liturgy of the Sacrament of the Maſs. Printed in 1620, in 4to. 31. A Memorial for Reformation: Or, A Remembrance for them that ſhall live when Catholick Religion ſhall be reſtored in England, in three parts. This is probably the ſame with that, entitled, The High Court or Council of the Reformation. The Author is ſaid to have been twenty years in compiling it, and finiſhed it in 1596; but it was not publiſhed till ſome years after his death. At length a copy of it coming into the hands of Edward Gee, Rector of St. Benedict near Paul's Wharf, in London, and Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary, he publiſhed it under this title: The Jeſuit's Memorial for the intended Reformation of England, under their firſt Popiſh Prince, publiſhed from the copy that was preſented to the late King James II. London 1690, in 8vo. To this Mr. Gee hath prefixed an Introduction, and added ſome Animadverſions. After the Introduction is the following title of the Memorial: A Memorial of the Reformation: Containing certain Notes and advertiſements, which ſeem might be propoſed in the firſt Parliament and national Council of our Countrey, after God, of his mercy, ſhall reſtore it to the Catholick Faith, for the better eſtabliſhment and preſervation of the ſaid Religion. Gathered and ſet down by R. P. 1596. 32. Controverſiæ noſtri temporis in Epitomen reductæ: MS. in Baliol College-Library, written with the Author's own hand: in the front of it is written: Compilator hujuſce Epitomes eſt Robertus Perſonius, ut patet ex Johanne Rainolde in cenſurâ Librorum Apocryphorum prælectione ſecundâ, pag. 22. ex Editione Hieronymi Galleri in nobili Openhemio. 33. He tranſlated from Engliſh into the Spaniſh tongue, A Relation of certain Martyrs in England, printed at Madrid 1590, in 8vo.

T.

PARTHENAI, a city of Poitou, under the juriſdiction of the Preſidial of Poitou, was frequently taken and retaken during the wars, on a religious account, in the 16th Century (α). The Proteſtants retired into it, the day of the battle of Moncontour (a); but thinking themſelves unable to ſtand a ſiege, they abandoned it at the approach of the Duke of Anjou's troops. They had taken it the foregoing year, and had even hanged Malo who commanded in the Caſtle (b); they puniſhing him with this ſeverity, becauſe of his boldneſs in ſtanding out againſt an army. We find by d'Aubigne's hiſtory, that they miſcarried more than once in their attempts, in 1588, to make themſelves maſters of that city by ſurprize. Great numbers of them were there ſince the edict of Nantz, as may be judged from the ill-grounded complaint of the Clergy of France [A], and by the anſwer which Drelincourt made to that complaint in 1656. The Lords of Parthenai are honorary ſecular Canons of St. Martin de Tours (c). I muſt not omit, that Parthenai is the capital of the little territory of Gaſtine, and of the Dukedom of la Meilheraye (d).

(a) The 3d of October 1569.

(b) La vraie & entiere Hiſt. des Troubles, Liv. 4. p. 131.

(c) Mercure Galant, for February 1693, p. 21.

(d) Du Val, Traite de la France, p. 144.

The

[A] The ill grounded complaint of the Clergy of France.] That the reader may not think that I make uſe of this epithet out of party-prejudices, I ſhall draw a parallel between the complaint and the anſwer. The Archbiſhop of Sens, who ſpoke in the name of all the Clergy, ſpeaks as follows: "May it "pleaſe your Majeſty; the piety of the Catholicks, "in the city of Parthenai, was forced laſt ſummer, "to ſubmit to the violence of the enemies of this "holy myſtery. By an abſolutely irreligious attempt, "they preſume to ſolemnize a funeral, the very in"ſtant that a proceſſion was made, to honour, pur"ſuant to the laws of the Church, a ſacrament which "is the center of our Religion. They diſturbed the "whole courſe of this holy ceremony, by a malici"ouſly concerted meeting: and ſuch Catholicks, "who are deſirous of diſtinguiſhing themſelves by "their modeſty, at the ſame time that their evil "brethren endeavour to make themſelves conſiderable "by their inſolence, were forced to yield, being "overpowered by the multitude of thoſe prophane "and impious wretches and to return to Church, "with ſorrowful countenances..... Did your Ma"jeſty ever hear of ſo audacious an action? And will "you ſuffer in your Kingdoms an attempt ſo injurious "to the honour of the ſon of God to go unpuniſhed? "But we can never believe this of your Majeſty; "and we ought to be perſuaded that you will revenge, "in ſuch a manner as may be agreeable to our wiſhes, "the quarrel of the living God (1)." I need give only the ſubſtance of the anſwer, which is as follows, viz. that the ſecond Sunday in April, there was brought to Parthenai, from a place two leagues diſtant from it, the corps of a Gentleman, to be buried after the afternoon Sermon; that as the whole company was going to the place of interment, they perceived, by ſome tapeſtry that was near the Citadel, that a proceſſion was to paſs that way; yet they immediately halted; and that as there was no other way to go to the Church-yard which is near the caſtle, it was judged proper to ſend a meſſage, with all poſſible reſpect, to the Pariſh of Holy Croſs, where the proceſſion was to begin, to enquire of the Canons, whether they would have the funeral halt where they then were, till ſuch time as the proceſſion ſhould have paſſed by; or, in caſe their proceſſion was not ready to ſet out, they would

(1) Remonſtrance du Clerge de France en 1659, p. m. 20.

The Lordſhip of Parthenai was re-united to the Crown in 1422, by the death of John l'Archevêque [B].

(a) In 1487, this city belonged to Francis, Count de Dunois, who adhered to the Duke of Orleans's party. The 28 of March, of that year, King Charles VIII. who was engaged in war againſt that Duke and the people of Bretagne, took Parthenai, and razed the walls of it. See Lobineau, Hiſt. de Britagne, Tom. I. pag. 765, and 768. Rabelais, Lib. I. Chap. V. ſpeaks of this demolition of Parthenai. REM. CRIT.

would have the funeral to go on. That anſwer was made, that they might end their funeral, and that their proceſſion would not ſet out ſo ſoon; that accordingly, it did not ſet out till half an hour after all the funeral was gone by; that to ſhew an entire deference, the Proteſtants ſtaid in their Church-yard till the whole proceſſion was ended, and all the tapeſtry was taken down; and conſequently it could not be juſtly ſaid, that the proceſſion returned back, by its meeting the funeral, with great trouble and ſorrow, ſince the proceſſion was not yet ſet out, and did not ſet out till a long time after the funeral was paſt. That not the leaſt mention was made of this affair during ſeveral days; but that, at laſt, the bailiff of Parthenai, a man of a fiery temper, being animated by ſome turbulent people, applied to Mr. Filleau, the King's Advocate at Poitiers, who gloried in perſecuting the Proteſtants on all occaſions; that accordingly ſeveral members of the conſiſtory of Parthenai were ſummoned to appear before the Preſidial of Poitiers, there to be ſentenced to pay a fine, for diſturbing the proceſſion; but that Mr. de le Meilleraye ſtopt this unjuſt proſecution; and that thoſe very perſons who began it were aſhamed, ſo that the thing reſted there (2). I have made uſe of the Author's expreſſions.

Would the Proteſtants have anſwered in ſo confident a manner, had this thing been true? Here then is an error, with regard to fact, which falls under our cognizance. We ſhall leave our readers to reflect on the dreadful ſtorms, which a vehement Orator may raiſe for nothing at all (3).

[B] The Lordſhip of Parthenai was re-united to the Crown in 1422, by the death of John l'Archeveque.] He had ſold this Lordſhip to the Duke of Berry, reſerving, during his life time . . . . . the profits ariſing from it. . . . . He had no children, and, on this account, the year he died, Meſſire James de Harcourt, who had married his niece, would have diſpoſſeſſed him of the ſaid Lordſhip and Caſtle of Parthenai, but he was prevented by the inhabitants, who took up arms and killed the ſaid Harcourt (4).

(2) See a Letter of an Inhabitant of Paris to a Friend in the Country, on the Remonſtrance of the Clergy, p. 133 & ſeq. edit. in 8vo. This letter was writ by Mr. Drelincourt, a Proteſtant Clergyman of Paris.

(3) See the Critique Generale of Maimbourg's Calviniſm, letter 23. p. 93 & ſeq. edit. 3d.

(4) John Bouchet, Annales d'Aquitaine, 4. part, chap. 7. folio, m. 137.

PARTHENAI, a family ſo named, continued for a long courſe of years, with ſplendor. The laſt male deſcendant of that illuſtrious houſe was John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, Lord of Soubiſe (a), who left iſſue but one daughter, Catharine de Parthenai, mother to Duke de Rohan, Commander of the Huguenot armies in France, in the reign of Lewis XIII. We ſhall give the article of this Lady hereafter. Some are of opinion, that the Lords of Parthenai took the ſirname of l'Archevêque, becauſe they ſprung from an Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux. Thoſe perſons are even of opinion, that this Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux was Joſſelin de Parthenai, who died in 1086; and that William de Parthenai, who took the ſirname of l'Archevêque, about the year 1100, was his ſon. Others (b) refer this original to one Archambaut, Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, Joſſelin's predeceſſor; but as this Archambaut was diveſted of his dignity, and became Lord of St. Maixent, and as we do not meet with any perſon of this name, nor any Lord of St. Maixent, in the Parthenai family, this opinion is no ways probable. "The "eldeſt branch of Parthenai, with all its eſtate, fell to the houſe of Melun Tancarville, "from which that of Longueville is deſcended, by marriage; and the Lords of Soubiſe "were ſeparated from the ſtock, about the year 1330, when Guy l'Archevêque, younger "brother to John Sire (Lord) of Parthenai was Lord of Soubiſe. It has aways been "thought, with great probability, that thoſe of Parthenai was of Lezignem, whoſe "arms they bear, rebated, on account of their being the younger branch, with a bend "Gules: but they muſt have ſprung from it before the year 1000; becauſe there is ex-"tant, from that time, the ſucceſſion till John l'Archevêque, Lord of Soubiſe (c)," Grandfather by the mother's ſide, to Duke de Rohan. 'Tis obſerved, in the life of this Duke, printed in 1667, that his mother was the principal Hiereſs of the houſe of Luſignan.

(a) See his article under the word SOUBISE.

(b) Du Cheſne, Annotat. ſur les Oeuvres d'Alain Chartier.

(c) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 1. p. 805.

PARTHENAI (ANNE DE), wife of Anthony de Pons, Count de Marennes, and daughter of John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, and of Michelle de Saubonne [A], was a Lady of great genius and learning. She was one of the brighteſt ornaments of the Court of Renata of France, daughter of Lewis XII. and Ducheſs of Ferrara. Now 'tis well known, that few Courts in the world were ſo polite as that in queſtion. Anne de Parthenai, not ſatisfied with ſtudying the Latin tongue, ſtudied the Greek with ſo much application, that ſhe could read the Authors with pleaſure in that language. Non modo in Latinis quibus ab ipſis incunabulis naviter operam dediſti, ſed in Græcis quoque ita profeciſti, ut

[A] Michelle de Saubonne.] She was a Lady of Britany, who had been one of the Maids of honour to Queen Anne of Britany. She married in 1507, by this Queen's favour, John l'Archevêque V. of that name, Lord of Soubiſe, head of the Parthenai family. The above-mentioned Queen appointed her Governeſs of Renata of France, her daughter, Ducheſs of Ferrara (1). In the third letter of Rabelais, we meet with ſome particulars relating to this Governeſs. "Monſieur de Limoges, who was the "King's Embaſſador in Ferrara, obſerving that the "ſaid Duke (2), without giving him any notice of "his deſign, went over to the Emperor, is re-"turned to France. There is reaſon to fear that "this circumſtance will cauſe great uneaſineſs to "Madam Renata. The ſaid Duke has taken Ma-"dam de Soubiſe her Governeſs, and has ſet Italian "women about her, which is no good ſign." This letter was writ in 1536.

(1) See the notes on Rabelais's letter, p. 85.

(2) The Duke of Ferrara.

[B] I

ut Græcos autores intrepide evolvas (a). Her curioſity extended to books of Divinity. She attained to great ſkill in the Scriptures; and took a ſingular pleaſure in diſcourſing, almoſt every day, with Divines on theological ſubjects. The Authors of that age were not ſparing of their encomiums, they applauding her on a thouſand occaſions; and did not omit obſerving, that ſhe ſung like an Angel, and underſtood all kinds of muſick in perfection. Quid nunc memorem qualis ſis in dignoſcendis & modulandis carminibus, quali venuſtate canas & gratia? Quantum denique in omni Muſica profeceris, id ejus diſciplinæ periti prædicant (b). See the Dedication cited by me (c). The great favour ſhe was in with the Ducheſs of Ferrara, and the great ſkill ſhe had attained in Divinity, will doubtleſs make all Roman Catholicks who ſhall read this, ſuſpect her of having a tendency to Calviniſm. However, I will not leave them to bare ſurmiſes, but will quote an Author who will prove to them that ſhe was a ſincere Huguenot [B], and the worthy ſiſter of Soubiſe, who was one of the chief ſupports of the party. Her huſband was forced to leave the Court of Ferrara [C].

(a) Gyraldus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Dialogi 2. Hiſtoriæ Poetarum.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) See alſo Clement Marot, in his letter, Loſt at Play, againſt Madame de Pons, p. 206 & ſeq. Hague edit. 1700.

[B] I will quote an Author, who will prove to them that ſhe was a ſincere Huguenot.] "With regard to "the town of Pons, the Lord of the place, ſo long "as Dame Anne de Parthenai, his firſt wife, and "ſiſter of the Sieur de Soubiſe, lived, was a lover of "virtue and truth; he having attained to ſo great a "knowledge in the ſacred writings, that ſcarce one "Clergyman could be found who was ſo zealous as "he; he himſelf taking the pains to inſtruct his "poor ſubjects, many of whom he edified, as well "officers as others in his town of Pons. But imme-"diately after the death of that very virtuous Lady, "God having deprived him of his underſtanding to "ſuch a degree, that he married, for his ſecond "wife, one of the moſt diſreputable women in all "France, viz. Mary de Monchenu, called Lady de "Maſſay, providence bereaved him of the re-"mainder of his ſenſe and judgment; ſo that, "without any manner of reaſon, he became from "that time an enemy and perſecutor of the truth "which he had ſo well known and forwarded (3)." To confirm the above-mentioned aſſertion of Theodore Beza, with reſpect to the aſcendant which the virtuous Anne de Parthenai had over her huſband, I will cite a paſſage from Gregory Gyraldus, in which he declares that the Lady in queſtion, and Count de Marennes her huſband, devoted herſelf to the ſame ſtudies with equal ſucceſs. Quid porro dicam qua charitate & amore, ac potius pietate proſequaris illuſtrem virum tuum, jure tuum, ut qui eiſdem quibus tu ſtudiis & virtutibus poſt militares artes ſit ornatiſſimus (4)? i. e. "Wherefore ſhould I take notice of the love and "affection, or rather piety, which you ſhew with "regard to your huſband, who is juſtly yours; "ſince, beſides his knowledge in the military arts, "he is adorned with the ſame ſtudies and virtues as "yourſelf?" This Count was firſt Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the Duke of Ferrara; and Gyraldus dedicated to him the fourth Dialogue of his Hiſtory of the Poets.

(3) Theodore Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 1. Liv. 2. p. 201. (and not 199, as it is ſet down in the book) ad ann. 1559.

(4) Gyrald. Epiſt. Dedicat. Dialogi 2. Hiſtoiræ Poetarum.

[C] Her huſband was forced to leave the Court of Ferrara.] 'Tis he doubtleſs who is ſpoke of in the "following paſſages of our Hiſtorians (5). "If the "King of France thought that there was juſt cauſe "for expelling Monſieur de Pons from Ferrara, be-"cauſe he boaſted his being of as noble a houſe as "thoſe of Aeſt (6); it not being juſt that, ſince he "lived by the Ducheſs of Ferrara, and had a penſion "from her, that he ſhould draw ſuch a compariſon, "although the ſaid late King judged the houſe of "Pons to be as antient as that of Aeſt; in like man-"ner 'tis as inſupportable, that thoſe of the houſe of "Guiſe, who owe all their ſubſtance and ſplendor to "the houſe of France, ſhould compare themſelves "to the Princes of the ſaid houſe." 'Tis extremely imprudent in any perſon, in the ſervice of another, to compare themſelves to him. If they are nobler than he, they ought not once to take notice of it. This conduct is particularly neceſſary with regard to Sovereign Princes. Their relations ought to forget that they are ſuch.

(5) Preſident de la Place, de l'Eſtat de la Religion, Liv. 2. folio 63.

(6) We muſt read Eſte.

PARTHENAI (CATHARINE DE,) daughter and heireſs of John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, Lord of Soubiſe, niece of the preceding Lady, was married in 1568 to Baron du Pont, and afterwards in 1575 to Renatus de Rohan II. of that name (a); who leaving her a widow in 1585 (b), ſhe employed her whole thoughts about the bringing up of her family. Her care was crowned with all the ſucceſs ſhe could promiſe herſelf from it; the eldeſt of her ſons being the famous Duke de Rohan, who aſſerted the Proteſtant cauſe, with ſo much vigour, in France, during the civil Wars, in the reign of Lewis XIII. Her ſecond ſon was Duke de Soubiſe. She had three daughters: Henrietta, who died in 1624, unmarried; Catharine, who married a Duke of Deux-ponts (c), and made the beautiful anſwer following to Henry IV. her admirer; I am too poor to be your wife, and of too noble a family to be your miſtreſs (d); and Anne, who was never married, but ſurvived all her brothers and ſiſters, and became extremely famous for her piety and knowledge. 'Tis plain that I ſpeak of the renowned ANNE DE ROHAN (e), who ſupported with ſo much patience and reſolution all the calamities of the ſiege of Rochelle. Her mother's courage was ſtill more wonderful; for ſhe, notwithſtanding her very advanced age, bore with prodigious reſolution, the neceſſity to which ſhe was reduced, of living during three months on horſe-fleſh, and four ounces of bread per diem. Notwithſtanding this miſerable condition to which ſhe was reduced, ſhe yet wrote to her ſon, exhorting him to go on as he had begun; and that the reflexion on the extremity to which ſhe was reduced, ſhould not make him act any thing to the prejudice of his party, how great ſoever her ſufferings might be (f). She and her daughter refuſed to be included in the articles of capitulation, and remained priſoners of war. They were conveyed to the caſtle of Nicort, the ſecond of November 1628 (g). Some writers ſay that Catharine de Parthenai was then fourſcore and eleven years of age [A]; but others ſay ſhe was but ſeventy.

(a) Thuan. lib. 61.

(b) Le Pere Anſelme, and Moreri, who copies him, ſay 1586. I have followed the Author of Duke de Rohan's Life.

(c) In 1605. She died in 1607.

(d) See the Obſervations on the Amours of Alcandre, and the Key.

(e) See her article.

(f) Hiſt. du Duc de Roban, p. 99. Dutch edit. 1667.

(g) Merc. Franc. Tom. 14 p. 716.

[A] . . . . then fourſcore and eleven years of age.] Father Anſelme muſt have been of this opinion, ſince, in giving us the Poſterity of Peter de Rohan, called Marſhal de Gié, he declares in the margin, oppoſite to our Renatus de Rohan II. of that name, that Catharine de Parthenai, his wife, died at Parc in Poitou, the 26th of October 1631, aged 94 years (1). Moreri ſays the ſame thing, except that he has put Pare

(1) Hiſtoire des grands Offic. p. 153.

ſeventy. La Croix du Maine informs me, that ſhe was very well ſkilled in poetry [B]. I muſt not omit the troubleſome law-ſuit for impotency, in which her firſt huſband was engaged [C]. If what a perſon of great abilities had advanced is certain, viz. that Mademoiſelle de Parthenai, Lady of Soubiſe, was thought to have been an Author, before Madame

Pare into Pare. But the author of the hiſtory of Duke de Rohan (2) obſerves, where he ſpeaks of the ſiege of Rochelle, and of the famine with which that Lady was oppreſſed there, that ſhe was ſeventy years of age. This was not a place to ſubſtract from her age; and a perſon who wanted to flatter her, ſhould rather have increaſed than leſſened her age. Nevertheleſs, 'tis very probable that this author made her younger than ſhe really was; a tragedy of her writing being played as early as the year 1574. Women of ſixteen ſeldom write Tragedies; and had this happened, ſuch an author as La Croix du Maine could not have been ignorant of it, nor would have been ſilent on ſuch a particular. I inſiſt leſs on the impotency, whether true or falſe, of Baron du Pont, which gives occaſion to a law-ſuit in 1572. A young woman at fourteen, is more capable of having children than of writing Tragedies at ſixteen. But the remark made by Varillas would be a proof that merits not to be rejected. He ſays (3) that in 1562, Vicount de Rohan headed the troops of Languedoc and Dauphine, which he had raiſed at the ſollicitation of Soubiſe, who promiſed to give him his only daughter in marriage. Can a man who is of age to levy and command forces, rely much on the marriage of a girl of four years old? But what follows would make the argument ſtronger. The only daughter in queſtion was married, as early as the year 1567, to Baron du Pont; for we find, among the Lords, who went to join the Admiral after the battle of St. Denys, a Soubiſe, who muſt be the ſame Baron (4). I ſay that this would make the argument ſtronger, not that it is ſo; becauſe I rely more on a letter ſent me, which declares, that the heireſs of Soubiſe was married to Baron du Pont in 1568, than to the accuracy of hiſtorians about ſuch little particulars. A certain circumſtance is, that Father Anſelme is miſtaken; for John de Parthenai and Antoinette Bouchard of Aubeterre, father and mother of the Lady in queſtion, were married the third of May 1553. She therefore was born at the ſooneſt in 1554, and could be but ſeventy ſeven years of age when ſhe died in 1631. On the other ſide, ſince ſhe was married in 1568, ſhe muſt have been above ſeventy years of age, at the time of the ſiege of Rochelle.

(2) He is ſuppoſed to be Mr. Fauvelet du Toc.

(3) Hiſt. de Charles IX. Liv. 3. init.

(4) D'Aubigne, Tom. 1. p. 372. Thuanus, Liv. 42. p. 854. Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX. Liv. 7.

[B] La Croix du Maine informs me, that ſhe was very well ſkilled in poetry.] That Lady, ſays he (5), ought to be greatly valued for the excellency and greatneſs of her genius, of which her writings are a ſufficient proof, and we need no other teſtimony; for ſhe has compoſed ſeveral French Tragedies and Comedies, and particularly the Tragedy of Holofernes, which was repreſented publickly in Rochel, anno 1574, or thereabouts, but it is not printed yet. She wrote ſeveral elegies or complaints on the death of Baron du Pont, her firſt huſband; and alſo on the Admiral, and other great Lords and illuſtrious Perſonages. She has tranſlated the precepts of Iſocrates to Demonitus, which are not yet printed. She is famous, continues he, this preſent year 1584. I am not acquainted with any more of her compoſitions, not having the happineſs to know her perſonally.

(5) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotb. Franc. p. 478.

[C] I muſt not omit the troubleſome law-ſuit for impotency, in which her firſt huſband was engaged.] Our Catharine de Parthenai's mother, and not ſhe herſelf, muſt be blamed for this. It was not the wife who ſued her huſband, but the mother-in-law, who was the plaintiff on this occaſion againſt her ſon-in-law: therefore, though no one can reaſonably doubt of the ſecret confidence between the mother and daughter, it muſt nevertheleſs be confeſſed, that Boileau's reflection (6) does no ways concern the heireſs of Soubiſe:

(6) Satyr 8. ver. 143.

Jamais la Biche en rut n'a pour fait d'impuiſſance
Traîné du fond des bois un Cerf à l'audience;
Et jamais Juge entr'eux, ordonnant le congrès,
De ce burleſque mot n'a ſali ſes arrêts.

The Senſe is,

" No Hind e'er ſued a Stag for impotency;
" Nor dragg'd him from a foreſt, to the commons.
" No Judge e'er call'd a congreſs in the wilds,
" And with ſo drole a word his ſentence ſtain'd."

If, on the one hand, it is ſurprizing, that at a time when the proteſtant Ladies were diſtinguiſhed by the ſtrictneſs of their morals, as well as the purity of their tenets, one of the greateſt women among them (7) ſhould have thought fit to commence a ſuit, which tended ſo little to edification; it muſt be conſidered on the other hand, that their perpetual ſtudy of the Bible was, at that time, more capable of infuſing certain inclinations: for, at that time, people ſtudied with greater application and zeal, the temper and ſpirit of the holy Patriarchs, and that of their wives, among whom there prevailed a very ſtrong, tho' chaſte deſire, of leaving poſterity. The Lady Soubiſe might alſo have been prompted by a religious motive upon another account. The Proteſtant religion was not yet firmly eſtabliſhed; the ſtrongeſt endeavours were made to deſtroy it; and therefore it was neceſſary to perpetuate, by all reaſonable and proper methods, ſuch families, which, like hers, had been the main ſupports of it. But what ſhall we think of the curioſity which the Ladies of the Court of France ſhew'd on this occaſion? But before I relate what Hiſtorians ſay on this matter, it will be proper to obſerve, that an end was put to the law-ſuit, by the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, in which Soubiſe's ſon-in-law loſt his life. We will now hear Varillas (8); Baron de Pont-Kuelleve (9) made ſo very long a reſiſtance, that thoſe who ſaw he did not yield, till he was pierced through with holes like a ſieve, gave this teſtimony of him, that he was more than man in battle, if he was not ſuch in the nuptial bed. He had married the heireſs of Soubiſe; and his wife's mother had commenced a ſuit againſt him for impotency, which was not determined. His body was dragged as far as the gate of the Louvre, where, notwithſtanding the compaſſion, which the ſight of it ought naturally to have excited, yet many court Ladies ſurvey'd it with great attention, in order to ſee whether there were no marks of the defects with which he was reproached. Thoſe who underſtand Latin, will ſee the noble expreſſions which Thuanus employs in relating this incident. Eadem calamitas Baudineum Acierii fratrem, Pluvialium & Bernium involvit, crudeliter à militibus regiis occiſos, nec non Carolum Quellevetum Pontium Armoricæ Regulum qui Catharinam Parthenæam Joannis Subiſii filiam & hæredem in uxorem duxerat, ſed à Parthenææ matre frigiditatem generi cauſata de diſſolvendo matrimonio lite aliquanto ante tempore intentata neque dum finita. Itaque cum corpora eorum ſicuti à percuſſoribus ſinguli occidebantur ante arcem Regiſque Reginæ ac totius aulici comitatus conſpectum abjicerentur, frequentes è gynæceo fœminæ, nequaquam crudeli ſpectaculo eas abſterrente, curioſis oculis nudorum corpora inverecunde intuebantur, & in Pontio præcipue aciem deſigebant, ſi qua ratione frigiditatis illius cauſam aut notas perrimari poſſent (10). i. e.

(7) See the great zeal of this Lady, in the notes on the article SOUBISE.

(8) Hiſt. de Charles IX. Tom. 2. p. 276. Dutch edit.

(9) It ſhould be QUELLENEC. See the article ſo called.

(10) Thuanus, lib. 52. p. 1076.

" Baudin, brother to Acier, Pluvial, and Berni,
" were involved in the ſame ſad calamity, they be" ing all killed by the King's ſoldiers; and likewiſe
" Charles Quellevé du Pont, a Nobleman of Britta-
" ny, who had married Catharine de Parthenay,
" daughter and heireſs of John Soubiſe; not long
" before which, Catharine's mother had ſued her
" ſon-in-law for impotency, in order to obtain a
" divorce, which ſuit was not then determined.
" When the bodies of theſe unhappy men, in propor" tion, as each of them were butcher'd, were brought
" and thrown before the King's palace, in preſence
" of their Majeſties, and of the whole court, ſeve-
" ral Ladies came out of their apartments, and,
" unſhocked at this barbarous ſpectacle, gazed, in
" the moſt immodeſt manner, on the naked bodies;
" but fixed their eyes particularly on du Pont, to diſ-
" cover, if poſſible, the cauſe, or ſome indications
" of his impotency." D'Aubigné ſeems, at firſt ſight, to have committed a blunder on this occaſion, as if he had aſſerted a thing of Soubiſe, which ought to have been ſaid only of his ſon-in-law. The bo-

Madame de Rohan was known in the world (b), ſhe muſt neceſſarily have writ when very young [D]. ["This perſon of great abilities, Mr. Baillet, is miſtaken, in imagining "that Catharine was only Mademoiſelle de Parthenay, when, in 1572, ſhe publiſhed "ſome Poems of her writing. See alſo QUELLENEC and ROSE hereunder †."] Some are of opinion that ſhe wrote an apology for Henry IV. [E], which, in reality, is a ſharp Satyr.

(b) Baillet, Auteurs deguiſez, part 3. chap. 3. § 3.

† From the rem. to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 970.

dies of Berni and Soubize, were dragged and laid before the Louvre, and expoſed to the view of the Ladies, who, ſurveyed the latter, to ſee whether he was incapable of performing conjugal duty, becauſe a law-ſuit was then depending on that account. But when the Reader is told that the ſon-in-law aſſumed the ſame name as his father-in-law, the moſt for which we can condemn the Hiſtorian in queſtion is, for not introducing ſome word, by way of diſtinction, as the reſt have done. Mezerai is much more inexcuſable. Who could believe, ſays he, page 156, Tom. 5. of his Abregé chronologique, that of ſo many brave men (he had juſt before given the names of thoſe Noblemen who were murdered on St. Bartholomew's day, and he had not omitted Francis de Quellevé, that is, the heireſs of Soubiſe's huſband) Guerchi was the only man who died ſword in hand. He is much more in fault, in his larger hiſtory; for he not only calls the huſband in queſtion Charles de Quellevé-Pontivy, which is making two perſons one, but he ſuppoſes that Baron du Pont's wife commenced the ſuit againſt her huſband for impotency. Now this is caſting an odium upon her, which Thuanus had not done; he declaring that the mother-in-law only had begun and carried on this law-ſuit. See the article QUELLENEC.

[D] She muſt neceſſarily have writ when very young.] For ſhe loſt the name of Mademoiſelle de Parthenai, anno 1568, by her marriage with Baron du Pont; and could then be but fourteen years of age, ſince her father and mother were married in May 1553. See the cloſe of the remark [A].

[E] Some are of opinion, that ſhe wrote an apology for Henry IV.] It has been printed as a work of Ducheſs de Rohan, in the new edition of the Journal of Henry III. D'Aubigné ſpeaks of this piece as follows. "He that is deſirous of ſeeing this ſubject treated of "more learnedly, may read the apology for the "King, written by Mr. Cahier, at that time Miniſter to Madame. The King ſhewed it to me as a "piece written in Madame de Rohan's ſtyle; 'tis a "prevaricating apology, which Roquelaure having "read, cried, plague! how well the Authors of this "piece are acquainted with what we do! Some aſcribe it to la Ruffie, becauſe that, after having diſcourſed concerning the King's temper, which is, to "puniſh for ſervices done, and reward injuries; he "ſays to thoſe who complain of his Majeſty, you "ought to complain of yourſelves, not of him; for "knowing his diſpoſition, if you deſire rewards, "you ſhould have merited them by worthy actions "(11)." Whoever wrote the piece in queſtion, is a perſon of wit and genius; and I very much queſtion whether Peter Victor Cayet was capable of ſetting ſlanders in ſuch a light. Varillas did not know who was pointed at in this ſatyr; for, ſpeaking of Anthony King of Navarre, he ſays (12), That Catharine de Parthenay, mother to the famous Duke de Rohan, reproached him with having never done ſervice except to thoſe who feared him. Now it was not this Prince, but Henry IV. his ſon, who was reproached after this manner in the Satyr aſcribed to the Lady in queſtion 13).

(11) Confeſſ. Catbol. de Sancy, Liv. 1. chap. 5.

(12) In the advertiſement of Tom. 5. of the Hiſtory of Hereſy.

(13) See remark [Q.] of the article HENRY IV.

PARTHENIUS, Author of a book, entitled, Περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων, De Amatoriis Affectionibus, i. e. concerning the paſſions of love [A], was of Nicæa, and lived under Auguſtus. There is no room to doubt but that he lived in this age, ſince his book is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus [B]. Many are of opinion that he is the ſame perſon with PARTHENIUS the Poet, who being deprived of his liberty in the time of the Mithridatick war, was reſtored to it in conſideration of his knowledge (a). Suidas, who informs us of this circumſtance, ſays that this poet lived till the reign of Tiberius, and aſcribes ſeveral works to him [C]. This is doubtleſs the Parthenius who taught Virgil the Greek tongue;

(a) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 2. cap. 1.

[A] Author of a book entitled . . . . concerning the paſſions of Love.] A Latin tranſlation was made of it, by James Cornarius. This tranſlation was printed with the Greek (1), at Baſil, in officina Frobeniana, anno 1531, 8vo. (2). The tranſlator who practiſed phyſick, thought he did not do a thing foreign to his profeſſion in tranſlating this piece; he ſuppoſing that the relations told in it may ſerve as phyſick in the diſeaſe of Love, which ſometimes turns to madneſs or a conſumption. Mihi ſane ejuſmodi narrationes ac Φιλτήρια utiliter adhiberi poſſe videntur, quum in aliis mentium perturbationibus, tum præcipue in morbo quem τῦ ἔρωτ@ medici vocant, qui tam graviter quibuſdam incumbit, ut in maniam, aut phthiſin & febrem ἰκτικὴν perducantur. Quæ cauſſa fuit cur ego medicinam profeſſus hæc edere non erubuerim, nihil veritus vulgi medicorum de me judicium, qui hoc tantum nomine boni medici videre geſtiunt, quod ſint egregie purpurati, & quam minimum literarum attigerunt (3). This work conſiſts only of thirty ſix chapters, and all very ſhort. The adventures related in them are taken from ſome very antient authors, which are now loſt. 'Tis not in verſe as is affirmed by Moreri (4).

(1) Not oppoſite to it, but apart.

(2) There is another edition of Baſil 1555, and an edition of Heidelberg 1601, both in 8vo. ["'Tis printed with Euſtathii de Iſmeniæ & Iſmenes amoribus, &c. Latin. Leyden 1618. and alſo in Hiſtoriæ Poeticæ ſcriptores antiqui, Gr. & Lat. ex recens. T. Gale. . . Paris 1675.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(3) Janus Cornarius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Parthenii.

(4) This error has been corrected by Le Clerc.

[B] This book is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus.] The tranſlator conjectures, that the deſign of Parthenius was to conſole Cornelius Gallus, who was run diſtracted for the love of Lycoris. A new motive for his tranſlating and publiſhing this work was, that young perſons, who are of too looſe a diſpoſition, might learn to bridle their affections; but Cornarius obſerves, that this kind of medicament was conſidered by ſome peeviſh cenſors, as a real poiſon. Hunc autem libellum ad Cornelium Gallum poetam ſcripſit, ut ſuſpicor, furoris ejus leniendi ac conſolandi gratia, in quem ex nimio amore Lycoridis amicæ inciderat, ut eſt apud Virgilium & Tibullum. Qua re poterant ſimili modo ſalubria exempla hinc peti juventuti ad libidinem proclivi, ut & patienter & conceſſa amare pergeret, niſi præ moroſitate aut fatuitate potius, multi etiam remedia ac ſalutaria pharmaca inſtar venerorum prohiberent (5). I know not why this tranſlator ventures to make conjectures, ſince the text of Parthenius informs him of the reaſon of this dedication. This Author affirms that he dedicated his collection, as a piece that would furniſh materials very ſuitable to the Poems of Cornelius Gallus.

(5) Cornarius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Parthenii.

[C] Suidas . . . . . aſcribes ſeveral works to him.] Elegies on Venus, the praiſe of his wife Areta, and a Poem on her death (6). He does not give the title of the reſt, where he ſpeaks of Parthenius; but ſays, under the word Νίκαια, that Parthenius of Nicæa wrote a book of Metamorphoſes, which is mentioned by Plutarch and Euſtathius. Stephanus Byzantinus cites ſeveral other pieces of Parthenius (7). Suetonius informs us, that Tiberius, writing Greek verſes, imitated, among other Poets, Parthenius, whoſe portrait and works he cauſed to be depoſited in the publick libraries. Fecit & Græca poemata (Tiberius) imitatus Euphorionem, & Rhianum, & Parthenium: quibus poetis admodum delectatus, ſcripta eorum & imagines, publicis bibliothecis inter veteres & præcipuos auctores dedicavit (8). Caſaubon is of opinion, that the perſon mentioned there, is the Parthenius who has left us the little piece, entitled, De Amatoriis affectibus (9). Voſſius is of the ſame opinion (10); but Gyraldi declares that a more antient Parthenius is meant, he who deſcended from Homer. See the following remark.

(6) Suidas in Παρθέν@.

(7) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 2. cap. 1. and Pinedo, in the Index of Authors cited by Stephanus Byzantinus.

(8) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 70.

(9) Caſaub. in Suetan. ibid.

[D] This

tongue ; and we muſt not confound him with one PARTHENIUS, who was of the iſland of Chios [D], and who wrote verſes on Theſtor his Father, one of Homer's deſcendants (b).

(b) Suidas, Tom. 2. p. 455.

[D] This is doubtleſs the Parthenius who taught Virgil the Greek tongue ; and we muſt not confound him with one Parthenius, who was of the iſland of Chios.] It may be proved by the following paſſage, that one Parthenius a Poet inſtructed Virgil in the Greek tongue: Verſus eſt Parthenii, quo Grammatico in Græcis Virgilius uſus eſt:

Γλαύκῳ καὶ πρωτῶ καὶ ἰνὼ μελικέρτῃ.
Glauco, & Panopeæ & Inoo Melicertæ (11).

(11) Macrob. Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 18. p. m. 412.

Macrobius had taken this obſervation from Aulus Gellius (12) ; but he added to it, the circumſtance of Virgil's having learnt Greek of Parthenius. A groſs blunder has crept into the place where Voſſius cites Aulus Gellius (13). There are more conſiderable errors in Gyraldi. He obſerves (14) that there have been two Poets named Parthenius, the one of Chios, and the other of Nicela. He of Chios, adds he, was ſirnamed Chaos, and deſcended from Homer. Virgil has imitated him in certain things, as Macrobius and Aulus Gellius obſerve. Probus the Grammarian cites Parthenius's work concerning Lovers. Plutarch likewiſe quotes a hiſtory from it. Stephanus Byzantinus quotes the Iphiclus and Propempticon of the ſame Author. It is to this Parthenius that Gyraldi refers the paſſage of Suetonius (15). As to Parthenius of Nicæa, he ſpeaks as follows concerning him. It is he who inſtructed Virgil in the Greek tongue, as Macrobius affirms. He compoſed a book of Metamorphoſes; he is the elegiac Poet mentioned by Artemidorus, in the 4th book of Dreams ; he is the Author of the Archelaid, cited by Hephœſtion ; of the Hercules, cited by Stephanus Bizantinus ; and of the work intitled ἐρωτικὰ, dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and cited by Probus the Grammarian.

(12) Aulus Gellius, lib. 13. cap. 25.

(13) Ex Parthenio hoc verbum (read verſum) à Marone expreſſum Gellius refert. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 1. p. 164.

(14) Gyrald. de Poetar. Hiſt. Dial. 3. p. m. 175.

(15) Cited in the remark [C].

One may eaſily perceive that Gyraldus confounds things here in a moſt miſerable manner, and is guilty of contradictions. I do not blame Voſſius for not cenſuring him, nor for not quoting him. The caſt of his work was not ſuch, as to engage him neceſſarily to point out the miſtakes of other writers ; and he perhaps might have found, without Gyraldus's aſſiſtance, all the incidents which he might be ſaid to borrow from him. However this be, I muſt obſerve, that the learned Italian in queſtion takes away, and aſcribes the ſame book, to the ſame Parthenius, in the ſame page. He aſcribes to Parthenius of Chios the treatiſe de Affectionibus amatoriis ; and, a little after, to Parthenius of Nicæa. He proves by Macrobius, that Virgil imitated Parthenius of Chios ; and immediately he cites Macrobius, to prove that Parthenius of Nicæa inſtructed Virgil in the Greek tongue : but it is certain, that Macrobius has ſpoke but of the ſame Parthenius. Farther, Giraldi would be greatly puzzled, ſhould he be urged to tell on what ground he aſſerts, that Parthenius, Author of the Hercules, is not the ſame perſon with Parthenius who wrote the Propempticon and the Iphiclus. He knew the titles of thoſe books only by Stephanus Bizantinus's quoting them as the compoſitions of Parthenius. This quotation cannot ſettle their ſeveral ſhares or diviſions, and incline us to conclude rather, that they were all writ by Parthenius of Nicæa. He was better known than the reſt of the Parthenius's ; and therefore we ſhould aſcribe the books cited ſimply under that name to him, rather than to the others. Accordingly we ſee in Stephanus Byzantinus the epithet of φωκαιύς, Phocenſis, added to the word Παρθένιος PARTHENIUS in two places (16). This epithet implies, that in all other places, Parthenius cited ſimply, differs from him of Phocæa ; and that, had he been different from him of Nicæa, he would have had the ſirname of his country. Let us obſerve, by the way, that Parthenius of Phocæa ſeems to have lived, at fartheſt, in the fourth century ; for Stephanus Byzantinus (17) cites him under a name which was given to a people on account of Decentius, brother of Magnentius (18). I am alſo to obſerve, that Athenæus, citing a Parthenius different from him of Nicæa, does not cite him ſimply, but adds, for diſtinction ſake, ὁ τοῦ Διονύσου (19), i. e. the ſon of Dionyſius, according to Dalechamp, or Diſciple of Dionyſius, according to Voſſius (20). This Parthenius wrote a work, intitled, περὶ τῶν παρὰ τοῖς ἱστορικοῖς λέξεων ζητωμένων, de vocabulis quæſitis apud hiſtoricos (21). Voſſius thought him to be the Diſciple of Dionyſius of Alexandria, a famous Grammarian, who flouriſhed from Nero to the reign of Trajan.

(16) In Γόρθυι & in Δεκέντιοι.

(17) In Δεκέντιοι.

(18) Who was Emperor ſome time, and killed himſelf in 353.

(19) Athen. lib. 11. p. 467, and 501.

(20) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 2. cap. 1.

If any one ſhould aſk me, who that Parthenius is, whom Lucian cites, where he gives the name of ſome poets who writ in a diffuſive manner, I anſwer, that Caſaubon ſuppoſes him to be the ſame with him who dedicated a treatiſe to Cornelius Gallus (22), that is, Parthenius of Nicæa. Ὅμηρος . . . καίτοι ποιητὴς ὤν, παραθεῖ τὸν Τάνταλον, καὶ τὸν Ἰξίονα, καὶ Τιτυὸν, καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους. εἰ δὲ Παρθένιος, ἢ Εὐφορίων, ἢ Καλλίμαχος ἔλεγε, πόσοις ἂν οἴει ἔπεσι τὸ ὕδωρ ἄχρι πρὸς τὸ χεῖλος τοῦ Ταντάλου ἤγαγεν ; εἶτα πόσοις ἂν Ἰξίονα ἐκύλισε (23). i. e. " Homer, although he be a poet, he yet runs through, " in few words, the ſtories of Tantalus, Ixion, Tityus, and others. But if Parthenius, Euphorion, or " Callimachus, were to write concerning them, " what a number of verſes would they employ to " bring the water to Tantalus's lips ; and how many to make Ixion turn on his wheel."

(21) Athen. lib. 11. p. 467.

(22) Caſaub. in Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 70.

(23) Lucian. de conſcrib. Hiſt. Tom. 1. p. m. 704.

PARTS (JAMES DES), in Latin de Partibus, lived in the 15th Century, and was Phyſician to Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy ; and afterwards to Charles VII. King of France (a). Some declare him to have been a native of Toumay, but others affirm that he was born in Paris [A]. He was a Canon of the Church of Paris (b) ; Canon and Treaſurer of the Church of Toumay (c) ; and died in the laſt mentioned city, about the year 1465 (d). He was one of the moſt learned men of that age, and wrote books which continued a long time in great reputation [B]. I ſhall obſerve hereunder (e), that (a) Naudæus, de Antiq. Scholæ Medicæ Pariſienſis, p. 48.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Lindenius renovat. p. 468.

(d) Riolan. Recherches ſur les Eſcoles in Medecine, de Paris & de Montpellier, p. 197.

(e) In the note of the article PRÆPOSITUS.

[A] Some declare him to have been a native of Tournay, but others affirm that he was born in Paris.] Merklinius declares for the firſt of thoſe two opinions. See page 490 of Lindenius renovatus. Riolanus declares for the latter ; and he has even employed this circumſtance, to prove that James Ponceau was a Pariſian. " James des Parts was a native of Paris. " His works (1) were printed under the direction of " James Ponceau, firſt Phyſician to Charles VIII. at " his return from Italy, and at the King's expence. " Janus Laſcaris, who dedicated this book to James " Ponceau, calls him patriotam, the countryman, of " James des Parts, & ejuſdem artis Profeſſorem (2), and " profeſſor of the ſame art." The circumſtance, which might make one conclude that this Phyſician to Charles VII. was not born in Tournay, is, becauſe neither Swertius, nor Valerius Andreas Diſſelius, Bibliographers of the Low-Countries, make any mention of him, tho' he was ſo capable of doing honour to his country.

(1) In three large volumes. Riolan. Recherches des Eſcholes de Medecine, p. 171.

(2) Ibid. p. 170.

(3) See the preceeding remark.

[B] He wrote books which continued a long time in great reputation.] The principal of theſe is, his Commentary on Avicen. It was printed at Lions, at the King's expence, and under the direction of James Laſcaris (3), apud Joannem Trechſel, anno 1498, in 4 volumes, folio (4). Some declare, that the Phyſicians of Paris concealed this noble work, in order that Foreigners might not enjoy the benefit of it. Cui (Jacobo de Partibus) ſi quemadmodum Tacitus * Cæſari concedatis, ut propter magnitudinem cognitionis (5), & occupationes rerum, & ſæculi ſui fatum, minus eloquentiâ effecerit, quàm divinum ejus ingenium poſtulabat, habebitis alioqui virum tam celebrem, tam eruditum, tam copioſum, ut non veritus ſit affirmare Joannes Agricola Mediacus Germanus †, " majores veſtros, quibus com- " mentum illud ingens & vaſtum in Avicennum pri- " mum

(4) Lindenius renovatus, p. 490. Geſner ſays anno 1497. Riolanus mentions only three volumes.

* Lit. de claris Oratoribus.

(5) It is cogitaliorum in ſeveral editions of Tacitus.

† Epiſt. num cupat. comment. in Galenum de locis affectis.

that ſome other Phyſicians have ſtole from him. He is the firſt who wrote upon the ſpotted Fever (f). The Bagnio-keepers of Paris attempted to aſſaſſinate him, becauſe he adviſed the Magiſtrate, not to permit the uſe of baths during the time of peſtilence [C].

(f) See the remark [C].

" mum obtigerat, centum annos perpetuos apud ſe, " clam, & ſecreto continuiſſe, nulliſque nationibus " aliis hoc communicari ſuſtinuiſſe, prius quàm ſecu- " la quædam annorum περιπλομένων revoluta eſſent." Sed quidquid ſit de hac hiſtoria, vel potius ex ſubducta temporis ratione non ineleganti fabella, hoc loco mihi venit in mentem quod narratur de veteris Romæ tam catis & cautis Juriſconſultis, qui faſtorum, dierumque ſingulorum rationem penes ſe unos eſſe voluerunt, donec inventus eſt quidam ſcriba Cneius Flavius, qui faſtos ipſos populo ediſcendos proponeret, ſuorumque magiſtrorum tam arcanam, occultamque ſapientiam compilaret, ac pervulgaret  : inventus eſt tandem Janus Laſcaris è Paleologorum familia Princeps Conſtantinopolitanus, qui hoc univerſæ Medicinæ ſacrarium, hoc ſi Diis placet, tectum & involutum non Eleuſiniarum, ſed Pariſienſis Æſculapii myſterium, ſymmiſtis omnibus, omnibus medicis reſeravit, aperit, communicavit.

 Videatur præfatio & Epiſt. nuncupat. ejus Operibus ab eodem Laſcaris præfixa.

Hoc autem imprimum, quod Jacobus de Partibus ab iis omnibus, qui illum præceſſerant, legitimè delatum obtinuit; illud idem diverſâ ratione Joannes Fernelius omnibus, qui eum ſecuturi ſunt, ita præripuit, ut non ſolum medicorum ſeculi decimi quinti Princeps (6), &c. i. e. " If " we ſay of James de Partibus, as Tacitus did of " Cæſar, that, on account of the vaſt extent of " his knowledge, the affairs he was engaged in, and " the deſtiny of the age in which he lived; his elo- " quence, I ſay, was therefore not ſo efficacious as " might have been expected from his divine genius; " we ſhall, in other reſpects, have a man ſo renown- " ed, ſo learned, and of ſo fruitful a genius, that " John Agricola, a German Phyſician, did not ſcru- " ple to affirm, as follows, Your anceſtors, who were " poſſeſſed of that mighty Commentary of Avicen, kept " it ſecretly among themſelves for an hundred years to- " gether, and would not permit other nations to have " the leaſt acquaintance with it, till a great number of " years after. But what truth ſoever there may be in " this ſtory, or rather, conſidering the time, agree- " able fable enough; it juſt now brings to my re- " membrance, what we are told concerning the ſo " wary and circumſpect Civilians of antient Rome, " who wanted to get poſſeſſed of the regulation of " the ſeveral days, in ſhort, the whole management " of the Calendar, till one Cneius Flavius, a Writer " or Notary, who propoſed that the people ſhould " learn the Calendar by heart, compiled and made " public this hidden wiſdom of thoſe who governed " them: in like manner Janus Laſcaris, a Conſtanti- " nopolitan Prince, of the family of the Paleologi, " has unlocked, opened, and communicated, to all " Phyſicians, this ſacred repoſitory of univerſal me- " dicine, this hidden myſtery, not of the Goddeſs " Ceres, but of the Æſculapius of Paris.

" But this aſcendant and ſuperiority, which James " de Partibus lawfully claimed and obtained from all " his predeceſſors, John Fernelius has, on the con- " trary, forced from all who ſhall ſucceed him, that " he not only is the Prince of Phyſicians of the 15th " century, &c." I was obliged to lengthen this citation, in order that it might ſerve as a proof to the text of this remark.

(6) Naudæus, de Antiq. Scholæ Medicæ Paris, p. 48 & ſeq.

Among the reſt of the works of James de Partibus, mentioned in the Lindenius renovatus, I ſhall mention only the two following. Summa Alphabetica Morborum ac Remediorum ex libris Meſuæ excerpta. Inventurium ſeu Collectorium receptorum omnium Medicaminum, Confectorum, Pulverum, Pilularum, Emplaſtorum, Unguentorum, & Oleorum, & aliorum cuivis uſui reſervandorum. In this laſt, neither the year, nor place where printed, are ſet down (7).

(7) Lindenius renovatus, p. 491.

[C] The Bagnio-keepers of Paris attempted to aſſaſſinate him.] The whole paſſage, which I ſhall here cite from Riolanus, is curious, and may be of uſe to this article, for which reaſon I ſhall give it entire. " I " cannot bear to hear Fracaſtorius, a very learned Ita- " lian Phyſician, where he ſpeaks of the ſpotted fe- " ver, in his treatiſe de Morbis contagioſis, ſay, that it " was not known in France, anno 1529, when An- " drew Naugier ††, Embaſſador from the Repub- " lic of Venice, died of that fever in Blois. I can " prove that it was deſcribed a little after the year 1500, " by Sebaſtian Montuus, in his Opuſcula; and that, " at the cloſe of the 14th century (8), one James des " Parts, a Phyſician of Paris, firſt wrote, in a clear " and learned manner enough, on that diſeaſe, and " cured it by letting blood. It is he himſelf, who " informs us that, in his time, baths and ſtoves were " ſo common in Paris; that having adviſed the " Magiſtrates to prohibit them during the plague, " the Bagnio-keepers would have murdered him, had " he not made his eſcape (9)."

†† This is Andrew Navagero. See his article.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(8) It ſhould be the 15th. Naudæus de Antiq. Scholæ Medic. Paris. p. 48. commits the ſame error.

Riolanus afterwards quotes ſix Latin verſes, written by Brixianus, an Italian, in which the city of Paris is applauded for its baths and ſtoves in the beginning of the 16th century; and it appears by Peter Matthieu (10), that when the Queen made her entrance into Paris, anno 1466, four baths were ſet up for her Majeſty and the Ladies, at John Dauvet's, the firſt Preſident. He ranks this (11) in the number of the ſenſual pleaſures of Lewis XI. which were no ways common, and little known to the Kings of France, his Predeceſſors. He is of opinion, that the Prince in queſtion brought this practice from Flanders; and cites Philip de Comines, who ranks baths among the corruptions which peace had brought into the Low-Countries. But the particulars I have related from James des Parts, ſhew that baths were very much uſed in Paris, before Lewis XI. returned from Flanders.

(9) Riolan. Recherches des Eſcholes de Medecine, p. 217, 218.

(10) Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI. in the beginning, p. m. 273.

(11) Ibid. Liv. 12. p. 733.

PASCAL (BLAISE), one of the ſublimeſt genius's the world ever produced, was born at Clermont in Auvergne, the 29th of June 1623. He never had any Preceptor but his Father, who was a very learned man [A], an able Mathematician, and Preſident of the Court of Aids in the Province where he lived; and had an extreme affection for this child, his only ſon (a). This great affection prompted him to quit his employment, and to go and ſettle at Paris in 1631, in order that he might employ his time to greater advantage in the inſtruction of his ſon, who, from his infancy, gave indications of a genius greatly ſuperior to the generality of mankind; for he always deſired to have a reaſon for every thing . . . . and could never yield to any point but what appeared to him evidently true, ſo that whenever good reaſons were not given him, he would ſearch for better in his own mind; and whenever he applied himſelf to a ſubject, he never left it till he had found ſome reaſon that was ſatisfactory to him (b). Having ſuch a caſt of mind, there was juſt reaſon to (a) He had two daughters, one of whom was a Nun of Port-Royal, and the other wife to Mr. Perier.

(b) Paſcal's Life, by Mrs. Perier, p. 5.

[A] His father . . . . . was a very learned man.] His name was Stephen Pascal. He was born anno 1588, at Clement in Auvergne, and deſcended from one of the beſt families in that Province. His father was treaſurer of France at Riom; and his mother, who alſo was ſurnamed Paſcal, was daughter of the Seneſchal of Auvergne in Clermont (1). Stephen Paſcal left the Province (country) after reſigning his employment of Preſident to one of his brothers, and retired to Paris as being a place advantageous to the deſign he had formed of beſtowing a good education on his ſon (2). He joined with Mr. de Roberval, in anſwering the objections of Des Cartes, in oppoſition to a work of Mr. de Fermat, de maximis & minimis (3); but he had little or no concern in the conſequences of that diſpute, he leaving Paris, and withdrawing to a ſolitude, for

(1) Baillet, Vie de Des-Cartes, Tom. 1. p. 332.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Idem, p. 331, ad ann. 1638.

to fear that he would turn Free-Thinker; and yet he never was tainted with that fault, but diſtinguiſhed with the utmoſt exactneſs, ſo long as he lived, between the laws of faith and thoſe of reaſon [B]. The manner in which it is ſaid he learnt the mathematicks ſeems ſomething miraculous [C]; as well as the great progreſs he made in them, in a very ſhort time [D]: but the particulars we are told concerning his piety and humility (c), are almoſt

(c) See the rem. [G].

for fear leſt his preſence ſhould exaſperate ſome perſons in power who were offended, and prompt them to deprive him of his liberty. The diſgrace into which he imagined himſelf fallen, was only the conſequence of that of one of his intimate friends, who had been ſeized and carried to the Baſtile, for ſome commotions raiſed into the town-houſe. Paſcal firmly perſuaded of the uprightneſs of his friend's heart, had obſerved that there was more of ill-fortune than guilt in the manner in which he had raiſed the diſturbance. He therefore had not barely contented himſelf with ſpeaking in his friend's favour, but had alſo ventured to undertake the defence of ſeveral perſons, who had been unjuſtly treated and oppreſſed by ſome venal ſpirited officers. He likewiſe had been informed, that this incident had been related, with ſome very odious circumſtances, to Chancellour Seguier; and therefore, the fear of his having diſpleaſed that Nobleman, (the firſt Magiſtrate in the Kingdom) had prompted him to retire, to prevent the effects of his reſentment. He continued about a twelve-month in his retirement, till Cardinal de Richelieu, informed of his merit and of the cauſe of his retirement, by the Ducheſs d'Aiguillon and the Chancellor himſelf, recalled him in 1639; and appointed him, a little after, intendant of Normandy in Roan (4). He died in 1651 (5); having contracted a friendſhip with Des Cartes.

(4) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 1. p. 339, 340.

(5) Ibid. p. 832.

[B] He diſtinguiſhed exactly, ſo long as he lived, between the laws of reaſon and thoſe of faith.] Here follows what we are told in his life written by Mrs. Perier his ſiſter. "He had been hitherto (6) pre-
(6) That is, till the age of 24.
"ſerved, by a peculiar protection of the Almighty, "from all the vices incident to youth; and, a circum-"ſtance that is ſtill more ſurprizing in a perſon of "his turn of mind, and character, he had never in-"dulged himſelf in free-thinking, having always "reſtrained his curioſity to the ſtudy of natural "things. He has frequently told me, that he added "this obligation to all the reſt he owed to my fa-"ther, who, himſelf, having the higheſt reverence "for religion, had inſpired him from his infancy "with the like regard for it; laying it down as a "maxim to him, that whatever is the object of "faith cannot be the object of reaſon, and much "leſs be ſubject to it. Theſe maxims, which were "often repeated by a father, for whom he always "had the higheſt regard, and whom he ſaw to be a "perſon of very great erudition, heightned with "the cleareſt and moſt powerful way of reaſoning, "made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion on his mind, that "none of the diſcourſes or arguments of the Free-"Thinkers could make the leaſt impreſſion on him; "and though very young, he conſidered them as "perſons who laid down the following principles, "viz. that human reaſon is ſuperior to all things, "and who don't know the nature of faith: thus "this great, this extenſive, this very inquiſitive and "enlightned mind, which ſo induſtriouſly and care-"fully ſought for the cauſe and reaſon of all things, "was, at the ſame time, as ſubmiſſive to all things "which relate to religion, as a child, and this ſim-"plicity prevailed in him all his life time: inſo-"much that, even after he had formed a reſolution "to apply himſelf to no other ſtudy but that of re-"ligion, he never applied himſelf to ſuch queſtions "in Divinity as were of a curious nature; but em-"ployed the whole power and ſtrength of the facul-"ties of his mind, in informing himſelf, and prac-"tiſing, the perfection of Chriſtian Morality, to "which he conſecrated all the talents that God had
(7) Vie de Paſcal, p. 12, 13.
"beſtowed upon him (7)." [Paſcal's father came to Paris, purpoſely that he might have an opportunity of devoting all his time to his ſon's education, which it would have been impoſſible for him to do in the country, he being ſo much taken up with the exerciſe of his employment and in viſiting his friends. The chief maxim he went upon in educating his ſon was, to always keep him, as it were above his work, that is, not to let him be employed in any ſtudy but what he could comprehend with eaſe. For this reaſon he did not permit him to learn Latin till he was twelve years old; before which he had inſtructed him in a great number of particulars that were eaſier learnt *.]

* Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 1. p. 215, 216. Paris 1701, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.

[C] The manner in which it is ſaid he learnt the Mathematicks is ſomething miraculous.] His father perceiving in him a ſtrong inclination (8) to matters of reaſoning, was afraid that the knowledge of the Mathematicks would prevent his learning the languages. This made him reſolve to prevent him, as much as lay in his power, from applying himſelf to Geometry. Accordingly he locked up all the books which treated of it, and even forbore to ſpeak any thing concerning that ſcience to his friends, when his ſon was preſent. But he nevertheleſs could not refuſe to make the general anſwer following, to his ſon's important curioſity: Geometry is a ſcience, which teaches the method of making figures with truth and exactneſs, and to find out the proportions they bear to one another; but at the ſame time he commanded him never to ſpeak or meditate any more upon them. The child (9), merely from this opening, began to reflect and meditate during the hours allowed him for recreation, and to draw figures with coal, on the floor of the room. He ſought for the proportions of figures; formed to himſelf definitions, axioms, and afterwards demonſtrations; and carried his enquiries ſo far, that he attained to the 32 propoſition of the firſt book of Euclid: for his father having ſurprized him one day, in the midſt of his figures, and aſked him what he was doing; he replied, that he was ſearching for ſuch a thing, which was that very propoſition in Euclid. He afterwards aſked him how he came to think on this, to which he anſwered, that he had found out another thing (which he told him) and in this manner going backwards, and explaining every thing by the terms right line and circle, he went back to the definitions and axioms he had formed to himſelf. The reader may ſee all this at large, with the conſequences that enſued upon it, in the authors cited by me in the margin (10). I have mentioned elſewhere a particular, which is ſomething like this, and relates to father Maignan. See his article, remark [E].

(8) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids. See alſo Mrs. Perier, Vie de Paſcal. p. 6.

(9) He was then but twelve years old. Mrs. Perier, ibid. and the Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids.

(10) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids. Mrs. Perier, Vie de Paſcal. Mr. Baillet, Enfans celebres, article 77.

[D] . . . . . the great progreſs he made in them, in a very ſhort time.] Mr. le Pailleur being told the above-mentioned particulars, adviſed Mr. Paſcal, who informed him of them, not to reſtrain his ſon any longer. Mr. Paſcal took his advice, and accordingly put Euclid's Elements into the hands of his ſon, who (11), "underſtood them without wanting the leaſt "aſſiſtance; and immediately made ſo great a pro-"greſs in it, that he, from this time, went regularly "to the conferences which were held every week, "where all the ableſt men in Paris uſed to aſſemble, "either to carry their works, or examine thoſe of "others. Young Paſcal had his ſeat there, as a "Member, to bring his own works or examine the "compoſitions of other perſons. He himſelf brought "as many new pieces as any of the Members; and "ſometimes diſcovered errors in the propoſitions that "were examining, which others had overlooked. "And nevertheleſs he employed only his hours al-"lowed him for recreation, in the ſtudy of Geome-"try; he then learning the languages under his fa-"ther. But finding, in thoſe ſciences, the truth "which he was paſſionately fond of in all things; "he made ſuch prodigious advancement in them, "though this application was not very great, that he "wrote at ſixteen years of age a Treatiſe on Conic "Sections, which, in the judgment of perſons of "the greateſt abilities, was looked upon as an aſto-"niſhing effort of the human mind. And therefore "Mr. Des Cartes, who had been in Holland for a "long time, having read it, and heard that it was "the performance of a youth of ſixteen years old, "believed that the father was the real Author of it; "and that he was willing to deprive himſelf of the "fame and glory which was juſtly his, in order to "transfer it to his ſon, rather than imagine that a "child of that age was capable of compiling a "book

(11) Idem, ibid. p. 8 & ſeq.

moſt as wonderful [E]. After having employed himſelf very aſſiduouſly in making experiments

" book in which ſo great a ſtrength of reaſoning " was required; ſhewing by his backwardneſs in " believing a circumſtance that was matter of fact, " that it was in reality incredible and prodigious. [It was thought that no ſuch effort of genius had been ſeen ſince Archimedes's time. As our Paſcal was never ſollicitous after fame, he would not let it be printed, notwithſtanding the entreaties of his father's friends, who earneſtly deſired it, both on account of the excellency of the performance, and the circumſtance of the Author's age, which greatly heightned his merit *.] " At nineteen years of age he found out that " admirable arithmetical machine (12), which has " been looked upon as one of the moſt extraordinary " inventions that was ever ſeen. [By this inſtrument, calculations of every kind are not only done without the help of pen or counters, but without the perſon's knowing one ſingle rule in Arithmetick, or running the leaſt hazard of miſtaking. It was two years before he brought it to the perfection in which we now ſee it; a circumſtance that was not owing to any difficulty he met with in inventing the motions, but from the trouble it put him to, to make the workmen underſtand them perfectly *.] " And " afterwards having ſeen, when twenty three years " of age, the Torricellian experiment, he invented, " and made a great number of new experiments in " that taſte." I muſt not omit the very early exertions he gave of his exalted genius. " When he " was but eleven years old, ſome perſon, at dinner, " happening to ſtrike accidentally a fine Delft-ware " diſh with a knife, young Paſcal obſerved that it " made a ſtrong ſound; but that the inſtant a perſon " laid his hand upon the plate the ſound ceaſed. " He at the ſame time was deſirous of finding out " the cauſe of it; and this experiment having engaged him to the making of ſeveral others upon " ſounds, he obſerved ſo many things about them, " that he drew up a little treatiſe on that ſubject, " which was looked upon as extremely judicious and " ſolid (13)." Here follows a particular that deſerves to be related. A man of genius, who has rallied in a delicate manner (14) the authors of the Preface above-cited (15), introduces Des Cartes ſpeaking as follows. " This man (16) is fortunate " in point of reputation. Many people were formerly made to believe, that he had compoſed, " merely from his own fund, a book of Conic Sections at ſixteen years of age. This book was ſent " me; and, before I had gone half through it, I " judged * that he had extracted a great number of " things in it from Mr. des Argues; a circumſtance " that was confirmed to me ſoon after, by his own " confeſſion (17)." The author, who puts theſe words into Des Cartes's mouth, immediately anſwers him as follows (18). *What you tell me here ſurprizes me a little; ſince, in the Preface to a treatiſe on the equilibrium of Fluids, printed after Mr. P's * death, your teſtimony, with regard to this article, is cited, and it does not agree directly with what you now tell me: for no mention is there made of his having been aſſiſted by Mr. des Argues. All that is ſaid there is, that the thing appeared to you ſo incredible and wonderful, that you could not be prevailed upon to believe it. That you was perſuaded, that the work in queſtion was in reality the compoſition of P——'s father, and that he was deſirous to transfer the honour of it to his ſon.* Des Cartes replies, I know not what I have been made to think or ſay in that Preface; but this I am certain of, that I ſay nothing to you at this time, but what I wrote in expreſs terms to father Merſenne, as ſoon as the work in queſtion had been communicated to me. I doubtleſs may be allowed to obſerve, that the Author of this Dialogue does not cite exactly Des Cartes's words, as written to Father Merſenne. The words of the letter are as follow (19): " I have alſo received young Mr. Paſcal's Eſſay on Conic Sections; and before I had read it " half through, I judged that he had been taught " by Mr. Des Argues, a circumſtance that was preſently afterwards confirmed to me by his own con" feſſion." This ſignifies evidently, that Mr. Paſcal, a little after the middle of his book, confeſſes that he had received great light from Mr. des Argues; but the words of the Dialogue intimate plainly, that Paſcal made this confeſſion, in a letter written by him to Des Cartes; which would prompt one to believe, that our youth, hearing that this Philoſopher ſuſpected that he had been taught by Mr. des Argues, wrote a letter to confeſs the juſtice of his ſuſpicion. Such are the conſequences that flow naturally from the relation made by the Author of the Dialogues; whence we muſt conclude that he miſleads his readers, and prompts him to form to himſelf a falſe idea of this fact. Nevertheleſs, the objection remains ſtill very ſtrong againſt the Preface of the Equilibrium of Fluids; for, after all, Des Cartes does not write one circumſtance to Father Merſenne, expreſſive of his admiration of young Paſcal; he does not beſtow one elogium upon him; does not give any approbation of the treatiſe on Conic Sections, and ſays not one word in praiſe or diſpraiſe of it. Where then is this teſtimony which is pretended he gave, that he looked upon this work as incredible and wonderful (20)? Here it will be anſwered, that it is in another letter that was never printed: but to this it muſt be added, and that was never writ to Father Merſenne; for had ſuch a letter been writ to him, Baillet would have quoted it, and not have been contented with referring us to the Preface on the Equilibrium of Fluids. Baillet informs us of three particulars. 1. That de Roberval, le Pailleur, and the reſt of Paſcal's friends, were diſpleaſed at Des Cartes for writing to Father Merſenne. And that they inveighed againſt his opinion, as being uncomplaiſant, ſince it related to a youth of ſuch rare and uncommon merit: in which they were followed by the Port Royal, who gave an advice, on this ſubject, to Mr. Clercelier, after he had publiſhed this teſtimony of Des Cartes, in the firſt impreſſion of his Letters (21). 2. That this great Philoſopher, grounding his belief on probability, could not be perſuaded that ſo good a work had been writ by a child. He therefore diſcovered to his friend his ſentiments on this matter, without the leaſt artifice or diſguiſe. He choſe to ſeek, for the work in queſtion, an Author among the moſt profound Mathematicians, rather than run the hazard of loſing, on other occaſions, the credit he had obtained with thoſe who knew him to be ſincere, by the facility with which he would have believed a thing, of the truth whereof he could not perſuade others, on his bare word. For this reaſon, after making ſome enquiries which cleared up the matter, he ſaw that he could not with any probability aſcribe any part of the work in queſtion to his friend des Argues, " he † choſe rather " to conclude that Paſcal's father was the true Author " of it, than to believe that ſuch a youth could have " writ a book with ſo much ſtrength of reaſoning". 3. That Des Cartes might alſo have been led, by the appearance of probability, into an error about fact, when, upon recollecting the intimate correſpondence between Mr. des Argues and Meſſieurs Paſcal, and finding, in the treatiſe of this young Author, who was but ſixteen years of age, ſome things which he imagined he had ſeen a little before in des Argues's piece; he therefore might conclude that the laſt mentioned had been concerned in writing this treatiſe, eſpecially as young Paſcal cited des Argues there (22). We cannot form a juſt judgment of this diſpute, till we have cleared up the two particulars following; the firſt, whether it be true that Des Cartes renouncing his firſt opinion, declared in his letter, that Mr. Paſcal's father had transferred to his ſon the fame and honour of his Conic Sections: but this does not appear either by his printed letters; by his manuſcript letters peruſed by Baillet, nor by any other circumſtantial proof: we have nothing, on this ſubject, but the random teſtimony of the publiſhers of the Equilibrium of Fluids. The other particular neceſſary to be cleared up is, to know in what terms des Argues is mentioned in Paſcal's Treatiſe. If he is but barely named in it, Des Cartes did very wrong, in aſſerting that Paſcal owned that he had been inſtructed by des Argues: but if Paſcal made ſuch a confeſſion, his friends, and thoſe of his Father, acted very unjuſtly in complaining of Des Cartes.

[E] The particulars we are told concerning his piety . . are wonderful.] I ſhall ſpeak more largely of this below (23), and will here mention but one proof of it. In the four laſt years of his life, as he was not able to undergo any fatigue, his chief delight was to go and viſit thoſe Churches where relicks were ſhewn, or ſome ſolemnity

* Addit. by the Tranſl.

(12) He preſented one of them to the King, one to the Chancellor, and afterwards gave another to Mr. Carcavi. See Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 378.

* Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 1. p. 217. Addit. by the Tranſl.

(13) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids.

(14) See, Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, p. 191, 192. Dutch edition.

(15) That of the Equilibrium of Fluids.

(16) i. e. Mr. Paſcal.

* Tom. 2. Let. 38.

(17) Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, p. 188.

(18) Ibid. p. 189.

* Mr. Paſcal. Tom. 2. Let. 38.

(19) Des Cartes, Tom. 2. Lett. 38. p. m. 217.

(20) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids.

† Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids.

(21) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 40. ad ann. 1639, 1640.

(22) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 41.

(23) In the rem. [G].

periments according to the new Philoſophy, he quitted his ſtudy [F], and every other kind of learning, to apply himſelf wholly to that only thing which Chriſt calls neceſſary (d). He was not yet four and twenty, when the peruſal of ſome books of devotion inſpired him with this holy reſolution. The patience he ſhewed in his long and repeated illneſſes, may alſo juſtly excite our wonder [G]; and we ought ſcarce leſs to admire his frame of mind, with regard to thoſe who offended him, and towards ſuch as were wanting in the obedience ſolemnity practiſed; and for this purpoſe he kept a ſpiritual almanack, pointing out the places where any particular devotion was paid; and he behaved on thoſe occaſions with much devotion and ſimplicity, that all who ſaw him were ſurprized; which gave riſe to the fine ſaying following of a very virtuous and learned perſon, viz. that the grace of God diſcovers itſelf, in perſons of exalted genius, by little things; and in the vulgar part of mankind, by great things (24).

(d) Vie de Paſcal, p. 12.

(24) Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 40.

[F] After having employed himſelf very aſſiduouſly, in making experiments according to the new Philoſophy, he quitted this ſtudy.] The firſt experiment he made was that of Toricellius, which he repeated ſeveral times (25), and drew ſeveral conſequences from it, for the proof of which he made ſeveral experiments, in the preſence of the moſt conſiderable inhabitants of Roan (26), where he then reſided (27). . . . . He printed them in 1647, and made a little book of them, which he diſperſed all over France, and in foreign countries. . . . . The ſame year, he was informed of a reflexion that Toricellius had made, viz. that the air is heavy; and that it's weight or gravity might be the cauſe of all the effects which till then had been aſcribed to the horror of a vacuum. He thought this a very noble reflection; but as this was merely conjecture, and that there were no proofs; in order to diſcover the truth or falſity of it, he made ſeveral experiments . . . . . which not giving him entire ſatisfaction, he meditated, at the cloſe of the year 1647, the famous experiment which was made in 1648. The ſucceſs of this experiment, which he repeated ſeveral times, . . confirmed him entirely in Toricellius's experiment with regard to the gravity of the air; gave him afterwards an opportunity of drawing ſome very noble and very uſeful conſequences from it; and of making ſeveral other experiments; which he inſerted in a large treatiſe written by him at that time, wherein he fully explained that matter, and anſwered all the objections that were made to him. But this treatiſe is loſt; or rather, being a great lover of conciſeneſs, he himſelf reduced it to two little tracts that were publiſhed after his death, one whereof is entitled, Of the Equilibrium of Fluids, and the other, Of the Weight of the Atmoſphere.

(25) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids.

(26) His father was Intendant there.

(27) i. e. anno 1646. See Baillet, vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 328.

We muſt not omit the reproach caſt upon him, of not behaving with due gratitude towards Des Cartes. I will cite the Dialogues of a modern Author (28). " Here Mr. Des Cartes interrupted me, and aſked, what " was this experiment of Mr. P. . . s' *? I anſwer'd, " that it was the experiment which was made in " 1648, on le Puy de Domme, with the Torricellian " Tube, in which the quick ſilver did not riſe near " ſo high on the top of the mountain, as in the mid- " dle and at the foot of it; whence the gravity or " weight of the air was evidently inferred. This, " replied Mr. Des Cartes, is called Mr. P. . . . .'s " experiment. . . . . 'Tis therefore becauſe he per- " formed it, or got it performed by Mr. Perrier: " for certainly 'tis not becauſe he invented, or fore- " ſaw the ſucceſs of it. And if this experiment " ought to be named from the inventor of it, it " might more juſtly have been called † Des Car- " tes's experiment: for it was I who deſired him, " two years before (29), to make it; and who aſ- " ſured him of the ſucceſs, as being entirely con- " formable to my principles; for otherwiſe this " could never have come once into his head, he be- " ing of a contrary opinion." Baillet has confirmed the juſtice of this reproach, he informing us, under the year 1647 (30), of what follows. *Deſcartes overjoyed at Mr. Paſcal's diſcourſe, found that all theſe experiments were conformable enough to the principles of his Philoſophy, although Paſcal † ſtill oppoſed them, as being of the ſame opinion with Mr. Roberval, and thoſe who maintained a vacuum. But in return for his converſation, he adviſed him * to make other experiments on the Atmoſphere, to whoſe weight, as we before obſerved, he referred what the vulgar Philoſopher had vainly aſcribed to the horror of a vacuum* †. He aſſured him of the ſucceſs of theſe experiments, though he himſelf had not tried them, becauſe he ſpoke of them as conformable to his principles. Paſcal, who promiſed, at that time, to offer ſome objections to his Materia Subtilis, would perhaps have paid no great regard to his advice, had he not been informed, about the ſame time, of much ſuch a reflection which had occurred to Toricellius. The experiments he made about the weight § of the air in 1648, on this advice, were very ſucceſsful: but he choſe rather to own his obligation to Torricellius than to Deſcartes, who was deprived of his acknowledgments, both in ‖ his letter to Mr. de Ribeyre, firſt Preſident of the Court of Aydes of Clermont-Ferrand, in which he gives the hiſtory of his experiments; and in the Preface written by a friend of his to his poſthumous Treatiſe on the Equilibrium of Fluids, and the weight of the air. 'Tis plain that Paſcal is not juſtified with reſpect to Des Cartes, as he had juſt before been with regard to Toricellius, in the following words (31). " The fame of theſe experiments being " ſpread in Paris, they had been confounded with " thoſe of Italy; and, in this confuſion, ſome aſ- " cribed them all to Paſcal, and others would not al- " low him to be the Author of one of them. Mr. " Paſcal, to inform the publick of this particular " with all its circumſtances; and to do juſtice to all " the perſons who had contributed to this invention, " Paſcal had determined, the year following, to " print an exact relation of the experiments he had " made in Normandy; and had written a Preface, " in which he pointed out thoſe of Italy, the author " of which he did not then know, any more than " his name, which was not known in Paris, till Ca- " valier del Pozzo ſent word from Rome, that the " famous Toricellius, who died about the ſame time, " was the man. This plain concealment of the " name of a perſon, whom Paſcal otherwiſe pre- " ferred to all the Geometricians of antiquity, made " ſome ſuſpect that he deſigned to act the plagiary " with reſpect to Torricellius; and even to believe, " though falſely, that he alſo had ſtole from the fa- " mous Capuchin's Valerian Magni (32)." [The arguments which Paſcal's friends have made, in his favour, againſt the Capuchin, are not near ſo good as that which can be brought to prove, that Paſcal had ſtole from Peter Petit, intendant of the fortifications, and a naturaliſt of good repute at that time. 'Tis as follows. Paſcal did not make his experiments on mercury till 1647, whereas Petit had made his at Paris in 1646. This laſt circumſtance is an undoubted fact; and is proved in page 208 of the Journal des Savans, of the 26th of April 1666. In the citations above (28) (30), Des Cartes is ſuppoſed to have been the inventor of this experiment among the French: but Petit did not allow this, he declaring that he had taught it Des Cartes. See Petit's Traité Des Cometes, p. 222 *.]

(28) Voyage du Monde de Des Cartes, p. 188.

* Mr. Paſcal.

† Lettre 77 de Des Cartes, Tom. 3.

(29) Des Cartes is miſtaken in a year, he deſired Mr. Paſcal to do this in 1647, and the Experiment was made in 1648. See Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 330. I will quote his words immediately.

(30) Baillet, vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. 330.

† Lettres. MS. to Merſenne, dated April 4. 1648.

* Tom. 3. of the Letters, p. 443. 438.

§ See the MS. Letters of Des Cartes to Merſenne, of Dec. 13. 1647. Feb. 7. 1648. Jan. 31. 1648. and April 4. 1648.

‖ Of July 12, 1651.

(31) Baillet, vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 329.

† Mr. Auzout declares that he gave the ſame advice, at the ſame time, to Paſcal.

Immediately after all theſe experiments, which confirmed Paſcal in the opinion of the weight of the air, he (33) applied himſelf to more ſerious ſtudies, which gave him ſo great a diſtaſte for the Mathematicks and Phyſicks, that he quitted them entirely. For though he ſince wrote a treatiſe on the Cycloid, under the name of Ettonville; this is no ways contrary to what I ſay, becauſe he found every thing contained in it by chance, and without applying himſelf to it; and wrote it only to make it ſubſervient to a deſign entirely remote from the Mathematicks, and from all curious ſciences, as will perhaps be ſhewn one day (34).

[G] The patience he ſhewed in his long and repeated illneſſes, may alſo juſtly excite our wonder.] His ſiſter informs us of ſeveral particulars, from which I will copy but one. " This his ardent charity, during " his ſickneſs, was heightned by ſuch admirable pa- " tience, as edified and ſurprized all Perſons about " him. And he often ſaid to thoſe who were griev- " ed at his calamitous condition; that, with regard " to

(32) The ſequel of this paſſage.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 2. p. 970. in which we are told of the conviction of this Capuchin, is in remark [B] of the article MAGNI.

(33) Preface to the Equilibrium of Fluids, near the end. See alſo Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 12.

(34) See Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 24, 25.

ence due to the King. He was regardleſs and inſenſible with reſpect to the faults of the former, but irreconcileable to the latter [H]. He died in Paris the 19th of Auguſt 1662, aged

" to himſelf, it did not give him the leaſt uneaſineſs, " and that all he was afraid of was, that he ſhould " recover. And when he was aſked the reaſon of " this, he uſed to ſay, it is becauſe I know the dan- " ger of health, and the advantage of ſickneſs. He " uſed likewiſe to ſay, when in the greateſt pain, " when the people about him were afflicted to ſee " him ſuffer; do not pity me; ſickneſs is the natu- " ral State of Chriſtians, becauſe they are then as " they ought always to be, viz. in a ſuffering condi- " tion; deprived of every bleſſing and the ſeveral " pleaſures of the ſenſes; free from all paſſions " which diſturb us during the whole courſe of our " lives; void of ambition, of avarice, and waiting " continually for death. Ought not Chriſtians to " ſpend their lives in this manner; and is it not a " great happineſs for a man to find himſelf, through " neceſſity, in the ſtate in which he is under an obli- " gation to be; and that all he has to do, is to ſub- " mit himſelf humbly and peaceably? For this rea- " ſon, all I deſire to do is, to beſeech God to grant " me that grace. Such was the temper with which " he ſuffered all his evils (35)." The author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres has made ſome reflections on this occaſion; and on the advantage that may be drawn from the extraordinary devotion of ſo excellent a Mathematician, and great a Philoſopher. 'Tis of ſervice, ſays he, to refute Free-Thinkers; they cannot now ſay, that none but perſons of mean genius are indued with a ſpirit of piety (36). It muſt be confeſſed, that we very rarely ſee perſons, who have once taken a pleaſure in mathematical ſtudies, and made a vaſt progreſs in them, extraordinarily devout. I know not whether we may ſay of them, what Abbé Furetiere ſaid of attornies. "There " are Saints who have been counſellours, bailiffs, nay, " players (37); in fine, there is no profeſſion, how " mean ſoever, but Saints have been of it, that of an " attorney excepted (38)." Mention is made of a Pariſh-Prieſt, who adopted a maxim like that of Paſcal, but it was with reſpect to another, and not to himſelf. I remember that a query is put to Bouchet's Serées; Whether a Pariſh-Prieſt acted well, in refuſing to pray for the recovery of a pariſhioner of his, who had ſent for him in order to implore Heaven for the recovery of his health? For the Pariſh-Prieſt having aſked him, whether he was the better Chriſtian, in ſickneſs or in health; and the ſick man replying, that it was when God viſited him: it will therefore be better, replied his Pariſh-Prieſt, that you continue ſick, in order that you may be a better man (39). What the Prieſt did on this occaſion is no very difficult thing; but had he himſelf defired, when afflicted with a grievous fit of ſickneſs, that people ſhould pray to God that it might continue, this would have been very extraordinary.

Some things in Paſcal's conduct and behaviour are as ſurprizing as his maxims with regard to health. " The converſations, in which he was frequently en- " gaged, though they were all on the ſubject of cha- " rity, he yet was ſometimes afraid leſt they ſhould be " of a dangerous conſequence; but as he could not in " conſcience refuſe the aid and relief which people " ſued to him for, he had found out a remedy for " this. He uſed to take occaſionally an iron girdle " ſtuck full of points, and put this round him, next " to his fleſh; ſo that whenever any vain thought " came into his mind, or took any delight in the " place he was in, or any thing like this happened; " he would ſtrike himſelf with his elbow, to make " the points run deeper, and in this manner put him- " ſelf in mind of his duty (40)." The two great maxims following were always in his mind, viz. to renounce every kind of pleaſure, and all ſuperfluity. He practiſed them when moſt grievouſly afflicted with ſickneſs; watching perpetually over his ſenſes, and abſolutely refuſing to gratify them in all ſuch things as were moſt pleaſing to them: and whenever neceſſity forced him to do any thing which might give him ſome ſatisfaction, he had a wonderful art to take off his mind from it, in order that it might have no ſhare in it: for inſtance, being forced, becauſe of the perpetual ſickneſs with which he was afflicted, to eat food of a dainty kind, he took great care not to taſte what he eat (41). He did not indulge himſelf much in thoſe he loved (42), and uſed to adviſe others not to permit any perſon to love them in a very high degree; this is a fault which people did not meditate enough upon, becauſe they did not ſufficiently comprehend the greatneſs of it; and did not reflect, that in cheriſhing and entertaining ſuch ardent affections, they poſſeſſed or employed a heart which ought to be devoted to God only: and that it was robbing him of a thing, which is more dear to him than any thing in the world (43). He uſed to find fault with ſome of his ſiſter's diſcourſes, which ſhe thought perfectly innocent. If I happened ſometimes to obſerve, ſaid ſhe (44), as the occaſion offered, that I had ſeen a pretty woman, he would be angry, and ſay, that I ought never to ſpeak of ſuch things before footmen and young people, becauſe I did not know what thoughts I might thereby ſuggeſt to them. So great was his humility, that the Pariſh-Prieſt of St. Etienne du Mont, who ſaw him during the whole courſe of his laſt illneſs, uſed to be for ever ſaying, he is a child, he is humble and ſubmiſſive as a child (45). This virtue, which he poſſeſſed, made him allow people to tell him of his faults with a full liberty, and he followed implicitly any advice that was given him (46). Having devoted himſelf, when but thirty years old, to a life quite diſengaged from the things of this world, he ſquared his conduct from the following maxim, to renounce all the pleaſures and ſuperfluities; and ſuch was his practice the remainder of his life. To ſucceed in this, he began, from that time, as he did ever afterwards, to diſpenſe as much as he could with the attendance of his ſervants. Accordingly he uſed to make his bed himſelf; he uſed to fetch his dinner out of the kitchen and carry it to his room; and, after he had dined, carried it back to his kitchen. In a word he employed his ſervants in nothing but in dreſſing his victuals for him, and going up and down the town, and for ſuch things as he himſelf was abſolutely unable to do (47). In fine, to make choice of one particular (which will be thought ſingular enough) among the ſeveral maxims of Paſcal, which doubtleſs will appear forced to worldly people; I muſt obſerve, that he did not approve of a man's employing theſe expreſſions, I have ſaid, I have done, &c. See the laſt remark.

[H] He was . . . . . irreconcileable with regard to the Rebels.] " He was ſo zealous for the glory of " God, that he could not ſuffer it to be violated in " any reſpect: this made him ſo exceſſively zealous " for his Majeſty's ſervice, that he reſiſted every per- " ſon during the time of the commotions in Paris; " and ever afterwards gave the name of Pretences to " all the reaſons which were given to extenuate the " guilt of that rebellion; and uſed to ſay, that in a " State ſettled in the form of a Commonwealth, as " Venice for inſtance, it was a great crime to at- " tempt to introduce a monarchical Government " there, and oppreſs the liberty of the people, which " providence had indulged them; but that in a State, " in which the regal power is eſtabliſhed, it would " be a kind of ſacrilege for any perſon to attempt to " violate the reverence due to it; ſince it is not only " an image of the Almighty's power, but a partici- " pation of that ſame power, which no perſon could " oppoſe without oppoſing manifeſtly the order of " Heaven; and therefore no one could ſufficiently " aggravate the greatneſs of this fault; not to men- " tion that it is ever accompanied with civil war, " which is the greateſt crime that can be committed " in oppoſition to the love we owe our neighbour; " and he obſerved this maxim with ſo much ſincerity, " that he refuſed at that time ſome conſiderable ad- " vantages which were offered him, that he might " not infringe it. It was uſual for him to ſay, that " he had as great an abhorrence for this crime, as " for aſſaſſination, or robbing on the highway: in " a word, that nothing was more repugnant than " this to his diſpoſition, or expoſed him to fewer " temptations. Such were his ſentiments with re- " gard to his Majeſty's ſervice, and he was irrecon- " cileable with reſpect to all thoſe who oppoſed it; " and, a circumſtance that ſhewed this was not ow-

(35) Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 44.

(36) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, for Dec. 1684, in the catalogue of new books, num. 2.

(37) Mr. Chappuzeau, in his Theatre, obſerves that there has been a martyr among the Players; and that St. Geneſt, whoſe feſtival the church celebrates the 31ſt of Auguſt, ended his life by a glorious tragedy.

(38) Futerieriana, p. 144. Dutch edit.

(39) Bouchet, Sérée 33. p. 224. Lions edit. of 1618, 8vo.

(40) Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 22.

(41) Ibid. p. 25.

(42) Ibid. p. 34.

(43) Ibid. p. 35.

(44) Ibid. p. 32.

(45) Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 41.

(46) Ibid.

(47) Ibid. p. 19.

aged thirty nine years and two months * (e). He had employed a long time in composing a work againſt Atheiſts, and all thoſe who do not admit the truth of the Goſpel. He did not live years ſufficient to give him an opportunity of digeſting the materials he was collecting: ſuch of them as were found among his papers, have been publiſhed and admired. He therein has ſet a thought of Arnobius in a moſt beautiful light [I], viz. that thoſe who believe the exiſtence of a God may be eternally happy, if they are in the right, and

* Perrrault's Hommes illuſtri, Tom. 1. p. 22. Paris 1701, 12mo. might have mentioned the two months he only giving 39 years, as Paſcal's age.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(e) Extracted from his Life, written by Mrs. Perier, his ſiſter. This Life is prefixed to the Amſterdam edition (1684) of Paſcal's thoughts.

" ing to diſpoſition, or a fondneſs for his own opi" nions, is, his behaving with the utmoſt mildneſs
" towards thoſe who did him any particular injury:
" ſo that he never made any diſtinction between
" ſuch perſons and the reſt of the world; and for-
" got ſo entirely whatever related only to himſelf,
" that he could ſcarce ever remember any ſuch par" ticulars; and, to make him do this, people were " forced to mention the circumſtances of them (48).
" And as this behaviour uſed ſometimes to be ad-
" mired in him, he would ſay; don't wonder at it;
" it is no virtue in me, but real forgetfulneſs; I
" have not the leaſt idea of what you ſpeak to me
" about. Nevertheleſs, we manifeſtly perceive by " this, that ſuch injuries as related merely to his per-
" ſon, made little impreſſion on him, ſince he for-
" got them ſo eaſily; for his memory was ſo excel" lent, that he uſed to ſay, he had never forgot any " particular he was deſirous of remembring (49)."
If this circumſtance, and the reſt I have related, are true, it muſt be confeſſed that Paſcal was a prodigy; and, if I might be ſo bold as to employ an expreſſion, I would call him a paradoxical individuum of the human ſpecies. He deſerves more to have it doubted, whether he was born of a woman, than that Sicilian Philoſopher on whom Lucretius beſtows this encomium.

(48) We therefore may apply to him, what Cicero in Orat. pro Ligario ſub fin. ſays Cæſar, qui obliviſci nihil ſoles præter injurias; " that he " forgot nothing " but injuries."

(49) Mrs. Perier, vie de Paſcal, p. 36.

Nil tamen hoc habuiſſe viro præclarius in ſe,
Nec ſanctum magis, & mirum, carumque videtur.
Carmina quinetiam divini pectoris ejus
Vociferantur & exponunt præclara reperta;
Ut vix humana videatur ſtirpe creatus 50).

(50) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 730.

That is,

" This iſle, tho' with ſuch wondrous ſights as theſe
" Doth call forth travellers, and the curious pleaſe,
" Is rich with men and fruit, hath rarely ſhown
" A thing more glorious than this ſingle one.
" His verſe compos'd of nature's works declare " His wit was ſtrong, and his invention rare;
" His judgment deep and ſound, whence ſome began,
" And juſtly too, to think him more than man."

CREECH.

One circumſtance may leſſen our wonder at the hatred he bore to the mutineers, viz. there breaking out, in France, in his time, one of the moſt unjuſt wars that was ever known; ſuch a war as was moſt prejudicial to Monarchy. At the ſight of the terrible conſequences of the ſedition, which the Pariſians raiſed in 1648, in order to reſtore ſome Magiſtrates to their liberty; every man of probity and honour muſt neceſſarily have inſurrections in the utmoſt deteſtation; and argue much after the manner of Balzac, or even with leſs regard for the Prince of Conde, the fatal Chief of the Rebellion (51). People, ſays he (52), began to take courage again, ſince the raiſing the ſiege of Cognac; and we are not now under ſo many apprehenſions with regard to our Province: however, ſhould a peace be concluded to morrow, this ſhort war will leave behind it a long remembrance of the evils it occaſioned. States are to be reformed and governed after this manner, thrice happy are the States which are left in confuſion and diſorder! Mr. Ablancourt's hero was alſo mine; but we have an equal abhorrence of the civil war; and cannot even forgive Julius Cæſar for it, though we tranſlate his Commentaries. By the way, Paſcal's friends glory very much in their having adhered to the Doctrine which condemns Rebellion. See what Arnauld (53) has cited, from the ſecond Tome of the Moral Eſſays.

(51) That is, the war to which the Barricades (), of 1648, gave occaſion inſenſibly. [ The commotions raiſed by the Leaguers in Paris.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(52) Balzac, Letter 25 to Conrart, Liv. 2. p. m. 148, 149. The other is dated 20 Nov. 1651.

(53) Arnauld, Apologie pour les Catholiq. part 1. chap. 11. p. 136.

[I] . . . . a thought of Arnobius.] This Father confeſſes to the Heathens, that the promiſes of Chriſt cannot be proved, ſince they relate to a future happineſs; but he adds, that when two uncertain things are propoſed, it is better to make choice of that which gives us hopes, than of that which gives us none. But the ſtrength of his reaſon will be clearer in the original. Sed & ipſe (Chriſtus) quæ pollicetur, non probat. Ita eſt. Nulla enim, ut dixi, futurorum poteſt exiſtere comprobatio. Cum ergo hæc ſit conditio futurorum, ut teneri & comprehendi nullius poſſint anticipationis attactu; nonne purior ratio eſt, ex duobus incertis, & in ambigua expectatione pendentibus, id potius credere, quod aliquas ſpes ferat, quam omnino quod nullas? In illo enim periculi nihil eſt, ſi quod dicitur imminere, caſſum fiat & vacuum; in hoc damnum eſt maximum, id eſt ſalutis amiſſio, ſi cum tempus advenerit, aperiatur non fuiſſe mendacium (54). Paſcal unfolds this reflection very well; and employs ſucceſsfully the proportions between a wager, and the hazard of winning or loſing, which makes the wager prudent. See chap. 6. * of his thoughts (55). [The following advertiſement is prefixed to this chapter. Moſt of the particulars in this chapter relate only to a certain ſort of perſons, who not being convinced of the proofs of religion, and ſtill leſs of the reaſons offered by Atheiſts, continue in a ſtate of ſuſpence between faith and infidelity. The Author's intention is only to ſhew them, from their own principles, and the mere light of reaſon, that they ought to conclude it would be of advantage for them to believe; and that they ought to do this, if this choice depended on their will. Hence it follows, that they ſhould, at leaſt till ſuch time as they have diſcovered light ſufficient to convince themſelves of this truth, uſe their utmoſt endeavours to incline themſelves to it; and diſengage themſelves from all ſuch obſtacles as divert them from this faith, the principal of which are the paſſions and vain amuſements] †. The thoughts of Paſcal were printed in 1669, and accompanied with ſeveral approbations, which are ſo many elogiums of them. Eight years after a book was publiſhed (56), in which this reaſoning of Paſcal was enforced with great ſtrength, and in a very ample manner. The Author had been little affected with the critique of Paſcal's deſign, made by Father Bouhours's Apologiſt, who concludes his cenſure with the critique of the following paſſage from Paſcal. " It is certain that God is, or is not;
" there is no medium, but there is an infinite chaos
" (diſtance) between theſe two extremes. A man
" plays a game, conſidering this infinite diſtance, at " croſs or pile; what will you gain by it? You can" not ſay, by the dictates of reaſon, that God is;
" and you cannot deny, by the dictates of reaſon, that
" he is not. Do not therefore blame thoſe of falſity,
" who have made a choice; for you know not whe-
" ther they are in the wrong, or have made an ill
" choice. No (will you ſay,) but I blame them for " having made a choice, not for this choice; and
" he who gueſſes croſs, or the other who calls for " pile, are both in the wrong. Yes (would I reply;)
" but a wager muſt be laid; this is not at our opti-
" on; and not to lay a wager that God is, is to lay
" that he is not. Which ſide will you take? Let " us weigh the loſs and gain, by chooſing to believe " that God is. If you win, you win all; if you
" loſe, you loſe nothing. If you ſay that it is un-
" certain whether you will win, but that it is cer" tain you riſk the pleaſures of this life, which you
" ſtake; and that the infinite diſtance there is be" tween the certainty which you riſk, and the uncer-
" tainty of what you would win, equals the finite
" good which you certainly venture, to the infinite
" which is uncertain: this is not the caſe; every
" gameſter riſks with certainty, to win with uncer-
" tainty, without acting repugnantly to reaſon (57)."
Here follows the manner in which the Critique has refuted this. Hold your tongue (Paſchaſius;) I loſe all patience to hear you treat the moſt exalted ſubject in the world, and ground the moſt important of all truths, (the principle

(54) Arnobius, adverſus Gentes, lib. 2. p. m. 44.

* It is the 7th chapter.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(55) It is intitled, That it is more advantageous to believe, than to disbelieve what the Chriſtian religion teaches.

† Penſees de Mr. Paſcal, &c. p. 39, 40. Paris 1686, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.

(56) Intitled, A religious treatiſe againſt Methodiſts, Deiſts, and the modern Scepticks. Printed at Paris by Lambert Roulland, 1677, 12mo.

(57) L'Abbe de Villars, traite de la Delicateſſe, Dialogue 5. p. 115, 116. Dutch edit.

and cannot be no loſers if they happen to be miſtaken; but an Atheiſt gains no advantage, if he ſhould be in the right, and makes himſelf eternally miſerable if he is miſtaken. Paſcal's Lettres Provinciales † have always paſt, and are ſtill looked upon as a maſterpiece [K]. Some Authors have erroneouſly denied, that thoſe Letters have been condemned principle of all truths) upon ſo low, ſo childiſh an idea; in a compariſon drawn from toſſing up croſs or pile, as being more apt to excite laughter than perſuade; and upon an argument that is ſo defective, and grounded on uncertain, and perhaps entirely falſe foundations. I will not ſay, that you at firſt laid down a thing which was not becoming a wiſe man; and I know not with what conſcience you could ſay to a Free-thinker, that we cannot, from the dictates of reaſon, affirm that there is a God. I know many people who would be greatly ſhocked to hear you make ſo horrid an aſſertion; and who would not venture a wager on the theology of the director, who permits you to employ theſe forms of ſpeech. Yet this were ſomething, if your moral reaſon were good; but, to the ſhame be it ſpoken both of his theology, and your morality, it concludes nothing; becauſe its whole force depends on the truth of the following propoſition, that every gameſter hazards with certainty, to win with uncertainty, without acting repugnantly to reaſon. Really, Paſchaſius, was exiſtence of the Deity as doubtful as this propoſition, we ſhould be in a wretched condition. All fathers and huſbands, who will not permit their wives or children to play, would be rank Atheiſts; and would obſtinately aſſert, that it is very irrational for a man to venture money, which he has certainly in his pocket, and with which he can ſpend life with comfort, to gain an uncertain ſum; and run the hazard, as often happens, of loſing both. But I was informed that you are a great enemy to looſe Caſuiſts: whence comes it to paſs, that you not only do not condemn gaming, but that you are for making Religion and the Deity depend on the game of croſs or pile (58)? This is a weak confutation, and does not deſerve to be examined. It ſuffices that I refer the Reader to the above-cited chapter in Paſcal, and to the Writer who made a fine Paraphraſe on it eight years after. [It may not be improper to hear Mr. de Voltaire on this occaſion. " It is evidently falſe " to ſay, that not to lay that God is, is to lay that " he is not. For he who doubts, and deſires to be " enlightned, certainly does not lay for or againſt. " Beſides, this article ſeems a little indecent and " childiſh; the idea of gaming, of loſs and gain, " is not ſuitable to the gravity of the ſubject. Farther, the intereſt I have to believe a thing, is not " a proof of the exiſtence of that thing. I will give " you (you ſay) the empire of the world, if I believe " that you are in the right. In this caſe, I ſincerely " wiſh you may be in the right; however, till you " have proved this to me, I cannot believe you. " Begin (might we ſay to Mr. Paſcal) by convincing " my reaſon. It is doubtleſs my intereſt that there " ſhould be a God; but if God, according to your " ſyſtem, came only for a few perſons; if the number of the elect is ſo ſmall, that the thought of it " quite terrifies; if I am not able to do any thing " of myſelf, tell me, pray, what intereſt I have to " believe you? Is it not evidently my intereſt to be " perſuaded of the contrary? With what face dare " you point out to me a ſtate of infinite felicity, to " which ſcarce one man out of a million has a right " to aſpire. If you are deſirous of convincing me, " ſtate this, I beſeech you, in a different manner; " and do not firſt ſpeak to me of games of chance, " of wagering, of croſs and pile; and afterwards " terrify me by the thorns you raiſe in that way " which I will, and ought to follow. Your reaſoning would have no other effect, but to make men " Atheiſts, if the voice of univerſal nature did not cry " aloud that there is a God, as ſtrongly, in proportion, as theſe reaſonings are weak *.] I ſhall make but one obſervation, whence it will be concluded, that Father Bouhours's friend failed either in accuracy or equity. He conſiders as a ſcandalous aſperſion, repugnant to wiſdom and conſcience, and deſerving the thundering rebuke of a worthy director, the following words of Paſcal, You cannot ſay, by the dictates of reaſon, that God exiſts. He ſuppoſes that this is confeſſing to a Free-thinker, that one cannot affirm, by the dictates of reaſon, that God exiſts. But this is a very falſe explication. Paſcal does not acknowledge ſuch a propoſition: he only will not combat with it, and take advantage of it, in order to reclaim Atheiſts. It is as plain as the ſun, that the words which Paſcal addreſſes to the Free-thinkers, amount to theſe that follow: You aſſert, that by the dictates of reaſon, you cannot ſay, that God exiſts. [It is not ſurprizing, that a man who had enriched his mind with ſuch variety of fine ſpeculations, and invented ſo many curious things, ſhould have ſhewn ſo much ſolidity and juſtneſs in his thoughts; but it is ſurprizing he ſhould have writ in ſo polite a ſtyle, and with ſo great a purity, as is ſeldom equalled by thoſe, whoſe talent and chief application is confined merely to the choice and order of the words. This is ſeen in the collection of his thoughts, which have been conſidered, by the whole world, as a prodigy of knowledge, penetration, and good ſenſe: but particularly in a certain work written by him, on occaſion of a diſpute that broke out in the Sorbonne **.]

† He was not known to be the Author of them till after his death.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

 Perrault, Hommes illuſtres, p. 218. Paris 1701, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.

[K] The Lettres Provinciales . . . . . have always paſt, and are ſtill looked upon as a maſter-piece.] See the applauſes which Perrault has beſtowed on this work (59). [The ABBOT. I could oppoſe to them (to Lucian and Cicero) ſeveral Authors who excel in the writing of dialogues; but ſhall content myſelf with producing only one, I mean the illuſtrious Mr. Paſchal, with his eighteen Lettres Provinciales. Among a million of men who have read them, it may be affirmed, that they have not tired ſo much as one. The CHEVALIER. I have read them above ten times; and though I am naturally impatient, yet I was always pleaſed with the longeſt. The ABBOT. Throughout the whole, there appears a purity in the diction, a grandeur in the thoughts, a ſolidity in the arguments, a delicacy in the raillery; and, in every part, a beauty which is ſeldom found in other Authors. The PRESIDENT. I confeſs, that the letters in queſtion are gay and diverting; but would you compare eighteen ſmall ſheets with the Dialogues of Plato, Lucian, and Cicero, which compoſe ſeveral large volumes? The ABBOT. The number and bulk of the volumes are nothing to the purpoſe: for, if there be more wit in theſe eighteen Letters than in Plato's Dialogues; more delicate and artful raillery than in thoſe of Lucian, but a raillery of a chaſte kind; if there be more ſtrength and art in the reaſoning than thoſe of Cicero; in fine, if we therein find the whole art of dialogue-writing, ought not the ſmalleſt of their ſize draw on them commendation rather than diſpraiſe? Let us confeſs the truth: we have not any thing more beautiful in this ſpecies of writing. Have you ſeen the Latin Verſion, which has been made of them? The PRESIDENT. I have, and think it very beautiful. The CHEVALIER. Did it pleaſe you as much as the original? The PRESIDENT. Equally the ſame. The CHEVALIER. I am very glad of it. In your opinion, Lucian's Dialogues in Greek are wonderfully witty, but flat and inſipid in Ablancourt's tranſlation; whereas you judge the Lettres Provinciales are equally agreeable in Latin and French; whence you muſt confeſs that I have clearly ſhewn you to be prepoſſeſſed *.] The Lettres Provinciales determined the beſt pens in France, among the Jeſuits, to refute thoſe letters, in a book (60) which was ſuppreſſed in France as ſoon as it was publiſhed, viz. in 1694, and which the Dutch booksellers reprinted. Of the great number of volumes which have been publiſhed againſt the Jeſuits, there is not one which has done them more prejudice, or vexed them more, than the Lettres au Provincial *. They have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages. Mr. Nicolle, under the fictitious name of William Wendrockius, a Divine of Straſburg tranſlated them into Latin, and added ſome notes and diſſertations (61). Other writers tranſlated them into Engliſh, Italian (62), and Spaniſh (63). I have ſeen an edition of them in 8vo, in four columns, in French and Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh; two columns in one page, and two in another; ſo that when the book was opened, the four pages were ſeen at once.

(59) In Tom. 2. of Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes.

* Parallele des Anciens, &c. p. 295 & ſeq. Paris 1693. Note, this whole work conſiſts of imaginary dialogues between a Preſident, a Chevalier, and an Abbot.] Addit. by the Tranſl.

(60) Intitled, Reponſe aux Lettres Provinciales de L. de Montalte, ou Entretiens de Cleandre & d'Eudoxe. See the extract of it in the hiſtory of the works of the learned, Nov. 1694. p. 113 & ſeq.

* That is as much as to ſay, Letters to a Peaſant.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

Here follows ſome collections, which will ſhew the opinion that is entertained of the late anſwer of the Jeſuits to the Lettres Provinciales; the effect it produced; and the ſeveral particulars which relate to the

(61) See the article NICOLLE, remark [B].

(62) Coſimo Brunetti, a Florentine Gentleman, gave the Italian verſion.

(63) Gratian Cordero, de Burgos, is the Author of the Spaniſh tranſlation.

(58) Ibid. p. 116.

* Lettres philoſophiques, par Mr. de V . . . . p. 143, 144. Rouen, Chez Ioré Libraire, 1734.

demned by any decrees [L]. It was publiſhed that Paſcal, during his laſt ſickneſs, deteſted the work in queſtion, and repented his having been a Janſeniſt (f); but this report was (f) See the cloſe of the rem. [M].

the hiſtory of thoſe two books. " At the end of forty years, there aroſe from the aſhes of ſo many baffled apologies, a new apology for the extravagancies of the Caſuiſts; an apology, ſo much the more dangerous, as the Author conceals with greater art his aim and deſign; and has employed all the ornaments and artifices which his rhetoric could ſuggeſt, in order to blind and miſlead his Readers. We are well informed, that it was printed againſt the advice of father de la Chaiſe; againſt the expreſs command of the late Archbiſhop of Paris, and againſt all the cuſtomary laws. It has been diſperſed with great profuſion and the utmoſt zeal, and been tranſlated into Latin by one of the ableſt pens of the ſociety. They got an Italian verſion of it to be made by another; and, by theſe various methods, the editions of it have been multiplied, and the world ſtocked with it. The impreſſions, which they have cauſed to be made of it in France, Holland, Flanders, &c. and the care with which they recommended it, and cauſed it to be brought up by their devotees of both ſexes, give juſt reaſon to fear that this book has already made much havock, in an age in which a looſe morality is but too much encouraged. It was hoped that the Holy See would not permit a work of ſo dangerous a tendency to paſs unpuniſhed; but the multitude of affairs of importance, which have been tranſacting for ſome time in Rome, muſt have made them ſuſpend the examination of a book that is filled with a great number of facts and citations, the examining the truth of which will take up a great deal of time (64)." Theſe are the words of the anonymous Author (65), who refuted the anſwer to the Lettres Provinciales, or dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus. Thus he ſpeaks in his dedication. Here follows that part of his preface. " The dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus, which are ſaid to be writ by Father Daniel, are the Society's laſt ſtake or ſhift. Almoſt half an age was required to produce ſuch a maſter-piece, and to form workmen; and, the inſtant it appeared in the world, the acclamations which they made every where, plainly ſhewed that this was the Prophet, whoſe coming they expected; and his work, the ſalvation of the Jeſuits. If they had flattered themſelves that they ſhould draw the public into the like ſentiments of eſteem, and to force them, by the ſparkling eloqence of this new defence, to declare againſt Paſcal, it is not my buſineſs to ſay, whether or no they have been miſtaken. Nevertheleſs, I myſelf am greatly out, if, notwithſtanding this late effort, the Lettres Provinciales will not be, in all ages, the delight of men of wit, and an almoſt inimitable original. With regard to Wendrockius, the illuſtrious defender of them, his book will be, to lateſt poſterity, a ſovereign antedote againſt the poiſon of corrupt morality; a book in which the moſt important principles of all Chriſtian morality are eſtabliſhed and defended in the moſt agreeable, as well as ſolid manner; and ſuch an apology for the Lettres Provinciales, as it will be impoſſible for the ſociety of the Jeſuits ever to weaken." I believe, I may venture to affirm, that tho' Father Daniel's piece were more ingenious, and the reaſonings ſtronger, than thoſe found in it, it yet would not make the admirers of the Lettres Provinciales change their opinion. Read, on this ſubject, the words of a Writer, who was of a critical turn of mind, and very much prompted to dip his pen in gall, which are inſerted in one of his collections. There was lately publiſhed, ſays he (66), an anſwer to the Lettres Provinciales, which pretends to quite demoliſh them; and which, nevertheleſs, will not do them much harm. How can this be? The reaſon of it is, that, altho' this anſwer evidently ſhews the horrid injuſtice, the abominable ſlanders, and the injurious falſities, with which all theſe letters are interſperſed, againſt one of the moſt famous Societies that maintain the intereſts of the church; nevertheleſs, they have ſo long, by the pleaſant and facetious touches with which they are interſperſed, got the laughers of all denominations on their ſide, that they have acquired ſuch a credit and authority, as it will be difficult to diveſt them of. It will be to no purpoſe for the Jeſuits to do conſiderable ſervices to the church and the public . . . great numbers of people will read, nevertheleſs, with an eaſy credulity, the Lettres Provinciales, and will not ſo much as ſee, or even hear the leaſt mention made of the anſwer. It muſt indeed be confeſſed, that prejudice, on this occaſion, is a very unjuſt, very cruel, and very obſtinate judgment; ſince (tho' theſe letters have been condemned by Popes, Biſhops, Divines, and burnt by the hands of the Executioner, purſuant to arrets of Parliament, and the Council of State) they yet have taken ſuch deep root in people's minds, that they reſiſt all thoſe powers. It is certain, that the zeal of the Anti-Moliniſts, in favour of the Lettres Provinciales, is revived ſince Father Daniel publiſhed his anſwer. They have reprinted them with a new Appendix (67), and beſtowed great application on this occaſion. Read the following paſſage. " You know that the late Mr. Nicole had publiſhed, under the name of Wendrock, a Latin tranſlation of the Lettres Provinciales, with very large notes by him. This work was lately tranſlated into French, and, as is pretended, by a Lady of Paris. It was printed at Lions in three volumes, 12mo. The Court having information of this, the King gave orders that all the copies ſhould be ſeized: which order was executed with great noiſe, but without ſucceſs. The officers went to the houſes of the partners of Sieur Aniſſon, ſuſpected to have printed that work, who, as we are told, had early notice enough given for them to carry off all the copies; ſo that not one was found. Some are ſeen here (in Paris) which now ſell for nine livres; that is, double the price for which they were ſold for before. To the firſt volume an advertiſement is prefixed, in which the Author ſays, that he was prompted to undertake this verſion, becauſe that Father Daniel's dialogues, that were publiſhed in 1694, againſt the Lettres Provinciales, attack an Author in French, who wrote in Latin; and that it is proper the whole world ſhould be enabled to judge of this diſpute. Afterwards comes a hiſtory of the Lettres Provinciales, which is little more than Wendrock's four Latin prefaces. At the concluſion, an account is given of the cabal or intrigue, carried on in Bourdeaux, in order to incite the Parliament to condemn Wendrock's letters (68)."

(64) The dedication to the apology for the Lettres Provinciales of Lewis de Montalte, p. 8. Roan edit. 1697.

(65) He is ſuppoſed to be Petitdidier, a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Vannes.

(66) Richelet, the moſt beautiful French letters on all ſorts of ſubjects, Tom. 2. p. 322, 323. Amſterdam edit. 1698. He informs us, that Mr. Bordellon is the Author of the letter whence this paſſage is extracted.

(67) See Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for Aug. 1699, p. 202.

[L] Some Authors have erroneouſly denied, that the Lettres Provinciales have been condemned by any decrees.] A Proteſtant Miniſter having aſſerted, That the cenſure of the morality of the Jeſuits, written by the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, the Lettres Provinciales, and the reſt of the books which cenſured that deteſtable ſyſtem of morality, had been burnt and torn to pieces by the common hangman (69), the following anſwer was made him. " But whither is Mr. Jurieu ſtraying? For, beſides that we do not know, that any cenſure of the morality of the Jeſuits, written by the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, has been burnt; and that it is falſe, in general, that the hangman burnt and tore to pieces the reſt of the books which cenſured that morality, or even the Lettres Provinciales; tho' all this were true, this would have been done merely by the ſecular arm, and not by the authority of the church; and conſequently the church ought not to be reflected upon on that account (70)." The Author who writes theſe words, is Abbot Richard, who is a very good friend of the Janſeniſts. [This Abbot Richard is the late Father Gerberon, a man incapable of owning certain facts, tho' known univerſally, when they were of prejudice to the party he eſpouſed *.] How could Abbot Richard be ignorant of the fate of the Lettres Provinciales, in a point of ſuch great importance? Ought he to have neglected, to ſo great a degree, the writings which the Jeſuits oppoſed to that in queſtion? Did it become him, to have never once looked into the arret of the Parliament of Aix, which they printed at the end of their anſwers to the Lettres Provinciales? The tenor of the decree is as follows: " The Court having heard the report of " the Commiſſioners, who have ſeen and examined " the

(68) Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, for January 1700, p. 113.

(69) Jurieu, Prejugez, Tom. 1. p. 387.

(70) Critique des Prejugez de Mr. Jurieu, p. 304.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 970.

was found falſe [M] ; however, it cannot be denied but that here were ſome diviſions between him and the Gentlemen of Port-Royal [N]. I forgot to obſerve, that it was from " the ſaid letters, and having peruſed them, has de" clared and declares them diffamatory, ſlanderous,

" and pernicious to the public : and therefore enacts,
" that they ſhall be delivered to the Executioner, to
" be, by him, burnt on the pillory in Preacher's Square,
" in this city of Aix ; and prohibits and forbids all
" Bookſellers and Printers, to put them any more
" to preſs, or any treatiſe of the like ſubjects ; and
" all Bookſellers and others, of what condition or " quality ſoever, to keep, vend, or put off, any of " them, upon pain of corporal puniſhment ; and en-
" joins them to ſend, without delay, to the Regiſter's
" Office, there to be ſuppreſſed, under the ſame pe" nalty ; ordains that the tranſgreſſors ſhall be in" formed againſt by the Chief Judge-Royal, or Uſher
" of the Court ; to the end that the informations be" ing lodged, the perſons ſo offending, may be pro-
" ſecuted, upon the declaration of the abovementi-
" oned penalties ; and in order that no perſon may
" plead ignorance, the preſent Arret ſhall be read
" and publiſhed by ſound of trumpet, in all and eve" ry the places and croſs-ſtreets of the city of Aix.
" GIVEN at the Parliament of Provence, ſitting in " Aix, and publiſhed at the Bar the ninth of Febru" ary, one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſeven (71)."
The Author of the hiſtory of Janſenius's five propo-ſitions, informs us (72), that, among the ſeveral works of Port-Royal, two of the moſt conſiderable are thoſe which were publiſhed in Latin ; the one, under the name of Paulus Irenæus, to juſtify Janſenius in denying the fact ; the other under the name of Wendrockius, which contained a Latin verſion of the Lettres Provinciales, with notes or diſſertations by the ſame Author, who is known to be Mr. Nicolle. Theſe two books being put into the hands (in order for their being examined by the King's order) of thirteen Doctors of the Faculty of Paris, whereof four were Biſhops, and moſt of the others Profeſſors of Divinity, were ſentenced to be burnt by a decree of the Council of State, made on the opinion of theſe thirteen Cenſors, the words whereof are as follow : " We
" whoſe names are underwritten being deputed by
" the King's Order, to give our judgment with re" gard to a book, intitled, Lettres Provinciales de
" Louis de Montalte, &c. after having examined it
" with care, do certify, that the Heretical principles
" of Janſenius, which the church has condemned,
" are maintained and defended in them ; and that " not only in theſe letters, but alſo in the Notes of
" William Wendrock, and the Enquiries of Paulus Ire-
" næus annexed to them. . . . We farther teſtify,
" that theſe three Authors have ſo natural a propen-
" ſion to ſlander and inſolence, that . . . . and there" fore that this book deſerves the penalties, which " are decreed by the laws againſt diffamatory and he-" retical libels. Given at Paris this 7th of Septem" ber, 1660." Now I leave the Reader to judge, if the Critique made by the Proteſtant Miniſter is excuſable, in his denying a thing ſupported by ſuch facts.

(71) Reſponſes aux Lettres Provinciales, p. 517, 518. Liege edit. 1658.

(72) Hiſtory of the five Propoſitions, Liv. 3. p. 175, 176.

[M] It was publiſhed . . . that Paſcal . . . repented his having been a Janſeniſt, but this report was found falſe.] Here follows a paſſage, extracted from a letter of Father Bouhours to a Nobleman of the Court, in 1668. " Who does not now know that Mr.
" Paſcal is author of the Lettres Provinciales, and " that he was engaged in the party at the time that " he wrote ? Should any perſon doubt ſo certain a " truth as this, it would be eaſy to convince him
" of it by the teſtimony of Paſcal himſelf, whom
" we know, from good hands *, abjured Janſeniſm,
" at his death (73)." The Janſeniſts aſſerted, that Paſcal had not made any ſuch abjuration. Read thoſe words of the anſwer, which they made to the Archbiſhop of Ambrun's apology : they refer to a writing in which this fact was refuted by convincing proofs. Neither is it neceſſary to overthrow, in particular, all that has been refuted elſewhere by treatiſes written profeſſedly on that account, as what he aſcribes to Paſcal, on a pretended atteſtation of the Pariſh-Prieſt of St. Stephen, viz. of his having abjured the principles of Janſenius, the falſity of which has been proved by convincing proofs, which make

* This is atteſted by a writing, ſigned by the pariſh-prieſt of St. Stephen du Mont, who was with Mr. Paſcal in his expiring moments. This piece is in the hands of the Archbiſhop of Paris.

(73) Letter to a Nobleman of the Court, p. 21, 22. Paris edit. 1669, 4to.

the ſubject of a letter printed after the refutation of Father Anat's piece, on Monſieur d'Alet's Mandate (74). Father Bouhours having inſerted his letter in a collection of tracts, publiſhed by him at Paris in 1684, ſtruck out every thing relating to that abjuration. This ſhews that he was convinced that it was falſe : and yet he had aſſerted this particular, in very poſitive terms, in his firſt edition, and referred to an authentick proof. What man would not, after this, have been catched ?

(74) Pieces ſur le Nouveau Teſtament de Mons, Tom. 1. p. 498. Colen. edit. 1669, 8vo.

Cornelius Hazart, the Jeſuit, in the anſwer to the caſe of Janſenius's relations, affirmed, that the Lettres Provinciales were retracted and deteſted by the author of them, when he was going to give an account of his actions to his ſaviour (75). He is anſwered in the following manner. " Another falſity, altogether as
" groſs, is, that Paſcal, before he died, retracted
" and deteſted the Lettres Provinciales. 'Tis the bu-
" ſineſs of the Jeſuits, who have aſſerted this in their
" Theſes, and ſpread ſuch a report in the publick,
" to exhibit proofs of it. 'Tis now above twenty " years ſince it has been ſhewn, by a written tract
" which is unanſwered, that what Paſcal had ſaid
" to his confeſſor, in his laſt ſickneſs, concerning a
" ſmall difference or diſpute between himſelf and " his friends, had been taken in a wrong ſenſe by
" the confeſſor in queſtion, as he himſelf has ſince
" owned ; but an undoubted circumſtance is, that
" this did not relate in any manner to the Lettres
" Provinciales." Theſe are Arnauld's words, which we may believe to be very true, ſince a writer (a friend to the Jeſuits) has obſerved (76), that Paſcal, who had changed his opinion with regard to the chief matters in Lettres Provinciales, and who could not doubt but that he was obliged to make a publick recantation in that reſpect, to undeceive thoſe, whom his letters had drawn, or might draw over, hereafter, to his firſt opinion . . (77), never attempted to inform the publick of this, not even in his dying moments, though he had time ſufficient for that purpoſe. [" Paſcal, ſtrictly ſpeaking, never was " a Janſeniſt. His ſiſter, who was not ſparing of " her encomiums on him, in his life written by
" her, owns * that he had never applied himſelf to cu- " rious queſtions in Divinity. This ſhews that he, like " many others, was a Janſeniſt from inclination and " prejudice, without knowing very diſtinctly what " Janſenius's doctrine was. His brethren at Port-
" Royal who had employed him, and for whom his " pen had done very good ſervices, were at laſt ob" liged to confeſs, that all his knowledge in Divinity
" was compriſed in the Memoirs which they them-
" ſelves had furniſhed him with." See the cloſe of the following remark †].

(76) Abbé du Mas, Hiſtory of the five Propoſitions, p. 202.

(77) Ibid. p. 203.

* See the remark [B] above.

† From the remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. 970.

[N] There were ſome diviſions between him, and the Gentlemen of Port-Royal.] We find by the hiſtory of the five propoſitions, that this difference related to two points, viz. on the ſigning of the formulary, and the variations of which he accuſed the Janſeniſts.

I. He had ſaid in his 17th and 18th letters, that there was no diſpute (78) about the right, but only about the fact, and that, with reſpect to the right, he thought himſelf bound to ſubmit to the Pope's deciſion (79). " But ſome time after he went over to " the oppoſite extreme, viz. to believe that the
" ſenſe of Janſenius, which he did not diſtinguiſh
" from Grace efficacious in itſelf, had been really
" condemned by the conſtitutions of the Popes : that " it was nevertheleſs a truth in point of faith, which " we are not allowed to abandon ; that the Popes
" therefore, in condemning it, had been miſtaken,
" not with regard to the fact, but to the right, or
" doctrine itſelf. Hence Paſcal concluded, that it
" was impoſſible, on this occaſion, to ſeparate the " fact from the right doctrine : that with reſpect to
" the ſubſcribing of thoſe who defended Janſenius, it
" was fallacious, unleſs they proteſted expreſsly, that
" they would not condemn this ſenſe ; and, in fine,
" that they could not, in conſcience, do otherwiſe.
" This is borrowed partly from a piece of Mr. Paſ-
" cal, and partly from the anſwers which the Di-
" vines of Port-Royal wrote againſt it. He drew up

(78) Ibid. p. 195.

(79) Ibid. p. 196. See this thing turned in a different manner in the Hiſtory of Janſeniſm, Tom. 2. p. 515. ad ann. 1661.

from him the Janſeniſts learned to denote themſelves by the Particle on [O]. [A French writer ſpeaks of him as follows. The frequent indiſpoſitions, or rather the perpetual illneſs with which he was afflicted during the four laſt years of his life, put his patience to the moſt ſevere trial. If we examine all the circumſtances of his life, we muſt confeſs that he was a wonderful man upon a great many accounts. His application to fine ſpeculations, the delicacy of his conſtitution, and eſpecially the auſterities he practiſed in the latter part of his life, contributed

" that piece, on occaſion of ſubſcribing the formu-
" lary of the aſſembly (80) by the Nuns of Port-
" Royal. In ſigning of it they ſaid ; We embrace
" ſincerely, and with all our hearts, all the deciſions,
" made by their Holineſſes (Alexander VII. and Pope
" Innocent X.) with regard to the faith, and reject all
" ſuch errors as they judged contrary to it : but they " did not add expreſsly, that they excepted the ſenſe
" of Janſenius. They ſuppoſed that they had ex-
" cepted it ſufficiently, and had not deviated from
" it ; becauſe they excuſed themſelves, in their ſub-
" ſcribing, from teſtifying any thing elſe but the
" purity of their faith ; whereby they tacitly intimated,
" that they ſaid nothing with reſpect to the fact of " Janſenius. Nevertheleſs Paſcal began, not only
" freely to blame that ſubſcribing, but even drew up a
" piece, in which he pretended to prove that it was not
" ſincere. Theſe are the words of the Divines of Port-
" Royal, in the  Letter of an Eccleſiaſtic to a
" friend, upon the ſubject of the declaration made by the " Pariſh-Prieſt of St. Stephen, &c. This letter, dated
" the 15th of July 1666, is annexed to a piece of " Port-Royal, entitled, A Refutation of the book of
" Father Annat, containing reflections on the Mandate
" of the Biſhop of Alet, &c. And, in another piece,
" written the following year, and entitled, A De- " fence of the Faith of the Nuns of P. R. Part II.
" they repeat ſtill more diſtinctly than before, what " had been ſaid by them in the letter."

II. (81) His opinion was not leſs changed with regard to the fact of the Janſeniſts, than with reſpect to that of Janſenius. For whereas, in writing the Lettres Provinciales, he affirmed, ſpeaking of them, that their doctrine with reſpect to Grace had never varied ; and that they never had any different from the ſchool of St. Thomas ; he charged them publickly with expreſſing themſelves, ſince the conſtitutions, in a different manner than before. Here follows what they themſelves relate of this, in their Letter of an Eccleſiaſtick to a Friend, &c. ††. " He even thought, that it was not only
" on this occaſion of the ſubſcribing of the Nuns of " Port-Royal that inſincerity had been ſhewn ; but " that the ſame defect might be found in the diffe" rent pieces which had been written after the af" fair which has ſo long diſturbed the peace of the " Church : that, in writing it, regard had been
" had to the preſent advantage ; and that, as this
" had changed with the times, their writings did " not appear altogether conſiſtent. He therefore " thought it would have been proper to reviſe them
" all, and to make a ſimilitude of expreſſion in " every part of them. To prompt Meſſieurs de
" Port Royal more ſtrongly to this, he drew up ano" ther piece, in which he pretended to point out the " advantages they gave their enemies by this diſpa-
" rity ; and that it might be proved that they had " expreſſed themſelves with more facility * ſince the
" iſſuing of the Bulls, than before." The Janſeniſts anſwered, that Paſcal was miſtaken, in ſuppoſing that he ſaw a contrariety between their works written, before and after the Bull ; becauſe there really was not any. And, to ſhew the cauſe of his error, they aſſure that he himſelf did not conſult the proofs of what he advanced, but was contented with the memoirs that were furniſhed by ſome of his friends, who did not examine with ſufficient accuracy * the paſſages from which they compoſed them. Whence it happened, adds he, that he could not help committing a conſiderable number of miſtakes ; and that there are, in his piece, ſome altogether fabulous ſtories, which ſerve † for a foundation to the pretended contrarieties he laid to their charge ; and ſome dialogues in which people are made to ſay, on both ſides, ſuch things as were never ſpoke of. That is to ſay that, by the confeſſion of the Janſeniſts themſelves, Paſcal did, at that time, juſt the ſame thing as he had done in their favour in the Lettres Provinciales, if we may believe their adverſaries and his.

All theſe particulars, in the hiſtory of the five propoſitions, are accompanied with many remarks, which perhaps would puzzle any one who ſhould attempt to apologize for Mr. Paſcal.

[O] 'Twas from him that the Janſeniſts learned to denote themſelves by the Particle on.] He declared, that a worthy man ſhould avoid naming himſelf, and even making uſe of the particles I and me ; and he uſed to ſay, on this occaſion, that Chriſtian Piety extinguiſhes or annihilates the worldly me, and that worldly civility hides and ſuppreſſes it (82). Not that, adds the Author of the Art of Thinking (83), this rule ſhould be obſerved in a ſcrupulous degree ; for there are ſome occaſions, in which, to endeavour to make ſuch diſtinctions, would be putting one's-ſelf to needleſs trouble ; but it is always good to keep it in view, in order that a man may deviate from that evil cuſtom of ſome perſons, who are ever ſpeaking of, and quoting themſelves, though their opinion is not any way concerned in the affair ſpoken of. This, in all probability, was the reaſon why the Janſeniſts of France have ſo ſtudiouſly affected to employ the particle on. One of their adverſaries has pretended to diſcover by this mark, that the work (84) of a certain anonymous Author, which he was refuting, ought to be aſcribed to them. He delivers himſelf in the following terms, after giving a ſtrong proof of the affection which this anonymous Author had for the Gentlemen of Port-Royal (85) : " But if " this be not judged ſufficient, and a more glaring
" one is wanting, the whole world knows their on ;
" that this is the manner in which they cite one a" nother ; that no perſons had ever employed it
" before them ; and that few but themſelves make " uſe of it. He not only never cites them other-
" wiſe : Comme ON a dit dane la Grammaire reiſonnée † ;
" i. e. As it was ſaid in the rational Grammar : Comme
" ON l'a remarqué dans l'Art de penſer ; i. e. As it has " been obſerved in the Art of Thinking ; ON a parlé de cela
" dans la Grammaire generale, i. e. that was mentioned
" in the general Grammar : but he does not ſpeak of " himſelf except with this form of ſpeech, in his Pre-
" face :" En revoyant cet Ouvrage ON s'eſt cru obligé ;
ON a cru qu'il eſtoit plus à propos, i. e. " in reviſing this
" work it has been thought an obligation ; it was " thought more proper. I have heard an excellent man
" ſay, that this manner of ſpeaking of one's ſelf, by
" the particle ON, was a kind of plural, equivalent to
" the particle nous (WE) employed by Kings and " other Potentates (86). Our Critic owns this in
" ſome meaſure, by ſaying that, inſtead of ON, peo" ple formerly wrote hons *, which ſignified men ; ſo
" that, adds he, that ON dit (it is ſaid) is the ſame as
" hommes on les hommes diſent (men, or the men ſay.)
" However, this illuſtrious man was of opinion, that
" the Gentlemen in queſtion did not employ that " form of expreſſion out of vanity, but merely from
" a principle of ſincerity, to denote that they did
" not write any thing, in which ſeveral perſons were
" not concerned ; and conſequently that they could not
" prefix the name of any ſingle Author to their works,
" without acting againſt truth, ſince not one of their " books was compoſed by one Author only. That " on the other hand, the ſpecifying of the names of " all thoſe who have been concerned in them, would
" be attended with other inconveniencies ; but that " they are all equally avoided by employing the myſ-
" terious particle on, which I never could have " thought to have been comprehenſive, had not I
" been told ſo by the able man in queſtion." Read what follows. After the foregoing ſheet was printed, I happened to meet with the book quoted in the margin (87), whence I have extracted the following paſſage. " Paſcal uſed to ſay of thoſe Au" thors, who ſpeaking of their works, ſay, my book,
" my

(80) i. e. the aſſembly of the Clergy of France.

 Page 80.

(81) Hiſtory of the five Propoſitions, p. 203.

†† Page 81.

* Facility ſeems, by an error of the Copieſt or Printer, to have been put for faintneſs.

* Page 81.

† Page 82.

(82) Art de Penſer, part 3. chap. 19. num. 6. p. m. 350. See alſo Paſcal's thoughts, chap. 29. num. 27.

(83) Ibid.

(84) It is intitled, Reflections on the preſent practice of the French tongue, or new and critical Remarks on politeneſs of ſtyle. Paris 1689, 12mo.

(85) l'Abbé de St. Real. Diſcourſe on Criticiſm, chap. 10. p. 223, Lions edit. 1691.

† p. 256, 318, 523.

(86) See St. Evremond, Oeuvres melees, Tom. 4. p. m. 136. where he ridicules the abuſe of the particle on. [Tom. 5. p. 372. Dutch edition of 1726]

* p. 342,

(87) Tom. 2. p. 200. Rotterd. edit. 1701, of Vigneul-Marville.

tributed very much to the ſhortning of his days *.] Hereunder is his epitaph [P]. Mr. Voltaire has made animadverſions on ſeveral of his Thoughts concerning Religion [Q]. I ſhall give a ſpecimen in one or two of them [R].

* Perrault's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 1. p. 219, 220. Paris 1701. 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.

PAS-

" my commentary, my hiſtory, &c. that they are like " thoſe trades-people, who are for ever ſaying, my " houſe. Theſe, adds this excellent man, ſhould ra- " ther ſay, our book, our commentary, our hiſtory, &c. " ſince, commonly, more of it belongs to others, " than to themſelves."

[P] . . . his epitaph.] It is as follows.

D. O. M.
Blaſius Paſcalis Scutarius nobilis.
Hic jacet.
Pietas ſi non moritur, æternum vivet :
Vir conjugii neſcius,
Religione Sanctus, Virtute clarus,
Doctrinâ celebris,
Ingenio acutus,
Sanguine & animo pariter illuſtris,
Doctus, non Doctor,
Æquitatis amator,
Veritatis defenſor,
Virginum ultor,
Chriſtianæ moralis corruptorum accerrimus hoſtis.
Hunc Rhetores amant facundum,
Hunc Scriptores norunt Elegantem,
Hunc mathematici ſtupent profundum,
Hunc philoſophi quærunt ſapientem,
Hunc Doctores laudant Theologum,
Hunc Pii venerantur Auſterum,
Hunc omnes mirantur, Omnibus ignotum,
Omnibus licet notum.
Quid plura Viator quem perdidimus
PASCALEM
IS LUDOV. erat MONTALTIUS
Heu !
Satis dixi, urgent Lachrymæ,
Sileo.
Et qui bene precaberis, bene tibi eveniat,
Et vivo & mortuo.
Vixit Ann. 39. m. 2. Obiit. an. rep. Sal. 1662, 14 Kal. Sept.
ΩΛΕΤΟ ΠΑΣΚΑΛΙΟΣ
ΦΕΥ, ΦΕΥ, ΠΕΝΘΟΣ ΟΣΟΝ
Poſuit, A P. D. C. Moerens. Aureliam canoniſta.
Cecidit Paſchalis
Heu! Heu! qualis Luctus ** ?

 Penſées de Paſcal, at the end of his Life, Paris 1686, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl.

[Q] Mr. Voltaire has made animadverſions on ſeveral of his thoughts concerning religion.] This he has done by way of letter, which, in the edition before me, is interwoven with his letters concerning the Engliſh nation, an edition of which was printed under the title of Lettres Philoſophiques, par M. de V . . . . (Voltaire) *. Here follows the preamble to this letter.

* A Rouen, Chez Jore Litraire, 1734.

I now ſend you the remarks which I had made long ſince on Mr. Paſcal's thoughts. I beg you not to compare me, on this occaſion, with Hezekiah, who would have had all Solomon's books burnt. I reſpect Mr. Paſcal's genius and eloquence; but the more I reſpect them, the more I am perſuaded, that he himſelf would have corrected many of thoſe thoughts which he had thrown at random on paper, in order for a future examination; and at the ſame time that I object to his ideas, I admire his genius.

It is my opinion that Mr. Paſcal's deſign, in general, was to exhibit mankind in an odious light. He ſtrenuouſly endeavours to repreſent us all as wicked and unhappy. He writes againſt human nature in pretty near the ſame manner as he wrote againſt the Jeſuits. He aſcribes to the eſſence of our nature, ſuch things as are peculiar to ſome men only; and ſpeaks injuriouſly, but at the ſame time eloquently, of Mankind. I ſhall be ſo free as to take up the pen, in defence of the human ſpecies, againſt this ſublime miſanthropiſt. I dare affirm that we are neither ſo unhappy, nor ſo wicked as he declares us to be. I alſo am firmly perſuaded, that had he proſecuted, in the work he intended to write the plan, which appears in his thoughts, he would have writ a book full of eloquent falſe-reaſonings and falſities, admirably well deduced. I even am of opinion, that all thoſe books, which have been lately writ, to prove the Chriſtian Religion, will be ſo many ſtumbling-blocks inſtead of edifying their readers. Do theſe authors pretend to know more of theſe things than Chriſt and his Apoſtles? This is like ſurrounding an oak with reeds, in order to ſupport it. We may root up thoſe reeds without prejudicing the oak in any manner.

I have made a diſcretionary choice of ſome of Paſcal's thoughts, and annex the ſeveral anſwers to them. It is your buſineſs to judge how I may have acquitted myſelf on this occaſion †.

† Lettres Philoſophiques de Mr. V. p. 136, 137. Addit. by the Tranſl.

[R] I ſhall give a ſpecimen in one or two.] When I conſider man's blindneſs and miſery, and the aſtoniſhing contrarieties which are ſeen in his nature; and when I behold the whole univerſe dumb, and man unenlightned, left to himſelf, and wandering, as it were in this nook of the univerſe, without knowing who placed him there; what he is come to do; and what will become of him after death; I return back terrified, as a man who having been carried, when aſleep, into a frightful deſart iſland, ſhould awake without knowing where he is, or knowing how to get out of this iſland: hence I wonder that mankind are not ſeized with deſpair, when they conſider the wretchedneſs of their condition ††.

†† Paſcal's Thoughts.

" As I was peruſing this reflection, I received a " letter from a friend who lives in a far-diſtant " country. His words are as follow.

" I am at this time juſt as you left me; neither " gayer nor more ſad, neither richer nor poorer. I enjoy " perfect health, and am bleſt with all things that make " life agreeable; undiſturbed with love, avarice, am- " bition, or envy; and will venture, ſo long as theſe " things laſt, to call myſelf a very happy man.

" Many men are as happy as my correſpondent. " It is with men as with animals. Here a dog " ſhall eat and lie with his miſtreſs: there another " turns the ſpit, and is equally happy; a third ſhall " run mad, and is knocked on the head. As to my- " ſelf, when I caſt my eyes on London and Paris, I " do not ſee any cauſe to throw me into the deſpair " mentioned by Mr. Paſcal. I ſee a city, that does " not reſemble in any manner a deſert iſland, but, " on the contrary, populous, rich, well governed; " and where men are as happy as far as is conſiſtent " with their natures to be: what wiſe man would " attempt to hang himſelf, becauſe he does not " know in what manner God is ſeen face to face, " and becauſe he cannot unravel the myſtery of the " Trinity? He might as well plunge into deſpair, " becauſe he has not four feet and a pair of wings.

" Why ſhould any one endeavour to make us conſi- " der our Being with horror? Our exiſtence is not ſo " wretched as ſome people would make us believe it " to be. To conſider the univerſe as a dungeon, " and all mankind as ſo many criminals who are " carrying to execution, is the idea of an Enthuſiaſt: " to ſuppoſe that the world is a ſeat of delights, " where we ought to meet with nothing but plea- " ſures, is the dream of a Sibarite: but to conclude " that the earth, mankind, and animals are what they " ought to be, in the diſpoſition of Providence, is, " in my opinion, thinking like a wiſe man *."

* Lettres Philoſophique, p. 145, 146.

Here follows another reflection. Thoſe who judge of a work by rule, are, with regard to other men, like thoſe who have a watch in compariſon of ſuch as have none. One man ſhall ſay, we have been here theſe two hours. Another ſays, we have been but three quarters of an hour. I look upon my watch, and ſay to the one, you are tired; and to the other, you think the time very ſhort †. Here Mr. Voltaire anſwers: " In " works of taſte, in muſick, poetry, and painting, " taſte ſerves as a watch; and that man who judges " of them only by rule, judges wrong **.

† Paſcal's Thoughts.

 Penſees Philoſophiques, p. 178, 179.

I will give one reflection more. As we ſay poetical beauty, we ought to ſay geometrical and medicinal beauty; and yet we don't ſay this, the reaſon of which is, that we know very well what is the object of geometry, and what is the object of phyſick; but we do not know in what the agreeableneſs conſiſts, which is the object of poetry. We do not know what this natural model, which we ought to imitate, is; and, for want of this knowledge, certain odd terms have been invented, as golden age, wonder of our time, fatal laurel, beautiful ſtar, &c. and this jargon is called poetical beauty. But that

PASCHALI (GIULIO CESARE) was one of the Italians who left their native country in the 16th Century, in order to have an opportunity of profeſſing the Proteſtant Religion: He was a good Italian Poet; and publiſhed the Pſalms in Italian verſe, at Geneva, anno 1592, being then threeſcore and five years old (a). He annexed to them a collection of Rime Spirituali, and the firſt Canto of an Epic Poem, entitled, Univerſo. This Poem was finiſhed; and contained, in thirty two Canto's, the whole hiſtory of Moſes, from the creation of the world to the entrance of the Iſraelites into the land of Canaan (b). I believe he is the ſame with Giulio Ceſare P, who printed at Geneva, in 1557, 4to. his Italian tranſlation of Calvin's inſtitution, and dedicated it to Galeas Caraccioli, Marquis del Vico. The dedication is dated at Geneva the 4th of Auguſt, 1558.

(a) See the beginning of his Preface to the Pſalms.

(b) See the cloſe of the Preface above-cited.

perſon who ſhall image to himſelf a woman clothed after this model, will ſee a pretty maiden quite covered with looking-glaſſes and copper chains *. Mr. Voltaire anſwers. "This is abſolutely falſe, we ought not "to ſay geometrical beauty, nor medicinal beauty, "becauſe a theorem and a purge do not affect the "ſenſes in an agreeable manner; and becauſe we be"ſtow the name of beauty on thoſe things only which "charm the ſenſes, as muſick, painting, eloquence, "poetry, regular architecture, &c. The reaſon "which Mr. Paſcal gives is equally falſe. We very "well know what it is in which the object of Poetry "conſiſts. It conſiſts in painting with ſtrength, "clearneſs, delicacy and harmony: poetry is har"monious eloquence. Mr. Paſcal muſt have had "very little taſte, to ſay that fatal laurel, beautiful "ſtar, and ſuch like ſtuff, are poetical beauties; "and the editors of his thoughts muſt have been but "little acquainted with polite literature, otherwiſe "they would not have printed a reflection ſo un"worthy of its illuſtrious author †."

* Paſcal's Thoughts.

† Lettres Philoſophiques, p. 184, 185.

The learned Mr. Dacier had before animadverted on the reflection above cited of Mr. Paſcal, in the following terms. Paſcal's reaſoning, ſays Dacier , is entirely falſe, and founded on a ſenſible error. How could any one imagine that we ſay poetical beauty, merely becauſe we do not know what is the object of poetry; and, that the only reaſon why we do not ſay medicinal beauty, and geometrical beauty, is, becauſe the objects of geometry and phyſick are known? The only reaſon why we do not ſay medicinal beauty and geometrical beauty, is, becauſe the objects of phyſick and geometry do not require ornaments, and are not ſuſceptible of them. But we ſay poetical beauty, and that not through ignorance, but becauſe its object is perfectly known, as well as the beauties which are peculiar to it; and nothing can be falſer and more irrational, than to aſſert that, in order to make up or compenſate for the knowledge which he pretends we have not, of the true beauties of poetry, thoſe empty words, thoſe cold hyperboles were invented, which bad Poets employ, in order to maſk or diſguiſe whatever they may not be capable of expreſſing in a ſimple, and at the ſame time, noble manner. This jargon, ſo far from being what is called poetical beauty, has always been laughed at and exploded by the beſt Poets. In fine, Mr. Paſcal's worſt error is, when he affirms, that we do not know in what the agreeableneſs conſiſts, which is the object of poetry; and that we do not know what this natural model, which we ought to imitate, is. On the contrary, all this is perfectly known, ſince rules have been given for it, and demonſtrations have been made thereof by Ariſtotle and Horace. The epick and dramatick poems, the ode, the elegy, the idyllium, in a word, every ſpecies of poetry has its ſtated ornaments and peculiar characteriſticks. And any Poet who is not able to hit upon theſe characteriſticks, and to give them their proper and peculiar beauties, is unworthy to be called a Poet, as Horace obſerves very juſtly:

Deſcriptas ſervare vices, operumque colores
Cur ego ſi nequeo, ignoroque, Poëta ſalutor ††?

†† Horace, de Art. Poet. ver. 86.

That is,

"Why is he honour'd with a Poet's name,
"Who neither knows, nor would obſerve a rule?"
ROSCOMMON.

If I am not able to give all theſe different characteriſtics, and employ in a proper manner the various colours which all the above-mentioned works require, why am I honoured with the title of Poet *?]

* Addit. by the Tranſlat.

 Horace de Dacier. Tom. 1. p. 80 &ſeq. A Hambourg 1733, 12mo.

PASOR (MATTHIAS), Profeſſor of Divinity in Groningen, born at Herborn, in the county of Naſſau, the 12th of April, 1599, was the ſon of GEORGE PASOR, who, after having taught Divinity and the Hebrew language during nineteen years in Herborn, was invited to Franeker in 1626, to be Profeſſor of the Greek language in that city, and died there the 10th of December 1637. Our Matthias had already made a conſiderable progreſs at Herborn, when the plague breaking out, he was ſent to Marpurg in 1614. Here he paſt his time away in a very diſagreeable manner; for the Profeſſors ſhunned him as an infectious wretch; and ſome of the ſtudents inſulted him in a very opprobrious manner, and beat him; by way of revenge, in that his father, when chief maſter at Herborn, had fined them, whenever they were guilty of any irregularity (a). He was forced to leave Marpurg, and the year following returned to Herborn, where he applied himſelf cloſely to his ſtudies. He went to Heidelberg in 1616, and meeting there with ſkilful Profeſſors in all parts of learning, he made a vaſt improvement. He even found an opportunity of leſſening the expences, to which his family had been put upon his account; he teaching, privately, the Mathematicks and Hebrew, and entering, as tutor, into a worthy man's houſe in Heidelberg. He gained ſo great a reputation by ſeveral publick exerciſes performed by him, in the Univerſities, that he flattered himſelf with the hopes of obtaining a Profeſſorſhip that was vacant; he flattered himſelf, I ſay, with theſe hopes, though one of his antagoniſts had many more friends than he. By a pretty extraordinary turn of good fortune he was not deceived in his expectations, he being appointed mathematical Profeſſor the 23d of April 1620. Not long after he was forced to fly, on account of the invaſion of the Palatinate. The ſtorm being in ſome meaſure blown over, he went and continued the duties of his employment in Heidelberg, in which unhappy city he ſuffered all the inconveniences and dangers that can be imagined; and did not leave it till it was ſacked by the troops of Count Tilly, anno 1622. He went to Herborn, through numberleſs difficulties; and reſolved, in 1624, to go into England. He read private Lectures in Oxford, both on the Hebrew and the Mathematicks, and went and took a Tour in France with ſome Germans. He ſpent the winter at Paris, where he heard, heard, among other Lectures, thoſe of Gabriel Sionita [A], Chaldee and Arabick Profeſſor. Returning to England in the ſummer of the year 1625, he found that the ſtudents of Oxford were very much diſperſed, occaſioned by the plague. The infection ceaſing, he had ſome pupils, whom he inſtructed either in Divinity or the oriental tongues; and he choſe to reſide here rather than to go to Ireland with the learned Uſher, who offered him his table and an handſome penſion: the petition he preſented in order to deſire to be made Profeſſor of the Eaſtern languages, met with a favourable reception; ſo that he entered upon his Profeſſorſhip the 25th of October 1626; and exerciſed that employment till the year 1629, when he was invited to Groningen, to be Profeſſor of Philoſophy, and accordingly began to exerciſe his employment the 27th of Auguſt of the ſame year. Six years after he was appointed mathematical Profeſſor, and in 1645 Divinity Profeſſor; for which reaſon he did not go to Harderwic, where he was offered the employment of Profeſſor in ordinary in Divinity and Hebrew. He took his Doctor's Degree in Divinity, at Groningen, the 21ſt of October 1645, and reſigned his mathematical Profeſſorſhip, but kept that of moral Philoſophy. He travelled to Naſſau, his native country, in 1653, and went as far as Heidelberg, where he met with numberleſs civilities from the Elector Palatine (b). He lived till the 28th of January 1658. He was never married [B], and led an irreproachable life of celibacy (c). He did not publiſh any book [C]; for which he gives two admirable reaſons [D], and theſe ought to ſerve as a rule to many people, and to myſelf in particular.

(a) Studioſi nonnulli memores mulctæ ſibi ob petulantiam Herbornæ à patre Rectore irrogatæ, me innocentem & minime ferocem ſed meticuloſum depoſitionis in Academiis Germanicis receptæ occaſione, verberibus & contumeliis variis affecerunt. Mathias Paſor, in vita ſua, p. m. 22.

(b) Extracted from the Journal of his Life, written by himſelf, and printed at Groningen, in 1658, 4to.

(c) Ex Orat. funebri.

[A] He heard . . . . the Lectures . . . . of Gabriel Sionita.] This Profeſſor has left off his Lectures for ſome years, becauſe he had no auditors. He reſumed his exerciſes at the requeſt of our Paſor; however, he did not read them in the Royal College, but in his own houſe (1). What a ſtrange circumſtance was this! a great Kingdom, ſuch a city as Paris could not furniſh three Auditors to a Profeſſor, whoſe fame was ſo great in foreign countries, that Bangius (2), a learned Dane, would not accept of a Hebrew Profeſſorſhip at Copenhagen, but upon condition that he ſhould be allowed time to go to Paris, and improve himſelf under Gabriel Sionita. And here we have a Heidelberg Profeſſor, who deſires to be a Diſciple of the ſame man, at the ſame time that not ſo many as two ſtudents in Paris are curious of being his Auditors. Such is the temper and diſpoſition of mankind, that they will travel to far diſtant countries in ſearch of things; which, were they at their own doors, they would utterly neglect.

(1) Ex vita Matthiæ Paſoris, p. 41.

(2) See his article.

[B] He was never married.] It is obſerved expreſsly in his funeral oration (3), that his leading a life of celibacy did not proceed from any particular vow, or from his entertaining an averſion to a ſuitable match; on the contrary, he was an advocate for it, and uſed to applaud it; though, at the ſame time, he was extremely ſorry, that ſo uſeful and neceſſary a ſtate of life, and inſtituted even in the ſtate of innocence, ſhould, by reaſon of ſin, be obnoxious to ſo many difficulties. The true reaſons therefore, why he did not marry were theſe; in his juvenile years he deſired to be free from domeſtick cares; in his riper age he laboured under the calamities of perſecution and baniſhment; and afterwards, he found his health a little impaired; in fine, he had entertained great hopes of John George Paſor, his brother's ſon.

(3) Abdius Widmarius, Miniſter of the Goſpel, and Profeſſor of Divinity in Groningen, wrote this funeral oration.

[C] He did not publiſh many books] He reviſed with care two or three of his father's works, which are of great uſe to ſcholars and ſtudents in Divinity: the books I mean are, Lexicon Novi Teſtamenti, the Manuale Novi Teſtamenti, and the Greek Grammar of the New Teſtament. This Father wrote ſome other books, as Piſcator's funeral Oration, the Analyſis of the difficult words in Heſiod, Collegium Heſiodeum, &c. With regard to our Matthias Paſor, I believe that nothing has been publiſhed of his except ſome Theſes, or general ideas of certain Sciences. The Journal he had drawn up of his own life ought not to have been publiſhed; it ſhould rather have been ſuppreſſed, or at leaſt many trifling particulars ought to have been retrenched; as for inſtance, was it neceſſary the world ſhould be informed, that the publick-houſe, in which the Heidelberg Profeſſors treated, in a body, Matthias Paſor, had ſwords for its ſign, Partim univerſi in prandio honorario lauto, inſtituto ad ſignum enſium (4)? Was it neceſſary that the world ſhould know that at Hanaw, in the very beginning of a ſumptuous entertainment he was forced to riſe from table, upon finding himſelf out of order, and his wanting to ſpew out ſome bilious humour? In prandio lauto nihil ventriculo arridebat, imo ſub initium menſæ ſurgere coactus ſum & bilem evomui (5). However, I do not wonder that ſuch Journals are publiſhed, ſince, in the funeral orations of profeſſors, we generally meet with a very exact deſcription of all the ſymptoms of their laſt ſickneſs; whether ſuch a day, they ſweated, were coſtive, or were troubled with a looſeneſs, &c.

(4) p. 54.

(5) Ibid. p. 55.

[D] . . . . for which he gives two admirable reaſons.] The firſt is, becauſe he was not willing that youth ſhould be diverted from reading the good books which are already publiſhed; and ſecondly, becauſe he did not care the bookſellers ſhould riſk their money; theſe very often defraying the expence of books which either ſell very ſlowly, or lie for ever buried in their warehouſes. Nolui, ſays he (6), nimis multa ſcribere; I. Ne juventutem abſtraherem à lectione graviorum Authorum, quos per Dei gratiam habemus. II. Ne miſeris typographis imponeretur, qui ſæpe magnos ſumptus impendunt libris nunquam vel tardè admodum diſtrahendis.

(6) Ubi ſupra, p. 58.

PATERCULUS (CAIUS (a) VELLEIUS), a Latin Hiſtorian, under the Empire of Tiberius. There is great reaſon to believe, that he was born the year of Rome 735 (b). His Anceſtors were illuſtrious by their merit and the employments they exerciſed [A]. He was a military Tribune when Caius Cæſar, Auguſtus's grandſon, had an interview with the King of the Parthians in an iſland of Euphrates, anno 753 (c). He commanded

(a) Publius or Marcus, according to others.

(b) See Dodwell's Annales Velleiani, prefixed to the edition of Paterculus, Oxford 1693, 8vo.

(c) Vell. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 101.

[A] His Anceſtors were illuſtrious on account of their merit and the employments they exerciſed.] Here follows what he ſays, ſpeaking of the confederate war. Neque ego verecundia domeſtici ſanguinis gloriæ quidquam, dum verum refero, ſubtraham, quippe multum Minatii Magii, atavi mei, Aſculanenſis, tribuendum eſt memoriæ: qui nepos Decii Magii, Campanorum principis, celeberrimi & fideliſſimi viri, tantum hoc bello Romanis fidem præſtitit, ut cum legione, quam ipſe in Hirpinis conſcripſerat, Herculaneum ſimul cum T. Didio caperet, Pompeios cum L. Sulla oppugnaret, Coſamque occuparet: cujus de virtutibus cum alii, tum maxime dilucideque Q. Hortenſius in Annalibus ſuis retulit: cujus pietati plenam populus R. gratiam retulit; ipſum viritim civitate donando, duos filios ejus creando prætores, cum ſeni adhuc crearentur (1), i. e. "Nor ſhould modeſty prompt me, to conceal "the glory of my Anceſtors, ſo long as I adhere "ſtrictly to the truth: for much is due to the me- "mory of Minatius Magius, of Aſculum, my great- "grandfather's grandfather, who was grandſon to De- "cius Magius, the chief man among the Campanians, "and famous for his virtue and fidelity. He ſerved "the Romans with ſo much faithfulneſs in this war, "that, with only a ſingle legion which he himſelf

(1) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 16.

commanded the Cavalry in Germany, under Tiberius; and accompanied that Prince nine years ſucceſſively, in all his expeditions (d), for which he was honourably rewarded (e). He was raiſed to the Prætorſhip [B], but to no higher employment. It is conjectured, with ſome probability, that, on account of the applauſes he beſtowed on Sejanus [C], he was looked upon as the friend of that favourite (f), and conſequently that he was involved

(d) See the rem. [B].

(e) See the ſame remark.

(f) Dodwell, Annales Vellei. num. 30.

" had raiſed among the Hirpini, he, in conjunction " with T. Didius, took Herculaneum; beſieged the " Pompeys with L. Sylla, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Coſa. " Among other Authors, Q. Hortenſius has written " with great clearneſs, in his Annals, concerning his " virtue and good qualities. His zeal was nobly re- " compenſed by the people of Rome, they beſtow- " ing upon him, man by man, the freedom of the " city; and creating his two ſons Prætors, at the " time that ſix only were created." We here have ſomething very ſingular with regard to the degrees of deſcent. Paterculus, born the year of Rome 735, reckons, as his great-grandfather's grandfather, Minatius Magius, who, at the head of a legion, which he himſelf had raiſed, beſieged and took cities about the year 664; and who was grandſon of Decius Magius, who greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Capua, by his fidelity for the Romans, the year of Rome 538. On one hand, we have five deſcents in the ſpace of ſeventy one years; and, in the other, we have but two in the ſpace of one hundred and twenty ſix years. In my opinion greater difficulties occur in the five deſcents than in the two; and perhaps we ought to conjecture, that atavus has been inſerted, by copiſts, inſtead of avus; or that atavus did not regularly ſignify, on all occaſions, the great-grandfather's grandfather. Dodwell is of opinion that atavus ſignified great-grandfather. Aves ſimiliter Vellei fuiſſe neceſſe irat Minatii Magii filios ſiquidem atavus ipſe fuerat Minatius (2). If the conjecture I ſpeak of was true, we muſt ſay that Paterculus did not deſcend from Decius Magius but by the mother's ſide; for there is no doubt but that Caius Velleius, mentioned by him in Chapter LXXVI. of Book II. was his grandfather by the father's ſide, and a different perſon from Minatius Magius. I will quote this paſſage, in order to eſtabliſh all we know of his Anceſtors. Quod alieno teſtimonium redderem, in eo non fraudabo avum meum: quippe C. Velleius, honoratiſſimo inter illos CCCLX. judices loco à Cn. Pompeio lectus, ejuſdem, Marcique Bruti ac Tironis præfectus fabrûm, vir nulli ſecundus, in Campania, digreſſu Neronis à Neapoli, cujus ob ſingularem cum eo amicitiam partium adjutor fuerat, gravis jam ætate & corpore, cum comes eſſe non poſſet, gladio ſe ipſe tranſfixit (3), i. e. " The teſtimony " which I would beſtow on any indifferent perſon, I " will not rob my grandfather of: for C. Velleius, " a man inferior to none, was appointed by Cn. " Pompey, to fill a moſt honourable ſeat among thoſe " 360 Judges; and nominated ſuperintendant of the " works to the laſt mentioned, and to Marcus Brutus " and Tiro. Upon Nero's leaving Naples, he hav- " ing aſſiſted his party, on account of the great " friendſhip that was between them, being very far " advanced in years and infirm, and finding himſelf " unable to accompany him, he killed himſelf with " his ſword." Here a ſmall ſcruple ariſes. Paterculus had a brother, Magius Celer by name. It is therefore very probable that they deſcended from Decius Magius, by the father's ſide. The printed books give the ſirname of Velleianus to this Magius Celer; but it is pretended, that this epithet is merely an invention of the Criticks, and that it is not found in the manuſcripts (4). Dodwell obſerves (5), that if it were true that Magius Celer was ſirnamed Velleianus, this would be a manifeſt proof that he had paſſed, by adoption, from the family of Vellei to that of Magius. In this caſe it might be ſaid, that he had been adopted by a relation on the mother's ſide, deſcended, in a direct line, from Decius Magius. The learned man whom I juſt now quoted would not admit of this ſuppoſition; he being of opinion, that our Paterculus was related, by the father's ſide, to the family Magia; and that the name Velleius belonged to him only by adoption. Eritque adeo gentile auctoris noſtri nomen Magius Velleius adſcititium ex adoptione in familiam Velleiam (6). But it is to be obſerved that his grandfather's name was Velleius. This hiſtorian had an uncle, by the father's ſide, name Capito, who was a Senator, and joined with Agrippa in impeaching Caſſius, the murderer of Cæſar. Quo tempore Capito patruus meus vir ordinis Senatorii, Agrippæ ſubſcripſit in C. Caſſium (7). I will alſo take notice of his brother. Cæſar ad alteram Belli Dalmatici molem animum atque arma contulit: in qua regione quali adjutore legatoque fratre meo, Magio Celere Velleiano, uſus ſit, ipſius patriſque ejus predicatione teſtatum eſt, & ampliſſimorum honorum, quibus triumphans eum Cæſar donavit, ſignat memoria (8), i. e. " Cæſar " devoted his thoughts and his arms to the other " war in Dalmatia. It would be needleſs for me to " obſerve, how greatly he was aſſiſted in that coun- " try by my brother Magius Celer Velleianus, his " Lieutenant-General. This is ſufficiently teſtified " by the account that himſelf and his father gave, " and by the great honours which Cæſar, at his " triumph, beſtowed upon him." He was Prætor, as the reader will ſee in the beginning of the following remark. I take ſome notice hereunder (9) of their father.

(2) Dodwellus, Ann. Velleianorum, num. 7. [The beſt and moſt methodical treatiſe, I believe, on Deſcents, is that intitled, A Diſcourſe concerning the Law of Inheritances in Fee; and therein, concerning the ſeveral degrees of Conſanguinity, &c. with a Kalendar of the perſons inheritable. A ſecond edition of it was lately publiſhed (1738) by Meſſ. Ward and Chandler; and alſo the Kalendar, (in Latin and Engliſh) curiouſly digeſted and engraved. The Law concerning Inheritances ſeems to be here illuſtrated and explained in a manner entirely new; and is ſaid to be written by the very worthy and learned Robinſon, of Gray's-Inn, Eſq; Recorder of Scarborough, &c.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(3) Vell. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 76.

(4) Dod. Ann. Velleiani, num. 7.

(5) Idem. Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Vell. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 69.

(8) Idem, Ibid. cap. 115. add to this what he ſays in chap. 121. quem (Tiberium in triumpho) mihi fratrique meo, inter præcipuos præcipuiſque donis adornatos viros, comitari contigit.

[B] He was raiſed to the Prætorſhip.] It was the ſame year that Auguſtus died. He himſelf informs us of this particular, and with ſuch a turn of expreſſion, as ſhews the ſubtilty of his genius. Quo tempore mihi fratrique meo candidatis Cæſaris, proxime à nobiliſſimis ac ſacerdotibus viris, deſtinari prætoribus contigit: conſecutis, ut neque poſt nos quemquam D. Auguſtus, neque ante nos Cæſar commendaret Tiberius (10), i. e. " At which time my brother and I being " elected by Cæſar's order, were appointed Prætors, " immediately after the moſt noble men, and ſuch " as belonged to the prieſthood: and we had " this advantage, that Auguſtus Cæſar did not " recommend any perſon after us, nor Tiberius " before us." Here follow ſome other paſſages, which ſhew the progreſs he made in his fortune. Habuit in hoc quoque bello, ſays he (11), ſpeaking of the war againſt the Dalmatians and Pannonians, under the year 759, mediocritas noſtra ſpecioſi miniſtri locum. Finita equeſtri militia, deſignatus quæſtor, nec dum ſenator æquatus ſenatoribus, etiam deſignatus tribunus plebis partem exercitus ab Urbe, traditi ab Auguſto, perduxi ad filium ejus: in quæſtura deinde, remiſſa ſorte provinciæ, legatus ejuſdem ad eundem miſſus; i. e. " Tho' ſo mean, " I yet had an honourable poſt in this war, and did " ſome ſervice. Having ended my ſervice in the " Cavalry, I was appointed Quæſtor; and, before I " was a Senator, was upon a level with thoſe of the " Senatorial Order; being likewiſe nominated Tri- " bune of the people, I led from the city, to Au- " guſtus's ſon, part of the army which Auguſtus had " delivered to me. Afterwards, in my Quæſtorſhip, " giving up my chance of a province, I was ſent to " him to be his Lieutenant-General." He ſpeaks as follows in another place (12): Hoc tempus me functum ante tribunatu caſtrorum, Ti. Cæſaris militem fecit: quippe protinus ab adoptione miſſus cum eo præfectus equitum in Germaniam, ſucceſſor officii patris mei, cæleſtiſſimorum ejus operum per annos continuos IX. præfectus aut legatus, ſpectator & pro captu mediocritatis meæ adjutor fui. i. e. " Having before been a Camp-Marſhal, I now " ſerved under Tiberius Cæſar: for ſoon after his " adoption, I was ſent with him to Germany, as Co- " lonel of horſe, in which poſt I ſucceeded my fa- " ther; and whilſt a Colonel or Lieutenant-General, " I was, during nine years ſucceſſively, a Spectator, " and, ſo far as my mean abilities would allow, an " aſſiſtant in the divine actions performed by him." I before obſerved (13), that he made a conſpicuous figure in Tiberius's triumph. Hankius fixes this triumph to the year of Rome 744 (14): but he anticipates full twenty years, or more; and did not know that Paterculus made his firſt campaign in the year 753. How then was it poſſible for him to appear, anno 744, in a triumph, with the moſt conſpicuous diſtinctions of honour, ſince he did not deſerve theſe, but by his aſſiduous ſervices under Tiberius, after his firſt military exploits (15)?

(9) In the laſt remark No. 3.

(10) Idem, Ibid. cap. 124.

(11) Idem, Ibid. cap. 111.

(12) Idem, Ibid. cap. 104. this refers to the year of Rome 757.

(13) Rem. [A], citat. (8).

(14) Hankius, de Scriptor. Rerum Roman. Tom. 1. p. 70.

[C] The applauſe he beſtowed on Sejanus.] See chap. 127 and 128 of his ſecond book. I ſhall extract but one

(15) See Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 101, 104, 121.

voled in his ruin. He wrote a very curious Epitome of the Roman Hiſtory [D], and promiſed to give a hiſtory more at large (g). The elogiums he beſtows on Tiberius are ſo extravagant; and he had ſo well found out the art to flatter this Emperor, that it is thought he did not ſcruple to ſpeak ill of Germanicus [E]. It is a miſtake to aſſert, that there was an Annaliſt of Rome named Cneius Velleius [F], as Glandorpius ſuppoſes. I ſhall one particular from them, viz. his ſhewing, by great examples, that a Prince may divide the toils of government with his Prime Miniſter. Raro eminentes viri non magnis adjutoribus ad gubernandam fortunam ſuam uſi ſunt; ut duo Scipiones duobus Læliis, quos per omnia æquaverunt ſibi; ut D. Auguſtus M. Agrippa, & maximè ab eo, Statilio Tauro: quibus novitas familiæ haud obſtitit, quo minus ad multiplices conſulatus triumphoſque, & complura eniterentur ſacerdotia, etenim magna negotia magnis adjutoribus egent (16). i. e. "Great men "frequently employ perſons of merit to aid them "in the adminiſtration of their affairs; as the two "Scipios acted with regard to the two Lælius's, "whom they equalled on all occaſions to themſelves: "as the divine Auguſtus did M. Agrippa, and chiefly "Statilius Taurus, after him. And altho' their families were but newly raiſed, they nevertheleſs "were often appointed Conſuls, had ſeveral triumphs decreed them, and made a figure in different degrees of the Prieſthood: for great affairs "require great aſſiſtants." This paſſage, and ſome others of the like kind, furniſhed a moſt beautiful varniſh or gilding to the panegyriſts of Cardinal Richelieu and Cardinal Mazarin. But they changed their note, and employed other maxims, after the death of the latter, as I have obſerved in another place (17). I muſt not omit a reflection of la Mothe le Vayer. He is blamed, ſays he (18), and that with great reaſon, for having . . . beſtowed ridiculous elogiums, not only on Tiberius, but even on Sejanus his favourite, whoſe merit he exhibits twice, as being one of the principal and moſt virtuous perſonages the Republic of Rome could boaſt of. Now what did he do in this, but what will happen, in all probability, to all thoſe who ſhall take up the pen, with a reſolution of publiſhing the hiſtory of their own times? This is a juſt reflection. It is ſcarce poſſible for an Author to be ſincere, when he writes of Princes in their life-time, or in that of their ſons.

(g) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 48, 103, & paſſim alibi.

(16) Idem, Ibid. cap. 127.

(17) See the Nouvelles Lettres de la Critique Generale de Maimbourg, p. 81 & ſeq.

(18) La Mothe le Vayer, in the treatiſe concerning Hiſtorians, p. 194.

[D] He wrote a very curious epitome of the Roman Hiſtory.] The beginning of it is loſt. It was a general idea of antient times. La Mothe le Vayer was not miſtaken in what I ſhall here ſubjoin (19). "The remembrance of the countries he had ſeen, "when a Military Tribune, and travelling through "the provinces of Thrace, Macedon, Achaia, Aſia "Minor, other countries ſtill more to the Eaſt, and "eſpecially on both ſhores of Pontus, Euxinus, furniſhed him a great number of very agreeable "ideas. Hence we may judge, that had he wrote "that entire and extenſive hiſtory, which he promiſes ſo often, we ſhould have therein read a great "number of very conſiderable particulars, as related "by him who had been an eye-witneſs of, and "partly aſſiſtant in them. In the little that ſtill remains of this, in which he gives nothing but by "way of epitome, we nevertheleſs find therein a "great number of particulars, which are ſo much the "more valuable, as this is the only place where they "occur, occaſioned either by the ſilence of other "Hiſtorians, or by the ſo common loſs, that of part "of their productions. The ſtyle of Velleius Paterculus is highly worthy of the age in which he "lived, that being ſtill the age of beautiful language. He excells particularly, when he cenſures "or applauds thoſe whom he writes of; all which "he does in ſuch beautiful terms, and ſuch delicate "expreſſions, that the like are not met with in a- "ny other Hiſtorian or Author. . . . . (20). We "do not meet with a greater purity of diction in "any of the Latin Authors, nor more worthy of the "ages of Auguſtus and Tiberius." Is it not very ſtrange, that a work which ſo well deſerved to be preſerved with the utmoſt care, and of which, on account of its ſhortneſs, many copies might eaſily have been taken, had like to have been loſt? It is affirmed, that Morbac's manuſcript, from which Rhenanus publiſhed the firſt edition of this Author (21), was the only copy in the world (22). Farther, it is obſerved, that no antient Author, except Priſcian, has ſpoke of Paterculus (23) However, the moderns have done infinitely more juſtice to him. They have publiſhed his works ſeveral times with Notes or Commentaries. It has been tranſlated into French. Mr. Doujat publiſhed one edition of it, in uſum Delphini, anno 1679; and, to make his work a continued hiſtory, he ſupplied whatever was wanting in Paterculus. I ſay nothing in particular, either of Lipſius's edition at Leyden 1591, 8vo, nor of that of Sckegkius at Frankfort 1602, 12mo, of that of Gerard Voſſius at Leyden 1639, 12mo; nor of that of Boeclerus at Straſburg 1642, 8vo; nor of the edition Variorum at Leyden 1653, 8vo, nor of many others. I ſhall only obſerve, that the Annales Velleiani of Dodwell, prefixed to the Oxford edition 1693, form a noble piece of Literature, which exhibit a prodigious knowledge of antiquity. It is to be obſerved, that Paterculus wrote this work the year of Rome 782 (24), in the 16th year of the reign of Tiberius (25).

(19) La Mothe le Vayer, in the treatiſe concerning Hiſtorians, p. 193, 194. Tom. 3. edit. 12mo. What he ſays concerning the travels of Paterculus, is in chap. 101. book 2.

(20) Ibid. p. 197.

(21) At Baſil, anno 1520.

(22) See the preface to the Paterculus, printed at Oxford 1693.

(23) Dodwell, Ann. Vell. num. 30.

(24) Paterculus, lib. 1. cap. 8.

(25) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 126.

[E] It is thought that he did not ſcruple to ſpeak ill of Germanicus.] A learned Critic will not allow this; he aſſerting that the following paſſage, Quo quidem tempore ut pleraque ignave Germanicus (26), is not correct, and that we muſt read gnave for ignave. He grounds his opinion on reaſons which appear to me ſolid (27); for it is certain that Paterculus, in other places, has beſtowed elogiums on Germanicus (28). However this be, the injuſtice, with which he palliates the paſſions of Tiberius, appears manifeſtly by his affecting to paſs ſo lightly over the ſhining actions of Germanicus, and even to ſuppreſs the greateſt part of them, and to ſully the glory of Agrippina, and of thoſe who were obnoxious to the Emperor. Lipſius has thus cenſured him for this. Ex antiquis bilem mihi etiam movet Vellejus Paterculus. Ælium Sejanum omnibus virtutibus accumulat, & quaſi in theatro plena manu dilaudat. Os hiſtorici! at nos eum ſcimus natum & exſtinctum exitio generis humani. Liviam Auguſtam, poſt multas laudes, diis quam hominibus ſimiliorem feminam concludit. Jam de Tiberio, flagitium ſit ſi uſquam aliter quàm ut de Jove immortali loquatur. Hæc liber & ingenuus animus qui ferat? Contrà ut Germanici Cæſaris virtutes ubique callidè diſſimulat? Ut Agrippinam, & quibus aliis infenſior Tiberius credebatur, obliquè premit? Quid multa? Non aliquid quàm mancipium aulæ agit. Dices, in tuta illis temporibus veritas fuit. Fateor. Sed verà ſcribere ſi non licuit, falſa non debuit, Nemo ſilentii cauſam reddit (29). i. e. "Velleius Paterculus, among the antients, fires "me with indignation. He exhibits Sejanus as a "man adorned with the whole circle of Virtues, "and applauds him, as in a theatre, in the higheſt "manner. What a front muſt this Hiſtorian have! "But we know that he came into the world, and "died, to the deſtruction of mankind. After beſtowing many elogiums on Livia Auguſta, he ends "with ſaying, that ſhe was a woman who reſembled "the Gods more than mortals. With regard to Tiberius, he looks upon it a crime, to ſpeak of him in "any other terms than of an immortal Jove. But "what man of a ſincere and ingenuous mind could "bear this? On the other ſide, how artfully does he "every where conceal the virtues of Germanicus Cæſar? How inſidiouſly does he endeavour to ruin "Agrippina, and others, for whom Tiberius was "ſuppoſed to harbour an averſion? To ſay all in a "word, he acts no other part than that of a court- "ſlave. But you will ſay, it was not ſafe to ſpeak "truth in thoſe times; I confeſs this: but if he was "afraid of writing the truth, he ought not to have "writ lies. No man is called to account for being "ſilent."

(26) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 225.

(27) See the notes of Boeclerus, on this paſſage of Paterculus.

(28) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 116, 129.

(29) Juſtus Lipſius, lib. 5. Epiſtol. Quæſtion. Epiſt. 11. p. m. 599. Tom. 1.

[F] It is a miſtake to aſſert, that there was an Annaliſt of Rome named Cneius Velleius.] Glandorpius's words are as follow: Cneius Velleius, hiſtoricus cujus

I ſhall animadvert on ſome errors of Moreri [G].

Annales citantur apud Gellium lib. 18. cap. 12. quo tempore in repub. vixerit, non comperi (30). i.e. " Cneius " Vellius, the Hiſtorian, whoſe Annals are cited in " Aulus Gellius, book 18. chap. 12. I have not " found in what time of the Commonwealth he " lived." In this part of Aulus Gellius, of Henry Stephens's edition, Cn. Vellius in Annalibus. Here then is one error of Glandorpius, Velleius for Vellius. And another is this, he ſhould have read in Aulus Gellius, Gellius and not Vellius; for he doubtleſs cites the ſame author there as he cited in chapter 13. book 8. and chap. 21. of book 13. under the name of Cn. Gellius: Voſſius (31) ſays, that Glandorpius has conjectured, that, inſtead of Cn. Vellius, we are to read Cn. Gellius, in chap. 12. book 18. of Aulus Gellius; but the above cited words of Glandorpius ſhew evidently that this is a falſity. Had Voſſius ſaid that, according to Glandorpius's conjectures, Gellius the Annaliſt is the ſame perſon with Cneius Gellius, againſt whom Cato the Cenſor pleaded (32), he would have been very much in the right, for Glandorpius expreſſes himſelf as follows (33): Fors idem eſt annalium ſcriptor cujus librum 2. citat Gellius 13, capite 21 & 15 (34). Now there is nothing here which relates to the paſſage, where it is Cn. Vellius in Henry Stephens's edition.

(30) Gland. Onomaſt. p. 887.

(31) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 1. cap. 8. p. 34.

(31) Aul. Gellius, lib. 14 cap. 2.

(33) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 380.

(34) We cannot find what Glandorpius means by this 15; but whether he means the chapter or book, he is miſtaken.

[G] I ſhall animadvert on ſome errors of Moreri.] I. The Moderns are in doubt very much, ſays he, whether his firſt name was Caius, Marcus, or Publius. This is not a good phraſe; it leading the reader to ſuppoſe, that Paterculus was firſt called by one of theſe names, and that he afterwards laid it aſide to aſſume another. This is very much practiſed by the Moderns: one of the French Chaplains of the 17th Century, gained great fame by the name of Count de Bouteville, and afterwards by that of Duke of Luxemburg. But nothing like this muſt be ſuppoſed of our hiſtorian, with regard to the name Caius or Publius, &c. the Romans always preſerving thoſe kinds of names: in a word, Moreri ought to have ſaid prænomen, or the proper name, and not the firſt name. II. He ſhould not have aſſerted that Paterculus was of a family that came from Naples: where did he find this? He ſays that his atavus was of Aſculum (35), and that the grandfather of this atavus was the chief man among the people of Campania, Campanorum principis (36). He affirms in another place (37), that no man in Campania was ſuperior to his grandfather. There is not one thing particular in this place, concerning the city of Naples; and I am ſurprized that Dodwell ſhould ſay, that Paterculus's grandfather was born in this city (38); for this cannot be inferred, becauſe this old man laid violent hands upon himſelf, when he could not accompany Tiberius at his leaving Naples. Doujat has committed theſe two errors as well as Moreri (39), occaſioned probably by his tranſcribing from him: whence we may infer, that a Dictionary writer has frequently the honour of being conſulted and copied by perſons who know more than himſelf: ſo well people love not to take the pains to collect materials, when they meet with collections of them ready at hand. III. Paterculus indeed ſucceeded his father in the command of the Cavalry: Miſſus cum eo (Tiberio) præfectus equitum in Germaniam ſucceſſor officii patris mei (40); but then he did not ſucceed him before he had been a Military Tribune. He had already been Camp-Marſhal, Functum ante tribunatu caſtrorum (41), a poſt ſuperior to that of a mere Tribune of the ſoldiers. IV. His father was not his Collegue in any employment. V. Magius Celer Velleianus was his brother, and not his father. VI. It does not appear that he was Lieutenant-General under Tiberius, in the armies of Germany and Hungary, but in Dalmatia (42). VII. And in this caſe his brother, who was abſent (43), could not be his collegue.

(35) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 16.

(36) Idem, Ibid.

(37) Idem, Ibid. cap. 76. See remark [A], citat. (1) above.

(38) Dodwell, in Synopſi Chronolog. ad calcem Annal. Velleian.

(39) Doujat, Preface to his tranſlation of Paterculus.

(40) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 104.

(41) Idem, Ibid.

(42) Idem, Ibid. cap. 115.

(43) Had he been preſent, would he have ſaid merely, that his brother had had the advantage of being with Tiberius?

PATIN (GUY), Profeſſor of Phyſick in the Royal College of Paris, was a perſon of great wit and erudition. See his Elogium prefixed to his Letters. Theſe are ſo well known all over the world, that this circumſtance will be my excuſe for not expatiating on his merit. It will be ſufficient for me to obſerve, that the reader may be informed of it in the Preface above hinted at. It would ſhew too great a delicacy in any perſon, to be diſpleaſed at the Author of the Elogium in queſtion, for not giving the hiſtory of Guy Patin. This is the common way of thoſe who write Elogiums. They ſeldom or never take the pains to inform us of the place of a man's birth, nor in what manner he raiſed himſelf; and do not ſpeak of his actions, unleſs they relate in a diſtinguiſhed manner to the virtue for which they applaud him. It is therefore neceſſary that I inform my readers, that our Patin was born at Houdan in Bray, three Leagues from Beauvais (a), in 1602 *. He does not boaſt of his being well deſcended, he ſpeaking of his family much after the ſame manner as Horace does of his [A]. He doubtleſs made his way into the world merely (a) Patin, Letter 293, p. 561. Tom. 3. Geneva edit. 1691.

* He was born the 6th of Auguſt, 1602. From the rem. on the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 970.

(b) It is ſaid in his elogium, that he died at ſeventy years of age, in 1672.

[A] He ſpeaks of his family much after the ſame manner as Horace does of his (a).] " My Parents, " ſays he (1), were good honeſt people, whom I " would not have exchanged for others who are " richer. Their picture is here before my eyes: I " daily remember their virtue, and am extremely " glad that I was an eye-witneſs to the innocence of " their lives, which was wonderful. The inhabi- " tants of cities, and particularly thoſe of Paris, do " not lead ſuch lives. I now ſee nothing but vanity, " cheating, and knavery. God reſerved us for a " fraudulent and dangerous age." I will now hear what Horace ſaid of his father:

Purus & inſons
(Ut me collaudem) ſi vivo, & charus amicis,
Cauſa fuit pater his, qui macro pauper agello,
Noluit in Flavi ludum me mittere magni.
. . . . . .
Nec timuit, ſibi ne vitio quis verteret, olim
Si præco parvas, aut (ut fuit ipſe) coactor
Mercedes ſequerer: neque ego eſſem queſtus. Ob hoc nunc
Laus illi debetur, & à me gratia major.
Nil me pœniteat ſanum patris hujus: eòque
Non, ut magna dolo factum negat eſſe ſuo pars,
Quòd non ingenuos habeat claroſque parentes,
Sic me defendam: longè mea diſcrepat iſtis
Et vox & ratio. Nam ſi natura juberet
A certis annis ævum remeare peractum,
Atque alios legere ad faſtum, quoſcunque parentes
Optaret ſibi quiſque: meis contentus, honeſtos
Faſcibus & ſellis nolim mihi ſumere E demens:
Judicio vulgi (2).

(1) Patin, Letter 293. p. m. 561.

(2) Horat. Satyr. 6. lib. 1. ver. 68.

That is,

" If innocent my life, if (to commend
" Myſelf) I live belov'd by every friend:
" I thank my father for't, for being poor,
" His farm but ſmall, the uſual ways forbore;
" He did not ſend me to Sir Flavius ſchool
" To teach me arts, and make me great by rule.
. . . . . .
" Nor did he fear the cenſuring world ſhould blame
" His high deſigns, or I be damn'd with ſhame.
" If after all his coſt I ſhould be made
" A common cryer, or a meaner trade;
" Or elſe, as he himſelf, have poorly liv'd
" A mean exciſeman, nor ſhould I have griev'd:
" I owe more thanks, and more reſpect for this,
" Nor ſhall I e're whatever fops adviſe,
" Repent of ſuch a father if I'm wiſe.

" Therefore

merely by the force of his genius ; and I was informed by a perſon whoſe veracity cannot be

" Therefore as others when they haughty ſcorn,
" 'Twas not our fault we were not nobly born,
" I do not ſay, nor mind thoſe meaner cares ;
" My words and thoughts are different far from theirs.
" For ſhould kind nature bid my ſoul retire,
" Go back to birth, and chooſe a noble ſire,
" As great as thought could frame, or pride deſire;
" Content with thoſe I have, let others chooſe,
" I wou'd the noble and the great refuſe :
" And this is fooliſh, this a wild deſign
" I'th Crowd's opinion."—— CREECH.

[How agreeable a picture does Mr. Pope give of his parents !

Of gentle blood (part ſhed in honour's cauſe,
While yet in Britain honour had applauſe)
Each parent ſprang——" What fortune, pray ?"----
Their own,
And better got than Beſtia's from the throne.
Born to no pride, inheriting no ſtrife,
Nor marrying diſcord in a noble wife,
Stranger to civil and religious rage,
The good man walk'd innoxious thro' his age :
No courts he ſaw, no ſuits would ever try,
Nor dar'd an oath, nor hazarded a lye :
Unlearn'd, he knew no ſchoolman's ſubtile art,
No language, but the language of the heart.
By nature honeſt, by experience wiſe,
Healthy by temp'rance, and by exerciſe,
His life, tho' long, to ſickneſs paſt unknown,
His death was inſtant, and without a groan.
O grant me thus to live, and thus to die !
Who ſprung from Kings ſhall know leſs joy than I *.]

* Pope, epiſt. 7. to Dr. Arbuthnot. Addit. by the Tranſl.

§ (α) It is true indeed, that in three volumes of Guy Patin's letters, printed at Geneva in 1691, we do not meet with any particular in them, concerning his family, which does not very well correſpond with the idea which Bayle gives here of it ; but this learned man might have found in Anthony Loiſel's tracts, a note of Claude Joly, which would have given him a more advantageous idea of Patin's family ; and informed him that this famous Phyſician was not the firſt who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in it. Here follows the note in queſtion. It explains a place in the alphabetical Index of antient perſons, mentioned in Anthony Loiſel's dialogue concerning the Advocates of Paris, &c. " Mr. JOHN PATIN, after ſpending ſome years " at the Bar of the Parliament of Paris, withdrew " to the city of Beauvais, the place of his birth, " where he was appointed the King's Counſellor and " Advocate in the Preſident Court, he there exer- " ciſing both thoſe employments together, by virtue " of an Arret of Parliament, paſt in his favour the " 15th of February 1588, as appears by the Confe- " rences des Ordonnances, the laſt edition, printed in " 1641, Tom. I. p. 427. Book II. Tit. VI. Paragr. " V. He exerciſes theſe two employments with " great conſtancy and reſolution, at the time that " this city was prevailed upon to ſide with the " Leaguers ; and therein maintained the King's au- " thority, with great ſkill, and with all the fidelity " that can be required in a man of probity and ho- " nour ; till at laſt, being perſecuted by the factions " of the Mayor Godin, and the Lieutenant General " called Nicholas, who were the two chief ring- " leaders of the League in Beauvais, as he was ſpeak- " ing to the people, according to the duty of his of- " fice, and exhorting them to keep the allegiance " he owed to King Henry IV. he narrowly eſcaped " being ſtoned by the ſecret practices of theſe two " arch-leaguers ; ſo that he was forced to leave the " city, and to retire to the King his maſter, where " he met with ſupport, upon the recommendation of " Mr. de Freſnes-Forget, Secretary of State. He " at laſt was reſtored to his two employments, when " the city returned to the allegiance, due to his Ma- " jeſty ; and there adminiſtred juſtice with reputation, " till, in 1605, he died of a quinſey, at his return " from a journey to Fontaine-bleau, whither he had " been ſent on a commiſſion, in the name of the city, " to the King. He uſed to be frequently employed " on ſuch commiſſions, as well on account of his " employment of King's Advocate, as becauſe of " his eloquence, and his great knowledge in hiſ- " tory and politicks. When he was forced, by the " wild havock made by the Leaguers, to leave Beau- " vais, his houſe was plundered, on which ſad occa- " ſion his excellent books were loſt ; books for which " he had an eſtimable value, and regretted all his " life-time. He left but one daughter, Frances Pa- " tin. He was uncle to Francis Patin, Advocate in " Parliament, who was the father of Mr. Guy Patin, " Doctor, Regent, and Dean of the Faculty (of Phy- " ſick) in Paris, who informed me of the above- " mentioned particulars, and alſo communicated to " me an epigram written in praiſe of his great uncle " in queſtion, printed in libello Epigrammatum vario- " rum ad amicos pro Xeniis per Petrum Geuſſainvil- " lum, Montfortenſem, pro anno 1574, printed at Paris, " apud Dionyſium à Prato 1574,

" A D DOM.
" JOANNEM PATIN, BELLOVACUM,
Facundiſſimum in ſupremo Pariſienſi Senatu Patronum.

" Cùm tu facundas ſolitus nunc ire per artes,
" Elogium & mirum creſcat in ore tuo :
" Cauſidicumque bonum ſic te Polyhymnia reddit,
" Omnes ut ſuperes viribus eloquii :
" Sic tua Muſa mihi quædam incrementa dediſſet,
" Ditior & Cræſo redderer arte ſua :
" Sed quia nummorum non extat plena crumena,
" Pro nummis tribuit Carmina miſſa tibi (3).

(3) Opuſcules de Leiſel, p. 756, 737.

The Senſe is,
TO
Mr. JOHN PATIN of BEAUVAIS,
A very eloquent Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

" Whilſt you're in arts of eloquence employ'd,
" From your ſweet tongue the periods flow har- " monious.
" By fam'd Polyhymnia taught the pleader's art,
" You all excel, and ſhine with brighteſt luſtre.
" Had but your Muſe indulg'd to me a ſmile,
" I'd vie in riches with the Lydian Cræſus.
" But ſince my purſe few golden pieces boaſts,
" Accept, dear friend, this tribute of my verſe."

To this I will add a paſſage ſtill more curious, and which it was not poſſible for Bayle to have any knowledge of, ſince it is tranſcribed from a book that was not printed till ſome years after his death. The work I mean, is, A new Collection of Letters of the late Mr. Guy Patin, taken from the Study of Mr. Charles Spon, printed at Amſterdam by Steenhouwer and Uytwerf, 1718, in two volumes, 12mo. A work that was publiſhed in too careleſs a manner ; and where the proper names, in particular, are often greatly diſguiſed. Patin there ſpeaks as follows concerning his family. " You deſire to be informed " of ſome particulars concerning my family, after " having acquainted me with yours. This, for your " ſake, I'll do with great freedom and pleaſure. " Not to mention that, without boaſting, abſit jactan- " tia verbo, you deſire a thing which twenty other " people have aſked before, moſt of whom were ne- " vertheleſs but little acquainted with me, except by " letter. Imagining here was no harm in this, and " taking it kindly from them, I informed them of " what you will juſt now read. I was born in a " village at three leagues diſtance from Beauvais in " Picardy, named Houdan, the third Barony of the " county of Clermont in Beauvaiſis. The moſt an- " tient perſon of my family I could diſcover, was " Noel Patin, who lived in the ſame pariſh above " 300 years before, whoſe family has continued " down to me. Some of his deſcendants withdrew " to cities, and ſome of them were Notaries in " Beauvais, and Woollen-drapers in Paris ; ſome " embraced a military life, and others continued in " the country. My grandfather, whoſe name I " bear, had a brother, Counſellor in the Prefidial- " Court, and the King's Advocate in Beauvais, he " being a man of vaſt erudition, and his memory be called in queſtion, that he was corrector in a printing-houſe (c). It would be no eaſy matter to determine, whether it were better that the Letters extant of his had been digeſted by their Author, for the publick; than to have been written in a careleſs manner, for

" was

(c) Mr. DRELINCOURT, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden, informed me of this.

" was greatly venerated by my father. My grand" father was a ſoldier, as all were in thoſe martial
" times. My late father went through a courſe of " ſtudies, to qualify himſelf to be an Advocate in
" this place, and was admitted there in 1588, a " week before the barricadoes of Paris, after having
" ſtudied at Orleans and Bourges, under the late
" Meſſ. Fournier and Cujas. He would have ſettled
" all his life in Paris, had not the death of Henry
" III. and the ſiege of Paris which followed it, pre" vented him. In 1590, he was taken priſoner by
" the Leaguers, and could not be ranſomed under
" the ſum of four hundred livres, which was to be " paid down; a ſum that is not very conſiderable
" in theſe days, but was ſo in that age, and particu" larly in time of war, and in the country. My late
" grandmother told me, that to make up this ſum,
" which was collected in ſeveral places, ſhe was forced
" to pawn her wedding-rings, and her ſilver girdle
" with pendants, to a goldſmith in Beauvais, at a
" high intereſt; which I have often heard her relate
" with tears, and deteſting the calamity of thoſe times.
" The chief Nobleman of our country, obſerving
" that my father, who was a handſome young man,
" ſpoke admirably well, and was no ways inclined
" to vice, might be of ſervice to him, found means
" to keep him in his family, in order to make uſe of
" him in his affairs, annuente avo meo, imo urgente,
" i. e. " my grandfather conſenting, nay preſſing
" him to it," and to engage him the more, and keep
" him in that country, he got him the moſt advanta-
" geous match in it; and prevailed with him to mar-
" ry, by fair promiſes which he never performed,
" my late mother, whoſe name was Clara Maneſſier,
" deſcended from a worthy antient family in Amiens.
" My late father's name was Francis Patin, an honeſt
" man, if ever there was one in the world. Were " all people like him, there would not be any occaſi-
" on for Notaries. He uſed to come every year to " Paris, upon his maſter's buſineſs, and had great cre" dit in that city. I have there found a conſiderable
" number of friends, with whom I was not acquainted
" in any manner, who were exceedingly kind to me
" upon his account; which has made me regret him
" ſtill more, a thouſand and a thouſand times. From
" this marriage ſprung ſeven children adhuc ſuperſti-
" tes (ſtill living;) two ſons, of whom I am the eldeſt,
" and a brother who is in Holland. The five daugh" ters are all married; and inherited all my mother's " eſtate, which being divided into five parts, were " portions ſufficient for each. My brother and I had
" the paternal eſtate, which, when remitted hither,
" does not produce an hundred crowns a year; but
" thoſe honeſt worthy people could not help this, they
" having lived, like the antients, moribus antiquis,
" free from avarice and ambition. The only miſ-
" fortune of my late father was, his having had to " do with an ungrateful covetous maſter, with whom
" he got nothing, notwithſtanding he had ſerved
" him, in a very painful way, for almoſt thirty years.
" His concern for his having left Paris, and ſettling
" in the country, on the ſpecious promiſes of a No-
" bleman, qui nimium attendebat ad rem ſuam, (who
" was too ſolicitous for his own intereſt,) made him
" form a reſolution, when I was but a child, to give " me ſuch an education, as might qualify me to be " an Advocate here; ſaying, that living in the coun" try was quite unprofitable; that it was people's " intereſt to go and reſide in cities; and uſed frequent" ly to repeat the following remark of the wiſe man,
" Labor ſtultorum affliget eos qui neſciunt in urbem per-
" gere, i. e. " (The toil of fools, will afflict thoſe
" who do not go and live in towns;) for which rea-
" ſon he uſed to make me read aloud, when I was but
" a child, Plutarch's lives, and taught me a graceful
" way of reading. In this view, he ſent me, when
" but nine years of age, to the great ſchool in Beau-
" vais; and afterwards ſent me to the great ſchool or " college of Boncourt in Paris, where I was a boarder
" two years, and went through a courſe of philoſo-
" phical ſtudies. Some time after the Nobility, to " reward him in a way that might be no expence to
" them, would have given him a benefice for me,
" which I flatly refuſed, proteſting abſolutely, that I
" would never be a prieſt: (benedictus Deus, qui mihi
" illam mentem immiſit in tenera adhuc ætate. (I bleſs
" the Lord for inſpiring me with ſuch a reſolution in " ſo tender an age.) My late father, who thought
" there was ſomething good and ingenious in this
" refuſal, was not very angry with me upon that ac" count; but my mother was exaſperated at me upon
" that account for five years, ſaying, that I refuſed
" the recompence for the long ſervices which my
" father had done for the Noblemen in queſtion;
" but no other reward was to be had. Providence
" aſſiſted me: I ſpent five years without once ſeeing
" her, or going to our houſe. In this interval, I " got acquainted with a man who adviſed me to turn
" Phyſician in Paris: for this purpoſe I ſtudied very " hard from the year 1622 till 1624, when I was " admitted here; and then my parents were recon-
" ciled; and gave me what money they could, to " enable me to take my degree, and purchaſe books.
" Five years after, duxi uxorem (I married,) and ſhall
" inherit (in right of my wife,) an eſtate worth twen" ty thouſand crowns, as ſoon as her father and mo" ther, who are very old, ſhall have left the world;
" not to mention a ſiſter, who has no children, and
" is very rich. Providence has bleſſed my marriage
" with four ſons, viz. Robert, Charles, Peter, and
" Francis. Annum ætatis attegi 41. (I am now one
" and forty,) with more practice than merit in my
" profeſſion, and with leſs health than would be re-
" quiſite for me, quam potiſſimum labefactarunt vigiliæ
" juges & elucubrationes nocturnæ, à quibus etiam nec-
" dum abſtineo, ſed hoc erat in fatis; (which has been
" chiefly impaired by continual watchings, and noc" turnal ſtudies, which I do not refrain from even
" at this time; but ſuch was my fate.) This, me-
" thinks, is what you requeſted of me, and perhaps
" much more. Excuſe my importunity and prolix-
" ity in re tam vili & tam exigua (4), (in ſo trifling a
" ſubject, and of ſo little importance.)" He ſays ſomewhere elſe, in the letters in queſtion (5), that he was pretty nearly related to the Preſident Miron, Intendant of Languedoc, and that his wife was ſecond couſin to this Preſident's daughter.

(4) Guy Patin's Letters to Charles Spon, Letter 18. Tom. 1. p. 78, 79, 80, 81.

(5) Ibid. p. 196 and 214.

As Bayle has ſpoke only of Guy Patin's letters, I ſhall here give a catalogue of his other works, extracted from Merklin's Lindenius renovatus. It contains the following books. De valetudine tuenda per vivendi normam, uſumque legitimum rerum ad benè ſalubriterque vivendum neceſſariarum. Extat p. 341. Medici officioſi à Philb. Guiberto editi, Pariſiis, apud Vid. Th. Popinguè, 1649, 8vo. Notæ in Nicolai Ellain Tractatum de Peſte. Ibidem, p. 485. Notæ in Galeni Librum de Sanguinis miſſione. Ibid. p. 538. Quæſtio de Sobrietate. Pariſiis, 1644, 4to. Et Medici officioſi, p. 446. An totus homo naturâ ſit morbus. Ibid. 1944, 4to. Extat etiam cum D. D. Virorum Epiſtolis & Reſponſis cum medicis, tum Philoſophicis Roterodami, apud Rudolphum à Nuyſſel, 1665, in 4to. Caſpari Hoffmanni Apologiam pro Galeno edidit. Lugduni apud Laurentium Aniſſon, 1666, in 4to. (6). I ſhall add two articles not mentioned by this Author, viz. the Latin tranſlations of divers treatiſes of Andrew du Laurens, inſerted in the Latin edition of the works of this Phyſician, printed at Paris in 1627, 4to. under the direction of Guy Patin (7); and a Latin Treatiſe De Elephantiaſi, mentioned by him in one of his letters to Charles Spon (8). The firſt of theſe works had been printed ſeparately at Paris in 1632, in 12mo, with the following title; Traité de la Conſervation de la Santé par un bon régime & légitime Uſage des choſes requiſes pour bien & ſainement vivre, i. e. " A " Treatiſe ſhewing how health may be preſerved, " by a proper regimen, and a fit uſe of ſuch things " as conduce to well and healthy living." I ſhall here tranſcribe the judgment which Patin himſelf has formed of this treatiſe. I wonder who could tell you, ſays he (9), that I was the Author of the little book concerning the preſervation of health, annexed to the Charitable

(6) Mercklini Lindenius renovatus, p. 396.

(7) See the rem. [B] of the article LAURENS.

(8) Patin's Letters to Spon, Tom. 2. p. 115.

(9) Ibid. Tom. 1. p. 90, 91.

for the particular uſe of thoſe to whom they were ſent [B]: but what judgment ſoever may be formed on this occaſion, I am ſure it will be owned, that the printing of them is of advantage to the publick. The letters indeed are extremely injurious to Paris, which they repreſent as a city infected with a moſt horrid corruption [C]; and filled with wretches

Charitable Phyſician. It is no ways worthy your peruſal. I formerly wrote it at the requeſt of the worthy charitable Phyſician himſelf, Mr. Guybert, from whom I received the Doctor's cap. He deſired me to make it as much for the uſe of the common people as poſſible, in order that it might be annexed to his book. It does not deſerve that you ſhould throw away any time upon it. . . . . If ever I have any leiſure, I will endeavour to retouch the the treatiſe in queſtion, and to put it into a little better condition than it is at preſent: and, in the mean time, beg you would be ſo good as not to inform any perſon that it is a compoſition of mine, for I really am aſhamed of it. Rem. Crit.

[B] Whether it were better that the letters extant of his had been deſigned, by their author, for the publick, than to have been written . . . . for the particular uſe of thoſe to whom they were ſent.] "There are ſo few "good letters, and ſo many bad ones, by the con- "feſſion of Bayle himſelf, that there is no room to "doubt but that it were better they had never been "printed, &c. See, on this ſubject, the Bibliotheque "du Richelet, where I alſo have examined the ac- "cuſation of Atheiſm, falſely imputed to Patin, "&c. *."] Had he deſigned them for publick view, he would have filled them with learning; with accurate obſervations on the hiſtory of the learned, and on their works; he having an excellent memory, a great compaſs of reading, and a fine library. He would not have publiſhed particulars imperfectly enquired into; and as they preſented themſelves to his imagination; in a word, we ſhould have found fewer falſities in his work; but then we ſhould not have ſeen his wit and genius painted in their natural colours; we ſhould not have met with ſo many curious incidents, nor ſo many lively bold touches, which are ſo diverting, and ſuggeſt ſolid reflections. Some ſelect letters of his were publiſhed at Geneva in 1683, which were reprinted ſoon after in Holland. The quick ſale they met with, encouraged a Bookſeller of Geneva to publiſh thoſe which had been rejected at the firſt impreſſion; accordingly he added them to the former; and, by this means, gave a collection in three volumes, anno 1691 (a). This edition was counterfeited in Holland a little after. It were better it had been counterfeited in Germany; becauſe the German Bookſellers have the laudable cuſtom of getting good indexes added to the books they reprint, and no work ever wanted one more than that in queſtion. The public ſoon diſcovered that ſome falſities are inſerted in it. Here follows the judgment paſſed upon it by the Author of Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. "It may be proper to inform the Reader, that all "the witty ſayings, or incidents related by him, "are not true. In ſome there appears a horrid ma- "lice and a ſurprizing boldneſs, in endeavouring to "give a criminal turn to every thing. We ſhould "be greatly in the wrong, to give credit to the par- "ticulars hinted at, becauſe they are printed. All "we can gather from them is, that Mr. Patin wrote "them to a friend, as particulars he had heard from "other people; and in purſuance of the cuſtom he "had long obſerved, of correſponding with him by "letter, in the ſame manner as if they had been taking "a walk together. It is well known that men, in "converſation, talk as ſoon of a report that is cur- "rent in town, though it be not true, as of any "piece of news that is true. And when this hap- "pens to be the caſe with regard to men of a ſaty- "rical temper, as it muſt be confeſſed Patin was, "ſuch perſons publiſh more induſtriouſly ſuch parti- "culars as are diſadvantageous to others, than others "which give praiſe (10)." Menage forms the ſame judgment of them. Guy Patin's Letters abound with falſities. Mr. Bigot and I took notice of a great many ſuch. Mr. Patin was no ways cautious in what he wrote; and prejudice made him give credit to a thouſand things which were not true (11). See the Acta Eruditorum, for May 1648 (12). We are promiſed Guy Patin's Latin Letters, with a beautiful and learned Elogium, written by Mr. Theveneau, a Phyſician of Nevers (13).

§ (a) The new Menagiana, Tom. II. p. 223. and Tom. III. p. 413. of the Paris edition, cites theſe letters as from an edition printed in five volumes at leaſt, which I had never heard of; the two paſſages cited from which are not found either in the edition in three volumes of 1691, nor in the following of 1692, in two volumes. By the way, in both theſe editions a very curious letter is omitted, concerning ſome errors which G. Patin had remarked in Thuanus's Hiſtory. This letter dated the 4th of February 1672, is the 137th in the Rotterdam edition in one volume 12mo. 1689. Rem. Crit.

[C] His letters are extremely injurious to Paris, which they repreſent as a city infected with a moſt horrid corruption.] It would be endleſs ſhould we collect all the complaints which have been made on this head; for which reaſon I will confine myſelf to the obſervations he makes on the crimes of ſuch lewd women as deſtroy their children. "Mademoiſelle de Guer- "chi's death makes a great noiſe here. The mid- "wife had been impriſoned in the Chatelet, whence "ſhe has been removed to the Conciergerie * by a "rule of Court. The Pariſh Prieſt of St. Euſtache "refuſed the above-mentioned Lady Chriſtian burial. "It is reported that her body was carried to the "Hotel de Condé, and there put into lime, to con- "ſume it the ſooner; and prevent its being known, "in caſe a ſearch ſhould be made. The midwife has "made a tolerable defence hitherto, but aliæ admove- "buntur machinæ, aliæ artes adhibebuntur ad eruendum "verum; but other engines will be ſet to work, and "other methods employed in order to extort the "truth. I am of opinion that ſhe will be put to "the torture. The Vicar-Generals and † Peniten- "tiaries have complained to the firſt Preſident, that, "within a twelvemonth, ſix hundred women have "confeſſed their having killed and deſtroyed their "fruit; and that they have taken particular notice "of this, on the report which had been made to "them (14)." Since I have begun to ſpeak of this adventure, I muſt relate the conſequences of it (15). A Libel is publiſhed here conſiſting of eight pages in 4to. (16), by which it is proved, that the crime of which Dame Conſtantin the midwife was lately charged with, is only a ſequel of the doctrine of the Jeſuits; and alſo to undeceive ſuch women as ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed on by this error, upon pretence that the Fathers in queſtion teach it in their books. It is ſaid that the midwife makes a very good defence. She owns that Madam de Guerchi died at her houſe, but that ſhe did not give her any potion: that ſhe came to her houſe very ſick, and died there, making dreadful outcries: that ſhe had heard of a certain potion, which that Lady had taken: but that ſhe did not know what it was, nor who had prepared it . . . . (17). Dame Conſtantin the midwife is ſtill confined in the Chatelet: ſhe is to be examined to morrow. N. and le Large have been ſubpœna'd, to come there and anſwer, as to the facts of the depoſition they have made, an ut ibi fatis cedat pudore carceris, & metu lethalis ſupplicii confecta? We are told that ſhe makes a good defence, and that there are not ſufficient proofs againſt her to condemn her to die; but ſome monitions are expected, which are to be publiſhed in all the pariſhes of the city and ſuburbs of Paris. Others ſay that ſhe will be cleared, and that perſons of the greateſt figure have made ſtrong intereſt for her. Nevertheleſs it is thought that ſhe deſerves death, and more than death; and that were ſhe to be hanged, ſhe would not die innocent. It is ſaid that her houſe was a publick brothel; and that a great number of ſtrumpets uſed to go and lie in there, vel abortum paſſuræ, "or to procure abortions ". . . . . (18)." Wedneſday the 14th of July, Dame Conſtantin, the midwife, was ſentenced, in the Chatelet, to be hanged and ſtrangled, after having been put to the torture, whence ſhe appealed, and have been removed to the Conciergerie. It is thought the next week the ſentence will be confirmed at la Tournelle . . . * (19). The midwife is ſtill in priſon; it is reported that it will be only for the next week, and that the Attorney General appeals againſt her from her ſentence à minima; that he will

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 970. col. 1.

* The priſons belonging to the Parliament of Paris. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

† Penitentiary is a Prieſt who is impowered by the Biſhop, to abſolve ſuch caſes as are reſerved to him. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

(10) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, April 1684. art. 1. p. m. 115, 116.

(11) Menagiana, p. 279, of the firſt Dutch edit.

(12) p. 248 & ſeq.

(13) See the Preface to Patin's letters, edit. of 1691.

(14) Patin, Letter 184, dated 22 June 1660. See p. 113, of Tom. 2.

(15) Ibid. 185. p. 119, of the ſame Tome.

(16) It was burnt by the Hangman at La Croix du Tiroir, by a decree of the Lieutenant-civil. Patin, Letter 190. p. 142, 143.

(17) Ibid. Letter 187. p. 130, 131.

(18) Ibid. Letter 188. dated 16 July, 1660. p. 136.

* A Court of Juſtice belonging to the Parliament of Paris. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

(19) The ſame Letter, 190. p. 144.

wretches who, after uſing their endeavours to people the world, ſtrive afterwards to people will give in his opinion, which will be very ſevere againſt her that ſhe ought to be burnt alive unleſs ſhe diſcovers all her accomplices. In fine, he informs his friend, in a letter dated the 16th of Auguſt 1660 (20), that Dame Conſtantin was hanged : " Damnata fuit laqueo infe- " lix obſtetrix & ſuffocata, in good company at " la Croix du Tiroir * (21)" We have ſeen the concluſion of the Tragedy, both with regard to the midwife, and the Lady delivered ; but let us now ſee part of the Preliminaries concerning the letter. I do not warrant them to be true : and if they happen to be falſe, the writer cited by me muſt anſwer for it (22). " Duke de Joyeuſe made his addreſſes " to Mademoiſelle de Guerchi, companion of Made- " moiſelle du Pons (23), who ſoon ſacrificed him " to the Commander de Jars, of the houſe of Ro- " chechouard . . . . (24). She left the Commander " de Jars for Jeannin de Caſtille, the Treaſurer ; " and behaved with ſo little diſcretion that the " Queen baniſhed her the Court. Notwithſtanding " this, Duke de Vitry made his addreſſes to her ; " and treated her with as much reſpect as if ſhe had " always lived chaſtly, though, at that time, ſhe " had had four or five children by different men. She " was again with child, and the Duke would have " had her delivered before her time, to ſave her " reputation, which he did not ſuppoſe to be ſo far " loſt as it really was. In vain ſhe declared, that it " would be a prodigious pleaſure for her to have " this pledge of his love : he was abſolutely deter- " mined to make her deſtroy the fruit of their " amours ; and, for this purpoſe, ſent to her one " Conſtantin a midwife, who would have forced the " child out of her, but ſhe died in the operation, " and Conſtantin was hanged. Duke de Vitry was " inconſolable for her death ; and reſpected her " memory to ſuch a degree, that he afterwards had " an intrigue with a common proſtitute, becauſe ſhe " was like her. This woman growing rich by the " Duke's munificence to her, married afterwards " Marquis de Goudron, a younger brother of the " family of Gamache." [Henault the Poet was ſuppoſed to have Mademoiſelle Guerchi in view, (though the truth of this is very much doubted †) when he wrote his famous Sonnet on an Embrio . As this Sonnet is looked upon as a very fine one, has been celebrated by ſo many Authors, and many inaccurate copies of it are printed, I ſhall tranſcribe it here from the little volume of Henault's works, it being rarely met with.

(20) The 194th, p. 162 of Tom. 2.

* A public fountain, over which a croſs ſtood, in Paris. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

(21) I believe ſhe is hinted at by Abbé Marolles, in the paſſage which will be quoted hereunder, citat. (63). Compare this with the Memoirs of Chavagnac, p. m. 210.

(22) Galanteries des Rois de France, Tom. 2. p. 198. Bruſſells edit. 1694.

(23) That is to ſay, that ſhe was Maid of Honour to the Queen-Mother, Ann of Auſtria.

(24) Galanteries des Rois de France, Tom. 2. p. 210.

† See the cloſe of rem. [A], of the article HENAULT [N].

 See the whole Rem. [A] of the article HENAULT.

" SONNET.

" Toy qui meurs avant que de naître,
" Aſſemblage confus de l'être & du néant,
" Triſte Avorton, informe Enfant,
" Rebut du Néant & de l'être.

" Toy que l'amour fit par un Crime,
" Et que l'honneur défait par un crime à ſon tour.
" Funeſte Ouvrage de l'Amour,
" De l'honneur funeſte victrime.

" Donne fin aux remors par quî tu t'és vangé ;
" Et du fond du Neant où je t'ay replongé,
" N'entretiens point l'horreur dont ma faute eſt ſuivie.

" Deux Tyrans oppoſez ont decidé ton ſort.
" L'amour malgré l'honneur t'a fuit donne la vie.
" L'honneur malgré l'amour te fait donner la mort ††.

†† OEUVRES DIVERSES, &c. Par le Sieur D. H (Henault). p. 237. Paris 1670, 12mo.

There being alſo a Latin tranſlation of the abovementioned Sonnet, (probably by Henault himſelf) printed in his works, it may not be improper to add it here.

" Tu, qui necdum ortus, cadis ipſo in limine vitæ,
" Mixta gerens nibili, & naturæ inſignia moles,
" Informis triſti fœtus ſucciſus abortu :
" Naturæ, & nibilo, fatis male creditus infans.

" Tu, quem inſanus amor furtivo crimine finxit,
" Quem pudor inſanus furtivo crimine mactat,
" Væ ! nimium inſani funeſtum pignus amoris,
" Victima væ ! nimium, inſani funeſta pudoris.

" Temperet à meritis, ſine, mens ſibi conſcia pœnis.
" E nihilique ſinu, quo te ſcelerata recondo,
" Et ſcelera, & ſcelerum horrorem non ingere matri.

" Fata per adverſos tua ſunt diſtracta tyrannos.
" Te vita donavit amor, nolente pudore.
" Te vitâ nolente pudor ſpoliavit amore *."

* Ibid. p. 238.

This Sonnet having been tranſcribed by ſome of our Engliſh writers ; and no one having given it in Engliſh, an imitation is attempted hereunder.

O thou, whoſe eyes were cloſed in death's pale night,
E'er fate reveal'd thee to my aking ſight !
Ambiguous ſomething ! by no ſtandard fixt ;
Frail ſpan, of naught and of exiſtence mixt :
Embrio ! imperfect as my tort'ring thought :
Sad outcaſt of exiſtence and of naught.

Thou, who from guilty Love receiv'dſt thy frame ;
Whom guilty honour kills, to hide her ſhame.
Dire off-ſpring, form'd by love's too pleaſing power ;
Honour's dire victim in a luckleſs hour.

Soften the pangs which ſtill revenge thy doom ;
Nor, from the dark abyſs of nature's womb,
Where back I've caſt thee, let revolving time
Call up paſt ſcenes to aggravate my crime.

Two adverſe tyrants rul'd thy wayward fate,
(Thyſelf the ſacrifice to their fierce hate.)
Love, ſpite of honour's dictates gave thee breath :
Honour, in ſpite of love, pronounc'd thy death †.]

J. LOCKMAN.

† Addit. by the Tranſl.

Theſe citations do not carry me ſo far from my ſubjects as might be imagined ; they exhibiting proofs of the text of this remark, or at leaſt, confirm the relation of Guy Patin. Beſides, I ſhall not value the being cenſured for giving too long citations, provided I do but ſave a conſiderable number of my Readers the diſſatisfaction of being inſtructed only by halves ; or the trouble of ſearching the ſequel of things, by turning over a variety of books. But however this be, here follows a quotation, which bears a nearer relation to Patin's narrative.

Thuanus relates, that in 1557, a law was enacted, ſentencing to death, as guilty of parricide, all women who ſhould conceal their pregnancy or delivery, and that ſhould not produce certificates concerning the condition in which their child was born ; in caſe there was any proof of its having been buried without the requiſite ceremonies, and unbaptized. Ea lege ſancitum, ut quæ graviditatem partumve celaſſet neque alterutrius teſtationem aut de edito fœtu ſeu vivo ſeu mortuo proferret, ſi eum lavacro juſtiſve exſequiarum privatum probationibus conſtaret, de illa tanquam parricidii rea ultimum ſupplicium ſumeretur (25). From that time this crime in queſtion was puniſhed with greater ſeverity than any ; and, that no perſon might plead ignorance, the Judges always cauſed it to be inſerted in the ſentence of condemnation, that the ordinance ſhould be publiſhed by ſound of trumpet, in all cities where there are courts of juſtice ; and that the Pariſh-Prieſts ſhould publiſh it from their pulpits, on feſtival days, in all towns and villages (26). Nevertheleſs, this crime continued to be more common than any other ; for Thuanus declares, that there were very few weeks, in which the Judges of criminal matters in Paris did not try one or more women charged with the crime in queſtion ; ſo mighty is the power of ſhame, ſince it prevails, in a fearful ſex, over the fears of a gallows, and the remorſe of conſcience. In nullum crimen ab eo tempore ſeverius vindicatum fuit. Ac ne qua ignorantiæ excuſatio prætexeretur, ſententiis judicum ſemper additum eſt, ut lex in inferioribus tribunalibus palam & per plateas urbium publica præconis voce promulgaretur, & per oppida ac pagos à curionibus coram populo diebus feſtis recitaretur. Nihilominus nullum frequentius crimen etiam hodie eſt, nec ulla

(25) Thuan. lib. 19. p. 395. ad ann. 1557.

(26) See the cloſe of the rem. [E].

ulla fere ſeptimana abit, quin in claſſe, quæ de judiciis capitalibus cognoſcit, una pluresve tam horrendi flagitii reæ producantur ; adeo malus pudor in verecundo & impotenti ſexu ſupplicii terrorem, & quod omni corporis pœna gravius eſt, conſcientiæ morſus vincit (27). It will be proper to relate the occaſion of enacting this law. Notice had been given that ſeveral women, to preſerve themſelves from infamy, uſed to kill their children after their delivery ; and throw them into the river, or the neceſſary-houſe ; or buried them in unconſecrated ground, without initiating them into the Chriſtian church by baptiſm. Such as were proſecuted for this crime, uſed to alledge to the Judges, that ſhame would not permit them to make a diſcovery of their pregnancy ; and that, contrary to their deſire, their children were ſtill-born. By this means they got off clear, there not being any witneſſes to prove the contrary ; and moſt of the Judges uſed to give it as their opinion, that they ought to be put to the torture. If they bore it, without confeſſing that they had deſtroyed their children, they were acquitted from all farther puniſhment. It was thought, that impunity increaſed the wickedneſs in queſtion ; and therefore a very ſevere law was ſolicited, and obtained ; but though it was executed with great ſeverity, ſtill the evil was not healed. Let us hear Thuanus (28) : Altera lex in ſpeciem ſevera, ſed qua impiis & abominandis parricidiis, quæ antea impunita, nunc etiam poſt legem conditam nimis frequentia ſunt, pœna conſtituta eſt, poſtulante Senatu promulgatur V. Non. Martias. Fœminæ, quæ viros non habebant, ubi ex furtivo complexu conceperant, malo pudore territæ utero celato ad extremum partus fere enecabant, geminato ſcelere famæ conſulere ſe exiſtimantes, & enecatos aut in ſterquilinium ſeu profluentem abjiciebant, aut loco profano defoſſos perdebant, atque ita neceſſaria ſacri lavacri relligione ac ſepulturæ honore privabant. Quod ſi quando res in judicium deduceretur, pudorem, quominus culpam confeſſæ eſſent, cauſſatæ mortuos ſe enixas dicebant, & ita deficientibus aliunde probationibus debitam inhumano ſceleri pœnam effugiebant. Nam judicum in hujuſmodi cauſſis incertæ plerumque erant & vagabantur ſententiæ, cum ad mortem alii tanti criminis reas damnarent ; alii, quod ſæpius accidebat, pronioribus ad miſericordiam animis, quæſtionum violentiæ ſubjiciendas cenſerent, ut vivoſne an mortuos fœtus enixæ eſſent ex ipſarum confeſſione conſtaret ; quam ſi obſtinato animo ferrent, liberæ dimittebantur (29).

(27) Thuan. lib. 19. p. 395. ad ann. 1557.

(28) Idem, ibid.

(29) We ſhall obſerve, in the remark [D] hereunder, that the procuring of abortions is of very great antiquity. See the Commentators on Minutius Felix, in Editione Ouzeliana, on the following words. Sunt quæ in ipſis viſceribus medicaminibus epotis, originem futuri hominis extinguant, & parricidium faciant antequam pariant.

A COMPARISON between the power of conſcience, and that of the point of honour.

(30) See articles 162 and 163 of Penſees ſur les Cometes.

This very ſtrongly corroborates ſome of the doctrines of the Author of the Thoughts of Comets (30). For what man, after having read the abovementioned paſſage of Thuanus, would preſume to deny, that the ideas, with regard to the point of honour, are not the ſtrongeſt bank which could be thrown up, to ſtop the flood of incontinency ? Who would dare to affirm, that, in general, the laws of religion are more effectual, or as effectual a remedy as that in queſtion ? If religion had a greater aſcendant over women, than the point of honour, would ſo great a number of them deſtroy their children ? Is not this a more cruel and barbarous murder, than to kill an antient man in ſome wood or foreſt ? Can any crime be more horrid, and more repugnant to nature, than that of the wicked mothers in queſtion ? They are perſuaded that, in deſtroying the fruit of their womb, they commit a parricide ; that it is more deteſtable, in the eye of Heaven, than the action of thoſe who rob and murder on the high-way. Beſides, moſt of thoſe hinted at by Thuanus and Patin, are alſo perſuaded, that they deprive their children of eternal life ; and that they caſt them into Limbus, where they muſt be deprived of the ſight of God to all eternity. This perſuaſion aggravates their crime to ſuch a degree as is inexpreſſible. Nevertheleſs, they perpetrate it in contempt of God, and in ſpite of the religion they profeſs ; and this merely, that they may not loſe their ſhare of worldly honour : this honour, therefore, muſt have a greater aſcendant over them, than the inſtinct of conſcience, and all divine laws. It is even ſtronger than the fear of death ; for, after the ſevere law mentioned by Thuanus, they ran the hazard of being put to death, and there was great probability of their being puniſhed for it ; and nevertheleſs this law, though very often put in execution, was to no effect ; theſe murders being as frequent as ever. What argument can be brought to prove in a ſtronger manner the power of the punctilio of honour, and the mighty aſcendant it has over us ? Will any one deny, that this punctilio alone would be ſufficient to reſtrain incontinence within thoſe limits, in which we ſee it confined ? It is not its buſineſs to prevent hidden crimes ; this is the buſineſs of conſcience : but when thoſe hidden crimes draw after them ſuch conſequences as are with great difficulty concealed from the public, it is of great power, in order to prevent them. Such is the incontinence of a woman who has no huſband. It will be to no purpoſe to ſay, that the art of procuring abortions is brought almoſt to perfection ; and that if we except that of curing venereal diſtempers, there is none, which a wretched induſtry, excited by the wants of numberleſs multitudes of people, has improved more than this ; for it cannot be denied, but that the conſequences I am ſpeaking of, are very perplexing. How many women, after labouring under difficulties, and having been under the greateſt tortures of mind, and after taking a great many drugs, could yet not prevent their crime from coming to the knowledge of the world ? Murther does not always hide it ; it ſometimes making it more infamous and fatal, becauſe of the puniſhment which accompanies it ; ſo that if a violent paſſion, and furious tranſport of natural diſpoſition, do not entirely take away the uſe of reaſon, women will never expoſe themſelves to inconvenient and dangerous conſequences, like thoſe in queſtion. Hence we may conclude, that ſince Thuanus and Patin declare that a great number of women break through this barrier, the fair ſex muſt be tortured in a violent manner (31). The Reader will particularly obſerve, that they ſpeak only of ſuch as deſtroy the fruit of their womb. If the confeſſors would give us a liſt of ſuch as uſe precautions ſtill earlier, and before the ſoul is come into the body, they would not confine themſelves to ſix hundred in ſuch a city of Paris, which, by the account of the moſt unprejudiced travellers, is not ſo immerſed in lewdneſs, as moſt capitals in the weſtern part of the world. By the way, theſe immature or anticipated abortions are a real parricide, in the opinion of good Caſuiſts. Read the following paſſage from Tertullian. Nobis vero homicidio ſemel interdicto, etiam conceptum utero, dum adhuc ſanguis in hominem delibatur, diſſolvere non licet : homicidii feſtinatio eſt prohibere naſci, nec refert natam quis eripiat animam, an naſcentem diſturbet : homo eſt & qui eſt futurus ; etiam fructus omnis jam in ſemine eſt (32). i. e. " Murther " being once forbidden, we are not allowed to de- " ſtroy the fœtus, though uninformed in the womb. " It is haſtening of murther to hinder the birth : " and it is the ſame to take away life when already " formed, or whilſt it is only forming. That is " man which would be man ; and all fruit is al- " ready in the ſeed." Guy Patin had pointed out this paſſage to the Lieutenant-Criminal, at the time of Mrs. Conſtantine's trial.

(31) See Penſees ſur les Cometes, articles 162, 163.

(32) Tertull. in Apologet. cap. 9. Patin's Letters, 188, p. 137, cites him. What he quotes, p. 144, from the ſame Tertullian de Anima, cap. 25, is not to the purpoſe.

I remember to have heard this queſtion put, whether, in order to prevent ſuch women as have not the gift of continency, from committing ſo many crimes, and to ſave the State ſo many ſubjects, of which it is deprived, it were not neceſſary to leſſen a little the aſcendant of the punctilio of honour ; that is, to decreaſe conſiderably the ſhame of an unmarried woman who happens to be with child ; for it is obſerved that, in ſuch countries where people are not ſo delicate on this article, and where ſuch women as thoſe we are ſpeaking of eaſily get huſbands, and appear confidently in companies, abortions are vaſtly leſs frequent ; and the Judges are not ſo much employed in puniſhing thoſe who deſtroy their children. A grave Gentleman immediately anſwered, and proved, by very good arguments, that the remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe ; and that there is nothing which the State ought to preſerve with greater care, than the fear of diſhonour, when it is connected with criminal actions, as in the preſent caſe. For this reaſon, adds he, Magiſtrates ought to be extremely cautious of ſtigmatizing people. A man who has once loſt his reputation, caſts off the rein which kept him to his duty ; and infamy is leſs dreaded, when we ſee it inflicted every day. Da principio ſi hanno in grande horrore gli infami, mentre ſi veggono miſti tra gli altri Cittadini : ma con l'aſſuefarſi à tolerarli, pare, che sì di giorno in giorno ſi allegeriſca la macchia, che quaſi al fine ſvaniſca in tutto. Così vienſi à poco à poco à porre in uſo nella Città il traſcurare l'infamia, errore d'ogni altro più grave, e più pericoloſo per il viver non Civile. Però ſtimo io bene l'andar lento à dichiarar publicamente infami i rei, quando la nota, con cui ſi ſegnano, non ſia perpetua per terrore degli altri. Perchè, ſe ben l'infamia naſce propriamente dalla operatione, di chi commette il misfatto; nondimeno non bene manifeſta da tutti ſi diſcerne, finche publica dichiaratione non vi ſi aggiunga (33). i. e. " Infamous perſons are at firſt looked up-

" on with horror, whilſt they are blended with the reſt
" of the citizens; but by cuſtom in tolerating them, the " infamy ſeems to leſſen every day, and at laſt to va-
" niſh quite away. In this manner, it becomes a " practice, inſenſibly, to overlook infamy; the great-
" eſt and moſt dangerous error in ſociety. However,
" I think it prudent, to be ſlow in ſtigmatizing
" guilty perſons publickly, when the ſtigma, with " which they are branded, is not perpetual, to ſtrike
" terror into others. Becauſe, though infamy re-
" ſults properly from the action of him who perpe-
" trates a crime; nevertheleſs, it is not plainly diſ-
" covered by all, till a public declaration is added
" to it." But ſince I have ſaid ſo much on this ſubject, the Reader will give me leave to add a word or two more. If he is deſirous of ſeeing, in the ſtrongeſt light, how greatly ſuperior the aſcendant or power of the punctilio of honour is to that of conſcience, let him conſider one of the ſix hundred women who had made away with her child.
Religion diſſuaded them from it for a variety of reaſons. It ſuggeſted to them the parricide, the eternal damnation of the child, the injuſtice of their deſign, and the goodneſs they ought to have made of their fault. They were deſirous of preſerving the reputation of being virtuous women: now this was an unjuſt deſign, it was a theft, a mere uſurpation of a benefit which did not belong to them: it was even an uſurpation intended for a very bad uſe, to impoſe upon the public in general, and a huſband in particular; for they were deſirous of being in a condition to beſtow themſelves upon a man, as a chaſt, modeſt, and unblemiſhed maiden. The advantage they might have reaped from diſcovering their fault, was great, with reſpect to their ſalvation; they might have drawn from thence a thouſand arguments to turn them to humility and contrition. Yet no ſoon-er did the punctilio of honour appear, but it threw down this great number of batteries. Muſt we not therefore own, that it is a thouſand times ſtronger than conſcience. The Italian Author is ſtill on my ſide. Però ſi dovera à giudicio mio aſſerire, che aſſolu-tamente la religione ſia più atta à render gli huomini giuſti, & innocenti: ma che all' incontro per lo riſpetto degli intereſſi, e per la ripugnanza degli affetti, i quali quaſi venti contrarii, turbano il mare della vita civile, più operi per la felicità Morale il zelo dell' Honore. Perche gli huomini ſono più facili à moverſi à bene operare per lo premio dell' Honore, & à guardarſi dal mal fare per la macchia della infamia, che ſi veggono innanzi à gli occhi, che per le promiſſe di premii, ò pur di caſtighi futuri, e lontani (34). i. e, " Yet it muſt, in my opi" nion be owned, that religion is abſolutely the beſt
" adapted to make men juſt and innocent; but, on " the other ſide, on account of ſelf-intereſt, and the " reluctance of the paſſions, which, like contrary
" winds, diſturb the ocean of civil life, the puncti-
" lio of honour is moſt conducive to moral felicity.
" Becauſe mankind are more perſuaded to do good,
" from a motive of honour; and to refrain from evil,
" from a dread of infamy, which is preſent to their
" eye, than from the promiſe of rewards, or dread
" of puniſhments, which are future and far diſtant."

(33) Lodovico Zuccolo, Academico Filopono di Faenza, Diſcorſo dell' Honore, capitol. 22. p. 122, Venice edit. 1623.

(34) Ibid. capitol. 20. p. 106.

[" Bayle's long digreſſion, comprehended in the " remarks C, D, E, F, is but a part of the proofs
" he had collected, to ſupport a paradox he was " mighty fond of, and which he has introduced in " ſeveral places in his Dictionary. This paradox is,
" that religion has very little influence over the mo-
" rals of men; and conſequently that, in a ſociety
" conſiſting wholly of Atheiſts, there neither would " be more moral evil nor leſs good, than in a ſo-
" ciety compoſed entirely of Chriſtians. It is to prove
" this in part, that he inſiſts ſo ſtrongly in this ar" ticle, *that the point of honour is a thouſand times
" more powerful than conſcience*, to bridle incontinence
" in both ſexes. But though we ſhould allow him
" all the facts he produces here, and that in particular
" relating to the ſix hundred women, whom he ſup-
" poſes after (citat. 33.) deſtroyed the fruit of their " womb in the ſpace of a year, and that only in the " city of Paris; it will be impoſſible for him to " draw, from theſe particular inſtances, the follow" ing general conſequence, that *the point of honour is
" a thouſand times more powerful than conſcience.*
" I. We may juſtly object to him, that the very ſame
" year, and in the ſame city of Paris, a much greater " number of women had been prevailed upon, by " religious views and motives of conſcience, not to
" ſwerve from their duty. This is a fact that no
" man, who is not poſſeſſed with the moſt obſtinate
" prejudice, can deny. II. Bayle may be refuted by " what he himſelf lays down. He ſuppoſes, after
" Patin, (citat. (14.) that *the Vicar-Generals and Pe-
" nitentiaries had complained to the firſt Preſident, that,
" within a twelvemonth, ſix hundred women had con-
" feſſed their having killed and deſtroyed their fruit.*
" What had forced the ſix hundred women in queſ-
" tion to make this humiliating confeſſion of their " crime; what but conſcience and religion? Here
" then religion triumphs, in its turn, over the point
" of honour. But why had theſe ſix hundred wo" men, whom their ordinary confeſſors refuſed to
" abſolve, by referring them to the Penitentiaries,
" recourſe to penance, &c.? It was becauſe they " were conſcious of the enormity of their crimes;
" were terrified at the reflection on them; were
" grieved for their having commited them; were
" deſirous of reconciling themſelves to Heaven, and
" were in hopes that its grace would preſerve them
" from the like guilt for the future, &c. Since theſe
" circumſtances were known only by the ſecret con-
" feſſion they had made of them, their honour was " conſequently ſkreened. Inſtead of theſe ſix hun" dred women, (bad Chriſtians if you will, but ne-
" verthleſs Chriſtians and who had not quite extin-
" guiſhed the ſentiments of religion) ſuppoſe, ac" cording to Bayle's ſyſtem, ſix hundred atheiſtical
" women, who were firmly perſuaded that there is no
" God, Paradiſe, nor Hell, and conſequently that a " concealed ſin is an action merely indifferent, what,
" in this caſe, could have prompted them to repent?
" Bayle ſays, (a little after citat. 30) *What man,
" after having read the above-mentioned paſſage of " Thuanus, would preſume to deny, that the ideas with " regard to the point of honour are not the ſtrongeſt bank
" which could be thrown up, to ſtop the flood of inconti" nence*, &c.? In oppoſition to this, I ſay, that we " may naturally conclude from the paſſage in queſ-
" tion of Thuanus, that the ideas with regard to the " point of honour, were very weak in the women in " queſtion. Not one of them had been checked by
" the point of honour, in their committing the firſt
" crime. It is true indeed, that, after having com" mitted the crime without having enough conſidered
" the conſequences of it, an unexpected pregnancy
" prompted them to ſcreen their honour by a murder;
" and that honour, in this particular caſe, prevailed
" over conſcience. But it is reaſoning very ill to ar" gue from thence, that the ideas with regard to the " point of honour are the ſtrongeſt bank which could be " thrown up, to ſtop the flood of incontinency. We may " look upon it as a truth, that motives of religion
" and conſcience prevent a thouſand impure actions,
" but that the ideas of the point of honour ſcarce pre" vent one,

" Bayle himſelf, in the whole, cannot deny this.
" He ſays, after citat. 31. It is not the buſineſs of the " point of honour to prevent hidden crimes; this is the " buſineſs of conſcience. The law of God forbids, not " only fornication, adultery, and all other exterior
" ſins of this kind; but it alſo condemns all ſuch in" ternal ſins as correſpond to them. All internal ſins,
" which are infinitely more numerous than external
" ones, are out of the ſphere of the point of honour.
" The ſame may be affirmed of above three fourths
" and more of external ſins, as *oſcula, tactus impudici,
" mollities, &c.* On the other ſide, there is no room to " doubt but there are millions of Chriſtian women
" (by which I mean the whole ſex in general) who not " only refrain from actions, which, as Bayle ſays,
" *draw after them ſuch conſequences as are with great
" difficulty concealed from the publick*; but who alſo are
" in a conſtant diſpoſition of mind, not to conſent to
" one impure deſire; and who would not give way,
" ſpontaneouſly or upon reflection, merely to thoughts
" of an impure kind. It is clear as the ſun, that " nothing but religion is able to produce and preſerve
" women in ſuch a frame of mind, notwithſtanding

ple Limbus [D]. This will give me an opportunity of ſpeaking of an ordinance of Henry II. (d), which was ſo very rigorous, that it might happen that a woman might ſuffer death, who was not guilty of deſtroying the fruit of her womb. Hereunder is a remark, (d) Vid. the rem. [E].

" the propenſion to evil, which is a fatal conſequence " of original ſin. Farther, nothing but religion can " prompt women, who have been long immerſed in " guilt, to become converts. If we look narrowly " into the diſpoſitions of ſuch women as are the moſt " abandoned to evil, it will appear that honour has " no influence over them; but that the ſentiments " of religion, notwithſtanding the kind of hardened " States in which they live, are not quite extinguiſhed " in them. We ſcarce meet with one in a thouſand " of theſe women, who would willingly die in ſo " deplorable a condition; and who do not hope, to " extricate themſelves from it one day or other, at " leaſt in their expiring moments. From all theſe " reflections it ſeems a clear demonſtration to me, " that Bayle was influenced by prejudice more than by " good ſenſe when he aſſerted, that the point of ho- " nour is the ſtrongeſt bank which could be thrown up, " to ſtop the flood of incontinence; and that it is a thou- " ſand times ſtronger than conſcience, religion, &c. *." [D] To people Limbus.] This does not require a large Commentary after what the reader has peruſed above. I nevertheleſs will add a paſſage from Drelincourt. One would imagine, ſays he, ſpeaking to Miſſionaries (35), that ſome of the maſters of the ſchools have really deſcended into the bowels of the earth, and had very carefully diſcovered and viewed all the lurking holes there. The opinion moſt commonly received among them is *, that there are four different places under the earth, or a deep place divided into four parts. They ſay that the loweſt place is hell, in which all the damned are; where their bodies will be after the reſurrection, and where all the devils will likewiſe be confined. That the place neareſt to hell is purgatory, where ſouls are purged; but rather where they ſatisfy God's juſtice by their ſufferings. They declare that here is the like fire, as well as an intenſe heat in theſe two places; and that the only difference is in the duration. They think that next to purgatory, is the Limbus for ſuch children as die without the ſacrament (baptiſm) and that the fourth place is the Limbus of the fathers, that is, the place where were gathered together ſuch ſouls of the juſt as died before the death of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. They declare that this place is empty at preſent, ſo that it is a houſe to let. According to this Doctrine, the Limbus of little children is become the veſtibule or porch of hell, ſince Chriſt's aſcenſion; for the Limbus of the fathers muſt be looked upon as nothing from that time. The ſame queſtion might therefore be aſked on this occaſion, as the cynical Philoſopher did, upon ſeeing the entry to a ſmall houſe; Where is the houſe belonging to this gate (36)? The entry to this houſe being very large. The frontiers of hell muſt neceſſarily be of a greater extent than the whole Kingdom, which is monſtrous. If we put together all the children who die unbaptiſed, whether they die after coming into the world, or are loſt by a voluntary or involuntary miſcarriage, theſe will no doubt compoſe two thirds of mankind. The number of immature births would doubtleſs be ſurprizing, could we know it; though we ſhould take in only ſuch as are victims to the punctilio of honour, thoſe who fall a ſacrifice to jealouſy (37), and thoſe to effeminacy (38). In all ages, the inhabitants of every part of the earth have been concerned in this crime. This might be eaſily proved, but we will content ourſelves with two teſtimonies. Conſider the following words of Juvenal.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 970.

(35) Drelincourt, Dialogue on Chriſt's deſcent into Hell, p. 309. edit. of 1664.

* See Cardinal Bellarmin's Treatiſe of Purgatory.

(36) Diogen. Laert. book 6. num. 57. relates this otherwiſe. Myndum profectus (Diogenes Cynicus) cum videret magnificas portas & urbem modicam, viri, inquit, Myndii portas claudite, ne urbs veſtra egrediatur, i. e. " Diogenes obſerving that " the city of " Myndus was " ſmall, and " had magnifi- " cent gates; " ye Myndians " (ſays he) ſhut " your gates, " for fear your " city ſhould go " out through " them."

(37) That is, in thoſe countries where Polygamy is allowed, the wives of the ſame husband play a thouſand tricks, to prevent one another's bearing of children.

(38) That is, that ſome married women, to preſerve a good ſhape, or ſave money, deſtroy their fruit. It is ſaid that ſome Caſuiſts aſſiſt them in this.

(39) Juven. Sat. 2. ver. 32.

Cum tot abortivis fœcundam Julia vulvam
Solveret (39).

That is,

" Himſelf the while
" With impious drugs and potions did beguile
" The teeming Julia's womb, and thence did wreſt
" Crude births, that yet th' inceſtuous fire confeſs'd." DRYDEN.

And in another place,

Sunt quas eunuchi imbelles, ac mollia ſemper
Oſcula delectent, & deſperatio barbæ,
Et quod abortivo non eſt opus (40).

(40) Idem, Sat. 6. ver. 364. See alſo ver. 593.

That is,

" There are who in ſoft Eunuchs place their bliſs,
" To ſhun the ſcrubbing of a bearded kiſs,
" And 'ſcape abortion." DRYDEN.

[" Bayle was ſo very intent upon carrying his " point, and multiplying the number of immature " births, that he did not conſider he gave a moſt " abſurd proof upon this occaſion. The number of " immature births, would doubtleſs, ſays he, be ſurpriz- " ing, ... though we ſhould take in only ſuch, &c. " One of the proofs he gives of the following, in " citat. 39.

" Sunt quas Eunuchi . . . .

. . . . . .

" Et quod abortivo NON eſt opus, &c.

" What was Bayle thinking of when he quoted " ſuch inſtances as theſe, to prove the ſurprizing " number there are of immature births † ?"]

† From the rem. of the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. vol. 4. p. 970, 971.

Ovid had exclaimed againſt this grievous crime before Juvenal; and had even repreſented the danger to which thoſe who perpetrated it expoſed themſelves.

Quid juvat immunes belli ceſſare puellas,
Nec fera peltatas agmina velle ſequi;
Si ſine Marte ſuis patiuntur vulnera telis,
Et cæcas armant in ſua fata manus?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Hoc neque in Armeniis tigres fecere latebris:
Perdere nec fœtus auſa leæna ſuos.
At teneræ faciunt, ſed non impune, puellæ.
Sæpe, ſuos utero quæ necat, ipſa perit.
Ipſa perit, ferturque toro reſoluta capillos:
Et clamant, Meritò, qui modocunque vident (41).

(41) Ovid. Amor. lib. 2. eleg. 14.

That is,

" What boots it that the fair are free from war,
" And what, that they're forbid the ſhield to bear;
" Againſt themſelves if they new arms employ,
" And madly with new wounds their lives deſtroy?
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
" The tygreſſes that haunt th'Armenian wood,
" Will ſpare their proper young, tho' pinch'd for food;
" Nor will the Lybian lioneſſes ſlay
" Their whelps; but women are more fierce than they;
" More barbarous to the tender fruit they bear,
" Nor nature's call, tho' loud ſhe cries, will hear.
" But righteous vengeance oft their crimes purſues,
" And they are loſt themſelves who would their children loſe;
" The pois'nous drugs with mortal juices fill
" Their veins, and undeſign'd themſelves they kill.
" Themſelves upon the bier are breathleſs born,
" With hair tied, which was in ringlets worn,
" Thro' weeping crowds, that on that corps attend,
" Well may they weep for their unhappy end."
DRYDEN.

I have given other paſſages from this Poet in the remark [F]. This furniſhes me with new proofs with regard to the point of honour. The methods employed at that time to deſtroy the child were of dangerous conſequence to the mother; they often killed both; and yet young women choſe rather to run the riſk of loſing their lives than of loſing their remark, upon this ſubject, of a famous Civilian [E] ; and I will quote a paſſage from Henry Stephens, which informs us, among other particulars, that this very rigorous law was fatal to none but women ſervants [F]. Patin's letters in queſtion ſhew particularly that ſame. In this age, ſuch as ſtay too long, die ſometimes under the courſe, as Mademoiſele de Guerchi It is to be obſerved, that ſuch as do not make away with their children, make no noiſe whilſt they are delivering, unleſs they happen to be in a place, where they are not under any fear of loſing their character, by the diſcovery of the myſtery. This too is a freſh proof of the inconceivable power of the point of honour. It ſuppreſſes the effects of the ſharpeſt pangs in a tender ſex, which groans, weeps, and cries, for the mereſt trifles.

A perſon one day ſaid to a miſſionary, you cannot ſay of Limbus, what the Poets uſed to ſay of Hell, that it is a ſmall houſe.

(42) Horat. Od. 4. lib. 1.

. . . . Domus exilis Plutonia. . . . .

That is,

" Pluto's ſmall manſion."

He anſwered, Embrio's do not take up much room. But how many (was it replied to him) children of four or five years of age go to Limbus? Beſides, do not you know that Embrio's, and all children in general ſhall riſe grown men? As to that, replied he, do not trouble yourſelf ; the world is wide enough.

By the way, ſome perſons are of opinion that Virgil, who believed a Limbus, ought to have divided it into two parts. The one for children who die before their birth ; the other for ſuch as die in their infancy. The number of the former is ſo very great, that they would well deſerve (ſay theſe people) a claſs apart. Whence was it therefore that this great Poet did not take any notice of thoſe unhappy creatures ?

Continuò auditæ voces, vagitus & ingens,
Infantumque animæ flentes in limine primo,
Quos dulcis vitæ exſortes, & ab ubere raptos
Abſtulit atra dies, & funere merſit acerbo (43).

(43) Virgil. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 426.

That is,

" Firſt ſhrill laments, and tender cries are heard,
" The ghoſts of infants weeping in the door,
" Whom of ſweet life abridg'd, and from the breaſt
" Untimely ſnatch'd, the fatal day cut off,
" And in a funeral immature involv'd."

TRAPP.

[E] Hereunder is a remark upon this ſubject, by a famous Civilian.] He ſays, that the benefit and utility of the laws ought not to be ſuſpended, upon pretence of ſome inconveniencies they may produce ; and he quotes, on this occaſion, the ſaying of Cato, viz. that no law is convenient or advantageous to all perſons in general. Here follows Bodins's words (44).

(44) Bodin, Demonomanie des Sorciers, Liv. 4. chap. 5. p. m. 447, 448.

" I readily confeſs, that it were better to clear the " guilty, than to condemn the innocent : but then " I ſay, that he who is convicted by ſtrong preſumptions, is not innocent ; as that perſon who was " found with a bloody ſword near a perſon murdered, " no one being there but himſelf, and other conjectures which we remarked. For this reaſon, King " Henry II. made a very uſeful edict in this Kingdom, which was publiſhed and regiſtred the fourth " of March, in the year one thouſand five hundred " and fifty ſix (45) ; wherein he declares, that that " woman ſhall be ſuppoſed to have killed her child, " and be put to death, who has concealed her pregnancy and delivery, and if her child died without baptiſm, and ſhe cannot produce witneſſes of " one or other of theſe things ; nor ſhall they be believed who ſay that the child was ſtill-born : which " has ſince been put in practice by ſeveral decrees . . . " And nevertheleſs it may happen, that a woman, " to preſerve her honour, may conceal her pregnancy " and delivery ; and that the child ſhe would have " been glad to bring up, died as it was coming into " the world ; but foraſmuch as it was obſerved, that " under the pretence that a child was ſtill-born, ſeveral parricides were committed, it was prudently " reſolved, that ſuch a preſumption was ſufficient, " to ſentence to death the perſon impeached, in order to revenge the innocent blood. For we muſt " not, becauſe of an inconvenience which does not " frequently happen, forbear to enact a good law * ; " and for this reaſon I gave it as my opinion, that a " woman of Muret, near Soiſſons, ſhould be ſentenced to die, for having concealed her pregnancy " and deliverance, and buried her child in a garden, " in the month of May M.D.LXXVIII." I know that the Author of the Flemiſh Haerlem Gazette, publiſhed not long ſince (46), under the article of Paris, that it had been ordered, that this edict of Henry II. ſhould be revived in its former rigour, and be read on feſtival days, in all pariſh Churches. I cannot ſay whether the reſt of the Gazetteers have mentioned this ; but I do not remember to have found this piece of news either in the Mercure Politique, or the Lettres Hiſtoriques : and yet it might have ſuggeſted a great many reflections. [" This " article with regard to the putting in force the edict " of Henry II. is true ; and the ordinance is repeated from time to time *."]

(45) Supposing the year to begin after Easter.

* l. 3 & 4. de legib. ff. 9. Sic Cato dicebat nullam legem ſatis commodam omnibus eſſe.

(46) I believe it was in 1698.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 971.

[F] A paſſage from Henry Stephens . . . . informs us, among other particulars, that this rigorous law was fatal to none but women-ſervants.] As theſe other particulars may ſerve as a confirmation and ſupplement to the preceding remarks, I am not contented with relating thoſe circumſtances which concern the impunity of perſons of diſtinction ; but have alſo annexed ſeveral incidents and notes which this writer gives us, before he obſerves that a reſpect was had to perſons, in the execution of the edict of Henry II. The time, in which he wrote, ſhews pretty evidently, that he had an eye to the puniſhments which followed upon this ordinance. With regard to ſuch women as murther their children, ſays he (47) . . . " the number is great, as well of thoſe who murther them " in the inſtant they are born, as of thoſe who exerciſe the like cruelty upon them, even before they " come into the world And firſt ; as to the latter, " it is certain their wickedneſs is of great antiquity. " For we find Phocylides, the Greek Poet, expreſsly " commanding women to refrain from the commiſſion of ſuch actions. And Ovid, who alſo was a " Heathen, reproaches a woman very ſeverely on " that account, and at the ſame time adds ſeveral " fine remonſtrances. We likewiſe find that Hippocrates, among other things, which he took an oath " to obſerve, places the following, viz. never to give " women any thing with which they may deſtroy " the fruit of their womb. Now this wickedneſs is " practiſed on two accounts : by ſome women, for " fear it ſhould be known that they have been robbed of their virgin-flower ; or in general, for fear " they ſhould be diſcovered to have been engaged in " an unlawful commerce, whether they are married " women or widows : by the reſt, for fear they " ſhould ſhorten the time of their youth (48), and " eſpecially for fear of what Ovid ſays :"

(47) Henry Eſtienne, Apologie d'Herodote, Liv. 1. chap. 18. p. 223 & ſeq. Antwerp edit. 1568, 8vo.

(48) See citat. (38) above : but obſerve that Henry Stephens commits a conſiderable fault on this occaſion ; he applying thoſe two verſes of Ovid, to ſuch mothers as deſtroy their fruit, for other reaſons than that of concealing their crime. See citat. (56) above, that this fear rugarum ventris, is not the fear of ſpoiling ſome corporeal beauties, but the fear of carrying about them, convincing proofs of their having been with child.

" Scilicet ut careat rugarum crimine venter,
" Sternetur pugnæ triſtis arena tuæ (49) !

That is,

" The belly muſt be ſmooth, no wrinkle there,
" To ſhock the lover's wanton glance appear.
" His touch as well as ſight they fain would pleaſe,
" And the womb early of its burthen eaſe.

DRYDEN.

" And as to what I ſaid concerning the ſhortning " of youth, the ſame Poet declares this alſo ;

(49) See citat. (56) below.

" Adde quod & partus faciunt breviora juventæ Tempora.

The

The Senſe is,

Add too, that child-birth ſhortens the gay bloom of youth.

" And, though we had not his teſtimony, we " have daily ocular experience of this. I alſo have " heard of ſome young gentlewomen, and even have " known ſome, who did not ſcruple to wear buſks, " to the deſtruction of the child they were going " with; and, that they might not loſe the honour " of being genteelly ſhaped, made no conſcience to " deſtroy that, which ought to be as dear to them as " life. For I ſpeak of thoſe very perſons who were got " with child in a lawful way. As to thoſe who " murder their children as ſoon as they are delivered; " throwing them, or cauſing them to be thrown " away, the convent of Nuns, not many years ſince, " might have furniſhed them with a good number " of examples to this purpoſe, (as well as of thoſe " who deſtroy them in the womb) even in Ponta- " nus's time, as is manifeſt from the following paſ- " ſage of this Author. Quod quidem execrationis ge- " nus maximè ſacerdotes attingit, quæ Deo virginitatem " quum voverint, pollutis tamen votis, ritúque ſacerdo- " tali perjuranter atque inceſtè contaminato, gravidæ " factæ, ne ſcelus pateat, execrabiliori conantur ſcelere " idipſum prohibere ac corrigere: dum aut medicaminibus " adhibitis abortionem procurant, aut partum ſtatim ip- " ſum exanimant, terræque aut cloacis clàm infodiunt. " i. e. " This crime, of a moſt execrable kind, is " committed chiefly by Nuns, who, though they " had devoted themſelves to Heaven by a perpetual " vow, yet breaking it; and profaning, in a perju- " rious and inceſtuous manner, the ſacerdotal Rite; " and becoming pregnant, to ſcreen their wicked- " neſs, they endeavour to conceal it by perpetrating " a ſtill more horrid crime: ſince, by taking medi- " cines, they either procure abortions, or murder the " babe immediately at its coming into the world, " and then bury it privately, or throw it into a ne- " ceſſary-houſe. Now when I ſay that a conſidera- " ble number of theſe would have been found, ſome " years ſince, I do not mean but that ſome might be " eaſily found at this time, if there were occaſion " for it, but that the number was then greater than at " preſent; as well becauſe there were more Nuns " then, as becauſe they were more afraid than at " preſent of being diſhonoured; and even of being " rebuked or corrected, in caſe they ſhould be con- " victed of playing a looſe game, their Father-Con- " feſſors not being ſo very ſevere (50); but, on the " contrary, they themſelves, on a proper occaſion, " would be forward enough to give a looſe to a cri- " minal paſſion. Beſides, as they ſee many, who " were Nuns before, like themſelves, married pub- " lickly (51), and live happily; this conſideration " makes them more conſcientious than to think of per- " petrating ſuch murders. But it muſt be owned that " this wickedneſs extends far beyond the Cloyſter, " even to marriageable women who live with their " parents, or under the inſpection of their relations, " and even to women of good families, not to men- " tion that many widows give a looſe that way. The " above-mentioned Pontanus has not concealed this " circumſtance, with regard to the women of his " time; he adding to the above-mentioned paſſage " I quoted from him; Nec verò monſtroſa hac feritate " ſacerdotes tantùm, verumetiam viduæ ac nubiles pu- " ellæ ſplendiſſimæque etiam fœdantur familiæ. Servant- " wenches have alſo played frequently at the game " in queſtion (52); and theſe, not thoſe we before " hinted at, generally fall victims to the ſecular " arm, according to the proverb we before cited " from Juvenal:

Dat veniam cervis, vexat cenſura columbas.

That is,

" Yet theſe obnoxious men without remorſe,
" Againſt our tribe will put the laws in force,
" Clip the dove's wing, and give the vulture courſe. DRYDEN.

" For I remember to have ſeen in Paris many ſer- " vant wenches (but of no other rank) hanged for this " crime; and I remember particularly to have ſeen, " in the phyſic-ſchools, the ſkeleton of a ſervant- " wench, who had been hanged for the crime in queſ- " tion, viz. for throwing her child into a privy . . . " (53). Now, no perſons could know more of theſe " ſecrets than midwives, was it not the cuſtom at this " time to go and fetch them from their houſes; and " after hoodwinking them, to take them to the " houſe of the woman who wants them; which wo- " man is then maſked, or otherwiſe covered, for fear " of being known by the midwives, whoſe eyes they " then are obliged to uncover . . . . (54). Many " Ladies, indeed, in this age, have no need to go " ſuch lengths, they employing remedies to prevent " conception." There are ſome errors in this paſſage from the apology for Herodotus, as the Reader will ſee, if he takes the pains to read the notes I have thrown into the margin, which alone would ſufficiently apologize for my giving ſo long a quotation.

The firſt paſſage of Ovid, cited by Henry Stephens (55), is from elegy 13, book 2. de Amoribus, and ſhews, that, in that age, a thing was commonly known in Rome, which an antient Apothecary, who had read a great number of books of Surgery and Phyſic, owned to me, he was wholly ignorant of, till he had read a book lately publiſhed, which I lent him. He told me, when he returned it, that it had informed him of two very curious obſervations he had never heard of before; and which relate to the indications, whereby it may be known whether a woman has had children. The book in queſtion was writ by Mr. Lamy, a Phyſician of the Faculty of Paris, and his words are as follow (56). " This woman (57) " had born children; and before we opened her, " or had the leaſt ſuſpicion of what we found, " we diſcovered it by undoubted ſymptoms. Mrs. la " Marche, chief Midwife of the Hotel-Dieu, was pre- " ſent on that occaſion; ſhe is extremely well ſkilled " in her profeſſion, and ſhews great wit and ſagacity " on all occaſions. I aſked her opinion on a great " many particulars, concerning the indications or " marks of virginity; and deſired her to inform me, " how ſhe came to know at firſt ſight, that the woman " we were going to open had born children; ſhe " then pointed out to me the folds or wrinkles of the " belly; and upon my obſerving, that the dropſy " might have occaſioned theſe, or that her belly " might have ſwelled from other cauſes than her be- " ing pregnant, and that theſe wrinkles might have " remained; ſhe pointed out to me, and the reſt of " the company, what the Midwives call among them- " ſelves le dechirement de la fourchette, which is the " rending the extreme of the loweſt part of the ori- " fice towards the Anus, which always happens at " the birth of a firſt child, and which is conſequently " an infallible mark of a woman's having had a " child." Of theſe two indications of child-birth, the former is infinitely more dreadful than the latter, with regard to one who paſſes for a maid, and is betrothed to a man; for ſhe has great reaſon to believe, that her huſband will not find out the ſecond, and be under the ſtrongeſt apprehenſions of his diſcovering the former. This enables us to underſtand the verſes from Ovid, much better than by the Commentators; and we evidently know the reaſon why the unmarried women among the Romans expoſed themſelves to ſo dreadful a peril, to avoid the rugarum crimen, that the wrinkles in their bellies might not reveal their crime. Theſe wrinkles were therefore much more dangerous than thoſe of the face; and there is no doubt but that the conſequences of theſe are as well known in our age, as in that of Auguſtus; and that this leaves a terrible uneaſineſs even on the minds of ſuch perſons as have had Lucina's (58) aſſiſtance, though with the utmoſt ſecrecy. Their invocations, according to the form of prayer which was addreſſed to Laverna (59),

Labra move, metuens audiri: Pulchra Laverna
Da mihi fallere, da juſtum ſanctumque videri:
Noctem peccatis & fraudibus objice nubem (60).

That is,

" He murmurs ſoftly, to be heard afraid,
" Good, good Laverna, hear me, grant me aid

(50) Henry Stephens is miſtaken here; for, in his time, the wickedneſs of monaſteries, and the connivance of Confeſſors, were not ſo flagrant as before: the reproaches of the Proteſtants having excited a kind of ſhame in them, and put them, in ſome meaſure, upon their guard.

(51) I don't underſtand the reaſon which Henry Stephens gives in this place; for he either ſpeaks of ſuch Nuns as were turned Proteſtants, or of ſuch as were permitted, by the Pope, to marry; and neither of theſe circumſtances ſeem adapted to prompt a Nun who is with child to preſerve it; the declaring her pregnancy, is not the way to prevail with the Pope to diſpenſe with her obſervation of her vows.

(52) See the article LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE) rem. [B], why ſervant-wenches are more liable to be debauched than other women.

(53) Henri Eſtienne, Apologie, d'Herodote, p. 225.

(54) Ibid. p. 226.

(55) Citat. (49) above.

(56) G. Lamy's Diſſertation againſt the new opinion, that all animals ſpring from an egg, p. 218 & ſeq. This Diſſertation was printed with ſome other treatiſes of the ſame Author, at Paris, 1678, in 12mo.

(57) That is, a woman who had been anatomized.

(58) The Goddeſs who preſided over child births.

(59) The Goddeſs who patroniſed thefts, and ſuch attempts as people would have concealed.

(60) Horat. epiſt. 16. lib. 1, ver. 60.

For

that their Author's Creed was not clogged with many articles [G], and that he behaved with great tenderneſs towards his children. This circumſtance alone is ſufficient to refute the

" For ſuch a cheat, let all believe me good.
" Let me ſeem juſt and honeſt to the crowd,
" And o'er my cheats and forgeries ſpread a cloud. CREECH.

Their invocations, I ſay, though indulged in all reſpects, according to the intention of the above-mentioned form of prayer, do not free their minds from the fears, with regard to the approaches of a bridegroom, who does not expect to find any folds or wrinkles; and for this reaſon, they have recourſe to drugs as ſoon as poſſible. It was with juſt reaſon Henry Stephens ſuppoſed, that in his time many Ladies knew ſeveral remedies to prevent pregnancy (61). The antient Greeks and Romans were but novices in this wicked art, in compariſon of the people of the 16th century; and we are told, that the 17th century ſurpaſſes the 16th in that particular; and yet they have put in practice the groſſeſt and moſt dangerous methods mentioned by Ovid (62). Read Abbé de Marolles's words on the following paſſage of Ovid:

(61) Henri Eſtienne, Apologie d'Herodote, p. 226.

(62) Ovid. eleg. 14. lib. 2. Amor. ver. 27.

Veſtra quid effoditis ſubjectis viſcera telis!

The ſenſe is,

" Why, with ſharp darts, do you your entrails pierce?

(63) L'Abbé de Marolles, rem. on the 2d book of Ovid's Amorum, p. 269, 270. This book was printed in 1661.

" It is ſtrange (ſays he) (63), that ſo damnable an " invention ſhould have been practiſed ſo long ſince, " and ſhould be revived in our time. A wicked woman, " convicted of this abominable crime, after killing " the mother, thinking only to kill the child in her " womb, has been puniſhed in an exemplary manner " for it at Paris, the ſame year that I wrote this " book." How ingenious ſoever the paſſions may be, which are kept up by the point of honour, that maiden or widow, who may grant the laſt favour to a gallant, runs very great riſks to this day; for often the remedies fail of a deſired effect: the ninth month comes thundering upon them, and this is the devil; this is infinitely the moſt perplexing ſcene; for the truth of which I appeal to Madame des Houlieres verſes.

BALADE à Mademoiſelle D.

Ores eſt temps de vous donner conſeil
Sur les perils où beauté vous expoſe.
Fille reſſemble à ce bouton vermeil
Qu'en peu de jours on voit devenir roſe.
Tant qu'eſt bouton on voudroit en jouïr,
Nul ne le voit ſans deſirs de rapine.
Dès que Soleil l'a fait épanouïr,
On n'en tient conte, un matin le ruïne,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l'épine.
Lorſqu'un amant, l'exemple eſt tout pareil,
Fait voir deſirs à quoy pudeur s'opoſe,
Si l'on ne fuit, l'amour eſt un Soleil,
Point n'en doutez, par qui fleur eſt écloſe.
Alors en bref on voit s'évanouïr
Tranſports & ſoins par qui fille peu fine
Préſume d'elle, & ſe laiſſe éblouïr.
Mépris ſuccede à l'amour qui décline;
De roſe alors ne reſte que l'épine.
Plus de commerce avecque le ſommeil,
Ou ſi par fois un moment on repoſe,
Songe cruel donne fâcheux réveil;
Cent & cent fois on en maudit la cauſe.
Voir on voudroit dans la terre enfouïr
Tendre ſecret duquel on s'imagine
Qu'un traiſtre ira le monde réjouïr.
Parle-t-on bas, on croit qu'on le devine,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l'épine.

ENVOI.

Galans fiéfez donneurs de gabatine,
J'ay beau preſcher qu'on riſque à vous ouïr,
A coqueter toute fille eſt encline.
Pluſtoſt que faire aprouver ma Doctrine,
On fileroit chanvre ſans le rouïr,
Mais quand tout bas faut apeller Lucine,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l'épine (64).

(61) Poeſies de Madame des Houlieres, p. 134, 135. Amſt. edit. 1694.

* It is in French Balade, a particular ſpecies of French Poetry, in which the rhymes are diſpoſed after a certain manner. It does not anſwer to our Engliſh word Ballad, tho' always (I believe) tranſlated ſo. Rem. by the Tranſl.

The ſenſe is,

VERSES * to Mrs.... D.

" Now is the proper ſeaſon for advice,
" To guard from perils, rais'd by your bright beauty.
" A maid reſembles the fair-blooming bud,
" Which in few days, burſts forth a lovely roſe.
" In its flow-budding ſtate, all men deſire it;
" Each eye that ſees its beauties would enjoy them.
" But when once blown, by Sol's prolific ray,
" Deſpis'd by all, a morning ſees it wither,
" And of the roſe, the thorn alone remains.
" Thus when a lover, (the example tallies)
" Exhibits, to a fair-one, guilty wiſhes;
" Unleſs ſhe flies, love ſoon becomes a ſun,
" And, ſure as fate, will raiſe her virgin-flower.
" Then, on ſwift wings, each balmy tranſport flies;
" Tranſports which ſwell'd her melting breaſt with pride,
" And (hapleſs maiden,) prov'd her fatal ruin.
" To now-declining love, contempt ſucceeds,
" And, of the roſe, the thorn alone remains.
" No longer ſlumbers cloſe her weeping eyes;
" But ſhould kind Morpheus plunge her ſoul in ſleep,
" Startling, ſhe wakes, in terrors, from a dream,
" And her whole ſoul is ſorrow and repentance.
" In wild deſpair, ſhe curſes now the cauſe
" Of her tumultuous woes, and deep would bury
" The tender ſecret, which (fond ſhe) imagines
" Her faithleſs wretch will blazon to the world.
" Conſcious of guilt, a whiſpering wakes her bluſhes:
" Of the bright roſe, the thorn alone remains.

MESSAGE.

" The faithleſs ſparks, beguilers of the fair,
" In vain I cry, that liſtning to you's ruin;
" For every virgin's boſom heaves with love.
" Much ſooner theſe would ſpin unwater'd flax,
" Than once approve my ſalutary counſels.
" But when Lucina, ſoftly, they invoke,
" Of the bright roſe, the thorn alone remains.

[G] Their Author's creed was not clogged with many articles.] I will cite the following words from his elogium (65). " He ſpoke with the gravity of a Stoick, " but then his expreſſions were very ſatyrical, and, in " this article, he might have taught Rabelais himſelf. It was ſaid that he had written a Commentary on that Author, and underſtood him perfectly. " For this reaſon he was accuſed of being a Free-thinker in ſome meaſure. The truth is, he could " not endure bigottry, ſuperſtition, and knavery; but " he had an upright ſoul, and a well diſpoſed heart. " He had a paſſionate affection for his friends, and " behaved with affability and courteſy to every one, " eſpecially with regard to foreigners and learned " men." The Reader will pleaſe to obſerve in particular, that the Author of the elogium, in his anſwering the charge with regard to Free-thinking, does not ſay that Patin was, in the main, an orthodox Chriſtian; he contenting himſelf with affirming, that he hated ſuperſtition, and was an honeſt man. See the Nouvelles de la republique des Lettres (66). Such an anſwer as this was not made in behalf of the Prince of Conde; his friends oppoſing, to common fame, the declaration he made in his expiring moments: I never doubted of the myſteries of religion, whatever may have been ſaid on this occaſion; but I doubt of them leſs now than ever (67). It perhaps will be ſaid, that the Bookſellers of Geneva foiſted whatſoever they thought proper into the work in queſtion of Patin, but this would be a ridiculous ſuppoſition.

(65) Advertiſement to the Reader, before Guy Patin's Letters, folio * 6 verſo.

(66) For April 1684. art. 1. p. m. 116, 117. See alſo the Acta Eruditor, 1684. p. 251.

(67) See his Funeral Oration, ſpoke by the Biſhop of Meaux, March 10, 1687, p. 56, 57. Dutch edition.

[H] The

the abominable falſity publiſhed by a German writer [H]. It has been obſerved that Guy Patin was like Cicero [I]. He died in 1672, and left a ſon, who made a great figure in the world [K], and excelled in the knowledge of medals. He had loſt his eldeſt ſon, for whom he had procured, in 1667, the reverſion of his Profeſſorſhip (e), and (e) See Letter 455, p. 337. Tom. 3.

[H] The abominable falſity publiſhed by a German Writer.] His name was Axtius. He publiſhed in a Letter about Antimony, annexed to a treatiſe de Arboribus coniferis, at Jena in 1679, that Mr. Patin attempted to poiſon his own ſon with Antimony, which he ſuppoſed to be a poiſon; but that, contrary to his expectation, it wrought a happy cure (68). Charles Patin, having complained of this injurious treatment, to the College of Phyſicians of Jena, obtained all the ſatisfaction he could deſire; the Faculty ordering Dr. Axtius to make a public recantation. Saluberrima Facultas illum παλινῳδίαν (69) cantare coëgit, quam ſupreſſa calumnia typis mandatam ad me tranſmiſit, (theſe are Charles Patin's words (70)) his verbis: Editioni Tractatus hujus de arboribus, benevole Lector, ſubjunxeram Epiſtolam de Antimonio, cui relationem de Illuſtriſſimo Guidone Patino inſerueram: Quia autem certo comperi illam falſam, & ab ipſius malevolis ſine dubio efficta esſe, Epiſtolam rurſus imprimi curavi, fabulam expunxi, & Manibus celeberrimi illius viri injuriam factam eſſe aperte profiteor, i. e. "The Faculty of "Phyſic forced him to make a recantation, which, after "the ſuppreſſing of the calumny, they ſent to me printed, "and was as follows. I had annexed, kind Reader, "a Letter concering Antimony, to this Treatiſe of "Trees, wherein I had introduced a ſtory relating to "the moſt illuſtrious Guy Patin: but having found "this to be wholly falſe, and to have been certainly "forged by enemies who bear a ſpite to him; I "cauſed this letter to be reprinted; expunged that "falſity; and openly confeſs that an injury had been "done to the memory of that famous man."

(68) Extracted from Guy Patin's Elogium, prefixed to his Letters.

(69) He ſhould have ſaid παλινῳδίαν.

(70) Carolus Patinus, in Lyceo Patavino, p. 102, 103.

[I] It has been obſerved that Guy Patin was like Cicero.] "The late Mr. Huguetan, a Counſellor of "Lyons, who was perfectly well acquainted with "him, thought he had the air of Cicero, whoſe "ſtatue we ſee in Rome (71)." This calls to my mind what was ſaid of the Chancellor de l'Hopital, that he was like Ariſtotle: Specie fuit auguſta, vultu gravi & tranquillo, qui ut ex vetere numiſmate apparuit Ariſtotelis faciem plane referret (72), i. e. "He had a "noble aſpect, a countenance grave and compoſed, "and which greatly reſembled Ariſtotle's face, as "we find it on an antient medal."

(71) Extracted from the Elogium above-cited.

(72) Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. 1. p. m. 59.

[K] He left a ſon, who made a great figure in the world.] This was CHARLES PATIN. He was born in Paris the 23d of February 1633; and made ſo ſurprizing a progreſs, that he maintained Theſes in Greek and Latin, on all parts of Philoſophy, anno 1647. The Profeſſor (73) under whom he ſtudied, who was an Iriſhman, and was ignorant of the Greek tongue, was very angry at theſe Theſes, when they were brought for him to examine; but finding the young man prepared to maintain them without a moderator, he was forced to preſide at the diſpute, to ſave his reputation. The Pope's Nuncio, thirty four Biſhops, and ſeveral perſons of quality of the court and city, were preſent at this Theſis. The reſpondent maintained the diſpute during five hours, in both languages; and was admitted with great glory to his Maſter of Art's Degree. He ſtudied the law, in compliance to an uncle, by the mother's ſide, an Advocate in Parliament: he took his licence at Poitiers, after ſixteen months, and was admitted an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. He ſpent ſix years in this ſtudy, but he could not lay aſide that of Phyſick, for which he always had an inclination. It was therefore no reſtraint upon him to comply with his father's will, which was, that he ſhould quit the law, and devote himſelf to phyſick. He ſoon approved the good reaſons that were alledged to him, and which were confirmed to him by Mareſcot's teſtimony. This famous Phyſician acknowledged himſelf indebted to his profeſſion for three things, which he could never have obtained by the Prieſthood, for which his father deſigned him. He had enjoyed a perfect ſtate of health till the age of eighty two years; had amaſſed an hundred thouſand crowns; and gained the intimate friendſhip of ſeveral eminent perſons. Artem diſceres docereſque non Magiſtratibus tantum ſed Regibus ipſis & Imperatoribus leges præſcribentem: Sapientiſſimos tandem quoſque ab ore tuo pendentes, tuoque ſubmiſſos arbitrio cerneres. Recorderis, mi Stoice (ſic quippe ob neſcio quam ἀπάθειαν me compellare ſolebat) Mareſcottum noſtrum tria ſe ſatræ arti noſtræ debere profeſſum, quibus caruiſſet, ſi propoſitum à Parentibus ſacerdotium ſuſcepiſſet, ſanitatem athleticam ætatis anno LXXXII. centum aureorum millia, atque intimam innumerorum illuſtrium amicitiam (74), i. e. "You would learn, and inſtruct others in an art, "which lays down laws, not only to Magiſtrates, "but alſo to Kings and Emperors. You would be- "hold men of the greateſt wiſdom liſtning to you, "and paying ſubmiſſion to your judgment. (Remem- "ber, my dear Stoick, for by this name he uſed to call "me, becauſe of a certain indifference he perceived in "me) that our friend Mareſcot owned, that he was "indebted, for three things to our ſacred profeſſion, "which he could not have obtained, had he de- "voted himſelf to the Prieſthood, as his parents in- "tended he ſhould, &c." As ſoon as Charles had taken his Doctor's Degree in Phyſick, he applied himſelf to practice, and ſucceeded greatly. He read Lectures on Phyſick, in the place of Lopez the Profeſſor, who was gone to Bourdeaux. Being afraid that he ſhould be thrown into priſon, if he ſtaid longer in France, he intended to retire into Holland. Excedere patria conſultius fuit, quam libertatis diſcrimen ſubire (75). But the ſeas were then ſo much infeſted by the Oſtend privateers, that he returned from Havre de Grace to Paris, and afterwards ſet out for the Palatinate. He made ſome ſtay in Heidelberg, and afterwards travelled into Germany, Holland, England, Switzerland, and Italy. He was ſettled at Baſil; but the war carrying on between the French and Germans gave him ſo much uneaſineſs, that he went to Italy with his whole family. In 1676 he was appointed Profeſſor of Phyſick in Padua; three years after which he was created a Knight of St. Mark. He was informed in 1681, that the King of France would receive him into favour; and he poſſibly would have returned to Paris, had not the Magiſtrates of Padua promoted him to the Chair of principal Surgeon, and increaſed his ſalary. Theſe particulars are extracted from a book which he publiſhed at Padua in 1682, intitled, Lyceum Patavinum, ſive Icones & Vitæ Profeſſorum Patavii 1682 docentium. He died in that city (76) in 1694 (77), having two daughters who gained great fame by the works they publiſhed (78). ["His two daughters, as well as their fa- "ther, were made Members of the Recouvrati of "Padua, and wrote ſeveral pieces. Charlotte Ca- "tharine ſpoke in Padua, the laſt day of October "1683, a Latin oration on the raiſing the ſiege of "Vienna, printed the ſame year, and afterwards in "1691, in her Tabellæ Selectæ. In the Acta Erudi- "torum * is an extract of one of her letters to the "Authors of that Journal, wherein ſhe defends a "piece written by her father, on the monument of "Marcellinus, which they had criticiſed. She alſo "publiſhed, Tabellæ Selectæ ac explicatæ à Carola "Catharina Patina, Pariſina, Academica. Patavii "1691. fol. fig. 42. This is the explication of 41 "pictures of the moſt famous painters which are en- "graved there. The 42d plate repreſents the family "of Charles Patin. His other daughter Gabriel "Charlotte alſo publiſhed De Phœnice in Numiſmate "Imp. Antonini Caracallæ expreſſa. Venice 1683, "4to. She alſo ſpoke in the Academy of Padua "1685, a Panegyrick on Lewis XIV."] His wife alſo was an authoreſs (79). ["Her name was Mag- "dalen Hommet, daughter of a Phyſician in Paris, "who printed, in 1680, a collection of Reflections, "Moral and Chriſtian. He married her in 1663 †."] Here follows a catalogue of his works, publiſhed by him between the years 1662, till 1682. Itinerarium Comitis Briennæ: Pariſiis, 1662, 8vo. Familiæ Romanæ ex anti. Numiſmatibus: Paris 1663, fol. Traité des Tourbes combuſtibles: Paris, 1663, 4to. Introduction à l'Hiſtoire des Medailles: Paris, 1665, and Amſterdam,

(73) This was Roger Omoloy.

(74) Carolus Patinus, in Lyceo Patavino, p. 83, 84.

(75) Idem. Ibid. p. 91.

(76) A Polypus was found in his heart, and in the great artery, which choaked him. I was informed of this by Mr. Drelincourt, Profeſſor in Leyden, who was told it by a Profeſſor of Padua, that was in the retinue of the Venetian Embaſſadors; I mean the Embaſſadors who arrived in Holland in March 1696, to congratulate his Britannic Majeſty. They went to Mr. Drelincourt's Lectures, with their whole train, the 2d of April of the ſame year, and paid him a great many civilities, which he juſtly merited.

(77) See Acta Eruditorum, 1702, p. 85.

(78) See Acta Eruditorum, for 1684, p. 587; and for 1691, p. 337 and 547. Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, for April 1685. p. 452.

* For anno 1691, p. 237.

† Addit. by the Tranſl. from Niceron's Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 10. part 1. p. 90 & ſeq.

(79) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, ibid. p. 453.

† Addit. by the Tranſl. from Niceron, ibid.

and who did not behave with the gratitude which was due to the affection of ſo good a father (f). This increaſed the affliction which the diſgrace of his other ſon had brought upon ſterdam, 1667, 12mo. Imperatorum Romanorum Numiſmata: Argentinæ, 1671, fol. Theſaurus Numiſmatum: Amſtelodami, 1672, 4to. Quatre Relations Hiſtoriques: Bâle, 1673, and Lyons, 1674, 12mo. Prattica delle Medaglie: Venezia, 1673, 12mo. Suetonius illuſtratus: Baſileæ, 1675. De Numiſmate antiquo Auguſti & Platonis: Baſileæ, 1675, 4to. Encomium Moriæ Eraſmi, cum fig. Holbenianis: Baſil. 1675, 12mo. De optima Medicorum Secta: Patavii, 1676, 4to. De Febribus, Patavii, 1677, 4to. De Avicenna, Patavii, 1678, 4to. De Numiſmate ant. Horatii Coclitis, 1678, in 4to, De Scorbuto: Patavi, 1679, 4to. Judicium Paridis: Patavi, 1679, 4to. [" The " complete title is, Judicium Paridis de tribus Deabus " reatum in Numiſmate Antonini Pii expreſſum. The " medal explained here, and the explication, are " curious *."] Le pompoſe Feſte di Vicenza: Padua, 1680, 4to. Natalitia Jovis: Patavii, 1681, 4to. Quòd optimus Medicus debeat eſſe Chirurgus: Patavii, 1681, 4to. Lyceum Patavinum, Patavii, 1682, 4to. [" The diſcourſe, containing the lives of the learned " men, is very ſhort, He gives himſelf here, a- " mong the learned, and exhibits a catalogue of his " own works †."] He himſelf has given us this catalogue in his Lyceum Patavinum, and yet he omitted this, Epiſtolæ ad Eggelingium de Numiſmatibus quibuſdam abſtruſis Imperatoris Neronis, publiſhed at Bremen in 1681, with Egglingius's anſwers (80). He afterwards gave a Latin tranſlation of the introduction to the Science des Médailles (81), which was printed in 1683 (82). Diſſertatio Therapeutica de Peſte: at Auſburg, 1683, 4to. Commentarius in tres Inſcriptiones Græcas Smyrna nuper allatas, Padua: 1685, 4to. Commentarius in antiquum Monumentum Marcellinæ: Ibid. 1688, 4to. Commentarius in antiquum Cenotaphium Marci Artorii Medici: Ibid. 1689, 4to. He likewiſe was concerned in the Theſaurus Numiſmatum Petri Mauroceni, publiſhed at Venice in 1683, and added ſome notes to it. Perhaps I may have omitted ſome of his works. [We may add the following pamphlets of his. " In ſtripem regiam Epigrammata. " Mottos and Emblems of the Royal Family, French " and Latin: Paris, 1660, 4to. Reprinted at Am- " ſterdam in 1695, with the following letter, at the " end of his Introduction to Hiſtory; the title of which " was changed as follows in this edition: The Hiſtory of " Medals, or an Introduction to the knowledge of that Art. " There are ten emblems, which were engraved by " F. Chauveau. An Epiſtle to the King, dated the 26th " of March, 1662, 4to. In this piece Patin be- " ſeeches his Majeſty to give him leave to dedicate a " work to him, compoſed on the conſular Medals, " and which was publiſhed the year following. In " the Amænitates Litterariæ of John Schelhorn , " is a pretty long letter of Patin to John Faber, dated " at Padua the 20th of December 1677. He here " ſays, that not long before he was going to be in- " vited to Vienna, to be the Emperor's Phyſician " there; however this came to nothing. Note, the " Prattica delle Medaglie, mentioned by Bayle, in the " catalogue of Charles Patin's works above, is only " a tranſlation of, Introduction à l'Hiſtoire des Me- " dailles. The complete title of the Prattica delle " Medaglie is as follows: Introduzione à l'Hiſtoria della " prattica delle Medaglie, tradotta dal Franceſe da " Conſtantino Belli: In Venetia, 1673, 12mo." " In a letter of Boeclerus, dated the 12th of May 1670, ††, it is ſaid, that " Charles Patin publiſhed the " Letters of Peter Martyr, printed at Amſterdam in " 1670, folio *."] There is an Italian Verſion of his " Hiſtorical Relations with the following title: Vi- " aggi di Carlo Patini: In Venetia, 1685, 8vo. In " the fourth part of his catalogue of Baron de Kiel- " mans-Egge's Library ‖, is a book entitled, Nou- " velles de Charles Patin au Marquis du Baden-Dourdac, " Frederic. Straſburg, 1673, 8vo. But I know not " what to make of this book †."] I ſhould add, that his Hiſtorical Relations were printed in Holland, anno 1695; and that his Introduction to the knowledge of Medals, was reprinted at Paris the ſame year (83). This book was cenſured by Mr. Sallo the firſt time it was printed (84). The Author anſwered this cenſure, in the following piece, A Letter from a Friend of Mr. Patin, on the Journal des Savans, of the 23d of February 1665. Mr. Sallo, ſpeaking of this Letter (85), continued to treat Mr. Patin with great contempt. [" The Journal des Savans gave " the following judgment of the work in queſtion. " This is really a very pretty book, though it be ſcarce " any thing but a repetition of what we meet with in " Savot; and as this is the true ſtate of the caſe, it is " ſomething ſurprizing that the Author, in his Preface, " ſhould ſay that the books which treat of this ſubject, " are moſtly Latin, Italian, or Spaniſh, without once " naming Savot, who has writ better in French, than " any other Author has done in his language . It " muſt nevertheleſs be owned, that there are ſome new " things in this work; but there are very few of theſe; " and the other had done better to have ſuppreſſed ſome " of them. So unfavourable a judgment muſt naturally " ſhock a writer's pride. Both father and ſon were " ſtung to the quick; the father's letters are filled " with complaints againſt the Journal, againſt which " he inveighs, as uſual, with the utmoſt vehemence. " As to the ſon, he employed a friend's pen, or ra- " ther he himſelf wrote the Letter from a friend of " Mr. Patin, on the Journal des Savans, of the 23d of " Feb. 1665. He endeavoured to defend himſelf, but " the Journaliſts, ſpeaking of this Letter, attacked " him again, and quite overthrew his defence. Pa- " tin would have replied again, but he was adviſed " to be ſilent, for fear the credit of the Journaliſts " ſhould be of fatal conſequence to him ††."] Guy Patin was highly exaſperated at the treatment his ſon met with from the Author of the Journal des Savans, as appears by the following paſſage from his CCCLI. Letter. I ſhall give it a little at length, becauſe it informs us, among other particulars, the reaſon which prevented Charles Patin from continuing his apology. " I do not know whether you have re- " ceived a kind of Gazette or News-paper, called " Journal of the Learned, the Author whereof hav- " ing complained of a little article againſt my ſon " Charles, with regard to the Medal which was " ſtruck here laſt year for the Swiſs, he anſwered " him. I have ſent you his anſwer, which is pru- " dent and modeſt. The new Gazetteer in queſtion " has made a reply, which ſhews him to be both ig- " norant and a madman. This would have been " anſwered in the ſtrongeſt, ſharpeſt, and moſt ra- " tional manner, had not my ſon Charles been deſired " to ſuſpend his reply, and threatned with a Letter de " Cachet. The truth is, Mr. Colbert patronizes the " Authors of this Journal, who are ſaid to be Mr. " Salo, a Counſellor of Parliament, Abbot de " Bourzé, Mr. de Gomberville, Mr. Chapelain, &c. " ſo that Charles is deſired to delay his anſwer, and " is even adviſed to this by the firſt Preſident, who " deſired it. (A particular reaſon is given for this, " viz, that he has loſt Mr. Colbert's favour, ſince " the proſecution of Mr. Fouquet.) We ſhall ſee " hereafter, whether theſe pretended Cenſors, ſine " ſuffragio Populi & Quiritum, whether theſe Authors " ſhall have ſo much credit and authority, as to " criticiſe in this manner all, whoſe writings ſhall " not pleaſe them. Are we now in Juvenal's age, " who boldly ſaid, Dat veniam corvis, vexat cenſura columbas?

(f) See his 1035th Letter, p. 539. Tom 3.

" Clip the Dove's wings, and gives the Vulture courſe? DRYDEN.

" One circumſtance however comforts us, which is, " that we are not in the wrong, and that the learned " and judicious are of our opinion; but theſe Au- " thors make an ill uſe of their credit. The literary " world is for us, but Mr. Colbert is againſt us; and " if my ſon offers to defend himſelf, it is ſaid he " will be impriſoned in the Baſtile. A man had " better not write at all (86)."

[L] The

(84) See Journal des Savans, for Feb. 23, 1665. p. m. 150.

(85) In the Journal des Savans, March 9, 1665. p. m. 202.

 This Savot's book is entitled, Diſcours ſur les Medailles antiques. It was printed at Paris in 1627. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

†† Niceron, Hommes illuſt. Tom. 2. p. 217, 218, 219. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(86) Guy Patin, Letter 351, p. 34, 35, of Tom. 3. See alſo p. 33, 34, 62, 64, 73, of the ſame volume.

* Addit. by the Tranſl.

† Addit. by the Tranſl.

(80) See Acta Eruditor. 1684. p. 35.

(81) I make uſe of the title he employs in his liſt, tho' the true title is, Introduction à l'Hiſtoire par la connoiſſance des Medailles.

(82) At Amſterdam, in 12mo.

 Tom. 10. p. 1252.

†† Inſerted in Struvius's Acta Literaria, Faſc. 6. p. 23.

* Niceron, Hommes illuſt. Tom. 10. part 2. p. 293, 294. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

‖ No. 4421.

† Niceron, ibid. p. 115, 116. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(83) See Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for Dec. 1694, p. 174.

upon him [L].

[L] The diſgrace of his . . . . ſon.] Charles Patin bewailed it, and affirms that it was entirely owing to calumny; but he draws a vail over the whole. Cùm ecce ἀτυχία, ſays he (87), veriùs διαβολὴ, & calumniam dixero, me præcipitem egit, & κακῶν ἰλιάδα intulit. Timanthum (88) imitari liceat, benigne lector, qui cùm mæſtos pinxiſſet adſtantes, & triſtitiæ omnem imaginem conſumſiſſet, ob Iphigeniam ſtantem ad aras perituram, patris vultum velavit quem ſatis mæſtum pingere deſperabat. Velum hic protendamus, ſeu dolore commoti ob fortunas perditas, ſeu charitate ob invidorum nequitiam. i. e. "When lo! misfortune, or rather calumny and detraction, plunged me into numberleſs evils. Permit me, gentle reader, to imitate Timanthes, who, when he had painted the ſpectators with ſorrowful countenances, and had quite exhauſted his imagination in repreſenting grief, on account of Iphigenia, who was ſtanding at the altar, in order to be ſacrificed; vailed her father's face; he deſpairing ever to give, with his pencil, ſufficient ſtrength to his ſorrow. Give me leave alſo to draw a vail on this occaſion; whether prompted by grief for the loſs of my fortune, or by concern for the wicked treatment of thoſe who envy me." His father was not ſo myſterious on this occaſion, he ſpecifying certain cauſes, or rather pretences of I know not what prohibited books which had been found in his ſon's ſtudy. But we had better hear his own words. Every body pities him, no one lays any thing to his charge; and, if we except a few raſcally bookſellers, he is univerſally beloved. He nevertheleſs is abſent from me; and we forced him to ſubmit to this, in ſpite of his ſtoical diſpoſition. He had always entertained hopes, that his Majeſty's Juſtice would have been extended to him, but our enemies have been too powerful. However, to allay the ſmart of our wound, it is ſaid, 1. That he was proſecuted for not appearing when ſummoned by the Court, as a man who is abſent, and will not make any defence. 2. That it was by a particular and ſupreme commiſſion, without allowing of an appeal, which is an unuſual way of proceeding, and ſhews more evidently the deſign his enemies had to ruin him. 3. That letters, under the King's ſignet, were directed to moſt of the Judges, and it was recommended to them, that it would be neceſſary to make an example of him. . . . . 4. It is ſaid, that a very powerful man, behind the curtain, carried on the cauſe againſt us; promoted, and ſet every engine at work againſt us; becauſe there were found among thoſe books, ſome volumes of Mr. Fouquet's caſe, and the Hiſtory of Gigeri's attempt. . . . . Three books have been ſpecified; one filled with impiety, viz. a Huguenot book, entitled, the Anatomy of the Maſs, by Peter de Moulin, a Proteſtant Miniſter of Charenton; as though the inquiſition was eſtabliſhed in France. This is a little ſixpeny piece. Paris is over-run with ſuch books; and ſome are found in moſt libraries, and even the Friars have them. The ſecond was a book, (as they ſay) againſt his Majeſty's ſervice: it is entitled, the Shield of State, which was ſold publickly in the Courts of Juſtice, and to which two anſwers are printing here. The third is, The Hiſtory of the Amours of the Court, which are certain ſmall libels that deſerve our contempt more than our anger. I am of opinion that theſe three books are only an handful; and that ſome perſon acts ſecretly againſt my ſon, and cauſes our misfortune (89). All this is nothing to the purpoſe, I mean, with regard to the cauſe which was given out in Paris, to have occaſioned his diſgrace. It was ſaid, 1. That Charles Patin was ſent to Holland, with orders to buy up all the copies of the Amours du Palais Royal, and to burn them immediately, without ſparing ſo much as one. 2. That a great Monarch gave him that commiſſion, and promiſed him a reward. 3. That this perſon commiſſioned, having bought up all the copies, did not burn them, but ſent a conſiderable number of them into the Kingdom. This is the common report, but whether well or ill grounded I cannot ſay.

(87) Carolus Patinus, in Lyceo Patavino, p. 91.

(88) It ſhould be Timanthem.

(89) Guy Patin, Letter 468. p. 370. Tom. 3.

PATRICIUS * (AUGUSTIN), in Latin Patricius (a), Canon of Sienna, afterwards Maſter of the Ceremonies of the Pope's Chapel, and at laſt Biſhop of Pienza in Tuſcany, flouriſhed about the cloſe of the 15th Century. Cardinal Francis Piccolomini, Archbiſhop of Sienna, who was afterwards Pope by the name of Pius III. †, ordered him to write an Abridgment of the Acts of the Council of Baſil. The reader will ſee hereunder, in what manner this was executed [A]. This is not the only work which Auguſtin Patrizi wrote, he compoſing another concerning the Ceremonies of the Pope's Chapels (b) [B]. He was Secretary to this Cardinal Francis Piccolomini, when he went Legate to Germany, under the Pontificate of Paul II. (c). I ſhall examine whether Father Mabillon ſhould have ſaid, that there was an Auguſtin Patrizi different from this [C]. It

* In Italian Patrizi. See the additions to this article. Rem. by the Tranſl.

(a) This muſt alſo be underſtood of the Patrizi of the two following articles.

† This is an error of Bayle, or of the Printer, it ſhould be Pius II. Rem. by the Tranſl.

(b) See the rem. [D] of the art. GRASSIS (Paris de).

(c) Extracted from Spondanus, ad ann. 1431. num. 9. p. m. 805.

[A] The Reader will ſee, hereunder, in what manner this was executed.] Auguſtin Patrizi made uſe, among other books, of two large volumes, a copy of which Cardinal de St. Mark lent him. He affirms that he ſaw them at Baſil, where they were kept with prodigious care, as thoſe of the Sybils were antiently preſerved; and that theſe two volumes were writ by John of Segovia, a Spaniard, called the Cardinal of St. Calixtus by the Council of Baſil, a man who perſiſted obſtinately in the ſchiſm till his death. He adds, that he made uſe of a hiſtory which Dominick, Cardinal of Ferma, had drawn up of the firſt part of this Council. This Cardinal had a ſeat in that Aſſembly, till the rupture broke out between Eugenius IV. and them. I muſt obſerve, that Auguſtin Patrizi's work is not printed *. Mr. Rigault lent it in manuſcript (1) to Spondanus (2). ["There is the "following piece of our Patrizi, Summa Conciliorum "Baſileenſis, Florentini, Lanſanenſis & Piſani. Father "Labbe inſerted it in the thirteenth Tome of his "Councils, col. 1448." †]

[B] He compoſed another treatiſe, concerning the ceremonies of the Pope's chapel.] The Latin expreſſions of Spondanus, whom I have followed, are theſe; Librum de Ritibus Sacelli Pontificii conſcripſit (3). This doubtleſs is the ſame work I ſpoke of elſewhere (4), where I related a paſſage of Mr. Couſin, where we ſee, by whom, and in what manner, Auguſtin Patrizi's book on the rites of the Church of Rome  was publiſhed, and the conſequences of that publication. We there find alſo, that Auguſtin Patrizi was nephew of Pope Pius II. who had given him the ſirname of Piccolomini, and that he began to be maſter of the ceremonies under that Pontif. It is certain, that in the dedication of his book Sacrarum Ceremoniarum, inſerted by Father Mabillon, in the 2d Tome of the Muſeum Italicum (5), and dated from Rome, the 1ſt of March 1488, he ſtiles himſelf Auguſtinus Patricius Piccolomineus; but I dare not aſſert, either that this Pope Pius II. gave him that ſirname, or that this Pope was his uncle ††. It appears more probable to me, that it was given him by Cardinal Francis Piccolomini his maſter. However, I wont affirm any thing. I know that Pope Pius II. gave the name of Piccolomini to a perſon of abilities, who had been his Secretary (6), and whom he raiſed to the Purple.

[C] I ſhall examine whether Father Mabillon ſhould have ſaid, that there was an Auguſtin Patrizi different from this.] He has inſerted, in Tome 1. of the Muſeum Italicum (7), the life of Fabian Bencius, written by Auguſtin Patrizi, Biſhop of Pienza, and ſays (8), that this Biſhop, who had been Maſter of the Ceremonies, in the Pontificate of Innocent VIII. differs from Auguſtin Patrizi, who was Secretary to Cardinal Francis Piccolomini; and who wrote an account of the tranſactions of the Diet of Ratiſbon, at the time that this Cardinal was ſent thither. Here then, according to him, are two Authors, named Auguſtin Patrizi;

* [This is an error of Bayle, that work being printed in Tom. 13, of Father Labbe's Councils. Rem. by the Tranſl.]

(1) He had taken it from the King's Library.

(2) Extracted from Spondanus, ad ann. 1431. num. 9. p. m. 805.

† Addit. by the Tranſl.

(3) Spondanus, ubi ſupra.

(4) Remark [D] of the article GRASSIS (Paris de).

 See the rem. [A] of the additions to this article.

(5) p. 524 & ſeq.

†† See the text of the addition to this article.

(6) James Amanatus, generally known by the name of the Cardinal of Pavia. See the Nomenclator Cardinalium, p. m. 96.

(7) p. 251 & ſeq.

(8) Mabill. Muſ. Ital. Tom. 1. p. 255.

It may be very proper to add a Supplement, there being ſome errors in the foregoing Article.

☞ PATRICIUS (AUGUSTIN), was native of Sienna, and deſcended from an illuſtrious family, but the year of his birth is not known. He went through his ſtudies in his own country. In 1460 he was appointed Secretary to Pope Pius II. who took an affection for him, and made him aſſume the ſirname of Piccolomini, (the name of his family) as was his cuſtom to do with regard to thoſe who, being devoted to his ſervice, diſcovered ſuperior abilities and prudence (a). This Pope dying in 1464, Patrizi entered into the ſervice of Cardical Piccolomini. Patrizi was Maſter of the Ceremonies in 1468, when the Emperor Frederick III. went to Rome a ſecond time. Thomas di Teſta, ſirnamed Piccolomini, for the ſame reaſon as Patrizi, Biſhop of Pienza, and of Montalcino, the Churches of which were then united, dying in 1482, Sixtus IV. appointed Auguſtin Patrizi to be his ſucceſſor. The latter preſided over this See till his death, which happened at Rome in 1496, under the Pontificate of Alexander VI. Several Authors have miſtook, by dividing the perſon whoſe article we are now writing into two ; and by making two Auguſtin Patrizis, both natives of Sienna, contemporaries [A]: whilſt others have committed an error of another kind [B]. Hereunder is a complete catalogue of his works [C].

(a) Elogium of Auguſtin Patrizi, in the Journal of Venice, Tom. 18.

Patrizi ; one of them was Maſter of the Ceremonies ; and afterwards, in 1483, Biſhop of Pienza : the other was Secretary of Francis Piccolomini. The former wrote the Life of Fabian Bencius ; and an account of the entry of the Emperor Frederic III. into Rome (9) : the latter drew up the acts of a Diet of Ratiſbon. It is of the latter, continues Father Mabillon, and not of the former, that Voſſius ſpeaks in his work on the Latin Hiſtorians. We, indeed, obſerve, that Voſſius does not indeed give any other title to his Auguſtin Patrizi, but that of Secretary to Francis Piccolomini, Cardinal of Sienna ; and makes him Author of no other work, but the Relation of the Tranſactions of the Diet at Ratiſbon. He obſerves that the Author dedicated it, in 1471, to James Piccolomini, Cardinal of Pavia (10) ; and adds, that Campanus called this Patrizi, Cicero's ape. Auguſtinum hunc ſimiam Ciceronis ob ſtudium ornandæ dictionis appellat Campanus Epiſtolâ quadam inter eas Piccolominæi, quas diximus (11). I will venture to affirm, that Father Mabillon is miſtaken. It does not appear to me, in any manner, neceſſary to ſuppoſe, on this occaſion, two Authors of the ſame name ; and I declare for Spondanus, who is of opinion, that the ſame Auguſtin Patrizi, Secretary to Francis Piccolomini, was Maſter of the Ceremonies, and Biſhop of Pienza. [See all this explained in the Text and Notes of this article *].

(9) It is in the Muſæum Italicum, ibid. p. 256 & ſeq.

(10) Voſſius de Hiſt. Latin. p. 604.

(11) Idem, ibid.

* Rem. by the Tranſl.

[A] Several Authors have miſtook . . . by making two Auguſtin Patrizis.] As Father Labbe, in his Bibliotheque of Manuſcripts ; Father Mabillon, in his Muſæum Italicum ; Wharton, in his addition to Cave's Hiſtoria Litteraria ; John Godfrey Olearius, in his Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Writers ; and du Pin's Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Authors. One eaſily ſees that theſe Authors copy one another. But all the Writers of Sienna ſpeak but of one Auguſtin Patrizi, to whom only the titles and works, which foreigners aſcribe to two perſons, belong (1).

(1) Niceron's Hommes illuſt. Tom. 7. p. 394.

[B] Others have committed an error of another kind.] Wharton, and after him Olearius, in ſtiling him Epiſcopus Pojentinus (2) ; Placcius (3), by ſtiling him Epiſcopus Picentinus.

(2) Ibid. p. 395.

(3) Theatruum anonymorum.

[C] Hereunder is a complete catalogue of his works.] 1. Commentarius de Comitiis Imperii Ratiſbonæ celebratis. This work is inſerted in all the editions of the letters of Cardinal Piccolomini, otherwiſe called the Cardinal of Pavia ; and in the ſecond Tome of the Writers of the Hiſtory of Germany, by Marquard Frequerus. This is only the beginning of what Patrizi had wrote on this ſubject, ſince we therein find nothing but the reaſons why the Cardinal of Sienna was ſent on this Legation ; his ſetting out for Germany, and his arrival in the territory of Verona. The remainder is in manuſcript in the Library of the Vatican. 2. Deſcriptio adventus Frederici III. Imperatoris ad Paulum Papam II. Father Mabillon has inſerted this deſcription in his Muſæum Italicum (4). 3. Summa Conciliorum Baſileenſis, Florentini, Lauſanenſis & Piſani. Father Labbe has inſerted this work in the thirteenth Tome of his Councils, col. 1488. 4. Vita optimi ac integerrimi viri Fabiani Bencii Politianenſis, Sacrorum Canorum Profeſſoris. Patrizi wrote this Life after Benci's deceaſe, which happened at Rome the 30th of November, 1481. It was firſt publiſhed by Father Mabillon, in his Muſæum Italicum. 5. De Senæ urbis antiquitate. This piece, which is merely a collection of fictions, was never printed. 6. Hiſtoriarum Sinenſium libri. This hiſtory likewiſe was never put to the preſs. It begins with the year 1186, and ends with 1338. Cardinal Piccolomini had ſome ſhare in writing this piece ; but he no doubt was not ſatisfied with it, ſince he himſelf drew up another, which however was never printed. 7. De Annatis. This work, as well as thoſe above, is alſo in manuſcript in the Vatican Library, and was never publiſhed. 8. Pontificalis liber magna diligentia Reverendi in Chriſto patris, viri D. Johannis Burckardi Præpoſiti & Canonici Eccleſiæ S. Florentii Haſelacenſis, Argentinenſis Diverceſis, correctus & emendatus. Romæ 1485. folio. This is the firſt edition of this work, in which Patrizi had no greater ſhare than Burckard, and Janus Lucio Biſhop of Cajazzo, who aſſiſted in the compoſition of it with him. The ſecond was publiſhed at Rome in 1486, and Lucio and Burckard are named as the chief Authors. The third was printed at Lions in 1511, folio. In theſe three editions, is a dedication of Patrizi to Pope Innocent VII. Father Albert Caſtellano, a Dominican of Venice, afterwards wrote additions to this Pontifical, which was firſt printed, with his additions and corrections, at Venice in 1520, and afterwards at Lyons in 1542. Patrizi is alſo mentioned in theſe, but his name is not printed in the modern editions. 9. Rituum Eccleſiaſticorum, ſive Sacrorum Ceremoniarum Romanæ Eccleſiæ libri tres. It was by order of Pope Innocent VIII. that Patrizi undertook to collect and correct the Ceremonial, as he had done with regard to the Pontifical ; and for this reaſon he inſcribed it to him in a dedication dated the 1ſt of March, 1488. He owns his having been greatly aſſiſted in this work by John Burckard, then Maſter of the Ceremonies. However, this Ceremonial was not printed till a long time after Patrizi's death, ſince the firſt edition was printed at Venice in 1516, folio. It has born ſeveral impreſſions ſince, but Patrizi's name was not mentioned, whence Marcellus, who publiſhed it, was looked upon as a Plagiary. The firſt edition of it is extremely ſcarce, becauſe Graſſi, who did all that lay in his power, but without ſucceſs, to ſuppreſs this work, deſtroyed all ſuch copies of it as fell into his hands (5).

(4) Tom. 1. part 2. p. 256.

(5) Journal of Venice, Tom. 18.

I.

PATRICIUS (FRANCIS) Biſhop of Caieta, a native of Sienna, ſhewed a great deal of reading in his books De Regno & Regis Inſtitutione, and in thoſe De Reipublicæ Inſtitutione. He flouriſhed in the 15th Century. He is ſometimes miſtaken for another FRANCIS PATRICI (a), a great Philoſophor, an Anti-peripatetic, who was born (b) in the

(a) See the rem. [A].

(b) At Cliſſa in Iſtria, according to Thuanus, lib. 119. p. 817.

the territories of the Venetians, anno 1592, or 1503 (c), and who died in Rome the 6th of February 1597 (d). Conſult Moreri, and ſtill more Teiſſier (e). They have anticipated me in moſt of the particulars which I could have related; and for this reaſon I ſhall content myſelf with pointing out certain errors, and make ſome obſervations with regard to the editions [A]. I will only add, that Francis Patrizi the Philoſopher complains

(c) His effigies prefixed to his Peripatetic Enquiries informs us, that he was in his 51ſt year in 1580; and he ſays, in the begining of his Nova Philoſophia de Univerſis, that he was writing it in 1588, being the 58th year of his age.

(d) Thuan. lib. 119. p. 817.

(e) Additions to Elogiums, extracted from Thuanus.

[A] I will content myſelf with pointing out certain errors, and make ſome obſervations with regard to the editions.] Gesner (1) had no reaſon to believe, that Francis Patrizi of Sienna was perhaps a different perſon from Franciſcus Lucius Durantinus, Author of a book de optima republicæ Gubernatione, printed at Venice in 1522. He ought to have ſaid that they are two Writers; for this Lucius's work is divided into three books only, the laſt whereof is partly calculated to celebrate the Republic of Venice; but Patrizi's work is divided into nine books, and has nothing in particular relating to the Venetians. In Geſner's epitome (2), Francis Patrizi, the Anti-Peripatetic, is miſtaken for the Biſhop of Caieta. The ſame error is made in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library; for therein is aſcribed, to one and the ſame Author, the Peripatetic enquiries or diſcuſſions, &c. and the books de regno & de reipublicæ Inſtitutione. In Geſner's epitome, mention is made of two other Patrizis, who are merely ideal perſons; for the pretended Fredericus Patricius Venetus is not a different perſon from him who attacked Ariſtotle. This appears evidently from hence, that the ſame books are aſcribed to him (3), which had juſt before been aſcrib'd to Franciſcus Patricius Senenſis. We can ſcarce conceive that there are compilers ſo inattentive and heedleſs. They tell us, in the ſame column of one page, that Franciſcus Patricius Senenſis, wrote peripatetic diſcuſſions or enquiries, and ten dialogues in Italian, de legendæ ſcribendæque Hiſtoriæ ratione, and that Fridericus Patricius Venetus, wrote the ſame dialogues in Italian, and the Peripatetic enquiries. They ſpeak of one Franciſcus Patricius, whoſe Commentaries were epitomized and printed at Paris. It is the ſame Author they had juſt before given an article of; it is, I ſay, Franciſcus Patricius Senenſis. Konig merits ſome cenſure, he not knowing Patrizi of Sienna, and applying to the other Patrizi a paſſage of Barthius, which cannot ſuit with him. Take particular notice that, according to him (4), the Patrizi he mentions died at Rome, in 1597, and he deſcribes him with ſuch characteriſticks that no one can take him for any other but the Anti-Peripatetic. It is therefore abſurd to aſſert that, according to Barthius, he was beheaded. This will eaſily be diſcovered, if we do but juſt caſt our eye on the following words of Barthius (5): Sed quid coarcevemus plures? cum hanc rationem æra pulſandi (6), neque aliam potuiſſe inducere videam qui horum clangorum meminerunt, è quibus Pindarum & Steſichorum cum aliis jam olim produxit, & inde Juvenalem enarravit Franciſcus Patritius lib. 2. de Regno & Inſt. Regia, vir omnino meliore fato dignus, quam qui in patria ſua ſecuri capite truncatus fuerit, anno 1447, aut paucis ante, ſcribente Raphaele Volaterrano lib. 21. Comm. Urbanor, i. e. "To what "purpoſe ſhould I collect more? ſince this method "of ſtriking kettles, and no other could induce thoſe "who call to mind ſuch noiſes or ſounds, among "whom Pindar and Steſichorus, &c. in antient times, "and afterwards Juvenal, are related by Francis Patrizi, in book 2. de Regno & Inſt. Regia, a perſon "highly deſerving a better fate, than to loſe his "head in his native country, in, or a little before, "the year 1447, as we are told by R. Volaterranus, "book 21. of his Commentariorum Urbanorum." Can one apply to a man who died in 1597 (7), a paſſage where mention is made of a man who was beheaded in 1447, or a little before? I am of opinion that Barthius did not commit a chronological error in this place, ſince, although Volaterranus does not ſpecify the year in which this Patrizi was put to death, he yet intimates ſufficiently that it was about that time. Having mentioned Gregory of Tiferno and Anthony Panormita, he adds, Joannes Auriſpa Secretarius Apoſtolicus ſub Eugenio inter eruditos non admodum ignobilis ea tempeſtate. Patricii quoque Senenſis, qui in factione civitatis ſecuri percuſſus fuit, magnopere commendatur oratio ſimul & eruditio. Petrus Candidus Nicolai V. Magiſter Brevium fuit (8), i. e. "John "Auriſpa, the Apoſtolical Secretary, under the Pon"tificate of Eugenius, was conſidered as a learned "man at that time. The eloquence and erudition "of Patrizi at Sienna, who loſt his head in a ſedi"tion of the city, are likewiſe highly applauded. "Peter Candidus was maſter of the Briefs under "Pope Nicholas V." This ſeems to intimate that a Patrici is ſpoken of, who flouriſhed under Eugenius IV. and was not living under Pope Nicholas V. I own that this is not a convincing proof; but however, if Barthius has not hit upon the true year, he is excuſable, and we ought ſooner to pardon him this error than that he has committed, where he ſuppoſes that an author was beheaded in 1447, is the ſame Francis Patrizi of Vienna, who wrote the books De Regno & Inſt. Regia. The latter lived under Sixtus IV. (9), to whom he dedicated his Treatiſe De Republica, & Reipublicæ Inſtitutione. It is to be obſerved that Volaterranus, in book 4. (10) of his work, ſays that the Patrizi, whom the people of Sienna beheaded, was put to death, during the war in which they were engaged with Pacininus, who poſſeſſed himſelf of one of their cities, whence they drove him, by the aid of Pope Calixtus. Now this Pope was not elected till 1455. Moreri did wrong in not ſaying, that Patrizi of Sienna was Biſhop of Caieta. He ſuppoſes him to be Biſhop of Carriati in Calabria; and he probably was led into an error by a typographical error, which he was not aware of in Aubertus Miræus. He had read, in this Author, Franciſcus Patritius, Senenſis. præſul Caretanus (11), i. e. "Francis Patrizi of Sienna, Biſhop of Carriati:" and not perceiving that it ought to be read Caietanus, he fixed the Biſhoprick at Cariati in Calabria. It is on the authority of the ſame writer that he has placed this prelate in the beginning of the 16th Century, which he would not have done, had he known that Francis Patrizi, appointed Biſhop of Caieta by Paul II. (12), died in 1494. Had Moreri, who refers us to Ughelli (13), conſulted him, he would have found this. What he ſays, after Miræus, with regard to the editions of the works of his pretended Biſhop of Carriati, requires a ſmall Supplement. The Latin edition of the 9. books De Regno, and of the 9. books De Republica, printed at Paris in 1519, is illuſtrated with notes by John Savigni, Cum Joannis Savigneii Scholiis . . . . cum ejuſdem Annotationibus (14). The Scholia or ſhort expoſitions relate to the book De Regno, and the notes to the books De Republica. One Nicodon of Saint Maixent publiſhed the books of the Republick at Paris, in 1580, in 16°. and added to them the arguments of the chapters, and the citations of Authors (15). John le Blond, Lord of Branville, drew up extracts of all theſe works of Patrici, and publiſhed them in French at Paris in 1550, as we are informed by du Verdier (16). Joli (17) obſerves, that this John le Blond tranſlated into French an Extract or Collection of the firſt Maxims from Eraſmus's book De Inſtitutione Principis Chriſtiani, and that this extract was printed at Paris in 1546, with Francis Patrici's Epitome of the Commonwealth. He alſo obſerves, that this extract was drawn up by Giles d'Aurigni, called le Pamphile, an Advocate of Parliament: and that it was printed at Paris, anno 1543, with an Epitome of Francis Patrizi's Commonwealth. We find in du Verdier's Bibliotheque (18), that John du Ferey, Knight of Dur Eſcu, Counſellor of his Majeſty's Privy Council, tranſlated from the Latin, the firſt books of the writings of Francis Patrizi oof Sienna, Biſhop of Caieta, treating of the Reign or Government of one perſon, called Monarchy, and of the inſtitution of a good King, Paris, 1577, 8vo. This is a French tranſlation of the 9. books of the Commonwealth, printed at Paris in 1610, 8vo. This tranſlation was by the Sieur de la Mouchettiere. I cannot ſay whether the notes added to the end of every chapter are by the tranſlator, or only a verſion of John Savigni's notes. Who would ſuppoſe, when he is told of ſo many editions,

(1) Geſnerus, in Biblioth. folio, 250 and 253 verſo.

(2) p. 242.

(3) In Geſner's Epitome.

(4) Konig. Bibliotb. p. 612.

(5) Barthius, in lib. 2. (and not as Konig ſays) Thebaidos Statii, p. 437.

(6) He ſpeaks there of the kettles which uſed to be ſounded when the moon was eclipſed.

(7) In the Jugemens des Savans ſur les Poetes, num. 1062, it is ſaid that Francis Patrizi (the Philoſopher who oppoſed Ariſtotle) was beheaded at Rome in 1597.

(8) Volaterran. Commentar. Urbanor. lib. 21. p. m. 773.

(9) Who was made Pope in 1471.

(10) p. m. 158.

(11) Miræus de Scriptor. Sæculi 16. p. 22.

(12) The 23d of March, 1460. Ughelli ubi infra.

(13) Ughelli, Italia Sacra, Tom. 1. p. 588.

(14) Epitome Bibliotb. Geſneri.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Biblioth. Franc. p. 406.

(17) Joly, Codicille Gbretien, in the preface, p. 35. edit. of 1666.

(18) p. 689, 690.

plains grievouſly of his fate [B].

He diſguiſed himſelf, under the name of Francis Mutus (f), in the title page of Diſceptationes contra Theodori Angelutii calumnias. This Angelutius, a famous Phyſician, had (f) Naudæus, de Fato & vitæ termino, p. m. 27.

that this work in queſtion is an admirable one? And yet it has been treated with contempt by good judges. Eorum fermè tempore (19) Franciſcus Patricius Senenſis Farraginem quandam exemplorum ſub Reipublicæ titulo, puerorum credo uſui ac chriarum in ſcholis compoſitioni, evulgavit: tantum diſſimilis alteri Franciſco Patricio Romano (20), qui non nihil pariter de hac re inter opuſcula juvenilia protulit, quantum noctua Aquilæ, aut anſer diſpar eſt olori (21), i. e. "Much about the ſame "time, Francis Patrizi of Sienna publiſhed a "rhapſody of examples, entitled, the Republic, de"ſigned, as I ſuppoſe, for children, and for rhetori"cal exerciſes in ſchools. All this is as unlike to the "other Francis Patrizi, a native of Rome, who like"wiſe publiſhed ſomething upon this ſubject among "his juvenile performances, as an owl is unlike an "eagle, or a gooſe is unlike a ſwan."

(19) i. e. at the time that a book of Robortel was publiſhed, and Jerom Vida's treatiſe de Republica. Naudæus is miſtaken: for Patrizi's book was dedicated to Pope Sixtus IV. Robortel and Vida were ſtill alive after the middle of the 16th century.

(20) Naudæus is miſtaken, this Patrizi was not born in Rome, but in the Venetian territories.

(21) Naudæus Bibliograph. Polit. p. m. 21.

The reader will find in the treatiſe on the Origin of printing at Paris, that the edition which John Savigni cauſed to be printed, did not pleaſe him, though very good types were uſed on that occaſion. It was full of faults, which vexed him the more, becauſe he had taken great pains in correcting the errors of the manuſcript: this edition being made from a manuſcript which John Provoſt, a Counſellor of Parliament, had brought from Italy (22). Whence it may be inferred that this Paris edition is the firſt.

(22) Chevillier, Origine de l'Impr. de Paris, p. 187.

[B] Francis Patrizi the Philoſopher complains grievouſly of his fate.] He regrets the ſeven years he had ſpent in the iſland of Cyprus, far removed from his ſtudies, and employed in affairs, the whole benefit of which was reaped by others. Being grown weary of a buſineſs from which he himſelf reaped ſo little advantage, he devoted himſelf to the ſervice of Philip Mocenigo, Archbiſhop of that iſland; and after having lived ſome time with him, he followed him to Venice, and afterwards to Padua (23). Returning with great ſatisfaction to his ſtudies, he began to write the life of Ariſtotle, but his unhappy fate drew him from that delightful employment, and carried him to Spain; he, who, from nine years of age, had ſcarce done any thing but ramble about from place to place by ſea and land. Ecce me fati quædam vis, quæ me novem annorum puerum, ad hanc uſque ætatem, peregrinationibus continuis terraque marique exercuerat, in Hiſpanias abripuit (24). He returned to Venice ſix months after, and finiſhed the life of Ariſtotle. This work contained alſo a judgment on the writings of this Philoſopher; it is, in a word, the firſt volume of his Peripatetic Diſcuſſions (25). Theſe particulars we are told in the dedication to this volume. The dedication to the ſecond volume informs us, that the Author found an aſylum at the Duke of Ferrara's Court, and employment to his mind, ſince he was permitted to teach the Philoſophy of Plato in the Univerſity of Ferrara. Cui melius labores meos dicarem, in this manner he addreſſes himſelf to Anthony Montecatino, Chief Secretary to Alphonſo d'Eſte, the ſecond of that name; .... quam ei viro qui me peſſum Cyprico bello datum, peſſimorumque hominum ingratitudine, fraudibus, inſidiiſque agitatum, perque multos annos fortunæ adverſiſſimæ fluctibus actum, in portum recepit, in Sereniſſi. Principis hujus familiam interpoſuit. Platonicam philoſophiam, in ſingulare hujuſce Academiæ ornamentum, publice profiteri dedit (26)? i. e. "To whom could my labours be more juſtly dedi"cated, than to him, who when I had been greatly "oppreſſed in the Cyprian war, injured by the in"gratitude, fraud, and wily deceits of wicked "wretches; toſſed up and down, during a long "courſe of years, by the waves of ill fortune, re"ceived me into Port, and fixed me in this moſt "Serene Prince's Family. He gave me leave to read "Lectures on and teach the Platonic Philoſophy, "whence great honour redounded to this Univer"ſity." Thus he ſtrongly complains, in a few words, againſt the malice of thoſe who envied him, and his hard fate. He repeats the ſame thing in the dedication to the 4th Tome; for, in addreſſing a Biſhop who had formerly been his fellow-ſtudent in Padua, he informs him of the retreat he had found after a great number of misfortunes, in the city of Modena, and how Ferrara ſerved him at laſt for a harbour. Neque enim locorum diſtantia, qua tu quidem per Italiam pene que Galliam, ego verò per Dalmatiam, per Græciam, per Aſiam, ad demum per Hiſpaniam atque Galliam disjuncti poſtea ſemper fuimus, potuit eam oblivioni tradere; neque ex animis noſtris eradere fortuna diſpar, quæ te in arduis ſemper negotiis ac magnis, magnorum principum habuit, donec ad eam dignitatem, qua nunc frueris, longè meritò es evectus. Ego verò pauperie preſſus, dum aliena commoda curo, mea non curo, continuis itineribus terraque marique exercitus, Cyprica claude oppreſſus, atque ingratiſſimorum peſſimorumque hominum fraudibus inſidiiſque circumventus, Mutinæ in patria tua te abſente, apud veteres amicos, apudque Alexandrum Baranzonum equitem, ac Tarquiniam Molziam ſingularem totius jeculi fœminam, primum reſedi; poſtea è marinis, fortunæque fluctibus in hunc portum jam devectus (27), i. e. "Nor would the diſtance of countries, by "which we have been ever ſince divided, you by "Italy and France, and I by Dalmatia, Greece, "Aſia, and laſtly by Spain and France, eraſe it "from our memories; nor that diſparity of fortune, "which kept you for ever employed in the weighty "and arduous affairs of mighty Princes, till ſuch "time as you was raiſed to the dignity which you "now ſo deſervedly enjoy, could obliterate it from "our minds. But alas! unhappy I, after being borne "down by poverty, whilſt I took care of other peo"ple's buſineſs and was negligent of my own, ha"raſſed with perpetual journies and voyages, oppreſ"ſed with the Cyprian overthrow, and over-reached "by the deceit and ſnares of moſt wicked and un"grateful men, firſt fixed my abode in Modena, "your native country, during your abſence, with my "old friends, and with Cavalier Alexander Baran"zoni, and Tarquinia Molzia, a Lady not to be pa"rallel'd in this age; and was afterwards waſted, "by the waves of the ocean and of fortune, into "this port." I do not find that he was Profeſſor in Padua, as Lorenzo Craſſo (28), and after him Moreri declared. It had been better to have followed Thuanus (29), who relates that Patrizi, after having been a Profeſſor ſeventeen years in Ferrara, went to Rome (30), upon the invitation of Pope Clement VIII.

(23) See the dedication of Tom. 1. of the Diſcuſſions Peripatetiques.

(24) Ibid.

(25) It was printed at Venice in 1571, 4to.

(26) Patricius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Tom. 2. Diſcuſſ. Peripat. p. 177. edit. Baſil. 1581. folio.

(27) Patricius, in Epiſt. Dedicatoria, Tom. 4. Diſcuſſ. Peripat. ad Benedictum Manzolium Epiſcopum Regienſem, p. 363.

(28) Lor. Craſſo, Elogii d'Huom. Letter. Tom. 1. p. 62.

(29) Thuan. lib. 119. p. 817.

(30) Lor. Craſſo, Elogii, Tom. 1. p. 62. and Moreri, fix his Profeſſorſhip in Rome, before that which it is pretended he had in Padua.

A certain perſon ſpoke as follows to me the other day. Patrizi was born at Cliſſa in Iſtria, as Thuanus affirms, and there is a fortreſs called Cliſſa in Dalmatia. Perhaps therefore Franciſcus Patricius Dalmata may not differ from this Patrizi; though Teiſſier (31) adviſes us not to confound FRANCIS PATRIZI, of whom we now ſpeak, with .... FRANCIS PATRIZI, born in Sclavonia, Author of a book, entitled, Eſpoſitione delli Oracoli di Leone Imperatore (32). I anſwered peremptorily, that no diſtinction ought to be made between them. Thuanus, in the firſt book De Vita ſua, gives the epithet Dalmatia to Franciſcus Patricius, Author of the Peripatetic Diſcuſſions. I was not ſo poſitive with regard to the following words of Teſſier's book, his new Philoſophy concerning the Predicables (33). He has ill tranſlated, ſaid the perſon to me, the Nova de Univerſis Philoſophia, of Thuanus. The above tranſlation means, that this Philoſopher propoſed ſome new doctrines in the five methods of Porphyry, the genus, ſpecies, differentia, propriam & accidens; and it is not probable that he took the pains to refute the ſchoolmen, about ſuch particulars, in all that work. I did not dare to be poſitive.

(31) Teiſſier, Eloges, Tom. 2. p. 279. edit. of 1690.

(32) See Hankius, de Scriptor. Byzantinis, part 1. p. 417.

(33) Teiſſier, Eloges, Tom. 2. p. 277.

Now I know what this book, is which Teiſſier calls the new Philoſophy concerning the Predicables. The Latin title of this work ſhould not have been tranſlated in this manner, it not treating in any manner of the Predicables. It is a folio, the Venetian edition of which, printed anno 1593, apud Robertum Meiettum, is thus entitled: Nova de Univerſis Philoſophia libris quinquaginta comprehenſa. In qua Ariſtotelica methodo non per motum, ſed per lucem & lumina ad primam cauſam aſcenditur. Deinde nova quadam ac peculiari methodo tota in contemplationem venit divinitas. Poſtremo methodo had undertaken, in oppoſition to him, the defence of Ariſtotle. There is, in the laſt edition of Moreri's Dictionary, a new article [C], on which I muſt make a remark.

methodo Platonica rerum univerſitas à conditore Deo deducitur. Auctore Franciſco Patricio Philoſopho eminentiſſimo, & in celeberrimo Romano Gymnaſio ſumma cum laude eandem philoſophiam publice interpretante, quibus poſtremo ſunt adjecta Zoroaſtris oracula CCCXX. ex Platonicis collecta. Hermetis Triſmegiſti libelli & fragmenta quotcunque reperiuntur ordine ſcientifico diſpoſita. Aſclepii diſcipuli tres libelli. Myſtica Ægyptiorum à Platone dictata, ab Ariſtotele excepta, & perſcripta philoſophia. Platonicorum dialogorum novus penitus à Franciſco Patricio inventus ordo ſcientificus. Capita demum multa in quibus Plato concors, Ariſtoteles vero Catholicæ fidei adverſarius oſtenditur. The reader may have obſerved, that the title promiſes but fifty books; and nevertheleſs we find the work divided into four parts; the firſt whereof contains ten books, the ſecond twenty two, the third five, and the fourth twenty two, which makes in all ſixty nine books. The Author entitles the firſt book Panaugia, the ſecond Panarchia, the third Pampſychia, and the fourth Pancoſmia. He treats on the moſt ſublime queſtions of Phyſicks and Metaphyſicks, and this he does on extraordinary hypotheſes. He ſtarts many paradoxes, and at the ſame time ſhews a wonderful depth of genius. He dedicated this work in queſtion to Pope Gregory XIV. and the dedication is dated from Ferrara the 5th of Auguſt, 1591. This book was cenſured, and the Author was obliged to make a recantation (34), which was a little before he died (35).

(34) Thuan. lib. 119. p. 817.

(35) Idem, ibid.

[C] Moreri . . . has . . . a new article, on which I muſt make a remark.] This new article is that of PATRIZI (FRANCIS), and is in page 133, Paris edition of 1699. It relates as follows; that this Francis Patricius (Patrizi) lived in the 17th Century: that he wrote, in Italian, a hiſtory of Poetry, divided into ten books; that he contented himſelf with writing as an hiſtorian on this, he not expatiating very much on the rules of the art; and that he loſt his head at Rome in 1597. Janus Nicius Erythreus, in Pinotheca I. p. 204, 205. is cited. My firſt obſervation is, that this Francis Patrizi ſhould not have been made the ſubject of a new article, ſince he is the ſame perſon with Francis Patrizi the Philoſopher, mentioned in page 134. This may be proved demonſtratively; for it is as clear as the ſun, that Nicius Erythreus in the place cited, ſpeaks only of Francis Patrizi, Ariſtotle's opponent; and relates two or three particulars concerning him, which Moreri aſcribes to the Patrizi of page 134. It is alſo certain that Erythreus has aſcribed to Patrizi a work De Arte Poëtica, which work is the ſame with that, wherein, if we may credit Father Rapin cited by Baillet (36), that Author is contented with writing as an Hiſtorian, without expatiating very much on the rules of the art. By the way, we may probably ſuppoſe that this Jeſuit was but little acquainted with this piece of Francis Patrizi. It is a work divided into two decades (37), in the firſt of which the Author writes as an Hiſtorian; and in the ſecond, as a diſputant, who attacks Ariſtotle with prodigious vigour (31). My ſecond remark is, that ſince the compilers in queſtion intended to relate but one diſadvantageous particular concerning this work, they ought not to have cited merely Nicius Erythreus, who ſpeaks very much in commendation of it. Edidit de ſcribenda Hiſtoria tres Dialogos, & de Arte Poëtica totidem Decadas, quibus precium ſtatui pro illorum æſtimatione vix poteſt (39), i. e. "He publiſhed three "Dialogues concerning the writing of Hiſtory, and "the like number of decads on the Art of Poetry, "which are invaluable." Neither ſhould he have obſerved, that this piece is divided into ten books, Erythreus ſuppoſing that it contained three decades. I believe he is miſtaken, but it is certain that it contained two. In fine, it ſhould not have been aſſerted, that Patrizi was beheaded, this being falſe, and is not in the Author who is cited. The placing a man in the 17th Century, when it is ſuppoſed he was beheaded in 1597, is an error which muſt be laid to the charge of the printers; but not that of ſaying, that Caieta is in Calabria (40).

(36) In Tom. 1. of the Jugement ſur les Poetes, num. 1062.

(37) Della Poetica Deca Iſtoriale. Della Poetica Deca diſputata. This work was printed at Ferrara in 1586.

(38) Lor. Craſſo, Elogii, Tom. 1. p. 62.

(39) Nic. Erythræus, Pinac. 1. p. 204, 205.

(40) We find this in Moreri's Dict. Dutch edit. 1628, and in that of Paris in 1699, in the article of PATRICIUS (Patrizi) Author of de Regno & Regis Inſtitutione.

PATRICIUS (ANDREW), was one of the learned men who were born in Poland in the 16th Century. He ſtudied at Padua, where he acquired the eſteem of the moſt illuſtrious Profeſſors of that country, and particularly of Sigonius and Paul Manutius (a). He publiſhed books which gained him great reputation [A]; and ſome conſiderable benefices in his native country were beſtowed upon him. At laſt he was Provoſt * of the Church of Warſaw, Archdeacon of that of Wilna, and at laſt Biſhop of Wenden. Stephen Battori, King of Poland, having recovered Livonia, of which the Muſcovites had poſſeſſed themſelves, erected the city of Werden into an Epiſcopal See, and beſtowed it on our Patricius, who did not enjoy it long, he dying ſoon after, viz. in 1583 (b).

(a) See the three Letters which Paulus Minutius wrote to Andrew Patricius. They are the 19th and 20th of book 4, and the 6th of book 3.

* This is one of the chief dignities in chapters. Rem. by the Tranſl.

(b) Extracted from Simon Starovolſcius, in Elogiis centum Polonorum, p. 27, 28.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works which gained him reputation.] He had diligently ſtudied polite literature, and he wrote polite enough in Latin. All this is ſeen in his Commentaries on two of Tully's orations, and in his ſpeeches to the King of Poland, Stephen Battori, to congratulate him, in the name of the Clergy of Warſaw, for having thrice defeated the Muſcovites. The pains he took, which doubtleſs was very great, to collect the fragments of Cicero, diſcovered very good things, which great numbers of the Literati would never have diſcovered, ſo much they were diſperſed, till he had collected them. Such of Cicero's pieces as are loſt were better than thoſe which are extant. Several paſſages from that Roman, which we meet with in St. Auſtin, and other Writers, are prodigiouſly fine; but how many Literati would never have fought for them in thoſe books? Andrew Patricius has conſequently done them great ſervice in collecting them. He alſo wrote ſome controverſial works. Paralleli Eccleſiæ Orthodoxæ cum Synagoga Hæreticorum. De vera & falſa Eccleſia libri quinque (1).

(1) See Starovolſcius, in Elog. centum Polonorum, p. 26.

☞ PATRICK (a) (SIMON), a very learned Engliſh Biſhop [A], was born at Gainſborough in Lincolnſhire, Sept. 8. 1626. His father was a Mercer of good credit in that place, who deſigning his ſon for a ſcholar ſent him to ſchool to one Mr. Merryweather, an excellent Latiniſt, as appears by his tranſlation of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici. He was admitted into Queen's College in Cambridge, in 1644, under the tuition of Mr. Welles, and was very intimate with Mr. John Smith, Fellow of the ſame College, ſufficiently known by his excellent Tracts publiſhed after his death by Mr. John Worthington. Mr. Patrick took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1647, and that of Maſter

(a) For the particulars of this article, we are obliged to the very learned Samuel Knight, D. D. Prebendary of Ely, and Archdeacon of Berkſhire, Author of the Lives of Dean Colet and Eraſmus; and who intends likewiſe to oblige the public with a very curious and ample Life of Biſhop Patrick.

[A] A very learned Engliſh Biſhop.] This appears from his writings, which are as follow. 1. A Sermon preached at the funeral of Mr. John Smith, late Fellow of Queen's College in Cambridge, who departed this life, Aug. 7. 1652. and lyes interred in the Chapel of the ſame College With a ſhort Account of his Life. Printed with Mr. Smith's ſelect Diſcourſes 1660, in 4to. 2. Divine Arithmetic; or, the right Art of numbering our Days. Being a Sermon preached June 17, 1659, at the funeral of Mr. Samuel Jacomb, B. D.

Maſter in 1651, and received Holy Orders from Biſhop Hall of Norwich in his retirement at Higham after his ejection from his Biſhoprick. He had been then ſometime Fellow of his College; and ſoon after removed to Batterſea in Surry to be Chaplain to Sir Walter St. John. He was afterwards Vicar of that Church. His next and much better preferment was the Rectory of St. Paul's Covent-Garden in London, which was given him without any ſolicitation by the Earl of Bedford; where he was very uſeful and diligent in his miniſterial function, and continued all the time of the plague in the year 1665 among his Pariſhioners, to their great comfort. The ſame year he took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity at Oxford, being before admitted into Chriſt Church there. In the year 1668, he publiſhed his Friendly debate between a Conformiſt and a Non-Conformiſt, in ſeveral parts; which was anſwered by the Diſſenters, whom he had much exaſperated by it; but by his candour and moderation towards them afterwards, they were perfectly reconciled to him, and he brought over many of them to the communion of the eſtabliſhed Church. The ſame year he was offered by Dr. Fuller, Biſhop of Lincoln, the Archdeaconry of Huntingdon, which he thankfully refuſed, as likely to take him off too much from the buſineſs of the great cure, in which he was employed. In 1678 he was made Dean of Peterborough, where he conſtantly reſided that portion of time which was alloted him, and was very uſeful and conſequently much beloved in that place. Here he ſet up weekly Communions. In the year 1680, he was freely offered by the Lord Chancellor the rich living of St. Martin's in the Fields, which he refuſed on the account of the eſteem he had for his Pariſhioners of Covent-Garden, and his apprehenſion that he ſhould not be able to diſcharge the duty of ſo great a cure; and therefore he recommended to his Lordſhip Dr. Thomas Teniſon, who had ſtrength of body and mind to execute ſuch a charge. In the year 1682, Dr. Lewis du Moulin, who had been a Hiſtory Profeſſor at Oxford, and had written many bitter books againſt the Church of England, ſent for Dr. Patrick upon his ſick-bed, and made a ſolemn declaration of his concern and regret on that account, which he ſigned, and it was publiſhed after his death. In 1686, Dr. Patrick and Dr. Jane, the King's Profeſſors of Divinity at Oxford, held a conference with ſome Popiſh

B. D. Miniſter of the Goſpel, at St. Mary Woolnoth, in Lumbard-ſtreet, London, and lately Fellow of Queen's College in Cambridge. London 1660, in 4to. There are two dedications of this Sermon, the former to his worthy friend Mr. Thomas Jacomb, Miniſter of the Goſpel at Martin's Ludgate, the latter to the Right Worſhipful Thomas Viner, Alderman of the City of London, and the reſt of the Inhabitants of the pariſh of Mary Woolnoth, Lumbard-ſtreet. 3. Menſa Myſtica; or, a Diſcourſe concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; in which the ends of its Inſtitution are ſo manifeſted, our Addreſſes to it ſo directed, our Behaviour there and afterwards ſo compoſed, that we may not loſe the Benefits which are to be received by it; with ſeveral Prayers and Thankſgivings inſerted to make it of more uſe: To this is added, Aqua Genitalis, a Diſcourſe concerning Baptiſm; in which is inſerted a brief Diſcourſe to perſuade to a Confirmation of the Baptiſmal Vow. 4. Jewiſh Hypocriſie; a Caveat to the preſent Generation, wherein is ſhewn both the falſe and true Way to a Nation's or Perſon's complete Happineſs, from the Sickneſs and Recovery of the Jewiſh State. To which is added, A Diſcourſe upon Micah vi. 8. belonging to the ſame Matter. London 1660, in 8vo. 5. Heart's Eaſe; or, a Remedy againſt all Troubles; a conſolatory Diſcourſe particularly directed to thoſe, who have loſt their Friends and dear Relations. London 1660, in 8vo. To the eighth edition are added two papers, written in the time of the plague, in 1665. 6. The Parable of the Pilgrim: written to a Friend. London, in 4to. 7. An Expoſition of the Ten Commandments. London, in 8vo. 8. A friendly Debate between a Conformiſt and a Non-conformiſt. In three parts. The firſt and ſecond parts were printed at London 1669, in 8vo. The ſixth edition of them, corrected and enlarged, was printed at London 1684, in 8vo. The Imprimatur of the firſt part, is dated Nov. 7. 1668. In the general Preface to the ſixth edition, our Author obſerves, that "the "Bookſeller having acquainted him with his intention of reprinting this treatiſe, which hath now "been in the world fifteen years, he thought good "to let the Reader know, that the Author of it ſees "no cauſe, after ſo long obſervation, and ſerious conſideration of things, to retract or alter any thing "he hath written therein; but is rather confirmed "in his opinion, that it was and is an uſeful and ſeaſonable Diſcourſe. Which, as it was written to take "down the pride and inſolence, wherewith the Non-"Conformiſts, began at that time to treat us, and "to perſuade men to conform themſelves to the "eſtabliſhed orders; ſo to give them withall a true "notion of Religion; to preſerve them from being "abuſed with phraſes; to inſtruct them in many "parts of their Chriſtian duty; to inform them "wherein Chriſtianity doth chiefly conſiſt, and what "will make them thoroughly good; and particularly how neceſſary a part of Chriſtian piety it is "to obey the public laws, which no way contradict "the laws of God; and to live in unity with their "Chriſtian brethren. What is to be done alſo for "the reſtoring of this unity, is here declared; and "how vain a thing it is to cry up unity, when men "themſelves keep up the diviſion; and that the "preſent ſeparation may be cured, if men pleaſe "but to do their plain duty, that is, if the Non-"conforming people would but do what the beſt of "their Miniſters acknowledge may be lawfully done "by them, and if thoſe Miniſters would but honeſtly preſs upon them, as it is here demonſtrated "they ought to do, and that they cannot juſtify "them, but muſt, if they will ſpeak as they think, "condemn the people in their ſeparation. And how "they can juſtify themſelves in ſtanding out, becauſe "of a few ceremonies (which have been the great "exception againſt conformity) I am not able to di-"vine; ſince they themſelves impoſed, without "any ſcruple, as many ceremonies (this Author "hath obſerved in taking the Covenant, which they "looked upon as a ſacred thing) as our Church doth "in the performance of divine ſervice." But tho' theſe and ſuch like things are the whole ſcope of this book, yet the Author of it hath been loaded with many hard cenſures and unjuſt reproaches, as if he had done the greateſt wrong, not only to them, but to true Religion. Which, thanks be to God, have not at all diſcouraged his reſolution of adhering firmly to the principles, which he avows in his book; for he was aware of ſuch uſage, and prepared againſt it, before he ſet pen to paper, having obſerved in the very book itſelf, that no man ever oppoſed their fancies, but preſently they voted him to be a perſon unacquainted with God, led by intereſt, and not by religion. Yet that ſuch a man as Judge Hales ſhould paſs that ſentence upon the Author, which Mr. Baxter hath lately reported, was, it muſt be confeſſed, ſomething ſurpriſing. For as he was a perſon of great learning and piety, ſo his candour (if common fame may be believed, for I knew him not) was no leſs eminent; and yet, as Mr. Baxter tells us *, he was pleaſed to expreſs ſo great a diſlike of the debate, and the Eccleſiaſtical Policy, as tending to the injury

* Second Defence of Nonconformity, p. 188.

piſh Prieſts at the deſire of the Earl of Rocheſter, then Lord Treaſurer, King James II. being then preſent. The reſult was, that the Earl was convinced, that the Religion of the Proteſtants was a ſafe way to Salvation. During the reign of that King, the Dean's behaviour ſhewed, that he had nothing more at heart than the Proteſtant Religion, for which he ventured all that was dear to him by preaching and writing againſt the errors of the Church of Rome. On this account he was ſent for by the King, and with a ſevere check refuſed to be introduced to his Majeſty by Dr. Crew, then Biſhop of Durham, but was introduced by Biſhop Spratt. The King treated him very kindly, and deſired him to remit of his zeal againſt his Church, and quietly enjoy his own Religion. The Dean anſwered with great courage, that he could not give up a Religon ſo well proved as that of the Proteſtants. In 1687, he publiſhed a Prayer compoſed for that difficult time, when perſecution was expected by all who ſtood firm to their Religion; and the ſame year, by a large ſum of money, which he and Dr. Teniſon received from the Lady Coventry, they were enabled to ſet up a ſchool at St. Martin's, to confront the Popiſh one, opened at the Savoy, for the ſeducing the youth of the town into Popery; which money afterwards was employed to the uſe of the poor Vicars in the Dioceſe of Canterbury and Ely, made more firm ſince by an Act of Parliament. At the Revolution great uſe was made of the Dean, who was very active in ſettling the affairs of the Church. He was called upon to preach before the Prince and Princeſs of Orange, who were appriſed of his zeal in oppoſing of the reading of King James's Declaration. He was ſoon after appointed injury of Religion itſelf, that he wiſhed the Authors would openly profeſs, that they wrote for themſelves, and no more abuſively pretend it was for religion. But it muſt be remembered, that wiſe and good men are wont ſometimes to overſhoot themſelves, when they are angry; and that they are never more apt to be ſo, than when thoſe beloved ſchemes, which they have been long in drawing, and of which (having laboured much in them) they have entertained an high opinion, are rejected and torn in pieces. This is provoking to men that look upon themſelves as maſters in policy, as well as in law and religion; and is all the fault, that I can think of, wherewith this Author can be juſtly charged. He was not then, nor is now, for that project of Comprehenſion, in favour of which every body knows Sir M. Hales was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed. The Debate, as he angrily calls it, came in the way of that, and lay croſs to it. But as for his charge of the Author's writing for himſelf, I can demonſtrate, that, as things then ſtood, it was impoſſible (unleſs we will ſuppoſe him to have been a fool) he ſhould have any ſuch reſpect to ſecular advantages, which he might thereby reap, ſave only the preſerving himſelf by preſerving the government; which he was bound to do as a member of this Church and Kingdom, which he loves unfeignedly, and whoſe preſent conſtitution he will always endeavour ſteadfaſtly to uphold. For they, whom he oppoſed, had too much power, he knew very well, at that time to obſtruct him in ſuch a deſign; and as they uſed all their intereſt to depreſs him, ſo they had ſuch an influence, I can prove, upon ſome who are now dead and gone, that by their means they did actually keep him down a long time from riſing at all in the world. Which he the more contentedly endured, becauſe he had the teſtimony of his conſcience (which is a thouſand times more valuable than all the applauſes they beſtowed upon thoſe, who would wink at their evil doings) that this book was not contrived to ſerve any worldly intereſt; but, quite contrary, notwithſtanding any prejudice it might do him in this world, faithfully to repreſent unto men the truth, as it is in the Lord Jeſus. Which could not be done indeed, without expoſing the follies, nay inſincerity ſometimes, of ſome perſons, who would be thought the only, or the moſt ſincere lovers of him. But in expoſing them, religion is ſo far from being injured (as the forenamed cenſure ſuggeſts) that it is reſcued from the contempt, which muſt neceſſarily fall upon it, if they paſs without controul for the moſt religious people. Mr. William Harris obſerves †, "that "it has been generally allowed, that Dr. Patrick "wrote the firſt volumes of the Friendly Debate, in "the heat of his youth, and in the midſt of his ex- "pectations; which by aggravating ſome weak and "uncautious expreſſions in a few particular Writers, "deſigned to expoſe the Non-Conformiſt Miniſtry to "contempt and ridicule. The deſign was after- "wards carried on by a worſe hand, and with a more "virulent ſpirit : a method altogether unreaſon- "able and unworthy, becauſe it will be always eaſy "to gather raſh and unadviſed expreſſions from the "weaker perſons of any party of men; and only "ſerves to expoſe religion to the ſcorn and contempt "of the profane. But Biſhop Patrick, in his ad- "vanced age, and in a public debate in the Houſe of "Lords about the Occaſional Bill, took the opportu- "nity to declare himſelf to this purpoſe; That he "had been known to write againſt the Diſſenters with "ſome warmth in his younger years; but that he had "lived long enough to ſee reaſon to alter his opinion of "that people, and that way of writing; and that he "was verily perſuaded there were ſome, who were ho- "neſt men, and good Chriſtians, who would be neither, "if they did not ordinarily go to Church and ſometimes to "the Meeting; and on the other hand, ſome were ho- "neſt men and good Chriſtians, who would be neither, "if they did not ordinarily go to the Meetings, and ſome- "times to the Church. A rare inſtance this of retrac- "tation and moderation, which, I think, redounds "greatly to his honour, and is worthy of imitation."

† Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Thomas Manton, p. 32, 33. edit. Lond. 1725, in 8vo.

 Dr. Samuel Parker, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford.

9. The Chriſtian Sacrifice: a Treatiſe ſhewing the Neceſſity, End, and Manner of the receiving the Holy Communion; together with ſuitable Prayers and Meditations for every month in the year, and the principal Feſtivals in memory of our bleſſed Saviour. In four parts, in 8vo and 12mo. 14th edition. 10. A Sermon at the funeral of Mr. Thomas Grigg, Sept. 4. 1670. on Cor. v. 9. London 1670, in 4to. 11. The Devout Chriſtian inſtructed how to pray and give thanks to God; or, a book of Devotions for Families, and for particular Perſons in moſt of the concerns of human life. 14th edit. in 12mo. 12. Advice to a Friend. 7th edit. in 12mo. 13. Jeſus and the Reſurrection juſtified in Heaven and in Earth. 2d edit. in 8vo. 14. Angliæ Speculum: A glaſs that flatters not; preſented to a country congregation at the ſolemn Faſt, April 24th, 1678, in a parallel between the Kingdom of Ireland and England. 4to. 15. A Sermon preached at Covent-Garden on Advent-Sunday, 1678, in 4to. 16. The whole book of Pſalms paraphraſed, with arguments to each Pſalm. In two parts. London 1680, in 8vo. 17. The book of Job paraphraſed. London, in 8vo. 18. The glorious Epiphany, with the devout Chriſtian's love to it. London, in 8vo. 19. The Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, in ſix books; written in Latin by Hugo Grotius, and now tranſlated into Engliſh, with the addition of a ſeventh book againſt the preſent Roman Church, London, in 8vo. 20. A book for Beginners, or a Help to young Communicants, that they may be fitted for the Holy Communion, and receive it with profit. 17th edit. in 24°. 21. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor at Guild-hall Chapel, Octob. 31, 1680. London, in 8vo. 22. Chriſt's Counſel to his Church, in two Sermons preached at the two laſt Faſts, April 27, 1679, and Decemb. 22, 1680. London, in 8vo. 23. A Paraphraſe upon the books of Eccleſiaſtes, and the Song of Solomon, with Arguments to each chapter, and Annotations thereupon. London, in 8vo. 24. The Proverbs of Solomon paraphraſed, with Arguments to each chapter, which ſupply the place of commenting. London, in 8vo. 25. A Treatiſe of the Neceſſity and Frequency of receiving the Holy Communion; with a Reſolution of Doubts about it: in three Diſcourſes, begun upon Whitſunday, in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, pointed one of the Commiſſioners for the review of the Liturgy. Upon the death of Dr. Lake, Biſhop of Chicheſter, in 1689 the Dean was appointed to ſucceed him in that See, which he immediately viſited, and diſcharged in all reſpects the duties of a vigilant Paſtor. He was employed with others of the new Biſhops to ſettle the affairs of the Church of Ireland; to which end all the Clergy of that Church, who had fled to England for ſafety, were ſent home, and ſeveral worthy perſons recommended to their Majeſties to fill the vacant Sees. In 1691 he was tranſlated to the See of Ely in the room of Biſhop Turner, who was deprived on account of his refuſal to take the oaths to the Government. The firſt thing Biſhop Patrick did, after he was ſettled in that See, was maintaining two Lectures in two Churches at each end of the town of Cambridge, viz. Botolph's and St. Clement's, allowing to each of them thirty pounds a year, for an afternoon Sermon every Sunday. He alſo finiſhed an affair, which had been long depending between the Biſhops of Ely and the Lord Hatton, relating to Hatton-Garden in London; and procured a rent-charge of an 100 l. a year to be ſettled on that Biſhoprick for ever. He was alſo a great Benefactor to his Palace at Ely, making commodious gardens for his own and his ſucceſſors benefit. He died at Ely May 31, 1707, in the eighty firſt year of his age, and was interred in the Cathedral, where a monument is erected to his memory; the inſcription upon which was written by Dr. John Leng, afterwards Biſhop of Norwich [B].

rough, 1684, to preſs the Obſervation of the fourth Rubrick after the Communion Office, 12mo. 26. A Treatiſe of Repentance and Faſting, eſpecially of the Lent Faſt, 12mo. 27. A Sermon preached on St. Mark's day, 1686, in the Pariſh Church of St. Paul's Covent-Garden. 28. A Diſcourſe concerning Prayer, eſpecially of frequenting the daily publick Prayers. In two parts, 12mo. 29. Search the Scriptures: A Treatiſe ſhewing that all Chriſtians ought to read the holy book, with directions to them therein. In three parts, 12mo. 30. A Diſcourſe of profiting by Sermons, London, in 4to. 31. A Diſcourſe about Tradition; ſhewing what is meant by it; and what Tradition is to be received, and what to be rejected, London, in 4to. 32. The Pillar and Ground of Truth: A Treatiſe ſhewing, that the Roman Church falſely claims to be that Church, and the pillar of that Church, mentioned 1 Tim. iii. 15. which is explained in three parts, 1687, in 4to. 33. A Sermon preached upon St. Peter's Day, printed with enlargements, 4to. 34. The Virgin Mary miſrepreſented by the Roman Church, in the Traditions of that Church concerning her Life and Glory, and in the devotions paid to her as the mother of God. Both ſhewed out of the Office of that Church, the Leſſons on her Feſtivals, and from their allowed Authors, Part I. wherein two of her Feaſts [her Conception and Nativity] are conſidered. Our Author promiſed a ſecond part, but we do not find whether it was ever printed. 35. An Examination of Bellarmine's ſecond note of the Church, viz. Antiquity, 1687, in 4to. 36. The Texts, which Papiſts cite out of the Bible for the proof of their Doctrine, Of the Supremacy of St. Peter and the Pope over the whole Church, examined. In two parts, 4to. 37. A private Prayer to be uſed in difficult times, 8vo. 38. A Thankſgiving for our late wonderful Deliverance, 1689, 8vo. 39. A Prayer for perfecting our late Deliverance, 1668, 8vo. 40. A Prayer for Charity, Peace, and Unity, chiefly to be uſed in Lent, 8vo. 41. A Prayer for the King's ſucceſs in Ireland, 1690, 8vo. 42. A Sermon preached in St. James's Chapel before the Prince of Orange, Jan. 20. 1688, on Iſaiah ii. 6. 4to. 43. A ſecond part of the Sermon preached before the Prince of Orange, on the ſame Text, preached in Covent-Garden, 4to. 44. A Sermon preached before the Queen in March, 1688-9. on Coloſ. ii. 15. 4to. 45. A Sermon againſt Murmuring. preached at Covent-Garden in Lent, 1688-9. on 1 Cor. x. 10. 46. A Sermon againſt Cenſuring, preached at Covent-Garden in Advent, on 1 Cor. iv. 10. 47. A Faſt Sermon before the King and Queen, April 16, 1690. on Prov. xiv. 34. 48. A Thanſgiving Sermon before the Houſe of Lords, Nov. 26. 1691, for the reducing of Ireland, and the King's ſafe return, on Numb. x. 9. 49. An Anſwer to a Book ſpread abroad by the Romiſh Prieſts, intitled, The Touchſtone of the Reformed Goſpel; wherein the true Doctrine of the Church of England, and many Texts of the Holy Scriptures are faithfully explained, 8vo. 50. A Letter to the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Ely at his primary Viſitation. 51. A Commentary on the firſt Book of Moſes, called Geneſis, 3d Edit. 4to. 52. A Commentary on the ſecond Book of Moſes, called Exodus, 2d Edit. 4to. 53. A Commentary on the third Book of Moſes, called Leviticus, 2d Edit. 4to. 54. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor, &c. on Eaſter Monday, 1696, on 1 Tim. ii. 8. 55. A Sermon preached before the Houſe of Lords, Novemb. 25, 1696, on Dan. iv. 5. 56. A Commentary on the fourth Book of Moſes, called Numbers, 2d Edit. 4to. 57. The Work of the Miniſtry, repreſented to the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Ely, 1698. 58. A Commentary on the fifth Book of Moſes, called Deuteronomy, 2d Edit. 4to. 59. A Commentary upon the Books of Joſhua, Judges, and Ruth, 4to. 60. A Commentary on the two Books of Samuel, 4to. 61. The Dignity of the Chriſtian Prieſthood, directed to his Clergy on his fourth Triennial Viſitation. 62. An Exhortation ſent to the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Ely, before his fifth Triennial Viſitation, 1704. With a Diſcourſe on Rev. xvi. 9. upon occaſion of the late terrible Storm of Wind, 1703, in 12mo. 63. A Commentary on the two Books of Kings, 4to. 64. A Commentary on the two Books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Eſther, 4to. 65. An Exhortation to the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Ely, at his ſixth Triennial Viſitation. 66. Fifteen Sermons upon Contentment and Reſignation to the Will of God. As alſo two Sermons on the Miniſtration of Angels. With a Prayer at the end of each Diſcourſe, ſuitable to the particular ſubject of it. Never before printed. With an exact Catalogue of his Works, London, 1719, in 8vo. In the Preface we are told, that "the ſeventeen Sermons contained in "this volume are the only pieces of our Author, "which have been publiſhed ſince his death. They "were compoſed in the prime of his years, and very "fairly written out by himſelf in one volume. They "were put into the bookſeller's hands by his Relict, "Mrs. Penelope Patrick, now living, with her deſire, "that they might be made publick. The Author "was ſo eminent for his great learning and ſingular "piety, and his practical writings and books of de-"votion have been ſo well received, that the book-"ſellers think it a conſiderable recommendation of "theſe diſcourſes, and the prayers annexed to them, "that they can aſſure the world they are the genuine "works of that excellent Prelate, and printed with "great care and exactneſs from his own manuſcript. "They have alſo been aſſured by their friends, who "have peruſed theſe Sermons, that as men's being "contented in all eſtates of life is a matter of great "conſequence to their happineſs, ſo the reader will "here find the duty of contentment very fully treated "of, and recommended with all that clearneſs and "ſtrength of reaſoning, and with all that learning "and true piety, which might be expected in ſo ce-"lebrated an Author, writing upon ſo important a "ſubject." 67. He made large additions to Mr. Gunton's Hiſtory of the Church of Peterborough, publiſhed in a thin folio.

[B] The Inſcription upon which was written by Dr. John Leng, afterwards Biſhop of Norwich.] It is as follows.

M. S.
Reverendi admodum in Xto Patris
SIMONIS PATRICK
Per biennium Ciceſtrenſis, per XVI annos deinde
Elienſis Epiſcopi:
Ad hos ampliſſimos dignitatis gradus propter
Eximia erga Eccleſiam ac Rempublicam merita

☞ PAUL (FATHER) was Son of Franciſco Sarpi, a Merchant, and Iſabella Morelli, a native of Venice. He was born at Venice Auguſt 14, 1552, and was baptiſed by the name of Peter. Upon the death of his Father, his Mother's Brother, Ambroſio Morelli, Prieſt of the Collegiate Church of St. Hermagoras, took him and a little ſiſter of his from under the care of his mother, who retired to a religious life (a). Ambroſio, who was well ſkilled in polite Literature, and taught the children of ſeveral Noblemen, took a particular care of the education of his nephew, who ſoon made a great progreſs in learning, and was very ſerious from his infancy, and averſe to thoſe paſtimes, which are the uſual amuſements of youth, and remarkable for two qualities, which ſeldom meet in the ſame perſon, a ſtrong memory [A], and clear judgment. At thirteen years of age he applied himſelf to Philoſophy, Mathematicks, and the Greek and Hebrew languages. John Maria Capella of Cremona, of the Order of the Servites, read to him Lectures in Logick, and ſoon after boaſted, that he had a ſcholar, who was capable of being his Maſter. The frequent converſation, which our young Sarpi had with Capella, inſpired him with a reſolution to enter into the Order of the Servites, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of his mother and uncle, who intended him for his own Order. He took upon him the habit of the Servites, November 24, 1566, and two years after made his tacit profeſſion, which he ſolemnly renewed May 10, 1572. Upon entering into this Order he changed his name of Peter Sarpi for that of Paul. During a Chapter held at Mantua at that time, he defended ſeveral Theſes in natural Philoſophy and Divinity with ſuch ſucceſs, that Duke William of Mantua appointed him his Chaplain; and Boldrino, Biſhop of that City, made him Reader in his Cathedral of Poſitive and Caſuiſtical Divinity, and Canon Law. Theſe employments animated him to proſecute other ſtudies, and particularly that of the Hebrew language, of which he made himſelf a complete Maſter, and of Hiſtory; but he ſhewed the utmoſt contempt for judicial Aſtrology [B]. Being now weary of a Court life [C], he returned to his Convent at Venice, and applied himſelf ſo intenſely to his ſtudies, that his conſtitution, which was naturally very delicate, was greatly injured by it [D]. At two and twenty years of age he was ordained Prieſt, and went to Milan at the time, when Cardinal Borromeo was reforming his Church, who had ſhewed great reſpect to him. However, his great reputation expoſed him to envy; for before he left Mantua, one Claudio, who was jealous of his ſuperior talents, accuſed him to the Inquiſition of Hereſy, for having denied, that the Doctrine of the Trinity could be proved from the firſt Chapter of Geneſis. But Father Paul, appealing to Rome, was honourably acquitted, and the Inquiſitor reprimanded for preſuming to determine upon things written in a language, which he did not underſtand. After he had taken the Degree of Doctor of Divinity, and was admitted a Member of the College of Padua, he was choſen Provincial of his Order for the Province of Venice, though he was then but twenty ſix years of age; an inſtance, which had never happened before among the Servites. He diſcharged this poſt with ſuch dignity and honour [E], that in 1579 in a general Chapter held at Parma, he was appointed with two others, who were more advanced in years, to draw up new Regulations and Statutes for his Order. This employment made it neceſſary for him to reſide at Rome, where he executed it alone with great ſucceſs. When his Office of Provincial was ended, he retired for three years to the ſtudy of

(a) Moſt of the particulars of the life of our Author, are extracted from Fra. Fulgentio's Vita del Padre Paolo; an Engliſh tranſlation of which, though very incorrectly done, was printed at London 1651, in 8vo. and likewiſe prefixed to ſome editions of Sir Nathaniel Brent's tranſlation of the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. Mr. John Lockman has prefixed an extract of this piece of Fulgentio to the third edit. of Mr. Jenkins's tranſlation of Father Paul's Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices and Revenues, as Father Courayer has alſo done before his tranſlation into French of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent.

Ab optimis Principibus Gulielmo & Mariâ evecti:
Cujus Pietatem inſignem, mores ſanctiſſimos,
Ingenium elegans, acre, copioſum, præclaram
In omni Literarum genere ſcientiam
Abunde teſtantur dicta, facta, ſcripta ipſius omnia, Præſertim eruditiſſimi & luculentiſſimi in SS. Scripturam
Commentarii,
Quovis elogio majores, quovis marmore diuturniores.
Vir, ſi quis alius, candore & charitate verè Xtianâ,
Conſtantiâ animi invictâ, æquitate nullo partium
Studio inclinata, in optimis artibus colendis promovendiſq;
In negotiis maximi momenti gerendis,
In univerſis vigilantiſſimi Epiſcopi muneribus explendis,
Ad extremum uſq; ſpiritum perpetuus & indefeſſus:
Cumulatis jam vitæ omnibus officiis pientiſſimus ſenex
Placide animam Deo reddidit, 31 Maii A. D. 1707.
Ætatis 81. T.

[A] A ſtrong memory.] It was ſo ſtrong, that to leſſen the idea of it, he uſed to ſay out of modeſty, that he could never repeat above thirty verſes, after he had heard them read once over (1).

(1) Fra. Fulgentio, Vita del Padre Paolo.

[B] He ſhewed the utmoſt contempt for judicial aſtrology.] He us'd to ſay, Il futuro, ò non ſi può apere, ò non ſi può ſchiffare, i. e. "Future things either cannot "be known, or cannot be avoided." But a little while before Father Paul left Mantua, there happened the following incident. Duke William, who was fond of ſoftening the cares of Government with pleaſant ſallies of humour, having a mare, that was ready to fole a mule, engaged our Author to beſtow a whole night's ſtudy on the horoſcope of the animal. This being done, and the ſcheme taken, the Duke cauſed copies of it to be ſent to all the eminent Aſtrologers in Europe, with this note, that at ſuch an inſtant of time, a baſtard was born in the Duke's palace. Some of the Aſtrologers anſwered, that this baſtard would be a Cardinal; others, a great General; and others, even a Pope (2).

(2) Idem, ibid.

[C] Being now weary of a Court life.] Fra. Fulgentio ſays, that this was the true cauſe of his departure from Mantua; though he obſerves, that others were of opinion, that Father was diſguſted at the odd capricious humour of the Duke of Mantua.

[D] Applied himſelf ſo intenſely to his ſtudies, that his conſtitution, which was naturally very delicate, was greatly injured by it.] He contracted habitual infirmities, with which he was troubled till old age, and which obliged him to drink a little wine, from which he had abſtained till he was thirty years old; and he ſaid, that one of the things, of which he moſt repented, was, that he had been perſuaded to drink wine. He eat ſcarce any thing but bread and fruits, and uſed a very ſmall quantity of food till he was fifty nine years of age; and even then always with great reſerve, becauſe it rendered him liable to violent pains of the head.

[E] He diſcharged this poſt with ſuch dignity and honour.] In his judgments, he ſhewed an inflexible regard to right; and could never be induced to accept the ſlighteſt preſent; a method, which he obſerved all his life after. He gave the utmoſt diſpatch in matters of juſtice. None of his deciſions were ever reverſed: he baniſhed all factions and parties of natural and experimental Philoſophy and Anatomy [F]; and was then choſen Procurator-General of his Order, and during his three years reſidence at Rome, he aſſiſted, by the Pope's command, at ſeveral congregations, where matters of the higheſt importance were debated. He was greatly eſteemed there by Pope Sixtus V. and contracted an intimate friendſhip with Cardinal Bellarmin, and other eminent perſons [G]. From Rome he went to Naples, under the character of Vicar-General of the Chapters, and Viſitor of the Convents; where he became acquainted with John Baptiſa Porta, who mentions him in his works with great honour. Upon his return to Venice, he reſumed his ſtudies, beginning them before ſun-riſe, and continuing them all the morning, except thoſe hours in which he was called to the publick devotions. The afternoons he ſpent in philoſophical or mechanical experiments, or in converſation with his learned friends. But now he was called forth from his ſtudious and retired courſe of life, and expoſed to a ſeries of troubles, on occaſion of one Gabrielle Colliſſoni's aſpiring to be General of the Order, who being oppoſed by Father Paul, in order to revenge himſelf upon the latter, accuſed him to the Inquiſition parties from among thoſe whom he governed; and eſtabliſhed ſuch orders and regulations, as, if his ſucceſſors had followed them, would have prevented many inconveniencies, to which they were expoſed. In ſhort, in this office, he ſhewed himſelf capable of managing the moſt important affairs; and his penetration and ſagacity were ſuperior to matters of the greateſt perplexity.

[F] He retired for three years to the ſtudy of natural and experimental philoſophy and anatomy.] Among other experiments, he employed himſelf in the tranſmutation of metals; but not with any view to diſcover the Philoſopher's Stone, which he always laughed at as an impoſſible attempt. In the courſe of his experiments, he found out ſeveral uſeful ſecrets. He ſtudied likewiſe Anatomy, eſpecially that part of it, which relates to the eye; on which he made ſeveral curious obſervations, ſo that the famous Aquapendente cited Father Paul's authority in his writings, with great approbation; and Fra. Fulventio is ſurprized, that Aquapendente, in his book de Viſu, did not own his obligations to our Author in ſtill ſtronger terms, ſince almoſt all the new diſcoveries in that treatiſe were due to him. He aſſerts likewiſe, that Father Paul diſcovered the valves, which ſerve for the circulation of the blood; "a thing, ſays he, "which not one of the antients or moderns had ever "ſpoken of, and conſequently was unknown till our "time, when Aquapendente propoſed it in a pub-"lic lecture of anatomy. But there are ſeveral "Phyſicians of great learning ſtill living, particu-"larly Santorio and Peter Aſſelineau, the latter "of whom is a Frenchman, who know that this obſer-"vation and diſcovery was not originally Aqua-"pendente's, but Father Paul's, who conſidering "the weight of the blood, concluded, that it could "not continue ſuſpended in the veins, if there were "not banks to keep it in, and doors, which by "opening and ſhutting might give the motion and "equilibrium neceſſary to life." Fra. Fulgentio's own words are as follow: Di qual argomento non ſi trova ch' alcuno, ne gl' antichi, ne dé Moderni habbia fatta mentione, perche era coſá incognita ſin' a noſtri tempi, che l'Aquapendente ne moſſe la queſtione in una publica Anatomia. Ma ſono ancora viventi molti eruditiſſimi & eminentiſſimi Medici, tre queſti Santorio Santorio & Pietro Aſſelineo Franceſe, che ſanno che non fu ſpeculatione ne inventione del Acquapendente, mà del Padre, il quale conſiderando la Gravita del ſangue, venne in parere, che non poteſſe ſtare ſoſpenſo nelle vene, ſenza che vi foſſe Argine che la retineſſe, & chiúſure, ch' aprendoſi, & riſerrandoſi, gli daſſero il fluſſo & equilibrio neceſſario alla vita. In the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (3), it is obſerved, that Johannes Leonicenus ſays, that Father Paul diſcovered the circulation of the blood, and the valves of the veins, but durſt not make the diſcovery public, for fear of expoſing himſelf to trouble, ſince he was already ſuſpected, and there wanted only ſuch a paradox to transform him into a Heretic, in a country where the Inquiſition prevails. For this reaſon he intruſted the ſecret to Aquapendente alone, who being cautious of rendering himſelf obnoxious to the rage of a great many perſons, who would treat ſuch a notion as a capital offence againſt the antients, never opened the ſecret intruſted to him by Father Paul to any, but men of whom he had not the leaſt ſuſpicion; and waited till his death before he would ſuffer his treatiſe of the Valves of the Veins to be preſented to the Republic of Venice. But becauſe in that country the ſlighteſt novelties are apt to terrify the minds of people, this treatiſe was repoſited privately in the library of St. Mark. But as Aquapendente had diſcovered the ſecret to a curious young Engliſh Gentleman, whoſe name was Harvey, and who ſtudied under him at Padua, and at the ſame time Father Paul made the ſame diſcovery in confidence to the Engliſh Embaſſador; thoſe two Engliſhmen, upon their return home, being in a country of freedom, publiſhed it, and having confirmed it by a variety of experiments, claimed the whole honour to themſelves. But Dr. George Ent, in his Letter to Dr. Harvey, prefixed to his Apologia pro Circulatione Sanguinis, having obſerved, that Charles Fracaſſati, in his preliminary Epiſtle to Malpighi, and John Walæus, in his firſt Epiſtle to Bartholinus, aſſert Father Paul to have been the firſt diſcoverer of the circulation of the blood; he remarks, that Dr. Harvey had long before related to him the occaſion of this ſtory, which was as follows. The Venetian Embaſſador, upon his return home, having been preſented by Dr. Harvey with his book concerning the circulation of the blood, lent it to Father Paul to read, who tranſcribed a great many things out of it, in order that he might remember them: theſe tranſcripts, after his death, came among his papers into the hands of his executors, and gave occaſion to ſeveral perſons to imagine, that he was the Author of thoſe Tranſcripts. And Dr. Harvey had letters from Fra. Fulgentio, Father Paul's moſt intimate friend, which ſet the affair in a clear light. Carolus Fracaſſatus in Epiſtolâ præliminari ad Malpighium ait, Italum quendam hoc Inventum ante Harveium excoluiſſe. Is nempe eſt Pater Paulus Servita, quem Joannes Walæus (Epiſt. 1. ad Bartholinum) etiam in ſcenam protraxit, Circulationiſq; hujus primum Auctorem prædicat. Nimirum nec Lux eſt abſq; umbrâ, neque gloria ſine invidiâ. Iſtius autem commenti fabulam jampridem à te mihi narratam memini. Nempe Legatum Venetum ad ſuas reditum parantem libro tuo de Circulatione Sanguinis à te donatum fuiſſe, eundemq; poſtea Patri Paulo legendum exhibuiſſe; indeq; virum hunc celebrem, memoriæ cauſâ, pluſcula tranſcripſiſſe; quæ, ipſo mox defuncto, in hæredis manus inciderint; habereque te Literas a Patre Fulgentio ipſius Sodali ad te ſcriptas, quæ rem eandem clarè exprimerent. There is a very great difficulty in this paſſage of Dr. Ent; for it is certain, that Dr. Harvey's book de Motu Cordis was not printed till 1628, whereas Father Paul died January 14th, 1623, and conſequently could not make extracts out of that book, unleſs Dr. Harvey gave the manuſcript of it to the Venetian Embaſſador.

(3) Mois de Juin, 1684. Art. 2.

[G] Contracted an intimate friendſhip with Cardinal Bellarmin, and other eminent perſons.] He became acquainted likewiſe with Cardinal Caſtagna, afterwards Pope Urban VII. and it is extremely probable, that if this Pope had enjoyed the See longer, (for he ſat in it but thirteen days) he would not have forgot his friend Father Paul. He was alſo very intimate with one of Ignatius Loyola's ten companions, who told him, that Ignatius never intended that his Society ſhould be advanced to the height, in which it then was; and that if he were to return to the world, he would not know his ſucceſſors, ſo ſurpriſingly were they changed.

[H] Who

Inquiſition at Rome [H]. This drew upon him great vexations for ſeveral years, all which he ſupported with exemplary patience and magnanimity, proſecuting his ſtudies of eccleſiaſtical and prophane hiſtory, of ſcripture and chriſtian morality, with more vigour than before, and writing ſeveral treatiſes. In the beginning of the 17th century, he was drawn forth from his private ſtudies into publick affairs, upon the occaſion of the diſpute between the Republic of Venice and the Court of Rome, relating to eccleſiaſtical immunities [I]. Father Paul being appointed one of the Divines and Conſultors of the Republic, took up his pen in defence of it; and wrote a piece upon Excommunication [K], and [H] Who being oppoſed by Father Paul, in order to revenge himſelf upon the latter, accuſed him to the Inquiſition at Rome.] Father Paul, upon his leaving Venice to go to Rome, had left his friends under the care and direction of Colliſſoni, with whom he had formerly joined in the redreſſing of certain grievances. But Colliſſoni did not anſwer Father Paul's expectations, being guilty of great exactions; and, when the Father intended to return to Venice, diſſuaded him from it, knowing that his return would put an end to his impoſitions, and therefore artfully repreſented to him, that by ſtaying at Rome, he would not fail of making his fortune. To which Father Paul returned an anſwer in cypher, "that there was no way "of advancement at the Court of Rome but by "ſcandalous means; and that he was ſo far from "valuing the dignities there, that he had them in "abomination." After this he returned to Rome, and coming to an irreconcileable rupture with Colliſſoni, on account of his corrupt practices, the latter ſhewed this letter to Cardinal Santa Severina, who was then at the head of the Inquiſition, but did not then think proper to attack Father Paul himſelf, tho' he perſecuted him in the perſon of his friends; and particularly Friar Guilio, a man of unexceptionable conduct. But when Father Paul exerted himſelf in oppoſition to Colliſſoni's being elected General of the Order, the latter accuſed him to the Inquiſition at Rome, of holding a correſpondence with the Jews; and to aggravate his charge, produced the letter in cypher above-mentioned. He alſo engaged his nephew Santo to accuſe him to the Inquiſition at Venice, as though Father Paul had declared in a Chapter, which had been held, that recourſe muſt be had to human means, when a motion was made to implore the aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt, in order to appeaſe the diviſions, which prevailed in their Order. This latter charge, after the ſeveral witneſſes had been examined, being found invalid, was ſuppreſſed. And though the Inquiſitors at Rome did not think proper to continue the proſecution; yet Father Paul, on account of the letter in cypher, was conſidered as a moſt inveterate enemy to the grandeur of the Court of Rome. He was charged alſo with ſhewing too great reſpect and civility to Hereticks; which was occaſioned by this, that his vaſt reputation for learning inviting perſons of all perſuaſions, who came to Venice, to viſit him, and theſe paying him the higheſt regard, he was obliged to return their civilities. And this expoſed him to the imputation of being a favourer of Hereticks, and prevented Pope Clement VIII. from nominating him to the See of Nola, when he was ſolicited by ſome perſons in the Father's favour. This is the account of Fra. Fulgentio; and in the Melange critique de Litterature recueilli des Converſations de feu Monſieur Ancillon (3), we are informed, that "Father Paul was an intimate "friend of Du Pleſſis Mornay, Diodati, and ſeveral "eminent Proteſtants; and that when a motion was "made at Rome to beſtow on him a Cardinal's hat, "that which appeared the greateſt obſtacle to his advancement was, his having a greater correſpondence with Hereticks than Roman Catholicks. "Diodati informed me, continues Monſieur Ancillon, "that obſerving in his converſations with Father "Paul, that in many opinions he agreed with the "Proteſtants, he ſaid that he was extremely rejoiced "to find him not far from the Kingdom of Heaven; "and therefore ſtrongly exhorted him to profeſs the "Proteſtant Religion publickly. But Father Paul anſwered, that it was better for him, like St. Paul, "to be Anathema for his brethren; and that he did "more ſervice to the Proteſtant Religion in wearing "that habit, than he could do by laying it aſide. . . . "The elder Monſieur Daillé told me, that in going "to and coming from Rome with Monſieur de Villarnoud, Grandſon to Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornay, "whoſe Preceptor he was; he paſſed by Venice, and "viſited Father Paul, to whom Du Pleſſis Mornay "had recommended him by letters: that having de"livered them to the Father, he diſcovered the high"eſt eſteem for the illuſtrious Monſieur Du Pleſſis "Mornay; that he gave the kindeſt reception to Mr. "Villarnoud his Grandſon, and even to Monſieur "Daillé. That afterwards Monſieur Daillé became "very intimate with Father Paul and Fra. Fulgentio "his companion, who alſo was a perſon of great in"tegrity and abilities, and who afterwards wrote "that Father's life, which is very well drawn up." After the death of Coliſſoni, Santo his Nephew, ſucceeding him in the direction of the affairs of the Order, endeavoured to oppreſs Father Paul, knowing that as long as the Father ſhould be concerned in any influence in the Government of the Order, it would be impoſſible for himſelf to continue his unjuſt practices. He objected therefore to the Father, in a Chapter of the Order, three trifling articles, which were treated with contempt by the whole Aſſembly. The firſt was his wearing a ſquare cap, contrary to the prohibition made under Pope Gregory XIV. The ſecond was, his uſing ſlippers after the French mode; Santo falſely affirming, that all, who wore ſuch ſlippers, were, by the prohibition, diſqualified from giving their votes. Thirdly, that he never at the end of the Maſs ſaid the Salve Regina. Father Paul's ſlippers being taken by the Judge's Order, it became a Proverb, Eſſor il Padre Paolo coſi incolpabile & integro, che ſivio le' ſue pianiſſe erano ſtate canonizate, i. e. "Father Paul is ſo irreproachable and free from all "ſcandal, that his very ſlippers were canonized." Santo's complaints were therefore rejected; ſome time after which he went to Rome, where living in a very extravagant manner, he was obliged to retire to the Iſle of Candy, and there ſetting up for a Merchant, he ſoon died, having ſpent his whole fortune.

(3) Tom. 2. p. 288 & ſeq. edit. 1698, in 12mo.

[I] The diſpute between the Republic of Venice and the Court of Rome, relating to eccleſiaſtical immunities.] About the year 1603, the Republic of Venice made ſeveral injunctions againſt lay-perſons giving lands or goods to the church, without licenſe from the Civil Magiſtrate; and in that inhibition they aſſigned theſe reaſons, "that when any goods or lands once came "into the hands of the Eccleſiaſtics, they were not "ſubject to alienation; by which means, as the "Laity at their death were charitable even to exceſs, "the Clergy grew every day more numerous, and "pretended an exemption from all public ſervice and "taxes, and from all ſecular juriſdiction, ſo that "the burthen grew thereby too heavy to be born by "the Laity." Another occaſion of the difference was, that about this time complaints were made by the Venetians againſt two Clergymen, viz. Brandolino Valde-Marino, Abbot of Nerveze, and Scipione Saracino, Canon of Vicenza; the firſt as being guilty of rapine and theft, accuſed of poiſoning his father and brother, of inceſt with his ſiſter, of having cauſed ſeveral perſons to be aſſaſſinated, and of employing magic to corrupt women: the latter, for having broken off the ſeals put upon the Biſhop's Court by the Magiſtrates, and for having attempted the chaſtity of a widow of quality, with moſt villainous outrages. Theſe two having been long complained of at Rome in the name of the Senate, and no ſatisfaction given to them, they ſeized the Abbot and the Canon, and committed them to priſon. The juſtice or injuſtice of ſuch or the like power then uſed by the Venetians had formerly been debated between the former Pope Clement VIII. and that Republic; but upon that Pope's death, Paul V. who ſucceeded him (tho' not immediately, yet in the ſame year) being a man of a much hotter temper, brought this difference

[K], and revived another Tract upon the ſame ſubject formerly compoſed by John Gerſon [L], which he printed in Latin and Italian, and prefixed it to an anonymous letter, in which he exhorted the Prieſts to perform their ordinary Functions, without any apprehenſion that this was contrary to their duty. This piece being condemned by the Inquiſition, and attacked by Bellarmin, Father Paul publiſhed Apologia per le Oppoſitioni fatte dal Cardinale Bellarmino alli Trattati & Reſolutioni di Gio. Gerſone ſopra la Validità delle Scommuniche, printed at Venice 1606, in 4to. This was followed by another Tract of his, entitled, Conſiderationi ſopra le Cenſure di Paolo V. which was attacked by ſeveral Writers, particularly Father Bovio, in his Riſpoſta alle Conſiderationi dal Paolo da Venetia ſopra le Cenſure di Paolo V. printed at Rome 1606, in 8vo. In anſwer to which there was publiſhed Confirmationi delle Conſiderationi de P. M. Paulo di Venetia contra le Oppoſitioni del Gio. Ant. Bovio, Venice 1606, in 4to. the materials of which ſeem to have been collected by Father Fulgentio, and the whole methodized by Father Paul. He drew up alſo in a few days a Supplement to the Hiſtory of the Uſcocchi (b), entitled, Aggionta e Continuatione all' Hiſtoria de gl' Uſcocchi, col Manifeſto; and wrote a little piece, entitled, De Jure Aſylorum Petri Sarpi J. C. and made an extract of a Tract of his, compoſed by order of the Government, concerning the Immunity of ſacred places within the Dominions of the Venetians. He compoſed likewiſe a work on the Inquiſition of Venice; and had a conſiderable ſhare in the Treatiſe concerning the Interdict, publiſhed in the name of the ſeven Divines of the Republick [M]; which book contains nineteen propoſitions, proving, that the Interdict was contrary to all Laws; that the Eccleſiaſticks were ſo far from being obliged to pay any regard to it, that they could not ſubmit to it with innocence; and that the Government ought to prevent the execution of it. He drew up alſo the plan of a work on the Sovereignty of Princes [N]. He managed the controverſy with great temper; and while the writers in defence of the Court of Rome were daily publiſhing the moſt ſcandalous Satires againſt the Republick of Venice and himſelf, he was one of the ten Cenſors appointed to inſpect all books deſigned for the preſs, in order that nothing defamatory might be publiſhed againſt that Court. However, that Court was ſo exaſperated againſt him, as to cite him by a decree of October 30, 1606, under pain of excommunication, to appear in perſon at Rome, in order to anſwer to the charges of Hereſies urged againſt him. But inſtead of appearing, he publiſhed a Manifeſto, ſhewing the invalidity of the ſummons, and afterwards drew up a piece of ſome length, which was preſented to the Pope, wherein he repreſented ſeveral manifeſt Hereſies and tyrannical Doctrines contained in the writings of thoſe, who pretended to defend the Pope's cauſe in this controverſy. He offered likewiſe to diſpute with any of the Pope's Advocates in a place of ſafety, on the articles laid to his charge; promiſing at the ſame to retract immediately any errors, in which he might be found. In April 1607, the controverſy between the Republick and the Court of Rome was ended by the interpoſition of the King of France [O]; and Father Paul, though extremely odious to the Pope's party, was with the Venetians to a much higher contention; alledging, that thoſe late acts of the Senate were a diminution of his juſt power; and limited a time of twenty-four days for the revocation of them; threatning, if he were not obeyed, to proceed to excommunication of the Republic, who ſtill offered to ſhew both reaſon and antient cuſtom to warrant their actions. But this Pope, contrary to his predeceſſors's moderation, required abſolute obedience without diſputes. Thus it continued for about a year, the Pope ſtill threatning excommunication, and the Venetians ſtill anſwering him with fair ſpeeches, and no compliance; till at laſt the Pope's zeal for the Apoſtolic See induced him in April 1606, to excommunicate the Duke, the whole Senate, and all their dominions; and then to ſhut up all their churches, charging the whole Clergy to forbear all ſacred offices to the Venetians, till their obedience ſhould render them capable of abſolution. But this act of the Pope did but the more confirm the Venetians in their reſolutions not to obey him; and to that end, upon the hearing of the Pope's Interdict, they publiſhed by ſound of trumpet a proclamation to this effect; "That whoſoever hath received from Rome any "copy of a Papal Interdict, publiſhed there, as well "againſt the law of God, as againſt the honour of "this Nation, ſhall immediately bring it to the "Council of Ten upon pain of death." Then Duado their Embaſſador at Rome was recalled; and the Inquiſition ſuſpended by order of the State.

(b) A people of Auſtrian Croatia, whoſe anceſtors were Dalmatians, who flying from the tyranny of the Turks, retired to Cliſſa, and afterwards to Segna.

[K] Wrote a piece upon Excommunication.] It was afterwards publiſhed in Holland in French, under this title, Droits des Souverains defendus contre les Excommunications, &c. i. e. "The rights of Sovereigns "defended againſt Excommunications, &c." But the Italian original was intitled, Conſolation of Mind, to quiet the Conſciences of thoſe, who live well, againſt the Terrors of the Interdict, publiſhed by Paul V.

[L] Revived another tract upon the ſame ſubject, formerly compoſed by John Gerſon.] He publiſhed it in Latin and Italian at Venice 1606, in 4to.

[M] He had a conſiderable ſhare in the Treatiſe concerning the Interdict, publiſhed in the name of the ſeven Divines of the Republic.] In the French tranſlation of this treatiſe, which was printed in 1607 at St. Vincent, and is ſaid in the title-page to be done from the copy printed at Venice by Robert Mejetti, in 1606, there are only ſix Divines named, viz. Pietro Antonio, Archdeacon and Vicar-General of Venice; Fra. Paolo, of the Order of the Servites, and Divine of the moſt Serene Republic of Venice; Fra. Bernardo Jordano, Cordelier of the Obſervance, Divine; Fra. Marc-Antonio Capelli, Conventual Cordelier, Divine; Fra. Camilli, an Auguſtinian, Divine; and Fra. Fulgentio, of the Order of the Servites, Divine.

[N] He drew up alſo a plan of a work on the Sovereignty of Princes.] Fra. Fulgentio tells us, that "this plan is ſo finely drawn up, that we may juſtly "preſume it would, if finiſhed, have been the nobleſt "and moſt important work, that ever was publiſhed; "and was to have conſiſted of 206 chapters."

[O] In April 1607, the controverſy between the Republic and Court of Rome was ended, by the Interpoſition of the King of France.] Fra. Fulgentio tells us, that this affair was tranſacted at Rome by Cardinal Perron, by order of the King of France. But ſome Writers are of opinion, that this accommodation between the Venetians and the Pope was owing to the miſconduct of King James I. and that if he had ſupported the Venetians, the latter would have abſolutely was comprehended in the accommodation. However, on the 5th of October following he was attacked in his return to his Convent by five Aſſaſſins, who gave him fifteen wounds, and ly divided the See of Rome. Mr. Iſaac Walton (4) obſerves, that during the diſpute, it was reported abroad, that " the Venetians were all turned Proteſ- " tants; which was believed by many, for that it " was obſerved, the Engliſh Embaſſador (5) was ſo " often in conference with the Senate, and his Chap- " lain, Mr. Bedell (6) more often with Father Paul; " and alſo for that the Republic of Venice was " known to give Commiſſion to Gregory Juſtiniano, " then their Embaſſador in England, to make all " their proceedings known to the King of England, " and to crave a promiſe of his aſſiſtance, if need " ſhould require. And in the mean time they re- " quired the King's advice and judgment; which " was the ſame, which he gave to Pope Clement at " his coming to the crown of England, (that Pope " then moving him to an union with the Roman " church) namely, To endeavour the calling of a free " Council for the ſettlement of peace in Chriſtendom; and " that he doubted not, but that the French King, and " divers other Princes, would join to aſſiſt in ſo good a " work, and in the mean time, the ſin of this breach, " both with his and the Venetians dominions, muſt of ne- " ceſſity lye at the Pope's door. In this contention, " which laſted almoſt two years, the Pope grew ſtill " higher, and the Venetians more and more re- " ſolved and careleſs; ſtill acquainting King James " with their proceedings, which was done by the " help of Sir Henry Wotton, Mr. Bedell, and Padre " Paulo, whom the Venetians did then call to be one " of their Conſultors of State, and with his pen to de- " fend their juſt cauſe: which was by him ſo perform- " ed, that the Pope ſaw plainly, he had weakened his " power by exceeding it, and offered the Venetians " abſolution upon very eaſy terms; which the Vene- " tians ſtill ſlighting, did at laſt obtain, by that " which was ſcarce ſo much as a ſhew of acknow- " ledging it. For they made an order, that in that " day, in which they were abſolved, there ſhould be " no public rejoicing, nor any bonfires that night, " leſt the common people might judge, that they de- " ſired an abſolution, or were abſolved for committing " a fault." Dr. Burnet (7) tells us, that the breach be- tween the Pope and the Republic was brought very near a criſis, ſo it was expected a total ſeparation, not only from the Court, but the Church of Rome, was likely to follow it. It was ſet on by P. Paulo, and the ſeven (8) Divines, with much zeal, and was very pru- dently conducted by them. In order to the advancing of it, King James ordered his Embaſſador to offer all poſſi- ble aſſiſtance, and to accuſe the Pope and the Papacy, as the chief Authors of all the miſchiefs of Chriſtendom . . . P. Paulo, and the ſeven Divines, preſſed Mr. Bedell to move the Embaſſador to preſent King James's Premonition to all Chriſtian Princes and States, then put in Latin, to the Senate, and they were confident it would produce a great effect. But the Embaſſador could not be prevailed with to do it at that time, and pretended, that ſince St. James's day was not far off, it would be more proper to do it on that day. If this was only for the ſake of a ſpeech, that he made on the conceit of St. James's day, and King James's book, with which he had pretended to preſent it, it was a weakneſs never to be excuſed. But if this was only a pretence, and that there was a deſign un- der it, it was a crime never to be forgiven. All that Bedell could ſay or do to perſuade him not to put off a thing of ſuch importance, was in vain; and, indeed, I can hardly think that Wotton was ſo weak a man, as to have acted ſincerely in this matter. Before St. James's day came . . . the difference was made up, and the hap- py opportunity was loſt; ſo that when he had his audience on that day, in which he preſented the book, all the an- ſwer he could get was, that they thanked the King of England for his good-will, but they were now reconciled to the Pope. Dr. Hickes has the following remark upon this paſſage (9): " Behold here a ſtory as falſe as " formal; and great pity it is, that Sir Henry Wotton's " heir, if any ſuch be now alive to repreſent him, " ſhould not have the benefit of an action againſt " our hiſtorian, to repair the honour of his anceſtor, " which is ſo deeply wounded by him. For if this " ſtory were punctually true, it would not bear the " ſevere reflections, which he hath made upon Sir " Henry for it, becauſe he might not think fit to fol- " low his Chaplain's advice, without order from the " King his maſter, which he might hope to receive " before St. James's day, and yet for private reaſons, " not think fit to tell his Chaplain the reaſon of his " delay. But the ſtory muſt needs be falſe, becauſe " the King's book, of which he makes mention, was " not then extant. For the Pope and the Venetians " were reconciled in April 1607 (10), and the King's " Præmonition came not out till 1609. Nor will it " help him to ſay, that this was only a miſtake of " the Præmonition for the Apology, which was reprint- " ed with it, and to which, in the King's own " phraſe, it was a Preamble; for the firſt edition of " the Apology was as little extant before the Recon- " ciliation mentioned, as the Præmonition. For that " which occaſioned the King's writing the Apology, " as himſelf tells us, was the two Breves ſent over by " the Pope, and Cardinal Bellarmin's letter; and " the latter of the Breves bares date from Rome but " in Auguſt 23d, 1607, and the letter September " 28th following. By which it appears, that the " reconciliation was made ſeveral months before ei- " ther of theſe were written, and longer before they " could come to the King's hand, longer yet before " he could finiſh the Apology in Engliſh, and again " longer before it could be put into Latin. From " whence it appears, that this fine-told ſtory, which " ſo diſhonours the memory of Sir Henry Wotton, to " honour that of his Chaplain, is a pure fiction, and " as much the birth of ſome body's brain, as ever a- " ny thing the vanity of Varillas wrote was his." Dr. James Welwood tells us (11), that as in moſt foreign tranſactions King James was unhappy, ſo more particu- larly in the difference between Pope Paul and the Vene- tians. There appeared at that time a wonderful diſ- poſition in that State to work a reformation in the Church, and throw off the Papal yoke. In order to ad- vance it, King James diſpatches Sir Henry Wotton his Embaſſador to Venice, and hearing Spain had declared for the Pope, he declared for the Venetians, and ac- quainted Juſtinian, their Embaſſador in England, that he would not only aſſiſt them with all the forces of his Kingdom, but engage his Allies in their defence. At Sir Henry Wotton's arrival, the breach between the Pope and the Republic was brought very near a criſis; ſo that a total ſeparation was expected, not only from the Court, but the Church of Rome; which was ſet on by the learn- ed Padre Paulo, and the ſeven Divines of the State, with much zeal, and conducted with as much prudence. The Embaſſador, at his audience, offered all poſſible aſ- ſiſtance in his Maſter's name, and accuſed the Pope and Papacy of being the chief Authors of all the miſchiefs in Chriſtendom. This was received with great deference and reſpect to King James. And when the Pope's Nun- cio objected, that King James was not a Catholic, and ſo was not to be relied upon; the Doge took him up briſkly, and told him, that the King of England believed in Jeſus Chriſt, but he did not know in whom ſome others believed. King James ſent with Wotton his Premonition to all Chriſtian Princes and States, tran- ſlated into Latin, to be preſented to the Senate; which Padre Paulo, and the other Divines, preſſed might be done at his firſt audience, telling him, they were confident it would have a very good effect. The Embaſſador could not be prevailed with, alledging he had poſitive orders to wait till St. James's day, which was not far off. This conceit of preſenting King James's book on St. James's day ſpoiled all; for before that day came, the difference was made up, and the happy opportunity loſt. So that when he had his audience on St. James's day, and had preſented the book, all the anſwer he got was, " that " they thanked the King of England for his good- " will, but they were now reconciled to the Pope, " and that therefore they were reſolved not to ad- " mit of any change in their religion, according to " their agreement with the Court of Rome." But this paſſage, which ſeems partly borrowed from that of Dr. Burnet cited above, is liable to the ſame ob- jections.

(4) Life of Sir Henry Wotton.

(5) Sir Henry Wotton.

(6) William Bedell, afterwards Biſhop of Kilmore in Ireland.

(7) Life of Biſhop Bedell, p. 12 & ſeqq.

(8) This is a miſtake of Dr. Burnet, for Father Paul was himſelf one of the Seven, there being but ſix employed by the Senate beſides.

(9) Some Diſcourſes upon Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotſon, occaſioned by the late funeral Sermon of the former upon the latter, p. 30, 31. edit. London 1695, in 4to.

(10) See Interdicti Veneti Hiſtoria, tranſlated by Bedell into Latin from the Italian, p. 218. edit. London 1626, in 4to.

(11) Memoirs of the moſt material Tranſactions in England for the laſt hundred years preceding the Revolution, p. 34 & ſeqq. edit. London 1700, in 8vo.

and left him for dead [P], and retired then to the Palace of the Pope's Nuncio in Venice, from whence they eſcaped that evening either to Ravenna or Ferrara. Theſe circumſtances diſcovered who were at the bottom of this attempt; and our Author himſelf could not forbear ſaying pleaſantly, that the wounds were made Stilo Romanæ Curiæ. How ſcandalous ſoever this deſign againſt his life was, it was attempted again more than once afterwards, and [P] On the 5th of October following he was attacked, in his return to his Convent, by five Aſſaſſins, who gave him fifteen wounds, and left him for dead.] In a letter of his dated at Venice December 11, 1607 (12), he gives this account of the affair. "And ſince I am "ſpeaking of promiſes, it puts me in mind, that I "am bound to give you ſome account of the happy "eſcape I had on the 5th of October, when three "bravo's ſet upon me behind and before in ſuch a "manner, that neither my ſervant nor myſelf were "aware of them. They gave me three ſtabs, two "in my neck, and one in my temples, all of them "above four fingers deep, with a ſtilletto or dag-"ger, which they thought was poiſoned. It pleaſed "God, that all the wounds went ſlanting, ſo that "the daggers run in all that way but little within "the fleſh, and I am now in no great danger; which "is a bleſſing, that I acknowledge due only to the "mercy of God, who was pleaſed to ſhew me ſuch "a ſtrange and ſignal deliverance. I make no doubt "but they might have murdered me a thouſand "times upon the place, if God's protection had not "prevented them. He be ever praiſed for it. I "ſhould not be againſt dying for that cauſe, which "theſe men undertook to do me miſchief for; "nor am I much concerned, that I was not killed, "excepting that it hath pleaſed the Divine Majeſty to "let me ſtill live and do further ſervice to that very "cauſe." Fra. Fulgentio relates the circumſtances of the Aſſaſſination in the following manner. As the Father was returning in the evening from the Palace of St. Mark to his Convent, he was attacked by five Aſſaſſins, armed with ſtilletto's and other weapons, who gave him fifteen thruſts, three of which only did execution. He received two wounds in the neck, and the third was made by the ſtilletto's entering his right ear, and coming out between the noſe and right cheek; and ſo violent was the ſtab, that the Aſſaſſin was obliged to leave his weapon in the wound. It was very extraordinary, that the villain did not pierce him in any part of the body, where the wound would have been mortal, the Father making not the leaſt reſiſtance. It is remarkable, that Father Paul had never ſtirred abroad before without three companions at leaſt for three months till this day, when he was only attended by Fra. Marino, his ſervant, Fra. Fulgentio being gone to ſee the ruins made by a fire lately broke out in Venice. Fra. Marino was ſeized and bound by ſome of the Aſſaſſins, whilſt others of them drawing their ſwords, and preſenting their Muſkets, kept off ſuch as might come to help him. Marino was ſo terrified at what he ſaw, that he ran away with the utmoſt precipitation; but Aleſſandro Malipiero, an old Gentleman, who had a great affection for Father Paul, walking before him, when the Aſſaſſins were gone, turning back, and ſeeing the ſtilletto ſticking in the Father's face, drew it out, and called for aſſiſtance, as likewiſe did ſome women, who had ſeen the whole affair from their windows. It happened unluckily, that the players were that evening to repreſent a celebrated Comedy, which drew ſuch crowds of people to the Theatre, that very few were left in that part of the city, where the Father was attacked; and this gave the Aſſaſſins an opportunity of eſcaping to a Gondola, which had been prepared for them, and conveyed them to the Palace of the Pope's Nuncio in Venice; whence they fled that evening to Ravenna or Ferrara. The populace hearing of what was done, ſurrounded the Nuncio's Palace, and would have ſtormed it with the utmoſt fury, if the Council of Ten had not ſent a guard to protect it. Father Paul being come to himſelf, and having had his wounds dreſſed, told thoſe about him, that the firſt two wounds, which he had received, ſeemed like two flaſhes of fire, which ſhot upon him at the ſame inſtant; and that at the third wound, he thought himſelf loaded, as it were with a prodigious weight, which oppreſſed and ſtunned his ſenſes. The chief of the Aſſaſſins was Ridolfo Pomâ, a bankrupt Merchant of Venice, who retiring to Rome, was highly careſſed there, and particularly by Cardinal Borgheſe, Nephew to the Pope. The other four were Aleſſandro Pereſio of Ancona, Giovanni of Florence, Paſquale of Bitonto, and Michael Viti of Bergamo, a Prieſt belonging to the Church of Trinity in Venice, who ſerved as a guide to them, and uſed to viſit Frâ. Fulgentio, and diſcourſe with him upon religious ſubjects; "ſo commonly, ſays Fulgentio, "is Religion made uſe of as an inſtrument to perpe-"trate the moſt ſhocking deſigns by thoſe, whoſe "circumſtances are deſperate, or who being infa-"tuated by powerful errors, are hurried away by a "blind obedience." Coſi facilmente & ordinariamente la Religione è fatta iſtromento delle piu gran ſceleraggini di quelli, che ò ſono cadute alla deſtra, ò aſſaſcinati da potente errore, con ubbidienza cieca ſi laſciano guidare. The ruffians met with great favour for ſome time at Rome; but not being rewarded according to their expectation, and murmuring upon that account againſt the Pope and Cardinal Borgheſe, both of whom, ſome ſay, they threatned to murder, they were obliged to leave Rome, and afterwards came to a miſerable end. But to return to Father Paul, as ſoon as his wounds were dreſſed, he received the Communion with the utmoſt humility, beſeeching the Fathers, who all ſtood weeping round him, not to let any ſearch be made after the aſſaſſins, all of whom, he ſaid, were unknown to him, and conſequently that he had not offended them in any manner; declaring that he freely forgave them. The only thing, that he deſired, was, that the Senate would appoint a guard for the ſecurity of his perſon for the future, in caſe Heaven ſhould prolong his life. He deſired to be attended only by a young Surgeon; but the Senate being greatly ſolicitous for his recovery, ordered all the eminent Phyſicians and Surgeons of Venice to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſave his life. Aquapendente and Adrian Spigelius were particularly ordered not to ſtir out of the Convent, till it ſhould be certainly known whether he would recover or not. This was long doubtful; for the wounds being very dangerous in themſelves, were ſtill more ſo, on account of the delicate conſtitution of the patient, who before was a mere Skeleton; to which we may add his prodigious loſs of blood, and the extreme pain, which he was obliged to undergo, through the various opinions of the Phyſicians. He ſuffered inexpreſſible torture from the dilating of the orifices; and his jaw-bone being broken, inflammations enſued, which were attended with a violent fever, till at laſt he was perfectly cured; the ſcars remained in thoſe places where he had been ſtabbed. Malipiero, who had drawn the ſtilletto out of his head, deſiring to have it, as thinking it his due, it was at laſt civilly refuſed for this reaſon, that as the Father had eſcaped ſo miraculouſly, it was fit that the bloody inſtrument ſhould be preſerved as a public monument; and therefore it was hung up at the feet of a crucifix, in the Church of the Servites, with the following inſcription, Deo Filio Liberatori, i. e. "To God the Son, "the Deliverer." The Senate of Venice, to ſhew their high regard for the Father, and deteſtation of this horrid attempt, broke up immediately upon the news, and with the deepeſt grief in their countenances came in ſuch numbers that very night to the Convent of the Servites, that one would have concluded it to have been the place of their Aſſembly. They ſent money to the Convent to defray the expence of the cure; and beſides the daily concourſe of the chief Senators, ſome of the principal Magiſtrates were appointed to viſit him every day; and the Phyſicians were ordered to come into the Senate, to acquaint them of the ſtate of the Father's health. The Republic afterwards knighted Aquapendente, and preſented him with rich chains and gold medals, for the great care he had taken of Father Paul.

The

(12) See The Letters of Father Paul, tranſlated out of the Italian by Edward Brown, Rector of Sundridge in Kent, Letter 2. p. 6 edit. Lond. 1693, in 8vo.

and even Monks and thoſe of his own Order were employed in thoſe deſigns [Q]. The Senate took all imaginable precautions for his ſecurity, and he himſelf determined to live in a more private manner than before. In this receſs he applied himſelf to the writing of his

The moſt ſevere penalties were enacted againſt the aſſaſſins; and large rewards promiſed to thoſe who might kill or ſeize any perſon, who ſhould make any attempt on his life, or diſcover any conſpiracy forming againſt him. They gave the Father leave to go always with armed attendants for his ſecurity, and appointed him an houſe near the Palace of St. Mark, where he might lodge in ſafety. However, he could never be prevailed with to quit his convent; only ſome little galleries were built adjoining to his chamber, in order that he might always go abroad by water, and never be obliged to return home in the night-time through the narrow lanes and alleys, when he came from publick buſineſs.

[Q] His life was attempted again more than once afterwards, and even Monks, and thoſe of his Order, were employed in thoſe deſigns.] In 1609, a new conſpiracy againſt his life was diſcovered, the particulars of which were as follow. Bernardo, a young Friar, who was highly careſſed by Cardinal Borgheſe, prevailed with the General of the Order of the Servites, to ſend to Padua a Friar named Gio. Franceſco of Perugia, upon pretence of proſecuting his ſtudies in that Univerſity. The little diſtance there is between Padua and Venice gave Franceſco an opportunity of going often to the Convent of Servites at Venice, where he contracted a friendſhip with Fra. Antonio of Viterbo, who was Father Paul's Amanuenſis. Theſe two Friars were townſmen, and had formerly been great friends. Father Paul was not pleaſed with this intimacy between them; but he only hinted his diſlike to Fra. Antonio. However, upon this, the latter was viſited no more by Franceſco in the uſual place, but they met elſewhere, and wrote letters to each other, which they ſent by a Jew. It happened one day, that when Antonio was not at home, the Jew delivered one of theſe letters to another Friar, telling him at the ſame time, that he was always the meſſenger upon theſe occaſions, but that he intended to be ſo no longer, becauſe he did not know what buſineſs they were upon. The Friar carrying this letter to Father Paul, the latter gave it afterwards to Antonio, charging him to break off his correſpondence with Franceſco upon pain of being diſmiſſed his ſervice. Antonio made the beſt excuſe he could, but ſtill continued to meet Franceſco privately at a certain woman's houſe, till ſuch time as the affair was ripe for execution. One morning, at day break, theſe two Friars being together in the Sacriſty, where they had a long conference, Franceſco took out a great piece of wax, which drawing with it a packet of letters, theſe dropped on the ground, unperceived by the two Friars, and were taken up after they were gone by the Sacriſtan, who carried them to Fulgentio. The latter found theſe letters all written in cypher, whence he concluded, that they concealed ſome myſtery. He afterwards diſcovered, that Bernardo had written to Franceſco, to deſire that he would preſs Antonio to diſpatch this Quadrageſimale; that the nine hundred crowns were ready for him; and that he might depend on the twelve thouſand crowns more, and even a larger ſum. In ſome of the letters he ſaid, that he had ſpoken with the Signor Padre, i. e. "the Lord Fa-"ther," in other places, with il Fratello, i. e. the Brother; and it appeared, that none of the perſons mentioned, except the General of the Order of the Servites, were under the degree of Cardinal. He told him likewiſe, that the General of the Servites bid him not doubt, but that he ſhould be beatified; and that they all wiſhed for this Quadrageſimale. Theſe letters being ſhewn to Father Paul, he immediate ſuſpected the purport of them; but earneſtly deſired Fulgentio not to take the leaſt notice of any thing, till they ſhould have got more light into the affair; declaring that in the mean time he would diſmiſs Antonio from his ſervice. Fulgentio, however, carried this packet, conſiſting of eight letters at leaſt, to one of the Inquiſitors of State; upon which Franceſco, and afterwards Antonio were ſeized. The affair being examined into, it appeared, that under the word Quadrageſimale, the attempts were concealed. The firſt was this: that as the Father, on account of a relaxation of the ſphincter ani, was obliged to have that part ſhaved once a week, and would not truſt any perſon on this occaſion but his ſervant Antonio; this Friar ſhould take this opportunity of giving Father Paul a mortal wound with the razor. But Antonio excuſed himſelf from undertaking this by ſaying, that he always fainted at the ſight of blood; and that he could not be ſo cruel as to murder his benefactor in ſo barbarous a manner. The ſecond attempt was the ſending of poiſon from Rome to mix with the Father's victuals or drink, perche con una fava havrebbono preſe due columbe, as they expreſſed it, i. e. "that they might catch two Pigeons with "one bean;" by which they meant, that Father Paul and Fulgentio might both be deſtroyed by the ſame doſe. But this was judged too hazardous, as it would be ſcarce poſſible to poiſon theſe two Fathers, without diſpatching thirty more at the ſame time, ſince the ſame food was prepared for them all without diſtinction: beſides, that all ſuch food, as was given to the two Fathers, was always inſpected very carefully ever ſince they had both been taken extremely ill with eating only a little biſket. The third attempt, which the two Friars approved as moſt eaſy and ſafe, was, that Antonio ſhould take the impreſſion of the keys of the Father's cell with the wax above-mentioned; and by this means getting other keys made, let in Ruffians in the dead of night, to murder the Father in his bed. The affair being brought before the Council of Ten, they pronounced as follows. That Franceſco ſhould be hanged, unleſs he, in a certain time mentioned in the ſentence, ſhould make a diſcovery of the whole conſpiracy; upon which condition he ſhould be impriſoned only for twelve months, and afterwards be baniſhed for ever from the Dominions of the Republick. The Senate alſo cauſed his chambers at Padua to be ſearched, in a private corner of which ſuch letters and cyphers were found, as ſufficiently cleared up the dark ſcene, and at the ſame time brought to light many other particulars; all which, ſays Fulgentio, the Senate, out of the reſpect which they bore to Religion, induſtriouſly concealed. Notwithſtanding the horridneſs of this attempt, Father Paul ſhewed his uſual compaſſion, and requeſted on his knees, that the criminals might not be put to death; and it is thought, that the commutation of the ſentence was owing to his intreaties. Several other conſpiracies were afterwards formed againſt his life, ſome of which were revealed to him by thoſe, who did it in view of being rewarded; and others were diſcovered to the inquiſitors of State. One of theſe plots was to carry him off alive out of the Dominions of the Venetians; but this deſign was afterwards laid aſide. We ſhall be a little more particular in the following relation. A young man arrived at Venice in a military habit; but behaving very aukwardly in it, was ſuſpected to be a Prieſt in diſguiſe. This man employed every artifice to get acceſs to Father Paul, upon pretence that he wanted to inform him of ſome particulars, which concerned his life; ſaying, that he would willingly conſent to come unarmed into his preſence. He always ſpoke to Fulgentio on theſe occaſions; and at laſt told him, that he was a near relation of Cardinal Baronius, but had loſt his favour. Fulgentio aſſuring him once for all, that he could never be admitted to the Father, but that if he wanted money, he ſhould be ſupplied with ſome; the man was ſurprized at the offer, and fixing his eyes ſtedfaſtly on Fulgentio, ſaid to him, Guardatevi da Traditori, che n'havete biſogno, &c. i. e. "Take care of traytors. God preſerve you all; "for I find you are not ſuch people as you were re-"preſented." Soon after this he left Venice, and was never heard of afterwards.

his History of the Council of Trent [R], for which he had begun to collect materials long before. His name ever since the Interdict was become very famous over all Europe, so that many great personages went to Italy to converse with him; and several Princes honoured

[R] In his recess he applied himself to the writing of his History of the Council of Trent.] Mr. Isaac Walton (13) tells us, that the contests between the Court of Rome and the Republick of Venice "were "the occasion of Padre Paulo's knowledge and inte- "rest with King James, for whose sake principally "Padre Paulo compiled that eminent History of the "remarkable Council of Trent; which History was, "as fast as it was written, sent in several sheets in let- "ters by Sir Henry Wotton, Mr. Bedell, and others, "unto King James and the then Bishop of Canter- "bury into England, and there first made publick, "both in English and in the universal language." And Dr. Burnet (14) observes, that Father Paul gave Mr. Bedell the manuscript of the History of the Council of Trent. But these two writers are undoubtedly mistaken; for Mr. Bedell left Venice in 1610. whereas in a letter of Sir Henry Wotton to the King, written in 1619, and entitled, A Report of my Negotiation in Germany, and of some particularities occurring in my journey (15); that History is mentioned as a work then in hand, or but newly finished. Sir Henry's words are as follow. "I acquainted them [the Princes of Ger- "many] how greedy the Italians were of our Trea- "tises in matter of controversy, and of divers ways, "that had been used both to excite and satisfy that "curiosity, both by the works of the Archbishop of "Spalato, since his retirement into your Majesty's "protection; and of a discourse, that was ready to "come abroad, wherein should be discovered by a "great intelligent man, even of their own breeding, "all the practices of the Council of Trent, out of "the original registers and secret papers; wherein "your Majesty had a hand, for the benefit of the chris- "tian world." Fra. Fulgentio informs us, that Camillo Olivo, who had been Secretary to one of the Legates at the Council of Trent, gave Father Paul great lights into the transactions of that Council, that Secretary having had a considerable share in all the Negotia- tions, and known the most secret particulars of it. He shewed the Father several writings and memoirs, which he had read over with great attention, and took notes of what was most remarkable. This His- tory was printed first at London 1619, in folio, and dedicated to King James I. by the Archbishop of Spalato. It was afterwards translated into Latin, English, French, and other languages; and a new translation of it into French by Dr. Le Courayer, was published at London 1736, in two volumes in folio; and reprinted at Amsterdam 1736, in two volumes in 4to. under this title. Histoire du Concile de Trente, ecrite en Italien par Fra. Paolo Sarpi de l'Ordre des Servites, & traduite de nouveau en François avec des Notes critiques, Historiques, & Theologiques, par Pierre François Le Courayer, Docteur en Theologie de l'Université d'Oxford, & Chanoine Regulier & ancien Bibliothecaire de l'Abbaye de Ste Genevieve de Paris.

(13) Life of Sir Henry Wotton.

(14) Life of Bishop Bedell, p. 17.

(15) See Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 486 & seqq. 4th edit. London 1685.

In 1705, Dr. Lewis Atterbury, Brother to the late Bishop of Rochester, published Some Letters relating to the History of the Council of Trent, London, in 4to. pagg. 26. and in the Dedication of them to Henry Reynell of Sheperton, Esq; observes, that he receiv- ed these papers from Mr. Basil Brent, son of Sir Na- thaniel Brent, the translator of that History. He remarks, that though these papers "at the first view "they may appear of no great moment, and too in- "considerable an entertainment for a judicious and "and learned Reader; yet when carefully perused, "they will be found useful to discover some truths, "which otherwise might have been concealed; to "clear up some transactions, which have not been "well understood; to rectify some mistakes; and to "set us right in several material passages relating to "the History of the Council of Trent. They will give "us a taste of the management of the Inquisition; "they will inform us at whose costs this useful work "was procured, by whom translated, and how agree- "able to the original, by what means transmitted to "us, and with what prudence and care the whole "affair was managed, and what danger Sir Natha- "niel Brent exposed himself to for the service of the "Church; and to advance the interest of the Pro- "testant Religion." Dr. Atterbury having desired Mr. Basil Brent to recollect what he could concerning that history, the latter wrote the following answer (16). Sir, what I can say of Father Paul, is but lit- tle material; however, to satisfy your desire, I send you this account, viz. that my Father having been once before at Venice, was sent by George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, a second time, on purpose to procure the His- tory of the Council of Trent; where he fell into ac- quaintance with Padre Paulo and Padre Fulgentio (two famous persons who sat in that Council (17) ) who were the persons who composed the History of that Council, and my father sent it over weekly, as they composed it, to the Archbishop in Italian; to whose hands it came, after five or six superscriptions to other persons, for the greater secu- rity. And when he had sent it all over, he came over himself, and translated it out of Italian into English and Latin. My father sent to them to desire the favour of them to send him their pictures, which they did accord- ingly, drawn upon canvas half way, and my father put them into plain black frames. I had them in my possession some time, but they were burnt in my lodgings in Fleet- street, in the great fire at London, I being then in the country. I have heard my father say, that he believed they were Protestants in their hearts, though they durst not own it, or else they might have discovered the business he came about, which might have cost him his life in the Inquisition. Next follows this letter, directed to Mr. John Brent, an English Gentleman at Padua (18):

(16) Some Let- ters relating to the History of the Council of Trent, p. 2, 3.

(17) This is a very gross mis- taken, for nei- ther of them ever sate in that Coun- cil.

(18) Some Let- ters, &c. p. 3 & seqq.

"Sir, out of respect I bear you as my countryman, I "could do no less (having understood of your being "at Padua) than to give you notice of an accident "lately befallen me, the knowledge whereof doth "much concern you. It happened of late, that I "came to Milan (being the 29th of this present "month,) where I had not made abroad for one "day, but towards the evening, came into the Inn "where I lay, certain Officers, who demanded for "Englishmen lodged in that house. The Host an- "swered them, that there was only one, and withal "shewed them my chamber, into which they were "no sooner entered, but they told me that they were "sent by the Father Inquisitor's command to have "me come to him. I knowing there was no way to "avoid those forelaid snares, went with them, tho' "with heavy chear; where I was no sooner come, "but the Inquisitor took me apart into a retired "chamber, and began to examine me, first, if I "were an Englishman? to whom I answered, yes. "Secondly, if I had not been a Student in the Uni- "versity of Oxford? I told him I had been many "times in Oxford, but never any Scholar there. "Hereupon he demanded me, from whence I "came? I told him from Rome: what I had done "there? I answered, for to visit that holy place, and "that in my way, I had likewise passed by Madonna "di Loretto, where I spent two days in devotion. "No sooner heard he me say so, but presently re- "plied, it seems by your actions, you should be a "good Christian: to which, I answered, I should be "exceedingly sorry to be otherwise, and that I did "rather desire to die, than not to live a good Ca- "tholic. All this I said, tho' false, in regard I ima- "gined it might serve my turn for the present, to "imprint a good conceit of me in him. This dis- "course was no sooner ended, but he began a-new to "examine me more strictly, if I knew in Italy any "of my Nation, who were Hereticks. To which I "answered him, not any that I could directly say to "be so, in regard I did not know any that did not "usually frequent churches and religious places. No! "(quoth he) do not you know one called Giovanni "Brent Oxonienſis, who is already come, or will "shortly come into Italy, in company of divers Eng- "lish Gentlemen? I told him no, tho' I had heard "of you. I thought (quoth he,) that you had been "the man, for I have had particular notice from "those parts where you came, that such an Eng- "lishman noured him with their letters, and obliged their ſons to viſit him in their travels; and two Kings made him very advantageous offers to reſide in their Dominions. We ſhall give his

" liſhman ſhould paſs, who, as I underſtand, is a " great enemy to the Catholic cauſe, and very dan- " gerous, for as much as he comes as a Spy into " this country, rather to give falſe and ſcandalous " relations, at his return home, of Catholics, and " their manner of living, than for any curioſity to " ſee the country. And after a long and tedious in- " vective againſt ſuch malicious perſons (to uſe his " own terms,) who, as he ſaid, were fitter fuel for the " fire, than to live among Chriſtians; he concluded, " that he would not be wanting in his endeavours to " be informed, that there were ſuch a man as your- " ſelf in Italy, as likewiſe any ſuch of the like ſort, " that by rewarding ſuch as you, according to their " merits, he might do God, and poor perſecuted " Catholics, good ſervice; and ſo after a friendly " admonition to continue firm in the Catholic " Faith, with a paternal Benediction, I gave him a " long ſcrape of the leg, and departed. The fear " and apprehenſion I had to undergo ſome unlucky " misfortune ſtruck ſo deep an impreſſion in me, " that it hath altogether changed my reſolution in " my journey; for whereas I purpoſed to go thro' " all Italy, I have now changed my mind (to pre- " vent the malice of future times) intending to go " through Switzerland into Germany, having ſpent " only five months in Italy, which was but in Genoa " and places circumvoiſini. If I have been tedious in " this relation, pardon me, in regard I have ſought " to expreſs each particularity of the aforeſaid inter- " rogation (though but of ſmall moment) were they " but to reſolve you in all doubts, and to clear you " in what my brevity in writing might give error " to your underſtanding. However, I being a true " Engliſhman, as you are, and hating all traitors, I " could do no leſs than give you notice hereof, to " the end, that being forewarned, you might, thro' " your own diſcretion, be armed againſt their trea- " cherous combinations, and live to know me for " your friend, with whom, though I have not had " the honour to be acquainted, yet the good report I " have heard of you, and your virtues, have obliged " me eternally.

" Yours to command,

Milan the 26th of June, 1614 (19). " John Renalds."

(19) This ſhould be 1618.

Then follow ſeveral letters from Archbiſhop Abbot, to Sir Nathaniel Brent; the firſt of which, dated at Lambeth, June 21, 1618, is as follows: Salutem in Chriſto. I am glad that you are ſafely arrived whether you deſired to go. I have read your letters, and the Canzoni incloſed, which are twelve in number, whereof I ſhall make ſuch uſe as is fit. I have not acquainted the Greateſt with any thing of your perſon, nor with the matter ſo much deſired; ſo that you may confidently tell your two good friends, that they need to dread nothing. And I may ſay in general, that there is no man living, to whom I have made known any thing in this matter, ſaving to you; only in general the old man, that liveth with me, underſtandeth of my deſire to get what I can appertaining to thoſe ſongs. Perſiſt, I pray you, in that courſe, which you have begun; and ſo commending me unto you, and wiſhing you to live as privately as you can, I reſt,

Your very loving friend,

G. Cant.

The next letter, dated at Lambeth, July 15th, 1618, is as follows:

" Salutem. At the time of the writing this letter, " I have received four ſeveral bundles, and in them " forty and nine Canzoni in the whole. Things are " here carried on with that quietneſs, that there is " no ſpeech at all of that wherein we labour. I am " glad to hear, that there is ſome hope, that by the " firſt of October, or thereabout, the whole courſe " of this muſic may be perfect. Commend me to our " two good friends, to whom I wiſh health and hap- " pineſs. And ſo letting you know that all is well " here, and that I do only communicate theſe affairs " unto my old gueſt, I remain

" Your loving friend,

" G. Cant."

Then follow three other letters of the Archbiſhop, one dated at Croydon, Aug. 10th, 1618; another dated there, Sept. 9th, and the laſt, Sept. 24, the ſame year; in all which the ſeveral parts of the manuſcripts of the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent are ſpoken of as Canzoni. After theſe, we have two letters of Father Fulgentio to Sir Nathaniel Brent, and two other letters, one to Fulgentio, and another of Dr. Thomas James to Sir N. Brent.

Dr. Gilbert Burnet (20) obſerves with regard to this work, that " the ſtyle and way of writing is ſo " natural and maſculine, the intrigues were ſo fully " opened, with ſo many judicious reflections in all " the parts of it, that as it was read with great " pleaſure, ſo it was generally looked on as the rareſt " piece of Hiſtory, which the world ever ſaw. The " Author was ſoon gueſſed; and that raiſed the eſ- " teem of the work; for as he was accounted one " of the wiſeſt men in the world, ſo he had great " opportunities to gather exact informations. He " had free acceſs to all the Archives of the Repub- " lick of Venice, which has been now looked on for " ſeveral ages, as very exact, both in getting good " intelligence, and in a moſt careful way of preſerv- " ing it; ſo that among their records he muſt have " found the diſpatches of the Embaſſadors and Pre- " lates of that Republick, that were at Trent; " which being ſo near them, and the Council being " of ſuch high conſequence, is not to be doubted, " but there were frequent and particular informations, " both of more publick informations and ſecreter " tranſactions tranſmitted thither. He had alſo " contracted a cloſe friendſhip with Camillus Oli- " va, that was Secretary to one of the Legates, " from whom he had many diſcoveries of the " practices of the Legates, and of their corre- " ſpondence with Rome. Beſides, many other ma- " terials and notes of ſome Prelates, that were at " Trent, which he had gathered together. His " work came out within fifty years of the concluſion " of the Council, when ſeveral, who had been pre- " ſent there, were ſtill alive, and the thing was ſo " recent in men's memories, that few thought a man " of ſo great prudence as he was would have ex- " poſed his reputation by writing in ſuch a nice " matter things which he could not juſtify. Never " was there a man more hated by the Court of Rome " than he was; and now he was at their mercy, if " he had abuſed the world by ſuch falſhoods in " matter of fact, as have been ſince charged on his " work; but none appeared againſt him for fifty " years." Monſieur Jurieu, in his Hiſtorical Reflections on Councils, prefixed to his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, ſpeaks of Father Paul's Hiſtory in the following terms. It hath pleaſed God in his providence to raiſe up even in the Church of Rome a wiſe, moderate, judicious, and ſincere man, one that in a word was the greateſt man of his age, who hath carefully wrote this Hiſtory [of the Council of Trent.] He has all the perfections required to compleat an Hiſtorian; of great judgment and abilities, ſtrong and clear ſenſe, perfectly inſtructed in affairs, of a vaſt penetration, and one that wanted no kind of aſſiſtance needful to the completing of his work. When this Author began to appear in the world, the memory of the Council of Trent was ſtill freſh in men's minds; ſo that he may very well paſs for a contemporary Author. . . . . He was a neighbour to the place, where the things he writes of had been tranſacted. He lived in a city full of curious perſons, who had collected memorials of what had paſſed in this great affair; and was himſelf one, who kept correſpondence with all the learned men of Europe. Nay, he had great intimacy with Camillo Oliva, who had been Secretary to the Cardinal of Mantua, Legate and Preſident of the Council in the laſt Convocation. And there is no doubt but he drew conſiderable advantages to his work from ſuch a perſon, who had been an eye-witneſs of all that had paſſed.

(20) Preface to a book intitled, The Policy of Rome: or, the Sentiments of the Court and Cardinals there, concerning Religion and the Goſpel, as they are delivered by Cardinal Palavicini, in his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. Engliſhed out of French. edit. London 1681, in 8vo.

his character in the note [S]. He ſaw death approaching him with a firmneſs and tranquillity, paſſed. Now ſince this Author was neither Lutheran nor of the Reformed Religion, he is not in reaſon to be ſuſpected by the Church of Rome; and as he was no ſervile Idolater of the Court of Rome, he ought not to be ſuſpected by Proteſtants. There ſhines throughout his work an air of ſincerity and honeſty, which happily united to his vaſt abilities, has made him paſs as unqueſtionably the ableſt man of his age in the art of writing Hiſtory. But in an age ſo depraved as ours, it is dangerous to be honeſt. The ſincerity of Father Paul hath raiſed againſt him a multitude of enemies. The Court of Rome endeavours to make him paſs for an impoſtor and the moſt profligate of men, and his work for a malevolent and venomous ſatyr. And yet to ſo many important truths, by him laid open to the world, nothing but ſcurrility and abuſe were oppoſed; till at laſt after forty years Cardinal Pallavicini bethought himſelf to publiſh a new Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, or, if you pleaſe, an anſwer to Father Paul, for he cites him and refutes him in every page. This work appeared with all the external advantages, which can well recommend a book. It had Pope Alexander VII. to whom it was dedicated, for Patron, and for its Author, one of the Princes of the Church, as they are called; one that was of a Society well acquainted with the arts of engaging men's minds; and one who in this work defended a favourite cauſe, ſupported by the number and quality of the Partiſans. " And yet with " all this he has not been able to attract all that ap- " plauſe and approbation, which the contract of " Rome had hoped. Men judged, that he came " much too late to inſtruct them in the tranſactions " of this Council; nor indeed is an opinion once " ſettled ſo eaſily ſhaken off. After having left the " Venetian Divine for fifty years together in peace- " able poſſeſſion of our belief of his Hiſtory, this " new comer will find it difficult to eradicate that " eſtabliſhed belief. An hundred years after the " Council of Trent, he bethinks himſelf of giving " the hiſtory of it; which certainly is a prudent " courſe to avoid being taken in falſities, on ac- " count of the diſtance of time; though indeed " many for the ſame reaſon think fit to excuſe " their giving credit to his Hiſtory. It is true, he " tells us, that he took from the memorials and " regiſters of the Vatican, which were communicat- " ed to him, the acts and proceedings of the Coun- " cil. One may believe this as one pleaſes; and ſo " long as ſuch pieces are not made publick, there " will always be ſome Infidels, who will call in queſ- " tion the credit of them. Beſides, there is another " claſs of men, of no mean parts, nor Hereticks, " who have no good opinion of theſe Vatican Re- " cords, from which the Cardinal ſays he made his " collections. It is very well known, that the Court " of Rome being governed by the moſt refined Po- " liticks, makes no collection of pieces, which may " prove injurious or dangerous to herſelf; or, if ſhe " had any ſuch, would not permit them to be made " publick. Thoſe that pretend to judge of ſtyle, do " likewiſe diſreliſh this work of the Cardinal. He " manages all with pomp, but miſplaces it; and is " extremely florid, but without art. . . . But above all " his uſage of Father Paul is diſliked by all men of " honour; ſince though the Father was certainly one " of the greateſt men of his time, the Cardinal has " treated him with rage and fury, unjuſtly, and even " childiſhly. People laugh at the liſt of 360 errors, " which he imputes to Father Paul. They ſay, " there is a myſtery in that number, and Aſtrology is " doubtleſs concerned in it; for there is no probability " that by mere chance alone there ſhould be a diſco- " very of juſt ſo many errors in a book, as there are " degrees in the greater circles. To complete the " catalogue, he brings in trifles not worth naming, " as the miſtakes of a few days or nights; nay, the " eſcapes of the preſs are improved into errors of " the Author."

[S] We ſhall give his character in the note.] Fra. Fulgentio obſerves, that notwithſtanding the great animoſity of the Court of Rome againſt him, the moſt eminent Prelates of it always expreſſed the higheſt regard for him; and that though many perſons thought him a Hypocrite, yet his whole conduct proved the contrary, ſince he never uſed any of thoſe actions, which Hypocrites perform ſo induſtriouſly in publick; ſuch as the making a parade of his beads in the ſtreets, kiſſing medals as he was walking, ſhewing himſelf among a great concourſe of people, talking in an affected ſtrain of piety, or wearing a mean ſordid habit. The ſame writer remarks, that he was abſolutely exempt from avarice and ambition; that learning, which is too apt to inflate the mind, had a quite contrary effect on him, his humility increaſing with his knowledge; and that as a proof how much he had the peace of his country at heart, was, that though the Senate reſolved to protect him againſt any attack from what quarter ſoever, he was yet extremely deſirous, that the Republick might not ſuffer in any manner on his account. And therefore Gregory XV. having ſucceeded Paul V. in the Pontificate, the Venetian Embaſſadors congratulating him on his acceſſion, he anſwered, that there would never be a firm union between the Apoſtolick See and the Republick of Venice, ſo long as the latter ſhould make uſe of Father Paul's counſels. Upon hearing of this the Father reſolved to leave the Venetian Dominions, rather than be the occaſion of any new diſpute: and becauſe neither his religion nor conſcience would ſuffer him to lay violent hands on himſelf, and that he could not retire into the Dominions of any of the Proteſtants without the hazard of being thought a convert to their Religion, nor be ſafe in any Roman Catholick country; he determined to go to Conſtantinople or ſome other city in the Eaſt, and accordingly he had begun to prepare for his voyage, and even obtained a paſſport from the Grand Signior. But the Pope's reſentment ceaſing, he laid aſide his deſign. This is the account of Fulgentio; but Dr. Burnet (21) tells us, that " when " the reconciliation with Rome was concluded, Fa- " ther Paul was out of all hopes of ever bringing " things to ſo promiſing a conjuncture [a Reformation] " upon which he wiſhed he could have left Venice, " and come over to England with Mr. Bedell. But " he was ſo eſteemed by the Senate for his great " wiſdom, that he was conſulted by them as an ora- " cle, and truſted with their moſt important ſecrets; " ſo that he knew it was difficult for him to obtain his " Conge; and therefore he made a ſhift to comply, as " far ashe could, with the eſtabliſhed way of their " worſhip. Bu he had in many things particular " methods, by which he rather quieted than ſatiſ- " fied his conſcience . . . . He never prayed to Saints." Sir Henry Wotton, in a letter to Dr. Collins, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity at Cambridge, dated January 17th, 1637 (22), ſays, that Father Paul was one of the humbleſt things that could be ſeen within the bounds of humanity, the very pattern of that precept, quanto doctior, tanto ſubmiſſior, and enough alone to demonſtrate, that knowledge well digeſted non inflat. Excellent in poſitive, excellent in ſcholaſtical and polemical divinity. A rare mathematician even in the moſt abſtruſe parts thereof, as in Algebra and the Theoriques; and yet withal, ſo expert in the Hiſtory of Plants, as if he had never peruſed any book but Nature. Laſtly, a great Canoniſt, which was the title of his ordinary ſervice with the State; and certainly, in the time of the Pope's Interdict, they had their principal light from him. When he was either reading or writing alone, his manner was to ſit fenced with a caſtle of paper about his chair, and over head; for he was of our Lord of St. Alban's opinion, that all air is predatory, and eſpecially hurtful, when the Spirits are moſt employed . . . . He was of a quiet and ſettled temper, which made him prompt in his counſels and anſwers; and the ſame in conſultation, which Themiſtocles was in action, αὐτοσχεδιάζειν ἱκανώτατος, as will appear unto you in a paſſage between him and the Prince of Conde. The ſaid Prince, in a voluntary journey to Rome, came by Venice, where to give ſome vent to his own humours, he would often diveſt himſelf of his greatneſs, and after other leſs laudable curioſities, not long before his departure, a deſire took him to viſit the famous obſcure Servita. To whoſe Cloyſter coming twice, he was the firſt time denied to be within; and at the ſecond it was intimated, that by reaſon of his daily admiſſion to their deliberation in the palace, he could not receive the viſit of ſo illuſtrious a perſonage without leave from the Senate, which he would ſeek quillity, which gave teſtimony to the integrity of his life, and the purity of his intentions; and ſeek to procure. This ſet a greater edge on the Prince, when he ſaw he ſhould confer with one participant of more than Monkiſh ſpeculations. So after leave gotten, he came the third time: and then, beſides other voluntary diſcourſe (which it were a tyranny over you to repeat) he aſſailed him with queſtions enough to have troubled any man but himſelf, and him too, if a precedent accident had not eaſed him. "The queſtion was παρρησιαν this; "he deſired to be told by him before his going, "Who was the true unmaſked Author of the late "Tridentine Hiſtory? You muſt know this, that but "newly Advertiſement was come from Rome, that "the Archbiſhop of Spalato being then re-arrived "from England, in an interview between him and "Cardinal Ludoviſio, nephew to Gregory XV. the ſaid "Cardinal, after a complimental welcoming him "into the Lap of the Church, told him, by order "from the Pope, that his Holineſs would expect "from him ſome recantation in print, as an antidote "againſt certain books and pamphlets, which he "had publiſhed, whilſt he ſtood in the revolt; "namely, his firſt Manifeſto; item, two Sermons "preached at the Italian church in London; again, "a little tract, intitled, his Scogli; and laſtly, his "greater volumes about Church Regiment and Con-"troverſies. Theſe were all named; for as touching "the Tridentine Hiſtory, his Holineſs (ſays the Car-"dinal) will not preſs you to any diſavowment thereof, "though you have an Epiſtle before the original edition; "becauſe we know well enough, that Friar Paolo is the "father of that brat. Upon this laſt piece of the "aforeſaid Advertiſement, the good Father came "fairly off; for on a ſudden laying all together, "that to diſavow the work was an untruth, to aſſume "it a danger, and to ſay nothing an incivility, he "took a middle evaſion, telling the Prince, that he "underſtood he was going to Rome, where he "might learn at eaſe, who was the Author of that "book, as they were freſhly intelligenced from "thence." Cardinal Perron (23) ſaid thus of our Author: I ſee nothing eminent in that man: he is a man of judgment and good ſenſe, but has no great learning; I obſerve his qualifications to be mere common ones, and a little ſuperior to an ordinary Monk's. But Daniel George Morhof (24) remarks, that this judgment of Perron is abſurd and malignant, and directly contrary to the cleareſt evidence, ſince thoſe who are acquainted with the great things done by Father Paul, and the extent of his learning, will allow him to be ſuperior, not only to Monks, but Cardinals, and even Perron himſelf. Ineptum eſt & malignum Cardinalis Perronii de Paulo Sarpio judicium . . . Adverſus ſolem hoc loqui eſt. Qui norunt quantas qualeſq; res geſſerit Sarpius, quibus ille doctrinis excelluerit, illi non ſupra Monachum ſed & ſupra Cardinalem, ac ipſum hunc Perronium, ſapuiſſe largientur. Dr. Le Courayer tells us (25), that our Author, "in imitation of E-"raſmus, Caſſander, Thuanus, and many other great "men, was a Catholic in general, and ſometimes a "Proteſtant in particulars. He obſerved every thing "in the Roman Religion, which could be practiſed "without ſuperſtition; and in points, which he "ſcrupled, he took great care not to ſcandalize the "weak. In ſhort, he was equally averſe to all ex-"tremes; if he diſapproved the abuſes of the Catho-"lics, he condemned alſo the too great heat of the "Reformed; and uſed to ſay to thoſe, who urged "him to declare himſelf in favour of the latter, that "God had not given him the Spirit of Luther . . . . . "We ſee by ſeveral of his letters, that he wiſhed "extremely the progreſs of the Reformation, but in a "manner a little different from that, which had been "taken to procure it. Perhaps, ſays he, in one of "his letters, God's will in this age, is to extinguiſh "the tyranny by means more gentle, than thoſe made "uſe of in the laſt age. He, who began to lay the foun-"dation, did not finiſh the work. Who knows whether "by beginning at the roof, as is done at preſent, it may "not be more effectual? It may be hoped for, if God bleſs "the undertaking. . . . . In ſeveral other letters, it "appears, that he was greatly pleaſed at all the ſuc-"ceſſes of the Reformed in France, and wiſhed them "new advantages, as of uſe to the progreſs of truth. . . "If there be a war in Italy, ſays he, in a letter, dated "April 27, 1610, it will be of vaſt ſervice to Religion; "and this is what Rome is afraid of; the Inquiſition "will be ſtopped, and the Goſpel have its courſe. Believe me, "ſaid he in another letter, dated Auguſt 26th, 1608, "there is a very great number of Hypocrites in Italy; "and be not ſurpriſed, that they ſhut their eyes againſt "the light, ſince they have always ſhut them againſt "the truth, and opened them to their intereſt. In "a word, he regarded the reformation as the only "means of reducing the power of Rome, and the "reducing of that power as the only means of mak-"ing the purity of religion flouriſh again. There "is nothing of greater importance, ſays he, in a letter "dated July 5, 1611. than to deſtroy the credit of the "Jeſuits; by ruining them, Rome is ruined; and if "Rome be deſtroyed, Religion will reform of itſelf." Dr. Le Courayer likewiſe obſerves, that Father Paul wiſhed for a reformation of the Papacy, and not the deſtruction of it; and was an enemy to the abuſes and pretenſions of the Popes, and not their place. He was an enemy to ſuperſtition; but he tolerated Ceremonies without any reluctance. He condemned an eagerneſs of making new doctrines, and did not always think it his duty to ſubmit to deciſions made too haſtily; but he did not imagine himſelf obliged to break communion on account of new opinions, which were imprudently raiſed into Articles of Faith. He readily ſubmitted to the authority of the Church in all things relating to Rites and Diſcipline; but he could have wiſhed, that the ſuperiors of the Church had been more eaſy in relaxing ſomething of the rigour of poſitive laws. He hated perſecution; but he hated ſchiſm likewiſe. He was a Proteſtant, if that is not giving blindly into all prevailing opinions, and condemning freely abuſes introduced and ſupported by intereſt. But he was a Catholick, if that be loving ſincerely the purity of the Church, hating diviſions, maintaining order and ſubordination, and being animated with a zeal to reform Religion, and not to tear it to pieces. The Author of the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée (26) having quoted this paſſage of Dr. Le Courayer, has the following remark upon it. "All this forms, in my opinion, "an incomprehenſible contraſt. To be deſirous of "reforming the Church, without cauſing diviſions "in it; to reduce the Popes without deſtroying "them; to baniſh ſuperſtition, and yet tolerate "ceremonies, which are made only to ſupport it; "to eſteem it equally bad, that conſcience ſhould "be forced to continue in a communion, which it "diſapproves, and that it ſhould be at full liberty to "ſeparate from that communion; is not this at-"tempting an impoſſibility? It ſeems evidently ſo "to me; and if this really was what Father Paul "attempted, are we to be ſurpriſed at the ſmall ſuc-"ceſs of his undertaking? He muſt neceſſarily fail "in the execution of a deſign, which naturally was "impracticable; and all that can be ſaid in his fa-"vour is, that being impoſed on by the beauty of "the ideas, he flattered himſelf too much with their "being compatible, becauſe he paſſionately wiſhed it. "None but minds elevated above the common rank "can fall into ſuch a miſtake." The ſame writer obſerves (27), that the account of Father Paul's inclination for the reformation will receive ſome confirmation from the following paſſages relating to Fra. Fulgentio, the moſt intimate of his friends, and who was beſt acquainted with his ſentiments. Dr. Burnet (27) informs us, that Fulgentio preaching upon Pilate's queſtion, What is truth? told the audience, that at laſt after many ſearches he had found it out, and held out a New Teſtament, and ſaid, that there it was in his hand; but then put it in his pocket, and ſaid coldly, But the Book is prohibited. The Author of the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée then quotes the following manuſcript relation. Dr. Duncomb, who had the care of ſome Engliſh Noblemen, being at Venice after the death of Father Paul, fell ſick there, and appearing to be extremely uneaſy in his mind, Fra. Fulgentio deſired to know the cauſe of it, and offered him all the aſſiſtance in his power. The Doctor frankly owned to him, that he had always prayed to God, that he might die in a place, where he might receive the Sacrament according to the method of the Church of England, that is, under both kinds;

(21) Life of Biſhop Bedell.

(22) See Reliquiæ Wottonianæ.

MEMORANDUM, that this Recantation was, to my knowledge, never printed at Rome, or elſewhere, thro' more haſte belike to his death, or otherwiſe upon farther conſideration, that things extorted with fear, carry no credit, even by the Prætor's Edict.

(23) See Perroniana.

(24) Polybiſtor, p. 293, 294.

(25) Vie abrégée de Fra. Paolo, prefixed to his tranſlation of the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent.

(26) Tom. 17. part 1. art. 5. p. 148.

(27) Ibid. p. 142.

(28) Life of Biſhop Bedell, p. 120.

and died with ſtrong ſentiments of piety, January 14, 1623 [T], aged ſeventy one years. His funeral was diſtinguiſhed by the publick magnificence of it, and the vaſt concourſe of the Nobility and perſons of all ranks attending it. And the Senate out of gratitude to his memory erected a monument to him, the inſcription upon which was written by John Anthony Venerio, a noble Venetian. Though ſeveral Kings and Princes had deſired him to ſit for his picture, he conſtantly excuſed himſelf, refuſing it even to his intimate friend Dominico Molini [U]. He was of a middle ſtature; his head very large in proportion to his body, which was extremely lean. He had a wide forehead, in the middle of which was a very large vein. His eyebrows were well arched, his eyes large, black, and ſprightly; his noſe long and big, but very even; his beard thin, and his chin in ſome places bald of hair, which yet was no ways unſeemly. He had a ſoft complexion, which, when he was in health, was formed with an agreeable mixture of white and red, though with a yellowiſh caſt. His aſpect, though grave, was extremely inviting; and he had a very fine hand. Monſieur Amelot de la Houſſaye publiſhed kinds; but that unhappily he had not hopes of obtaining this in the country where he then was. What would have been a difficulty to another, was none to Fulgentio. He immediately comforted the Doctor, by ſaying, that he had the Common Prayer in Italian; and that if he deſired it, he would come himſelf with ſome of his brethren, and adminiſter to him the Communion under both kinds; and ſo much the rather as there were in his Convent ſeven or eight Diſciples of Father Paul, who met from time to time, and received the Sacrament in that manner. Dr. Duncomb gave this account, upon his return to England, to the Lord Hatton; and Biſhop Atterbury declared, that he had it from Captain Hatton, who had frequently heard it from his Father. The Author of the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée ſubjoins this reflection (29): (29) p. 143.

" What ſhall we then believe concerning Father " Paul, Father Fulgentio, and others of the ſame " character, who lived and died in the Roman Ca" tholick Religion? Was their profeſſion only gri" mace and hypocriſy? Monſieur Le Courayer aſ" ſerts, that their conduct does not ſhew this in any " manner; and I own, that I find myſelf as much " inclined as any perſon to acquit them from any " blame. But I think, that it will eaſily be granted " me, that with ſuch ſentiments, and ſuch great " lights, thoſe Divines muſt have been in a very " diſagreeable and uneaſy ſituation. Let us not con" demn any man: it is God alone, to whom judg" ment belongs. But ſhall not we pity thoſe conſci" ences, whoſe inward voice is ſo much the ſtronger " and more clamorous, as it is reſtrained without? " Can one better expreſs this embarraſſment, than Fa" ther Paul himſelf has done in the fragment of a " letter, which the French writer of his life has " thought proper to cite? In the ſervice of God, ſays " that great man (30), I do what I know; but al" ways full of fear of doing ſomething unſeaſonably, and " thereby preventing ſomething. Father Fulgentio does " the ſame. We muſt not deceive ourſelves, but wait for " every thing from above. To ſpeak plainly, if Luther " had had the Spirit of Father Paul, the Papal yoke " would have been now perhaps as heavy and as uni" verſally received, as it was in the beginning of the " 16th century; and if Father Paul had had the Spirit " of Luther, it is very probable, that within about " 130 years, the Reformation would have prevailed " in the very boſom of Italy."

(30) In his Letter of May 26, 1609.

[T] Died with ſtrong ſentiments of piety, January 14th, 1623.] In the beginning of the winter, 1622, his health began to decline greatly; upon which he withdrew his thoughts pretty much from his ſtudies and public affairs, to the meditation of the other world. In the beginning of the year 1623, he told his friends, that this year would be his laſt; and on the 6th of January, notwithſtanding his indiſpoſition, he went to the Palace; but returned home very weak. On the 8th, being Sunday, he ſaid Maſs, and dined in the Refectory, and walked for a conſiderable time with his friend, Signor Secchini. Till the day before he died, he always got up, dreſſed himſelf, wrote and read as uſual, and when he was not able to do this, he laid himſelf along upon his cheſt, and heard others read. Being dreſſed on the Monday morning, he found himſelf deprived, as it were in an inſtant, of the uſe of his limbs, and had a violent nauſea. But his judgment and memory were as perfect as ever; and on the Saturday morning he ſaid to his friends, Io v' ho tenuti conſolati ſinò ch' hò potuto; hora non poſſo più, e tocherebbe a voi tenermi allegro, i. e. " I have endeavoured to comfort you as " long as I was able; and as I am no longer capa" ble of doing it, it is your buſineſs to divert me." On the 12th, he took the Sacrament with ſo much devotion and reſignation, as drew tears from all who were preſent. On the 14th, which was the day he died, he cauſed the chapter of St. John's Goſpel, relating to our Saviour's Paſſion, to be read, as had been done the preceding days; and declared his reliance on the mercy of Chriſt. One of the Phyſicians telling him, that he found by his pulſe that he had but a few hours to live, he anſwered with a chearful countenance, Sia lodato Iddio; mi piace ciò ch' a lui piace; col ſuo aiuto faremo bene queſta ultima Attione, i. e. " God be praiſed: what pleaſes him, " pleaſes me: with his aſſiſtance, we ſhall perform " well this laſt action." He continued very chearful, without ſhedding a tear, or venting the leaſt groan; and uſed to cry at every little interval, Horsù, andiamo ove Dio ci chiama, i. e. " Come, let us go " whither God calls us." The clock ſtriking eight, he counted it, and a little after calling Fulgentio, ſaid to him, Horsù non reſtate più à vedermi in queſto ſtato; non è dovere. Andate à dormire, & io n' andarò à Dio, d' onde ſiamo venuti, i. e. " Leave me, there is no occa" on for you to ſtay to ſee me in this condition. Go " to ſleep, and I ſhall go to God, from whom we " all came." After which he deſired a kiſs of him, and a particular embrace; and then Fulgentio broke from his dear friend and maſter. And now the Prior returned with the reſt of the Monks, who kneeling round his bed repeated the uſual prayers. The laſt words which he uttered, were, Eſto perpetua; which was ſuppoſed to be a prayer for the Republic. A little after, throwing his arms acroſs, fixing his eyes on a crucifix, caſting them downwards, and ſhutting them, he reſigned his ſoul into the hands of his Creator. The particulars of his death, ſolemnly atteſted by the whole Convent of the Servites, were publiſhed by order of the Senate, to refute a ſcandalous report ſpread about, that he died yelling and howling; that an hideous black dog was ſeen; and that horrid noiſes were heard in and about his cell. The like ſlanderous rumours had been raiſed to aſperſe the memory of the excellent Leonardo Donato, and to blacken thoſe, who, at the time of the Interdict, eſpouſed the cauſe of the Republic. When the news of his death was brought to Rome, the Courtiers rejoiced; and a thouſand falſe and ſcandalous particulars were raiſed concerning him. Nor could the Pope himſelf forbear ſaying, that the hand of God was viſible in taking him out of the world; as if there was any thing miraculous in a man's dying at ſeventy one years of age.

[U] Though ſeveral Kings and Princes had deſired him to ſit for his picture, he conſtantly excuſed himſelf, refuſing it even to his intimate friend Dominico Molini.] This is the account of Fra. Fulgentio; who tells us likewiſe, that " tho' many pictures of the Father " go abroad for originals, yet they are all but co" pies of one, which is ſaid to be in the gallery of " a great King, which was taken againſt his will, " and by a ſtratagem." But Sir Henry Wotton, in his letter to Dr. Collins, cited in the remark [S], writes thus: " And now, Sir, having a fit Meſſen" ger, publiſhed a French tranſlation of our Author's Treatiſe of the Eccleſiaſtical Benefits and Revenues, illuſtrated with remarks. And we have an Engliſh tranſlation of the ſame work, the third edition of which was printed at Weſtminſter 1736, in 8vo. under the title of A Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices and Revenues, written originally in Italian by the learned Father Paul, Author of the Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, tranſlated by Tobias Jenkins, Eſq; late Member of Parliament, and Lord Mayor of York. And illuſtrated with Notes by him, and from the ingenious Amelot de la Houſſaye. To which is prefixed (never before printed) the Life of Father Paul, by Mr. Lockman; and a Preface giving an account of the Work. His Letters were tranſlated out of Italian into Engliſh, by Mr. Edward Brown, Rector of Sundridge in Kent; and printed at London, in 1693, in 8vo.

" ger, and not long after the time when love-tokens " uſe to paſs between friends, let me be bold to " ſend you for a New-year's-gift, a certain memo- " rial, not altogether unworthy of ſome entertain- " ment under your roof; namely, a true picture of " Padre Paulo the Servite, which was firſt taken by " a painter, whom I ſent unto him, my houſe then " neighbouring his monaſtery. I have newly added " thereunto, a title of my own conception, Conci- " lii Tridentini Eviſcerator; and had ſent the frame " withal, if it were portable, which is but of plain " deal coloured black, like the habit of his Order . . . " You will find a ſcar in his face; that was from a " Roman aſſaſſinate, that would have killed him " as he was turned to a wall near to his Convent; " and if there were not a greater providence about " us, it might often have been eaſily done, eſpeci- " cially upon ſuch a weak and wearyiſh body." T.

(a) Platina, in Paulo II.

PAUL II. choſen Pope Auguſt the 31ſt 1464 (a), was the ſon of Nicholas Barbo, a Nobleman of Venice, by a ſiſter of Pope Eugenius IV. Moreri obſerves that the Proteſtants have given Paul II. a very bad character: but as he mentions but few particulars, I muſt ſupply his omiſſions here. They aſſert (b) that he was privy to the wicked deſign of Ferdinand King of Naples, who cauſed Picininus to be baſely murdered; that he was the perſecutor of the learned [A]; that he ſold all the employments; that he did not care to give Biſhopricks but to ſuch perſons, who had already ſome other poſts, which they could reſign to him, to ſell them for his own profit; that he extended the bull of caſes reſerved to the Popes as far as he could, that by that means he might have more pretences to extort money from all quarters; that he bought at any price all the fineſt jewels he could meet with, to adorn the Papal Mitre, with which he delighted to be ſeen abroad, having alſo his face painted; that he detained ſtrangers in town, and had the holy handkerchief ſhewed according to cuſtom, that there might be at once more people to behold him. That he had a baſtard daughter [B]; that he was ſtrangled in the night time by the Devil in the very act of fornication;

(b) See Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquite, p. m. 542, 543.

[A] The Proteſtants aſſert . . . that he was the proſecutor of the learned.] " He had ſo great an averſion " for men of letters, that he looked upon them " as Hereticks; and he deprived of their em- " ployments all the learned who had been prefer- " red by his Predeceſſors: As he was extremely igno- " rant, (ſays our Hiſtorian, who is a great flatterer " of the Popes*) he perſecuted moſt cruelly all learned " and honeſt men; he uſed to call Hereticks, all the Ro- " mans who applied themſelves to Literature, and he al- " ways exhorted the youths of Rome never to ſtudy. He " not only deprived ſeveral learned men of their eſtates, " but alſo put them in priſon, and made them ſuffer the " moſt cruel torments: amongſt others, were Baptiſt Pla- " tina, and Milverton, an Engliſhman, who was Pro- " vincial of the Carmelites (1)." I have related in ſome other paſſages of this Dictionary (2), the perſecution which Platina ſuffered, and what was the occaſion of it. I ſhall only tranſcribe here the paſſage in which he gives us an account of that Pope's taſte for Literature. Humanitatis ſtudia ita oderat & contemnebat, ut ejus ſtudioſos uno nomine hæreticos appellabat. Hanc ob rem Romanos adhortabatur ne filios diutius in ſtudiis litterarum verſari paterentur: ſatis eſſe ſi legere & ſcribere didiciſſent (3), i. e. " He deſpiſed and " hated the ſtudy of polite Literature to ſuch a de- " gree, that he uſed to call indifferently, all thoſe " who applied themſelves to it, Hereticks. And " therefore he adviſed the Romans not to ſuffer their " children to ſtudy too long, ſaying it was enough if " they learned only to read and to write." Monſieur du Pleſſis having given a tranſlation of that paſſage, adds, that it gave Genebrard an occaſion, in the 2d part of his Chronicle, to ſtile this Pope an enemy to Virtue and Learning (4). Father Gretſer not meeting with that paſſage in Genebrard's Chronicle, of the edition printed at Cologne, in the year 1581, ſuſpected it was a falſe quotation (5). I cannot determine the matter: for though my edition, which is that of Lyons 1609, does not contain that remark in the paſſage where Paul II. is mentioned, yet Genebrard may have ſtiled this Pope thus in ſome other paſſage. Let us obſerve here, that one cannot eaſily comprehend, how there ſhould be an edition of Genebrard's Chronicle printed at Cologne in the year 1581, ſince the Author's Dedication is dated in November 1584; and it is obſerved there, that the book was then printed for the firſt time. Father Gretſer's Printer put, perhaps, LXXXI. inſtead of LXXXXI. Now ſince after all, the edition he made uſe of was not the firſt (a); it remains ſtill to be examined, whether it was not caſtrated in the paſſage which Du Pleſſis read in the firſt edition.

* Wicelius, in Epitome Rom. Pontif.

(1) Jurieu, Prejugez legitimes contre le Papiſme, Tom. 1. p. 245.

(2) See the art. PLATINA, rem. [B], &c. and the article EXPERIENS, rem. [A].

(3) Platina in Paulo II. ſub fin. folio m. 362 verſo.

(4) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniq. p. m. 543.

(5) Gretſer, in Exam. Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 535.

[a] The edition he made uſe of was not the firſt.] This is true indeed, if Mr. Bayle's ſuppoſition of the error of the preſs be well grounded; but as he does not prove it, may we not ſuppoſe that the Printer put LXXXI. inſtead of LXXXIV? in which caſe there can be no caſtrated edition, and Du Pleſſis's memory muſt have failed him. ADD. REM.

[B] . . . . that he had a baſtard daughter.] To prove this particular, the following lines are quoted from Janus Pannonius.

Pontificis Pauli teſtes ne Roma requiras
Filia quam genuit, ſat docet eſſe marem.
Sanctum non poſſum, Patrem te dicere poſſum,
Cum video natam, Paule ſecunde, tuam (6).

i. e. " If Rome requires witneſſes of Pope Paul's man- " hood, the daughter he begot proves him a man. " I cannot call you holy Paul II. though I can call " you father, when I behold your daughter."

(6) See Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniq. p. 543, and John Zwinger, de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, p. 132.

This is confirmed by the following lines of another Poet.

Quum ſit filia, Paule, ſit tibi aurum,
Quantum Pontifices habere raros
Vidit Roma prius, Pater vocari
Sanctus non potes, at potes beatus.

i. e. " Since you have a daughter, Paul, and ſo much " gold, that few of your Predeceſſors ever were ſo " rich, you may be ſtiled, not indeed an holy, but yet " a bleſſed father."

cation [C]; that he uſed to ſleep in the day time, and to paſs the night in reckoning his money, and admiring his jewels and pictures (c); that he was a hard drinker, and that he cauſed ſome drunken games to be celebrated in Lent, to which he invited perſons of all ſorts, by giving them hopes of receiving prizes and rewards; that he abandoned himſelf to ſodomy and magick (d) [D]. Some of theſe particulars are related by Platina, either as matters of fact, or as common reports. The others are not grounded on very certain authorities. However it be, I do not think that the Proteſtants ever mentioned a more notorious injuſtice of this Pope, thna is to be met with in the works of a Cardinal, who was his contemporary, and one of the moſt illuſtrious Prelates of that age. I ſhall relate it

(c) Revius, in Hiſtor. Pontificum Romanor. p. 245.

(d) Idem, Ibid.

It is added (7), that Paul II. having read theſe poems, fell a crying, and complained of the ſevere law of celibacy, and reſolved to abrogate it. You will find in another place (8), on whoſe authority this is aſſerted. I muſt not forget to obſerve, that Platina has not ſaid a word of that baſtard daughter, and his ſilence is taken by Paul the Second's Apologiſts, for an argument that clears him: for, ſay they (9), that Hiſtorian, out of anger and reſentment, ſpoke ſo ill of that Pope, that he would not have ſpared him, with regard to incontinency, if he could have traduced him as the father of a daughter, publickly known at Rome. They make the ſame obſervation, with regard to the other imputations which Platina has not mentioned.

(7) Ibidem.

(8) In the rem. [B] of the art. ORICHOVIUS.

(9) See Gretſer, in Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 536, and Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquite, p. 1199.

[C] . . . that he was ſtrangled in the night-time by the Devil, in the very act of Fornication.] Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai, relates this particular upon Peucer's credit. I have conſulted that Author, and found that he expreſſes himſelf thus. Paulus Secundus ob ſpurciſſimam libidinem maſculam & artes Dæmoniacas publice infamis atque execrabilis, utpote quem tandem in concubitu à Dæmone ſtrangulatum, obtorti colli terribile ſpecie mortis genus oſtendiſſe fama eſt (10). That is to ſay, according to Simon Goulart's tranſlation, Paul the Second, infamous and execrable to all the world, on account of his ſodomitical practices and magic arts, who was at laſt, according to the accounts of the Hiſtorians, ſtrangled in his bed by the Devil, who broke his neck. I am apt to think that this Tranſlator, through an overſight, imagined that there was in the text cubitu (bed), and not concubitu, (the act of fornication). Or perhaps he made uſe of an edition, in which the Printer omitted the firſt ſyllable of the word concubitu. Otherwiſe, I cannot imagine, why he would have enervated Peucer's account, by omitting the circumſtance of the lewd act, in which that Pope was ſtrangled by the Devil. It is not Simon Goulart's cuſtom to weaken ſuch accounts; on the contrary, he takes a delight in making them ſtronger. We have an inſtance of it in this very paſſage. For he tranſlates the Latin words fama eſt, by theſe, according to the accounts of the Hiſtorians. Now there is a great difference between ſaying, it is reported, men ſay, and the Hiſtorians relate. Peucer made uſe only of the former expreſſion, whereas his Tranſlator uſed the latter. They were both in the wrong: for a man ought never thus to traduce even his enemies, without unqueſtionable vouchers: but Goulart is more to blame ſtill, than Peucer. The illuſtrious Author (11), who only quoted a Proteſtant Writer on this occaſion, ought to have foreſeen that this would expoſe him to opprobrious language from the oppoſite party; and thus it happened accordingly, as appears from the following paſſage of a Jeſuit. Illud Diabolicum mendacium eſt, Paulo in ipſo acto venereo a Diabolo ſtrangulatum; nam omnes apoplexia exſtinctum tradunt, etiam acerrimus hoſtis ejus Platina. Sed Pleſſæus dicti ſui teſtem laudat Peucerum, hominem mendaciloquentiſſimum; cui qui fidem commodandam cenſet, is neſcit adhuc, quam in rebus referendis infidus, & fide indignus ſit Peucerus, etiam apud ipſos Sectarios, præſertim Lutheranos Ubiquitiſtas, qui Peucerum ob ſcelera ſua decennali carcere macerarunt: quo forſan tempore à Diabolo hoc de Paulo mendacium accepit (12), i. e. "It is a deviliſh falſity, that Paul "was ſtrangled by the Devil in the very act of fornica"tion. For all the Hiſtorians, and even Platina, his "moſt bitter enemy, relate that he died of an apo"plectick fit. But du Pleſſis quotes Peucer for his "voucher, the greateſt liar in the world: ſo that "whoever thinks that he deſerves the leaſt credit, "does not know how unfaithful an Hiſtorian he is, "and how unworthy he is to be believed, even by "the Sectaries themſelves, eſpecially by the Lutheran "Ubiquitarians, who condemned him for his crimes "to a ten years impriſonment; during which time, "the Devil acquainted him, perhaps, with that ſto"ry concerning Paul II." Here follows Coeffeteau's anſwer, as to this particular. "Du Pleſſis quotes in "the margin Peucer (13), a notorious Heretick, "ſon-in-law to Melanchton, from whom one cannot "expect any true account of the Popes (14)."

(10) Peucer, Chronicorum, lib. 5. p. m. 895.

(11) Du Pleſſis Mornai.

(12) Gretſer, in Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 530.

(13) It ſhould have been obſerved, that du Pleſſis ought to have written Peucer, and not Peucher.

(14) Coeffet. Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniq. p. 1178.

[D] . . . . that he abandoned himſelf to Sodomy and Magic.] The chapter, in which Mr. du Pleſſis-Mornai ſpeaks of this Pope, ends thus. But what is worſe ſtill, there is an Author who charges him with Magic and Sodomy (15). He does not ſay who that Author is, and by that ſilence, he expoſed himſelf to the moſt bitter reproaches. Gretſer challenges him to name that Author, and in the mean time, he charges him with forgery and calumny, which neither Platina, nor Bale himſelf, ſay a word of. Non vult Pleſſæus, homo religioſiſſimus, Paulum magiæ & præpoſteræ Libidinis accuſare; & tamen dum non vult, impudentiſſime accuſat. Ait, non deeſſe, qui illum horum criminum inſimulent. Quinam illi? Certè non Platina, qui odio Pauli talia flagitia vix latere ſuiſſet. Non ipſe calumniatorum primipilus Balæus. Quare nulla injuria Pleſſæum gravabis, licet ex ipſius officina deteſtabile hoc commentum proceſſiſſe credas; donec unde acceperit auctorem edat, quem ſi ediderit, Pleſſæo tam ſimilem conſpicies, quàm ovum ovo, & lac lacti (16), i. e. "Du Pleſſis, a "moſt religious man, will not accuſe Paul II. of ma"gic and ſodomy; and yet, whilſt he would ſeem "to ſcruple it, he does it all along moſt impudent"ly. There are not wanting thoſe, ſays he, who charge "him with theſe crimes. Who are thoſe? Certainly, "not Platina, who was too much exaſperated againſt "Paul II. to ſuffer ſuch odious crimes to be buried in "oblivion. Not Bale himſelf, the moſt notorious "ſlanderer in the world. You will not therefore "do du Pleſſis the leaſt injury, if you ſuppoſe him "the contriver of that abominable ſtory, till he "names the Author from whom he borrowed it; and if "ſhould name him, you will find him of the ſame "character with himſelf." One may be ſurpriſed that Monſieur de Mornai ſcrupled to quote Peucer for that particular, ſince he had cited him juſt before for a particular which is not leſs infamous. For Peucer relates, as we have ſeen above (17), both the abominations mentioned in the text of this remark. Gretſer did not know this.

(15) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniq. p. 544.

(16) Gretſer, in Examine Myſterii Pleſſæani, p. 536.

(17) In the rem. [C].

I ſhall obſerve by the by, that if Peucer had quoted ſome Author of the 15th century, he would have avoided the reproach he is liable to, of giving no other proof, but an uncertain tradition, far remote from its firſt origin. He wrote an hundred years after Pope Paul's death; a time long enough to alter ſuch traditions, as were not fixed at firſt by being ſet down in ſome writings (18). There is another obſervation to be made, which is, that we ought to miſtruſt a diſhonourable tradition much more, than a tradition which contains an elogy, when the queſtion is about perſons, who by their cruel extortions, drew the publick hatred upon themſelves. There was no ſtory, but the people believed in France, when it was diſgraceful to Cardinal Richelieu, or to Cardinal Mazarin. If a ſervant turned out of doors for very good reaſons, or a family moſt juſtly puniſhed, did but ſlander their Eminences, and invent whatever ſtory they pleaſed, it was immediately ſwallowed with the greateſt pleaſure imaginable, and ſoon ſpread abroad. Would it become a wiſe Hiſtorian to make a collection of ſuch reports? A contemporary writer might do it without blame, becauſe it would be poſſible for him to make all the neceſſary inquiries in order

(18) See the Reponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, Tom. 1. p. 31.

it in the very words of a writer of Port-Royal [E]. Paul II. died of an apoplectick fit [F], July 28th, 1471 (e). It was he who ordered that the Jubilee ſhould for the future be order to find out the truth. But after three or four generations it is almoſt impoſſible to diſcover the grounds of thoſe uncertain and vulgar reports, which no Hiſtorian thought worthy to be mentioned. It is proper to remember here, that Paul II. was haughty and ſevere, that he was greedy of gain, &c. (19). Let us conclude, that Peucer was abſolutely obliged to quote ſome Author, and not only fame in general.

(e) Platina, in Paulo II. Others ſay the 25th.

(19) Moroſus erat & difficilis tum domeſticis tum externis; & ſæpe quod promiſerat mutata ſententia invertebat.... Durus interdum & inexorabilis, ſi quid ab eo peteres habebatur, neque hoc contentus convitia & proba in te conjiciebat. Platina, in Paulo II. in fine. i. e. " He was peeviſh and moroſe, both with his own ſervants, and with ſtrangers, and he often came back from his word.... He was ſometimes ſevere and inexorable, when you asked him any thing, and not content with refuſing you, he would alſo give you opprobrious language."

[E] I ſhall relate a moſt notorious injuſtice of Paul II. in the very words of a writer of Port-Royal.] " It is a cuſtom with the Cardinals, when they are " meet together for the election of a Pope, to make " among themſelves ſome laws, which they think " uſeful for the Church, and to bind themſelves by " an oath to keep them in caſe they ſhould be raiſed " to the papal dignity. This cuſtom was followed " before the election of Pope Paul II. it was agreed " amongſt other things, never to put in any bull or " in any decree, that ſome order was made by the " advice of the Cardinals, unleſs it had been really " ſubmitted to their examination, and they had " given their conſent to it: Nil in diplomatibu factum " dicere ex fratrum conſilio, quod ad verum conſulentibus " iis decretum non eſſet, ſays Cardinal James of Pavia, " Comment. II. (20). Nothing was more reaſonable " than that reſolution, ſince it was only obliging " themſelves not to lie. And accordingly, Peter, " Cardinal of St. Mark, a Venetian being choſen " Pope in that conclave, and taking upon him the " name of Paul II. confirmed when he was Pope, " what he had ſworn to when but a Cardinal; add- " ing that he would have obſerved thoſe orders, " though he had not been obliged to it by a vow and by " a ſolemn oath. And yet as men are naturally inclined " to free themſelves of all ſorts of ties, and to look " upon the laws as a troubleſome reſtraint, from " which it is proper to be delivered, this Pope did " ſoon hearken to ſome ambitious and flattering Pre- " lates, who repreſented to him that he was not " bound to ſubmit to thoſe regulations, which li- " mited the Papal power, which ought not to be li- " mited by any laws: ſo that he was ſo far from " keeping what he had ſworn to, that he would even " oblige the Cardinals to ſign bulls and decrees, " without giving them the leaſt knowledge of what " they contained. Such proceedings ſeemed very hard " and odious to the ſacred College, which was fully " perſuaded that the Pope could not refuſe to keep " a promiſe which was ſo ſolemn and juſt: their incli- " nation and opinion therefore was, that they muſt ab- " ſolutely refuſe to ſign what the Pope required of " them. But it appeared very plainly on that occa- " ſion, that the courage neceſſary to reſiſt ſo power- " ful a Sovereign, who has ſo many means to hurt, " is not a very common virtue; and that as there is " nothing ſo eaſy and ſo common as that obedience " which is paid to all the orders of a Sovereign, " whatever they be, ſo there is nothing more difficult " and more ſcarce than that holy diſobedience which " makes men reſiſt their ſuperiors in things unjuſt or " unreaſonable. The Cardinals, ſays James of Pa- " via, were forced, partly by fair words, and partly by " threatnings, to ſign briefs which they never read; and " Pope Paul's tyranny was ſuch, that Cardinal Beſſarion " running away from his chamber, that he might not be " obliged to ſign a decree he had not ſeen, the Pope ſtopt " him with his own hand, and threatned to excommu- " nicate him, if he did not ſign it, which he did at " laſt, not having courage enough to reſiſt ſo powerful " a Sovereign, though in an action moſt evidently " unjuſt. Thoſe Cardinals, who had more honour " and conſcience, made a little more reſiſtance a- " gainſt the Pope's commands: and the Cardinal of " Pavia, who had a great deal of honour, did not " only refuſe at firſt to obey, but he even wrote a " very ſevere letter to the Pope, in which he repre- " ſented to him very freely the obligation he was " under to keep the oath he had made, and how un- " juſt thoſe ſubſcriptions were, which he required of " them. But at laſt he was daunted like the reſt, " and carried away with the ſtream of baſeneſs. " There was but one perſon in the whole ſacred Col- " lege, namely Cardinal Carvial (21), who had cou- " rage enough to reſiſt to the laſt, and to be conſtant " in his refuſal to ſign thoſe decrees. This is what " Cardinal James of Pavia repreſents himſelf, con- " feſſing his own weakneſs, with great humility, " and extolling on the contrary the Chriſtian gene- " roſity of Cardinal Carvial, a Spaniard. We have " all ſubſcribed, ſays he in his 182d Letter; partly " through the deſire of obtaining what we wiſh for, " and partly through the fear of being continually expoſed " to the dreadful effects of his Holineſs's indignation. It " is true we have been cowards, and too much ſwayed " by our own private intereſt; we have had no regard " for the glory of God, but only for the fleſh, and for a " worldly happineſs. However, none of us approved " the Pope's proceedings; but Cardinal John Carvial, " a very old man, and eminent by his merit, is the only " perſon who on this occaſion gained the reputation of a " man of courage. He declined conſenting to that ſhame- " ful action, nor could he be brought back from his reſo- " lution by all the moſt artful ſolicitations of the Pope, " who endeavoured to win him: to all the entreaties " that were made him, he anſwered, that it was not to " be expected that he would forſake juſtice in his old age, " which he had never forſaken in his youth. I ſhall not " create you any trouble, ſaid he to the Pope, about thoſe " laws, but ſuffer me to have a regard for my conſcience, " and for my reputation. Which makes the Cardinal " of Pavia, conclude that this worthy man deſerved " not only to ſit among them as Cardinal, but even " to preſide over them as a Pope. VIR profecto dignus, " non qui nobiſcum ſedeat, ſed qui præſideat ad conſilium " Sedis Romanæ (22)."

(20) Theſe words are to be met with in the 2d book of Jacobi Cardinalis Papienſis Commentarii, p. 37, of the Francfort edit. 1614.

(21) It ſhould be Carvagral.

(22) Les Imaginaires, Lettre 9. p. 180, &c. edit. of Cologne 1683, in 8vo. Obſerve that the anonymous Writer, (I imagine it was F. Queſnel) who in the year 1704, publiſhed a book, intitled, Avis ſinceres aux Catholiques des Provinces Unies ſur le Decret de l'Inquiſition de Rome contre Monſ. l'Archeveſque de Sebaſte Vicaire Apoſtolique, quoted this long paſſage from the Imaginaires, p. 95, &c.

I wonder that ſuch a particular ſhould have eſcaped the notice of ſo many Proteſtant Authors, who have made collections of the wicked actions of the Popes.

[F] Paul II. died of an apoplectick fit.] The Authors of the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, who complain of the Proteſtants about the cauſe they aſcribe his death to, do not relate it accurately; for they ſuppoſe that the Proteſtants aſſert he was ſtrangled by a man, who found him in bed with his wife. Now we have ſeen above (23), that they charge the Devil with that execution. The truth of the matter is that no man ſaw him die (24). Platina thinks that he died of an apoplectick fit occaſioned by his eating two large melons. Bibaciſſimus quidem erat: ſed vina admodum parva & diluta bibebat. Peponum eſu, cancrorum, paſtillorum, piſcium, ſuccidiæ admodum delectabatur, quibus ex rebus ortam crediderim apoplexiam illam, qua è vita ſublatus eſt, nam duos pepones & quidem prægrandes comederat eo die quo ſequenti nocte mortuus eſt (25), i. e. " He was a great drinker, but he drank only " weak wines, and even mixed with water. He " liked very much to eat melons, crab-fiſhes, paſtils, " fiſh, and dainties, which in my opinion occaſioned " the apoplectick fit of which he died: for the day " before his death he eat two pretty large melons." This Hiſtorian ſays in another place, that he thinks this Pope's apoplexy was occaſioned by the heavineſs of the jewels, with which he delighted to load his head. Qui (Leo IV. Imperator) adeo gemmis delectatus eſt, ut direpto ſacrario S. Sophiæ coronam magni ponderis ac precii ſibi conſtituerit, qua quidem ita frequenter utebatur, ut aut propter, pondus, aut ob frigiditatem lapillorum ſubito morbo correptus ſit. Idem quoque accidiſſe noſtra ætate Paulo II. putaverim, quod adeo his muliebribus delinimentis delectatus eſt, conquiſitis undique magno precio gemmis, & exhauſto pene Eccleſiæ Romanæ ærario, ut quotieſcunque in publicum prodiret, Cybelle quædam Phrygia ac turrita, non mitrata videretur. Hinc ego ortam tum ſudore præpinguis corporis, tum gemmarum pondere apoplexiam illam puto, qua correptus ſubito morbo interiit (26), i. e. " The Emperor Leo IV. took ſo " great a pleaſure in jewels, that he plundered the " Veſtry-room of St. Sophia, and cauſed a very rich " Crown to be made, which he wore ſo often, that " either the weight or the coldneſs of the precious " ſtones threw him ſuddenly into a diſtemper. I am " apt to think that the ſame happened in our time to " Pope Paul II. who took ſo great a delight in thoſe " womaniſh ornaments, that having got jewels at a

(23) In the rem. [C].

(24) Apoplexia ſolus in cubiculo nemine vidente, ſecunda noctis hora moritur. Genebr. Chron. lib. 4. p. m. 701, and Carranza, in Summa Concilior. p. m. 879.

(25) Platina, in Paulo II. folio 362 verſo.

(26) Idem, in Adriano I. folio 125 verſo.

(f) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniq. p. 543.

be celebrated every 25 years, being in hopes to have the pleaſure of ſeeing that fair in the year 1475 (f).

" great price from all places, and almoſt exhauſted " the treaſury of the Church of Rome, he might, " whenever he appeared in publick, be like a Phry- " gian Cybele, with a Turret on his head inſtead of " a Mitre. I imagine that either his ſweating too " much, for he was very fat, or the weight of the " jewels occaſioned the apoplectick fit, of which he " died ſuddenly."

PAUL (FATHER), a Servite Monk, and Theologue to the Republick of Venice. See SARPI (α).

(α) Mr. Bayle refers us to the word Sarpi for the article of Father Paul; but he could not keep his word for a reaſon which he mentions in the text of the article Peireſc. REM. CRIT.

PAULICIANS. Thus the Manicheans were called in Armenia, when a certain Paul headed them in the 7th Century. " They became ſo powerful * either through the " weakneſs of the Government, or by the protection of the Saracens, and even by the " Emperor Nicephorus's favour, who was very zealous for that Sect, that at laſt, being " perſecuted by the Empreſs Theodora, conſort to Baſilius †, they were in a condition " to build cities, and to riſe in arms againſt their Princes. Theſe wars continued a long " time, and were very bloody under the reign of Baſilius the Macedonian, that is to " ſay, towards the end of the ninth Century (a)." And yet they had made ſo great a ſlaughter of theſe Hereticks under the Empreſs Theodora [A], that one would have thought they would never have been able to retrieve their loſs. It is preſumed, that the Preachers, whom they ſent into Bulgaria [B], eſtabliſhed the Manichean Hereſy in that country, from which it ſpread ſoon after into the other parts of Europe. They condemned the worſhipping of the Saints, and the images of the Croſs [C]. But this was not their chief Characteriſtick. Their fundamental Doctrine was that of two coeternal Principles, independent on each other. Such a Doctrine immediately ſtrikes one with horror, ſo that it is ſtrange that the Manichean Sect could ſeduce ſo many people [D]. But on

* Cedrenus, Tom. 2. p. 480.

† Ibid. p. 541.

(a) Mr. de Meaux, Hiſt. des Variations, Liv. 9. num. 13. p. m. 128.

[A] They had made ſo great a ſlaughter of theſe Hereticks under the Empreſs Theodora.] This is mentioned in the ſupplement to Moreri's Dictionary (1), where Father Maimbourg is quoted, whoſe words are as follow. " Theodora . . . reſolved to procure ef- " fectually the converſion of theſe Paulicians, or to rid " the Empire of them, if they ſhould obſtinately op- " poſe their real happineſs. . . . It is true, that thoſe " to whom ſhe gave the commiſſion, and ſufficient " forces to perform that deſign, acted with too much " ſeverity, and too great a cruelty, for inſtead of en- " deavouring at firſt to bring them back gently, and " with charity, to the knowledge of the truth, " they ſeized thoſe unfortunate wretches who were " diſperſed in the cities and towns, and it is ſaid, " they put about an hundred thouſand of them to " death throughout Aſia, by all manner of torments; " which obliged all the reſt to ſurrender, and ſubmit " to the Saracens, who knew very well how to em- " ploy them ſome time after againſt the Greeks. " But the Empreſs, who was not concerned in the " inhuman conduct of her Lieutenants, reaped, how- " ever, this advantage from it, that the Empire was " free from thoſe vermin during her reign, which " laſted fourteen years (2)." This method of converting people is entirely Mahometan, and confirms what has been obſerved in another place (3), that the Chriſtians have been infinitely more cruel than the followers of Mahomet, againſt thoſe who were not of their religion.

(1) Under the word Paulicians.

(2) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, lib. 6. p. 263, Dutch edit. under the year 845.

(3) In the article MAHOMET, remarks [O] and [AA].

[B] The Preachers whom they ſent into Bulgaria.] Peter (4) of Sicily, whom the Emperor Baſilius the Macedonian ſent to Tibricum in Armenia, one of the towns belonging to theſe Hereticks, to negotiate an exchange of priſoners . . . (5), diſcovered, during the time of his Embaſſy, that it had been reſolved in the Council of the Paulicians, to ſend Preachers of their Sect into Bulgaria, to ſeduce the people there, who had been lately converted to the Chriſtian Religion. Thrace, which is near that country, had been a long time before infected with that hereſy. So that there was but too much reaſon to fear for the Bulgarians, in caſe the Paulicians, the moſt artful of all the Manicheans, attempted to ſeduce them: this obliged Peter of Sicily to direct to their Archbiſhop the book we have mentioned juſt now (6), in order to ſtrengthen them againſt the attacks of ſuch dangerous Hereticks. But notwithſtanding all his cares, it is certain that the Manichean hereſy took very deep root in Bulgaria.

(4) Monſieur de Meaux, Hiſt. des Variations, Liv. 11. num. 14

(5) Ibidem, num. 16.

(6) It is a book intitled, Hiſtoria de Manichæis, (an hiſtorical account of the Manicheans.) Raderus tranſlated it out of Greek into Latin, and publiſhed it at Ingolſtat with notes, in the year 1604, in 4to.

[C] They condemned the worſhip of the Saints, and the Images of the Croſs.] Peter of Sicily relates, " that a " Manichean woman ſeduced an ignorant Lay-man " named Sergius, by telling him that the Catholics " worſhipped the Saints as ſo many Deities, and that " this was the reaſon why the Laity were not ſuffer- " ed to read the Scripture, leſt they ſhould find out " ſeveral other errors of the ſame kind (7)." See what is quoted from Father Maimbourg, in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(7) Hiſt. des Variations, Liv. 11. num. 15.

[D] It is ſtrange that the Manichean Sect could ſeduce ſo many people.] We have obſerved in another place (8), with how much zeal Pope Leo warned all the Biſhops, not to ſuffer that theſe Hereticks, who were ſentenced to baniſhment by the laws of the Empire, ſhould find any retreat or ſanctuary. And yet this hereſy kept its ground, ſo that it was neceſſary to make much more ſevere laws againſt it, and to condemn the profeſſors of it to death. However, it continued to ſubſiſt, and even ſpread farther. The Emperor Anaſtaſius, and the Empreſs Theodora, Juſtinian's Conſort, favoured it; and we meet with the followers of it in Armenia, even under Heraclius's children, that is to ſay, in the ſeventh century (9). We have already mentioned the great progreſs that hereſy made there; we have ſeen that the maſſacre of an hundred thouſand Paulicians could not prevent the propagating of that hereſy from Thrace into Bulgaria. Several perſons were afterwards infected with it in many provinces of France. Conſult Monſieur de Meaux (10). Lambert Daneau obſerves, that it prevailed very much in Perſia, Syria, and Meſopotamia, under the Emperor Anaſtaſius, and in Sicily under Pope Gregory the Great. Romam ipſam occupavit hæc hæreſis, unde tamen expulſa eſt a Leone Pontifice Romano circa annum a Chriſto paſſo 414. In Arabia tamen, Perſide & Ægypto maxime viguit potuitque, unde poſtea Mahumatiſmus tanquam ex ſerpentis, viperæque ovo enatus & excluſus. Diutiſſime etiam ſubſtitit; nam & Anaſtaſii Imperatoris temporibus adhuc in Perſide, Meſopotamia, & Syria graſſabatur aperte: & Gregorii Magni Pontificatu in Sicilia, id eſt, annos poſt Manetem mortuum plus quam 340 ut apparet ex Gregorii Epiſt. 6 lib. 4. & P. Diaconi lib. 15. Hiſtoria, ubi Indaganam eorum Epiſcopum commemorat (11), i. e. " That hereſy " got

(8) In the art. MANICHEANS, rem. [E].

(9) Hiſt. des Variat. Liv. 11. num. 13.

(10) Hiſt. des Variat. Liv. 11.

(11) Lambert. Dan. Not. in Auguſtin. de Hæreſib. cap. 46. folio m. 119 verſo.

on the other hand, it is ſo difficult to anſwer all the objections concerning the origin of Evil [E], that we ought not to wonder the Hypotheſis of two Principles, the one good, the

" got alſo ground at Rome, whence it was however " driven, by Pope Leo, about the year 414. But it " flouriſhed and ſpread very much in Arabia, Perſia " and Egypt; and from that hereſy ſprung after- " terwards Mohamediſm, as from a ſerpent's and a " viper's egg. The Manichean hereſy continued a " great while; for it raged ſtill publickly in Perſia, " Meſopotamia and Syria, under the reign of the " Emperor Anaſtaſius, and in Sicily, under Pope Gre- " gory the Great; that is to ſay, above 340 years " after the death of Manes, as appears from the 6th " epiſtle of the 4th book of Gregory's letters, and " from the 15th book of Paul the Deacon's hiſtory, " where he mentions Indagana, a Manichean " Biſhop." I dare not aſſert, that this hereſy ſpread into the provinces of the Eaſt, where we find ſome nations who hold the doctrine of two principles: they might have received it ſome other way, than from the Manicheans. I am very much of Lewis Thomaſſin's opinion. The accounts which are often given us of Aſia, ſays he (12), ſhew that there are ſtill, in that part of the world, ſome Manicheans beyond the borders of the antient Roman Empire. I cannot aſſert very poſitively that they are the remains, or the poſterity of thoſe, who being often baniſhed from the whole Roman Empire, retired into the neighbouring provinces. There is ſome probability in this, but not the ſame certainty, as when we ſay the ſame of the Arians, the Neſtorians, and the Eutychians. Theſe are really Hereticks, who would have no other Origin, but from the Catholick Church of their time, whoſe bowels they rent to get out of it. But the Manicheans came originally from the Eaſt, being derived from the antient Idolaters, who admitted alſo two firſt principles, the one the Author of good, the other of evil, as we read in Plutarch, and in ſeveral other heathen Hiſtorians.

(12) Thomaſſin, de l'Unite de l'Egliſe, Tom. 1. part 2. cap. 9. p. 378.

[E] It is ſo difficult to anſwer the objections of the Manicheans concerning the origin of evil.] I have prepared my Readers (13) to find here three obſervations, which I would have inſerted in the article of the Manicheans, had it not been that I was afraid of making that article run to too great a length. Let us acquit ourſelves of our promiſe, and not diſappoint thoſe who may be willing to conſult our Reference. I ſhall put hereunder, (14) by themſelves, the ſecond and third obſervations. But here follows the firſt.

(13) In the art. MANICHEANS, quotation (61).

(14) In the rem. [G] and [H].

The Fathers of the Church, who have ſo well refuted the Marcionites, the Manicheans, and generally all thoſe who admitted two principles, have but indifferently ſolved the objections, which relate to the origin of evil. They ought to have given up all the arguments a priori, as weak out-ſides, open to every attack, and which cannot be defended: they ſhould have kept to the arguments a poſteriori, and put their whole ſtrength behind that entrenchment. The Old and New Teſtament are two parts of a Revelation, which confirm each other: ſince therefore the Manicheans admitted the Divinity of the New, it was no difficult taſk to prove to them the Divinity of the old, which being done, it was an eaſy matter to ruin all their objections, by ſhewing that they were inconſiſtent with a matter of fact. There is, according to the Scriptures, but one principle, and that a good one, and yet moral and natural evil crept in amongſt mankind; it is not therefore inconſiſtent with the nature of the good principle, to ſuffer the introduction of moral evil, and to puniſh ſin: for it is not more plain that 4 and 4 make 8, than it is plain, that if a thing happened, it is poſſible. Ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia, is one of the moſt clear and unqueſtionable axioms of Metaphyſicks (15). This is an impregnable bulwark, and ſufficient to make the cauſe of the Orthodox triumph, though their arguments a priori could be refuted. But can they be refuted, will ſome aſk? I anſwer, yes: It is not only unaccountable, but even inconceivable, how evil could creep into the world, under the government of a ſovereign Being, infinitely good, infinitely holy, and infinitely powerful; and all that is objected againſt the arguments urged to account for that Being's permitting evil is more agreeable to right reaſon, and to our notions of order, than thoſe very arguments are. Do but well examine the following paſſage from Lactantius; it contains an anſwer to an objection of Epicurus. Deus, inquit Epicurus, aut vult tollere mala, & non poteſt; aut poteſt, & non vult; aut neque vult, neque poteſt, aut & vult & poteſt. Si vult, & non poteſt, imbecillis eſt; quod in Deum non cadit. Si poteſt, & non vult, invidus; quod æque alienum à Deo. Si neque vult neque poteſt, & invidus & imbecillis eſt; ideoque neque Deus. Si vult & poteſt, quod ſolum Deo convenit, unde ergo ſunt mala? aut cur illa non tollit? Scio pleroſque Philoſophorum, qui providentiam defendunt, hoc argumento perturbari ſolere, & invitos pene adigi, ut Deum nihil curare fateantur, quod maxime quærit Epicurus. Sed nos ratione perſpecta, formidoloſum hoc argumentum facile diſſolvimus. Deus enim poteſt quicquid velit; & imbecillitas, vel invidia, in Deo nulla eſt: poteſt igitur mala tollere, ſed non vult; nec ideo tamen invidus eſt. Idcirco enim non tollit, quia & ſapientiam (ſicut docui) ſimul tribuit, & plus boni, ac jucunditatis in ſapientia, quam in malis moleſtiæ. Sapientia etiam facit, ut etiam Deum cognoſcamus, & per eam cognitionem immortalitatem aſſequamur; quod eſt ſummum bonum. Itaque niſi prius malum agnoverimus, nec bonum poterimus agnoſcere. Sed hoc non vidit Epicurus, nec alius quiſquam; ſi tollantur mala, tolli pariter ſapientiam; nec ulla in homine virtutis remanere veſtigia; cujus ratio ſuſtinenda & ſuperanda malorum acerbitate conſiſtit. Itaque propter exiguum compendium ſublatorum malorum maximo, & vero, & proprio nobis bono careremus. Conſtat igitur, omnia propter hominum propoſita, tam mala, quam etiam bona (16), i. e. " God, ſays Epicurus, either " would remove evil, and cannot, or he can, and will " not, or he neither will nor can, or he both will " and can. If he would but cannot, he wants power " and is weak, which is inconſiſtent with the nature " of God; if he can but will not, he is malicious, " which is equally unbecoming him. If he nei- " ther will nor can, he is both malicious and weak, " and therefore no God. If he both will and can, " which alone becomes his nature, whence comes " evil? Or why does he not remove it? I am ſenſi- " ble, that ſeveral Philoſophers, who maintain a " Providence, have been perplexed by that argu- " ment, and almoſt forced by it to acknowledge, " though againſt their will, that God does not mind " the things of this world, which is what Epicurus " chiefly aims at. But we, having fully examined " the whole matter, eaſily ſolve that mighty ar- " gument. God can do whatever he wills, there is " neither weakneſs nor malice in him. He can there- " fore remove evils, but he wills not: and yet he " is not malicious: for he does not remove it, be- " cauſe, (as I have ſhewed before) he has endowed " us alſo with wiſdom; and there is more good, " more ſweetneſs in wiſdom, than there is uneaſineſs " and trouble in evil. It is alſo owing to wiſdom, " that we know God, and by that knowledge, ob- " tain everlaſting life, which is the ſupreme good, " and chief happineſs. If therefore we had not firſt " known evil, we could not have known good. But " neither Epicurus, nor any other man, obſerved, " that if you remove evil, you remove alſo wiſdom " at the ſame time, nor will there remain the leaſt " footſtep of virtue in men, which conſiſts in ſuffer- " ing with conſtancy, and even conquering the great- " eſt evils. So that for the ſmall comfort of being " free from evil, we ſhould be deprived of the great- " eſt and true good, which is the moſt proper for " us. It is therefore certain, that all, both good " and evil, is deſigned for man's happineſs."

(15) See above the article MANICHEANS, remark [D], quotation (59).

(16) Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. 13. p. m. 548.

It was impoſſible to ſtate the objection more fairly; Epicurus himſelf could not have propoſed with more clearneſs, nor with more ſtrength. See the margin (17) But Lactantius's anſwer is a moſt wretched one; it is not only weak, but it even abounds with errors, and perhaps alſo with hereſies. It ſuppoſes that God was under a neceſſity to produce evil, becauſe he could not otherwiſe have given us either wiſdom, or virtue, or a ſenſe of good. Can there be any thing more monſtrous than ſuch a doctrine? Does it not overthrow all that the Divines teach us of the happineſs of Paradiſe, and of the ſtate of innocence. They

(17) Obſerve, that this objection of Epicurus, does not relate to moral evil. It would be much more perplexing, if it related to it.

the other bad, ſeduced ſeveral antient Philoſophers, and got ſo many followers amongſt the Chriſtians, whoſe Doctrine of the profeſſed hatred of the Devils againſt the true God tell us that Adam and Eve enjoyed, without the leaſt mixture of evil, all the pleaſures, which the garden of Eden could afford them, a moſt charming and delicious place, which God had given them to live in. The Divines add, that if our firſt parents had not ſinned, they and all their poſterity would have enjoyed that happineſs, without being ſubject to diſtempers, or to vexations, and that neither the elements nor the beaſts would ever have done them the leaſt injury. It was their ſin that expoſed them to heat and cold, to hunger and thirſt; to pain and grief, and to the miſchief which ſome animals do us. It is therefore ſo far from being true, that virtue and wiſdom cannot belong to man, without natural evil, as Lactantius aſſerts, that on the contrary we muſt maintain, that a man is expoſed to evil, only becauſe he forſaketh virtue and wiſdom. If Lactantius's doctrine were true, it would follow unavoidably from thence, that the good Angels are expoſed to a thouſand inconveniences, and that the Souls of the Bleſſed paſs ſucceſſively from a ſtate of joy to a ſtate of ſadneſs. So that in the very place of bliſs, in the ſight of God himſelf, men would not be free from adverſities. Nothing is more inconſiſtent than this with the unanimous opinion of all the Divines, and with reaſon. It is even certain, that according to ſound philoſophy, it is by no means neceſſary that our Soul ſhould have felt evil, in order to have a ſenſe and taſte of good; or that it ſhould paſs ſucceſſively from pain to pleaſure, and from pleaſure to pain, in order to be capable to know that pain is an evil, and pleaſure a good. So that Lactantius's Doctrine claſhes both with right reaſon, and with Divinity. We know by our own experience, that our Soul cannot feel at once pleaſure and pain: it muſt therefore the firſt time feel either pain before pleaſure, or pleaſure before pain. If its firſt ſenſation was that of pleaſure, it found it an agreeable ſituation, though it had no notion of pain: and if its firſt ſenſation was that of pain, it found it a diſagreeable ſituation, though it had no notion of pleaſure. Suppoſe its firſt ſenſation continued ſeveral years following without any interruption, you will eaſily comprehend that the Soul muſt have found itſelf either in an agreeable or diſagreeable ſituation. Do not pretend to object that experience is againſt me: do not ſay, that a pleaſure which continues too long becomes inſipid, and that pain will at length become tolerable: for I ſhall anſwer that this is owing to an alteration in the organs, by which it happens, that though the continued ſenſation be ſtill the ſame as to its kind, yet it is not the ſame as to the degree of intenſity: if at firſt you have a ſenſation of ſix degrees, for inſtance, it will no longer be of ſix degrees at the end of two hours, or of a year, but only of one degree, or of one fourth part of a degree. Thus it is that cuſtom takes off the edge of our ſenſations: their degrees anſwer to the commotion of the parts of the brain; that commotion grows weaker and weaker by the frequent repetitions; whence the degrees of our ſenſations grow leſs. But if pleaſure or pain were communicated to us in the ſame degree for an hundred years following, we ſhould be as happy or as unhappy the hundredth year as we were the firſt day. Which proves evidently, that a creature can be happy by a continued good, or unhappy by a continued evil, and therefore that the alternative mentioned by Lactantius is but a poor ſolution: it is grounded neither on the nature of good and evil, nor on that of the ſubject which receives either, nor on that of the cauſe which beſtows it. Pleaſure and pain are not leſs proper to be communicated the ſecond moment than the firſt, nor the third moment than the ſecond, and ſo on. Our Soul is as ſuſceptible of them after it had taſted them one moment, as before it had any ſenſe of them: and God who beſtows them is not leſs capable to produce them the ſecond time than the firſt. This is what we find by the natural notions we have of theſe objects. The Chriſtian Theology confirms this moſt invincibly: for it teaches us that the torments of the damned will be eternal, uninterrupted, and as ſevere at the end of an hundred thouſand years as the firſt day; and that on the contrary, the pleaſures of Heaven will laſt for ever, without any interruption, and without loſing the leaſt degree of their livelineſs. I would be glad to know whether, if we were to make a very eaſy ſuppoſition, namely, two Suns, the one of which ſhould always riſe, when the other ſhould ſet, it would not follow from thence, that mankind would have no notion of darkneſs. But according to Lactantius's fine Philoſophy it would alſo follow from thence, that man would have no notion of light, that he would not know it is day-light, that he ſees the objects before him, &c. Conſult the margin (18).

(18) I ſhall quote hereunder, in the remark [G], a paſſage from Plutarch, which may be urged againſt Lactantius's anſwer.

What I have been obſerving, proves methinks unqueſtionably, that a man would not much puzzle our Paulicians, by repreſenting to them, that God mixed good with evil, only, becauſe he foreſaw, that good unmixed, would in a little time ſeem inſipid to us. They would anſwer, that this propriety is not contained in the idea we have of good, and that it is inconſiſtent with the common Doctrine concerning the happineſs of Heaven. And as for experience, by which we find but too much, 1. That the pleaſures of this life affect us more or leſs, according as they deliver us from a ſad condition: 2. That they are ſoon attended with a diſguſt, if they continue but a while; they would maintain that this phænomenon is unaccountable, unleſs we have recourſe to their hypotheſis of two principles. For if we depend, would they ſay, only on an almighty cauſe, infinitely good, infinitely free, which diſpoſes of all Beings in general, according to its will and pleaſure, we ought never to feel any evil, all the good things we enjoy muſt be without mixture, nor ought we ever to find the leaſt diſguſt in them. If the Author of our Being is infinitely beneficent, he ought to take a continual delight in making us happy, and in preventing all that could interrupt or leſſen our pleaſures. This is a propriety eſſentially contained in the idea of the ſupreme goodneſs. The fibres of our brains cannot be the cauſe why God ſhould take off the edge of our pleaſures; for according to you, he is the only Creator of matter, he is Almighty; nothing can prevent him from acting according to the full extent of his infinite Goodneſs. It is in his power to make our pleaſures independent on the fibres of our brains; or if he will make them depend on thoſe fibres, he can continue them eternally in the ſame condition: it is in his power to prevent their being worn out, or to cauſe the damage they receive to be immediately repaired. You cannot then account for what we experience, but by the hypotheſis of two principles: if we enjoy any pleaſure, it is the good principle which beſtows it upon us: but if we do not enjoy it without ſome allay, if we are ſoon diſguſted of it, it is becauſe the bad principle thwarts the good one: the latter is ſoon even with the former; he cauſes pain to become leſs troubleſome through cuſtom, and makes us find ſome relief in the greateſt misfortunes. This, together with the good uſe men often make of adverſity, and the bad uſe they often make of happineſs, can be admirably well accounted for in the Manichean Syſtem. They are facts which lead us to ſuppoſe, that the two principles have made an agreement together, by which their reſpective operations are limited within certain bounds (19). The good principle cannot do all the good he could wiſh; but in order to do us a great deal of good, he was obliged to conſent, that the bad principle ſhould do us as much miſchief: for without ſuch a conſent, the Chaos had always continued a Chaos, and no creature had ever enjoyed any happineſs. So that the good principle finding a better method to ſatisfy his inclination, by ſuffering the world to be ſometimes happy, and ſometimes miſerable, than by ſeeing it never happy, made an agreement, from which ſprung the mixture of good and evil, which we obſerve among men. If you ſuppoſe your principle almighty, and give him the glory of enjoying eternity alone, you deprive him of that attribute, which goes before all the reſt; for the optimus (beſt) always proceeds the maximus

WHY cuſtom takes off the edge of our ſenſations.

(19) In the 1ſt a-linea or break of the remark [I], we give an explication, which ſuppoſes no agreement at all.

God is attended with the Doctrine of the rebellion and fall of ſome of the good Angels. The Hypotheſis of two Principles would probably have made a greater progreſs ſtill, had maximus, (greateſt), in the ſtyle of the moſt learned nations, when they ſpeak of God: you ſuppoſe that though nothing hinders him from loading his creatures with bleſſings, yet he loads them with miſery, and if he raiſes ſome on high, it is only that their fall may be the heavier (20). We clear him from all this, and without calling his goodneſs into queſtion, we explain all that can be ſaid of fortune's inconſtancy, of Nemeſis's jealouſy, and of that continual play, which Æſop makes to be God's employment. He abaſes the high, ſaid Æſop, and exalts the low (21). He could not, ſay we, get better terms for his adverſary: he has extended his goodneſs as far as he could, and if he does not do us more good, it is becauſe it is not in his power; ſo that we have no reaſon to complain.

(20) Tolluntur in altum ut lapſu graviore ruant. Claudian. in Rufinum, lib. 1. circa init.

(21) See the article ÆSOP, remark [I].

Who would not wonder at, and lament the ſad fate of our reaſon? Here you ſee the Manicheans, who with an Hypotheſis entirely abſurd and inconſiſtent, account for matters of fact an hundred times better than the orthodox do with the moſt juſt, neceſſary and only true ſyſtem of a firſt principle who is Almighty and infinitely good.

Let us ſhew by another inſtance how little ſucceſs the Fathers had in their controverſy with theſe Hereticks concerning the origin of evil. Here follows a paſſage from St. Baſil. At neque à Deo ipſum malum profluxiſſe pium eſt dicere: propterea quod nihil contrariorum à contrario ſuo gignitur——at ſi nec ingenitum, inquies, ipſum malum nec à Deo profluxit, unde naturam ſortitur? Nam mala eſſe nemo particeps vitæ contradixerit. Quid igitur eſt dicendum: nempe malum non eſſentiam viventem animaque præditum eſſe, ſed affectionem animæ virtuti contrariam, deſidioſis ac inertibus, propterea quòd à bono deciderunt, inditam. Noli itaque malum forinſecus circumſpicere, atque inquirere, neque quandam naturam principem malignitatis imaginare, ſed malitiæ quiſque ſuæ ſeipſum Autorem agnoſcat. Nam ſemper ea, quæ nobis eveniunt, partim è natura proficiſcuntur, ut ſenectus, ut infirmitas: partim ſuâ ſponte proveniunt, quales ſunt caſus inopini alienis principiis accidentes——partim verò in nobis ipſis ſunt collocata, ut cupiditates ſpernere, aut voluptatibus modum non ponere, continere iram, aut manus injicere in eum qui injuriâ laceſſivit, vera dicere aut falſa, manſuetum moribus eſſe ac moderatum, aut faſtu ſuperbum arrogantiaque elatum. Quorum itaque tute Dominus es, horum principia non aliunde quærere velis, ſed quod propriè malum eſt——id ab ultronea & voluntaria electione ſumpſiſſe principium ſcito, &c. (22), i. e. "Religion requires us to maintain "that evil did not come from God, ſince nothing "can produce its contrary——But you will ſay, if "evil be uncreated, and did not come from God, "whence does it come? For no man living can "deny there are evils in the world. What muſt "we ſay then? We muſt ſay, that evil is not a living "ſubſtance, and has no Soul. But that it is only an "affection of the mind contrary to virtue, under "which the ſlothful and negligent are made to la"bour, becauſe they fell from good. Do not there"fore conſider and examine evil as though it were "without you; do not imagine there is a certain na"ture, who is the cauſe and principle of evil; but "let every one acknowledge himſelf the Author of "his own wickedneſs: for all the evils which hap"pen to us come partly from nature itſelf, as old "age, infirmities, &c. partly of themſelves, as "thoſe unexpected accidents, which are occaſioned "by foreign cauſes . . . . but thoſe evils are alſo "partly owing to ourſelves, as for inſtance, to curb "our appetites, or to ſet no bounds to our deſires; "to conquer anger, or to revenge an injury, to ſpeak "the truth, or to tell lies; to be mild and humble, "or haughty and proud. Do not therefore pretend "to look abroad for the cauſe of thoſe things, which "are owing to yourſelf, but know that whatever is "really evil, ariſes from a free and voluntary "choice." The German Divine (23), who quotes this paſſage, obſerves very juſtly, that this Father grants to the Marcionites more than he ſhould; for he will not even confeſs that God is the Author of natural evil, as diſtempers, and old age, and an hundred other accidents, which happen to us from without and unexpectedly. So that to ſolve a difficulty he admits errors, or perhaps even hereſies. But another defect of his anſwer is, that he imagines he will diſentangle himſelf, and juſtify providence, by barely ſuppoſing that the vices have their origin in men's Souls. How came he not to ſee that this was only evading the difficulty, or giving for a good ſolution the very thing in which the chief difficulty conſiſts? Zoroaſter, Plato, Plutarch, the Marcionites, the Manicheans, and in general all thoſe who admit a principle naturally good, and a principle naturally bad, both eternal, and independent, all theſe, I ſay, pretend that it is impoſſible to account otherwiſe for the origin of evil. You anſwer, it comes from man himſelf: but how can that be, ſince, according to you, man is created by a Being infinitely holy, and infinitely powerful? Muſt not the work of ſuch a Being be good? Can it be otherwiſe than good? Is it not more poſſible that darkneſs ſhould ariſe from light, than it is poſſible that the production of ſuch a principle ſhould be bad? Herein lies the ſtreſs of the difficulty. St. Baſil could not be ignorant of it. Why then does he anſwer only, that we ought to look for the cauſe of evil in man himſelf. But who put it there? Man, by the ill uſe he made of his Creator's grace, who being immenſely good had created him in a ſtate of innocence. If you anſwer this, you only beg the queſtion. You are arguing againſt a Manichean, who aſſerts, that two contrary Creators concurred in the production of man: and that man received from the good principle all that is good in him, and from the bad principle all that is bad in him: and you anſwer his objections by ſuppoſing that there is but one Creator of man, and an infinitely good one; is not this giving your own Theſis for an anſwer? It is plain, that St. Baſil argues wrong: but beſides, as this is a ſubject which puts philoſophy to a nonplus, he ought to have retired into his ſtrong hold, that is to ſay, he ſhould have proved by the word of God, that there is but one Creator of all things, who is infinite in goodneſs, and in all kind of perfections: that man came innocent and good from his hands, but loſt his innocence and goodneſs by his own fault (24). This is the origin of moral evil, and of natural evil. Let Marcian, and all the Manicheans argue as much as they pleaſe, in order to prove, that under the government of an infinitely good and holy Providence, the fall of innocent man could not happen, they will argue againſt a matter of fact, and conſequently expoſe themſelves to ridicule. I ſuppoſe always, that they are perſons, who may be brought by arguments ad hominem to acknowledge the divinity of the old Teſtament. For if we had to deal with a Zoroaſter, or with a Plutarch, it would alter the caſe.

(22) Baſilius Magnus Hexaem. Homil. 2. apud Tobiam Pfannerum Syſtem. Theologiæ Gentilis, cap. 9. p. m. 253.

(23) Tobias Pfannerus, ibid.

(24) See the art. MANICHEANS, between the quotations (58) and (59), and above, the remark [E] of this article, at the firſt a-linea or break.

Thus the Reader may ſee, it is not without reaſon I maintain, that we muſt object againſt thoſe Sectaries only this Maxim, ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia, and this little Enthymen, this happened, and therefore it is not repugnant to the holineſs and goodneſs of God. I obſerve, that it is impoſſible to engage the diſpute upon another footing, without ſome diſadvantage. The reaſons for the permiſſion of ſin, which are not borrowed from the myſteries revealed in Scripture, how good ſoever they may be otherways, yet have this defect (25), that they may be confuted by other reaſons more ſpecious ſtill, and more agreeable to the notions we have of order. For inſtance, if you aſſert, that God permitted ſin with a deſign to ſhew his wiſdom, which appears with more glory, amidſt the diſorders, which men's wickedneſs occaſions daily, than it would do in a ſtate of innocence you will be anſwered, that this is comparing God either with the father of a family, who ſhould ſuffer his children's legs to be broke, in order to ſhew what an able bone-ſetter he is; or with a King, who ſhould ſuffer diſorders and ſeditions to rage throughout his dominions, that he might gain a great reputation by ſuppreſſing them (26). The conduct of that Father and of that King is ſo inconſiſtent with the clear and diſtinct ideas, by which we are wont to judge

(25) Refer to this what a Father of the Church ſaid, Felix culpa quæ talem meruit habere redemptorem, i. e. "Happy "crime, which "deſerved to "have ſuch a "Redeemer."

(26) See in the article CALLISTRATUS, quotations (7) and (8) the words of Seneca.

had it been explained in a leſs groſs manner, and had it not been attended with ſeveral odious judge of goodneſs and wiſdom, and in general of all duties of a father and of a King, that our reaſon cannot comprehend how God could chooſe to act thus. But you will ſay, the Lord's ways are not our ways. Keep then to that; it is a text from the ſcripture (27), and do not pretend to argue any more (28). Do not pretend to tell us, that had it not been for the fall of the firſt man, God's juſtice and mercy had continued unknown; for you will be anſwered that nothing was more eaſy than to give man a notion of theſe two attributes. The bare idea of a Being infinitely perfect teaches even ſinful men that God is poſſeſſed of all the virtues, which become a nature infinite in every reſpect. How much more would it have taught the innocent man, that God is infinitely juſt? But, you will ſay, he would have puniſhed none: I anſwer, even this would have made his juſtice known: it had been a continual act, a perpetual exerciſe of that virtue: no man would have deſerved to be puniſhed; and conſequently the ſuppreſſion of all puniſhment had been a function of juſtice. Pray anſwer me? Here are two Princes, the one of whom ſuffers his ſubjects to fall into a wretched condition, that he may deliver them after they ſhall have ſuffered enough: the other keeps them conſtantly in a ſtate of proſperity. Is not the latter a better Prince, is he not even more merciful than the former? They who hold the immaculate conception of the bleſſed Virgin, prove to a demonſtration that God diſplayed his mercy and the benefit of Chriſt's redemption upon her much more than on the reſt of mankind. Nor need a man be a Metaphyſician to underſtand this: the moſt ignorant country fellow knows moſt diſtinctly, that there is much more goodneſs in preventing a man's falling into a ditch, than in ſuffering him to fall into it, to help him out of it an hour after (29); and that it is much better to prevent an Aſſaſſin from committing murder, than to have him broke upon the wheel for the murders he was ſuffered to commit (30). All this ſhould warn us, not to engage in a controverſy with the Manicheans, unleſs we ſet down beforehand, the doctrine of the exaltation of Faith, and the abaſement of Reaſon (31).

They who hold that God permitted ſin, becauſe he could not have prevented it without affecting the free-will, which he had endued man with, and which was the moſt noble preſent he had made him, lay themſelves very much open. This reaſon has, indeed, ſomething dazzling in it; it ſeems grand; but it can be refuted by other reaſons, which are better ſuited to the capacity of the bulk of mankind, and better grounded on common ſenſe, and on the notions of Order. Without reading Seneca's beautiful treatiſe on Benefits, a man may know by his own natural reaſon, that it is the eſſential character of a benefactor, not to beſtow favours, which he knows will be ſo ill uſed, as to promote only the ruin of him on whom they are beſtowed. There is no enemy, let him be never ſo exaſperated, but would in ſuch a caſe load his enemy with favours. It is the eſſential character of a benefactor, to ſpare nothing that is neceſſary to make his kindneſs procure the happineſs of the perſon he honours with it. If, though it were in his power to confer the art of making a good uſe of his favours, he ſhould refuſe it, he would but indifferently act the part of a benefactor: nor would he act it better, if when it was in his power to prevent his client's making an ill uſe of his favours, he did not prevent it by curing him of his wicked inclinations (32). The common people are not leſs acquainted with theſe notions than the Philoſophers. I confeſs, that if the ill uſe of a favour could not be prevented, but by breaking the legs and arms of one's clients, or by putting them in chains, and throwing them into a dungeon, one would not be obliged to prevent it; and it were better in ſuch a caſe to refuſe the favour. But if the ill uſe of it could be prevented, by altering a man's heart, and by giving him a taſte for what is good, the benefactor would be obliged to do it. Now this is what God could eaſily do, if he pleaſed. Take notice of what Cicero objects to thoſe who aſſerted it was not God's fault that men made an ill uſe of his favours. Huic loco ſic ſoletis occurrere, Non idcirco non optimè nobis à diis eſſe proviſum, quòd multi eorum beneficio perverſè uterentur: etiam patrimoniis multos malè uti: nec ob eam cauſam eos beneficium à patribus nullum habere. Quis iſtuc negat? aut quæ eſt in collatione iſta ſimilitudo? nec enim Herculi nocere Deianira voluit, cùm ei tunicam, ſanguine Centauri tinctam, dedit: nec prodeſſe Phæreo Jaſoni, is qui gladio vomicam ejus aperuit, quam ſanare medici non potuerant. MULTI ENIM, ETIAM CUM OBESSE VELLENT, PROFUERUNT, ET CUM PRODESSE, OBFUERUNT. Ita non fit ex eo, quod datur, ut voluntas ejus, qui dederit, appareat: nec, ſi is, qui accepit, bene utitur, idcirco is, qui dedit, amice dedit (33), i. e. "To this argument you uſe to object, that "tho' men make an ill uſe of the favours of the "Gods, it does not follow from thence, that the "Gods did not provide for our happineſs as well as "it was poſſible. Many make an ill uſe of their patrimony; but have they therefore no obligation to "their fathers? Who denies this? Or what likeneſs is there in that compariſon? For Deianira did "not deſign to hurt Hercules, when ſhe ſent him a "garment dyed with the Centaur's blood. Nor did "he, who with a ſword cut an impoſthume in Jaſon "of Pheræa's body, which the Phyſicians could not "cure, intend that Prince a kindneſs. For many, "when they pretended to hurt, have been uſeful; and "many have done harm, when they deſigned a favour." Whence it is plain, that a man's deſign does not "always appear, by what he gives; and that if a "good uſe is made of it, yet it does not follow from "thence, it was kindly given."

There is no kind mother, who having given her daughters leave to go to the maſquerade, but would go back from her promiſe, if ſhe knew for certain that her daughters would yield to the addreſſes of a lover, and leave their maidenhead there. Any mother, who, knowing that this would infallibly happen, ſhould ſuffer them nevertheleſs to go to the ball, being content with only exhorting them to chaſtity, and threatning them with her indignation, if they returned women; ſuch a mother, I ſay, would very juſtly draw upon her the blame of having no love for her daughters, and no value for chaſtity. It were to no purpoſe for her to ſay in her own vindication, that ſhe would not put her daughters liberty and free-will under any reſtraint, nor ſhew them the leaſt miſtruſt: ſhe would be anſwered, that this was a very imprudent circumſpection, becoming an exaſperated ſtep-mother, rather than a kind parent; and that it had been much better not to let her daughters go out of her ſight, than to give them ſo prepoſterouſly ſuch a privilege of free-will, and ſuch proofs of truſt. This ſhews the raſhneſs of thoſe, who pretend to alledge as a good reaſon, the regard which they ſay God had for the firſt man's free-will. It is better to believe and be ſilent, than to give reaſons, which may be refuted by the inſtances I have mentioned. Cotta, in a book of Cicero, urged ſo many arguments againſt thoſe who aſſert, that the faculty of reaſoning is a preſent which the Gods made to men, that Cicero did not think himſelf capable to ſolve thoſe difficulties: for if he had thought himſelf capable of it, he would have anſwered them. His academical genius was in its true element, when he could ſhew that one can argue for ever for and againſt the ſame queſtion. Since therefore he left Cotta's arguments unanſwered, we ought to infer from thence, that he did not know what to reply (34). And yet Cicero was one of the moſt excellent wits that ever were. Cotta having ſhewed that reaſon is an accomplice of all men's crimes, and that therefore the Gods ought to have given it us, if they deſigned us harm, objects to himſelf the common ſolution, which is, that men make an ill uſe of the favours of Heaven. Sed urgetis identidem hominum eſſe iſtam culpam, non deorum . . . in hominum vitiis ais eſſe culpam (35). He replies, that the ill uſe ſhould have been prevented, and that man ought to have been endued with ſuch a reaſon, as might make him avoid all evil; that they cannot be excuſed, who make a preſent, which they know will prove pernicious. This he ſhews by ſeveral inſtances. Eam

(27) Iſaiah, chap. 56. ver. 8.

(28) See hereunder, rem. [M], towards the end.

(29) See Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, p. 430.

(30) Cur omnium cruadeliſſimus tamdiu Cinna regnavit? At dearit pœnas. Prohiberi melius fuit, impedirique ne tot ſummos viros interficeret, quam ipſum aliquando pœnas dare. Summo cruciatu ſupplicioque Varius homo importuniſſimus periit; ſed quia Druſum ferro, Metellum veneno ſuſtulerat, illos conſervari melius fuit, quam pœnas ſceleris Varium pendere. Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 33, 34.
i. e. "Why did "Cinna, the "moſt cruel of "all men, govern ſo long? "He was puniſhed at laſt. "But it had "been better to "prevent him "from putting "ſo many of the "beſt men to "death, than to "puniſh him for "it afterwards. "Varius, the "moſt outrageous man that "ever lived, "ſuffered the "moſt cruel "capital puniſhment, becauſe he had "killed Druſus "with the "ſword, and "Metellus with "poiſon: but it "had been better to ſave their "lives, than to "puniſh him for "murthering "them."

(31) Mr. Amyraut wrote a book with that title: See his article, remark [H].

(32) Concerning all this, ſee the remark [E] of the article ORIGEN.

(33) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 28. Add to this, what has been obſerved concerning Horace's Eutrapelus, in the art. ORIGEN, quotat. (43).

(34) As it began to be late, Balbus did not anſwer Cotta, and put it off till another day, which never came. Quoniam ad veſperaſcit, dabis diem nobis aliquam, ut contra iſta dicamus. Cotta anſwered, that he deſired and hoped to be refuted. Ego vero & opto redargui me, Balbe, & ea quæ diſputavi diſſerere malui quam judicari, & facile me a te vinci poſſe certo ſcio. Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. ſub fin.

(35) Non ut patrimonium relinquitur, ſic ratio homini eſt beneficio Deorum data. Quid enim potius hominibus dediſſent, ſi iis nocere voluiſſent. Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 28, 31.

odious actions (c), or if there had been then as many controverſies as there are now about Predeſtination [F], in which the Chriſtians charge each other, either with making God the

(c) See the rem. [B] of the art. MANICHE-

Eam dediſſes hominibus rationem, quæ vitia, culpamque excluderet. Ubi igitur locus fuit errori Deorum? nam patrimonia ſpe bene tradendi relinquimus, qua poſſumus falli: Deus falli quî potuit? An ut Sol in currum cùm Phaëthontem filium ſuſtulit? aut Neptunus, cùm Theſeus Hippolytum perdidit, cùm ter optandi à Neptuno patre habuiſſet poteſtatem? Poëtarum iſta ſunt: nos autem philoſophi eſſe volumus, rerum auctores, non fabularum. Atque ii tamen ipſi Dii poëtici ſi ſciſſent perniciosa fore illa filiis, peccaſſe in beneficio putarentur. Et ſi verum eſt quod Ariſto Chius dicere ſolebat. Nocere audientibus Philoſophos iis qui bene dicta male interpretarentur: poſſe enim aſotos ex Ariſtippi, acerbos è Zenonis ſcholâ exire. Prorſus, ſi qui audierunt vitioſi eſſent diſceſſuri, quòd perversè philoſophorum diſputationem interpretarentur; tacere præſtare philoſophis, quàm iis qui ſe audiſſent, nocere. Sic ſi homines rationem bono conſilio à Diis immortalibus datam, in fraudem, malitiamque convertunt, non dare illam, quàm dari humano generi melius fuit, ut ſi medicus ſciat eum ægrotum, qui juſſus ſit vinum ſumere, meracius ſumpturum, ſtatimque periturum, magnâ ſit in culpâ: ſic veſtra iſta Providentia reprehendenda, quæ rationem dederit iis, quos ſcierit eâ perversè & improbè uſuros. Niſi forte dicitis eam neſciviſſe. Utinam quidem, ſed non audebitis: non enim ignoro quanti ejus nomen putetis (36), i. e. "He ought "to have given ſuch a reaſon to men, as might pre- "vent all vices and guilt. Whence then came the "miſtake of the Gods? For when we leave an eſtate "to our children, it is in hopes that they ſhall make "a good uſe of it; wherein we may be diſappoint- "ed: but how can God be miſtaken? Is it as Apol- "lo was, when he put his ſon Phaeton in his cha- "riot? Or as Neptune, when Theſeus loſt his ſon "Hippolytus, though his father Neptune put it three "times in his power to have his wiſh? Theſe are po- "etical ſtories, you will ſay; but we are Philoſo- "phers, who mind real facts, and not ſtories. But "even theſe poetical Gods would be thought to have "but ill beſtowed their favours, had they known that "they would prove pernicious to their children. And "if that be true, what Ariſto of Chios uſed to ſay, "that the Philoſophers do an injury to thoſe, who "miſconſtrue their ſayings, as if ſome were to come "debauched from Ariſtippus's ſchool, or cruel from "Zeno's; or in the general, if ſome were to become "vicious, by miſunderſtanding the Philoſopher's diſ- "putations; in ſuch caſes it were better for the Phi- "loſophers to be ſilent, than to do an injury to their "hearers. Thus if reaſon, which the immortal "Gods gave men with a good deſign, be by them "uſed to their own prejudice, and make them "wicked, it had been better for mankind, not to "make them that preſent: for as a Phyſician would "be much to blame, who ſhould preſcribe wine to "a patient, knowing that he will drink it un- "mixed with water, and die immediately; ſo your "Providence is to blame for giving reaſon to men, "knowing that they would make a bad and wick- "ed uſe of it. Unleſs you ſay, Providence did not "foreſee it. I wiſh you would, but you will not dare "to ſay it, for I know how much you value that "Providence." With ſuch arguments it is eaſy to ſhew, that the free-will of the firſt man, which was preſerved whole and entire to him in ſuch circumſtances in which he was to uſe it to his own prejudice, to the ruin of mankind, to the introduction of a dreadful flood of moral evils, and natural evils, and to the damnation of the greateſt part of his deſcendants, was not a good preſent. We ſhall never be able to comprehend that ſuch a privilege was preſerved to him out of kindneſs, and from a love for holineſs. They, who aſſert it was neceſſary there ſhould be free Beings, that God might be loved through choice (37), are ſenſible in their conſcience, that ſuch an hypotheſis does not ſatisfy our reaſon. For when it is foreſeen that ſuch Free-Beings will chooſe, not the love of God, but ſin, it is plain that God's deſign was fruſtrated, and therefore it was not neceſſary to preſerve free-will. I ſhall examine this again in the remark [M]. See in the margin (38), the leſſon that is given us.

(36) Idem, cap. 31.

(37) See Father Malebranche's Traite de Morale.

(38) Sancta illa & profunda fidei myſteria non pari paſſu cum cauſis naturalibus ambulant, eoque rectius illa & creduntur clauſis oculis & intelliguntur. Il ſegreti del Ciel ſol colui vede, Che ſerra gli occhi e crede. Franciſcus Redi, de Gener. Inſectorum, i. e. "Thoſe holy "and deep myſ- "teries of Faith, "are not pro- "portioned to "the natural "cauſes, where- "fore they are "better believ- "ed and under- "ſtood with our "eyes ſhut. He "alone ſees the "ſecrets of Hea- "ven, who ſhuts "his eyes and "believes." Obſerve, that the two Italian lines quoted here, are of Count Guido Ubaldo Bonarelli, at the end of his Paſtoral, intitled, Filli di Sciro.

[F] I there had been then as many controverſies as there are now about Predeſtination.] If the Manicheans were to ſtop here, they would give up their greateſt advantage: for here follow ſome objections much more terrible. 1. One cannot conceive how the firſt man could receive the faculty of doing evil from the firſt principle. That faculty is a vice: all that can produce evil, is bad, ſince evil cannot come but from a bad cauſe: and therefore Adam's free will came from two oppoſite principles: as far as it could chooſe good, it depended on the good principle, but as it could chooſe evil, it depended on the bad principle. 2. It is impoſſible to comprehend that God only permitted ſin: for a bare permiſſion of ſin added nothing to free will, and did not make it poſſible to foreſee, whether Adam would perſevere in his ſtate of innocence, or fall from it. Beſides, by the ideas we have of a created Being, we cannot conceive that it can be a principle of action, that it ſhould move itſelf, and that receiving every moment of its duration its very Being and the Being of its proprieties entirely from another cauſe, it could create by its proper modalities within itſelf. Theſe modalities muſt be, either undiſtinguiſhed from the ſubſtance of the Soul, as the modern Philoſophers hold, or diſtinct from the ſubſtance of the Soul, as the Peripateticks aſſert. If they are undiſtinguiſhed, they cannot be produced but by the ſame cauſe, that can produce the very ſubſtance of the Soul; now it is plain that man is not, nor can be that cauſe. If they are diſtinct from the Soul, they are created Beings, Beings made out of nothing, ſince they are not made of the Soul, nor of any pre-exiſting nature; they cannot therefore be produced but by a cauſe that can create. Now all the Sects of Philoſophers agree that man is not, nor can be ſuch a cauſe. Some pretend, that the action which moves him, comes from without, but that he can nevertheleſs ſtop it, or direct it to ſuch or ſuch an object (39). This is a contradiction; for there is no leſs ſtrength requiſite to ſtop what is in motion, than to move what is at reſt. Since therefore a creature cannot be put into motion by a bare permiſſion of acting, and has no principle of motion within itſelf, it is abſolutely neceſſary that God ſhould move it: he does then ſomething more than barely ſuffering it to ſin. 3. This may alſo be made to appear by another argument, which is, that we cannot comprehend how a bare permiſſion ſhould take contingent events out of the number of things merely poſſible, nor how it ſhould make the Deity capable to know with certainty that the creature will ſin. A mere permiſſion cannot be the ground of God's Preſcience: for which reaſon moſt of the Divines ſuppoſe, that God made a decree, the purport of which is that the creature ſhall ſin. This is according to them the foundation of his foreknowledge. Others maintain that the purport of the decree is that the creature ſhall be put in ſuch circumſtances, in which God foreſaw it would ſin. So that the former aſſert that God foreſaw ſin becauſe of his decree, and the latter, that he made his decree becauſe he had foreſeen ſin. But in whatſoever manner they expreſs themſelves, it follows evidently from thence that God would have man to ſin, and that he preferred this before a continual duration of innocence, which it was eaſy for him to procure and to decree. Reconcile this if you can with the goodneſs he ought to have for his creatures, and with the infinite love he muſt have for holineſs. 4. If you ſay with thoſe, who come neareſt to the method by which providence would be cleared, that God did not foreſee Adam's fall, you will not get much by it; for you muſt own at leaſt, that God knew moſt certainly, that the firſt man was in great danger of loſing his innocence, and of introducing into the world all the natural and moral evils, which were the conſequence of his rebellion. Neither God's goodneſs, nor his holineſs, nor his wiſdom, could ſuffer him to run the riſk of thoſe ſad events. For our reaſon teaches us moſt plainly that a mother, who ſhould ſuffer her daughters to go to a ball, when ſhe knew moſt certainly that their honour would run the greateſt danger, would ſhew thereby that ſhe loves neither her daughters, the Author of ſin, or with denying his providence. The Heathens could eaſier anſwer the daughters, nor chaſtity: if it be ſuppoſed that ſhe has an infallible preſervative againſt all temptations, and yet does not give it her daughters when ſhe ſends them to the ball, one ſees plainly that ſhe is guilty, and does not care whether or not her daughters keep their maidenhead. Let us carry this compariſon a little farther ſtill. If that mother went to the ball, if through a window ſhe ſaw and heard one of her daughters defending herſelf but weakly in the corner of a cloſet againſt the preſſing inſtances of a young lover, if even when ſhe ſhould ſee her daughter juſt ready to yield to the tempter's wiſhes, ſhe did not run to her aſſiſtance, and deliver her from the ſnare, would it not be juſtly ſaid that ſhe acted like a cruel ſtep-mother, and was capable of ſelling her own daughter's honour (40)? Now this is an image of the conduct which the Socinians aſcribe to God (41). They cannot ſay, that God knew the ſin of the firſt man only as a poſſible event. He knew every degree of the temptation, he could not but know, a moment before Eve fell, that ſhe was juſt going to ruin herſelf: he could not, I ſay, but know it, with ſuch a certainty, which renders one inexcuſable, if he does not prevent the evil, ſo that one cannot ſay, I had reaſons to think this would not happen, I had a great deal of hopes left ſtill. There are no men, who have a little experience of the world, but will, without ſeeing what paſſes in a woman's heart, and knowing it only by outward ſigns, be certain, that ſhe is ready to yield to a lover, if they ſee through a window how ſhe defends herſelf, when her fall is really near at hand. The moment ſhe will conſent, is preceded by ſome ſigns which are not at all equivocal. How much more muſt God, who knew all Eve's thoughts as they aroſe in her mind (for the Socinians do not deny him that knowledge) how much more, I ſay, muſt God have been certain that ſhe was juſt going to fall? Adam's ſin has been foreſeen with more certainty ſtill. For Eve's example gave hints, whereby the huſband's fall could be the eaſier foreſeen. If God had been concerned for the preſervation of man and of innocency, and for preventing all the misfortunes, which were to be the unavoidable conſequence of ſin, would he not at leaſt have ſtrengthened the huſband after his wife's fall? Or would he not have given him another wife holy and entire, inſtead of her who ſuffered herſelf to be ſeduced? Let us ſay therefore, that the Socinian Syſtem, by depriving God of his Preſcience, reduces him to a ſtate of ſlavery, and to a wretched method of governing the world; and yet it does not remove the grand difficulty, which was to be removed, and which drives thoſe Hereticks to a denial of God's foreſeeing the contingent events (42).

(39) Father Malebranche, in his Traite de la Nature, & de la Grace.

I refer you to a Profeſſor of Divinity, who is ſtill living (43), who proved moſt evidently, that neither the Syſtem of the Scotiſts, nor that of the Moliniſts, nor that of the Remonſtrants, nor that of the Univerſaliſts, nor that of the Pajoniſts, nor that of F. Malebranche, nor that of the Lutherans, nor that of the Socinians, were proper to ſolve the objections of thoſe, who charge God with introducing ſin into the world, or who pretend that his introducing it is inconſiſtent with his goodneſs, his holineſs, and his juſtice (44); ſo that this Profeſſor not finding his account better in any other Syſtem, keeps to St. Auguſtin's Hypotheſis, which is the ſame with that of Luther and Calvin, and which is alſo that of the Thomiſts, and of the Janſeniſts; he keeps to that, I ſay (45), though perplexed with the terrible difficulties he has diſplayed (46), and though ready to ſink under the heavy load (47). Since Luther and Calvin appeared, I do not think there ever paſſed one year, in which they were not charged with making God the Author of ſin. The Profeſſor I ſpeak of owns, that the charge is well grounded with regard to Luther (48). The preſent Lutherans ſay the ſame of Calvin: the Roman Catholicks aſſert it of both. The Jeſuits maintain it alſo with regard to Janſenius. They who are moderate, and judge fairly, do not charge an adverſary with diſhoneſty, who proteſts that he does not accuſe God of man's ſin, and does not make him the Author of it: they are willing to acknowledge that he does not aſſert it poſitively, and does not ſee all the conſequences of his Doctrine: but then they add, that Proteſtatio facto contraria nihil valet, a proteſtation againſt matter of fact is void; and that if he will take the trouble to determine exactly what God muſt have done to be the Author of Adam's ſin, he will find, that according to his Doctrine, God has really done all that was requiſite for it. You do, therefore, add they, the contrary of what Epicurus did: he denied, in reality, the Being of the Gods, though he ſaid there were Gods (49); but you on the contrary deny in words, that God is the Author of ſin, though you really teach it.

Let us come now to the text of this remark. The controverſies, which aroſe in the Weſt among the Chriſtians ſince the Reformation, have ſo plainly ſhewn that men do not know what party to chooſe, when they will ſolve the difficulties concerning the origin of evil, that a Manichean would be now a more dreadful adverſary, than he was formerly, for he would refute us all the one by the other. You have ſpent, would he ſay, the whole ſtrength of your wit; you have invented the ſcientia media, or middle ſcience, as a God deſcending from a machine to diſentangle your Chaos: but it is a chimerical invention: one cannot conceive it is poſſible that God ſhould have future events otherwiſe than by means of his decrees, or by the neceſſary connection of cauſes and effects. This is not leſs inconceivable in Metaphyſicks, than it is inconceivable in Morals, that God, being infinitely good and holy, ſhould yet be the author of ſin. I refer you to the Janſeniſts: ſee how they run your middle ſcience down both by direct proofs, and by a retortion of your own arguments: for notwithſtanding that ſcience, all man's ſins and all his misfortunes are nevertheleſs owing to God's free choice: and we may compare God (abſit verbo blaſphemia: Let it be ſaid without blaſphemy) [See the margin (50)] with a mother, who knowing certainly that her daughter would give her maidenhead, if at ſuch a place, and at ſuch an hour, ſhe were preſſed to it by ſuch a one, ſhould procure the meeting, lead her daughter to the place, and leave her there to herſelf. The Socinians being perplexed with this objection, endeavour to ſolve it by denying God's preſcience: but they find to their ſhame, that their hypotheſis only debaſes God's Government, without clearing him, and is but little leſs liable to the compariſon of that mother, than the other ſyſtems. See above, quotation (41). I refer them to Proteſtants, who run them down and put them to a non-plus. As for the abſolute decrees, which are a ſure cauſe of preſcience, pray ſee, how the Moliniſts and the Remonſtrants confute them. We have here a Divine, as ſtout and reſolute as Bartolus, who confeſſes almoſt with tears in his eyes, that no man is more perplexed than he by the difficulties of thoſe decrees, and that he continues to hold that ſyſtem, only becauſe he found himſelf ſtill labouring under the ſame perplexity, when he would go over to more remiſs ſyſtems (51). He has expreſſed himſelf with more ſtrength ſtill (52), and you cannot deny but he has unanſwerably refuted all thoſe ſyſtems, and conſequently you cannot extricate yourſelf, unleſs you admit my ſyſtem of two principles. All the difficulties will then vaniſh away; you will fully clear the good principle, and you will find that it is only paſſing from a leſs reaſonable to a more reaſonable Manicheiſm: for if you examine your own Hypotheſis with ſome attention, you muſt acknowledge, that you admit, as well as I, two principles, the one of good, the other of evil, but inſtead of placing them, as I do, in two different ſubjects, you combine them together in one and the ſame ſubſtance, which is monſtrous and impoſſible. The only principle, you admit, reſolved from all eternity, that man ſhould ſin, and that the firſt ſin ſhould be contagious (53); that it ſhould continually be productive of all crimes imaginable on the whole face of the earth; after which he prepared for mankind in his life all the misfortunes that can be conceived, as plagues, war, famines, pains, and griefs, and after this life an hell in which almoſt all men will be eternally tormented in

(40) See the quotation (50).

(41) I ſhall ſpeak of this again in the following column.

(42) See Monſieur Arnauld, Reflexions ſur le Syſteme du P. Malebranche, Liv. 1. chap. 13. p. 256, &c. where he ſhews, that unleſs God by particular decrees combines the ſeveral wills of men, with the motions of matter, thoſe events, which are called contingent, will ſtill be ſo, even with regard to God.

(43) This was wrote in the beginning of April 1696.

(44) Jurieu, Jugement ſur les Methodes rigides & relachees d'expliquer la Providence & la Grace. See above, quotation (36), of the article NIHUSIUS.

(45) Ibid. p. 23.

(46) p. 19, 20, 21, 22.

(47) Ibid. p. 23.

(48) Having related Luther's opinions, he adds, Hæc omnia abdicamus & horremus ut religionem omnem peſſundantia & Manicheiſmum ſpirantia. i. e. "All this "we explode "and abhor, as "overthrowing "all religion, "and favouring "of Manichei-"iſm." Petrus Jurius, de Pace inter Proteſtantes ineunda, p. 214. See Monſieur de Meaux, in the addition to the Hiſtoire des Variations.

(49) Epicurum verbis reliquiſſe Deos, re ſuſtuliſſe. Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 30. See alſo Lactantius, Libro de Ira Dei, cap. 4.

(50) This compariſon ſeemed ſhocking to ſeveral perſons of the Reformed Religion; but I deſire them here to conſider, that it is only deſigned to be even with the Jeſuits and the Arminians, who make the moſt horrid compariſons between the God of the Calviniſts (as they ſay) and Tiberius, Caligula, &c. It is very proper to ſhew them, that ſuch arms may be turned againſt themſelves.

(51) Jurieu, Jugement ſur les Methodes, p. 23.

(52) See the rem. [I].

(53) According to the Moliniſts, he decreed to put men in ſuch circumſtances, in which he knew for certain they would ſin, and he might, either have put them in other circumſtances, or not have placed them in thoſe.

the objections of the Manicheans, than the Chriſtians [G]; but ſome of their Philoſophers found it a difficult taſk (d). We ſhall ſhew hereunder in what ſenſe the orthodox ſeem

(d) See the rem. [G].

in ſo terrible a manner as makes one's hair ſtand an end, when the deſcriptions of it are read. If ſuch a principle be on the other hand perfectly good, if he loves holineſs infinitely, muſt it not be acknowledged, that the ſame God is at once both perfectly good, and perfectly bad, and that he does not love vice leſs than virtue. Now is it not much more reaſonable to divide theſe oppoſite qualities, and to aſcribe all the good to one principle, and all the evil to another principle? The hiſtory of mankind will prove nothing to the diſadvantage of the good principle. I do not ſay, like you, that of his own accord, from his own free will, and becauſe ſuch was his pleaſure, he made all mankind ſubject to ſin and miſery, when it was in his power to make it holy and happy. I ſuppoſe that he conſented to this, only in order to avoid a greater evil, and, as it were, againſt his own inclination. This clears him. He ſaw that the bad principle would ruin all; he oppoſed him as much as he could, and by agreement (54), he obtained that things ſhould be in the condition they are in. He has done like a Monarch, who, to prevent the ruin of all his dominions, ſacrifices one part of them, for the preſervation of the reſt. It is a great difficulty, which at firſt ſhocks our reaſon, to ſpeak of a firſt Principle, and of a neceſſary Being, who does not do all that he wills, and who through want of power, is forced to ſubmit to the circumſtances of things: but it is a greater defect ſtill for ſuch a Being, freely, and of his own accord, to reſolve upon doing evil, when it is in his power to do good (55). Such might be the language of a Manichean. Let us conclude with the good uſe, for which I deſigned theſe remarks.

(54) In the rem. [I] at the firſt break, we propoſe another Method, than that of an agreement.

(55) See what ſhall be quoted from Plutarch and from Tully, in the following remark.

WHAT uſe we ought to make of the controverſy related above.

It is much more uſeful than ſome people may think, to humble man's reaſon, by ſhewing him how effectually the moſt abſurd Hereſies, as thoſe of the Manicheans are, confound his underſtanding, by perplexing the moſt important truths. This ſhould teach the Socinians, who pretend that reaſon muſt be the rule of faith, that they walk in a bad road, which will by degrees lead them to deny every thing, or to doubt of every thing, and that they expoſe themſelves to be put to a non-plus by the moſt execrable Hereticks. What muſt we do then? We muſt captivate our underſtanding under an obedience of faith, and never diſpute upon ſome ſubjects. And more eſpecially we ought not to pretend to refute the Manicheans but by the Scripture, and by the principle of ſubmiſſion, as St. Auguſtin did. Their Doctors, who were Philoſophers, or rather Sophiſts, and pretended to follow only reaſon, without having any regard for authority, did by their arguments, and by the falſe ſubtleties of a merely human Philoſophy, very eaſily perplex thoſe, who were not learned enough to anſwer them, and who had nothing to oppoſe them but the Scripture and the authority of the Church, who alone has a right to explain the true ſenſe of it. So that as they promiſed their Diſciples to teach them the truth by the natural light of reaſon and good ſenſe only, and made all that is above reaſon, as are our Myſteries, paſs for errors, they perverted a great many perſons; which engaged St. Auguſtin, who was well acquainted with the ſtrong and weak ſide of that Sect, to write againſt them his excellent Treatiſe of the uſefulneſs of Faith, and the neceſſity we are under to believe, chiefly with regard to things ſupernatural, and which belong to religion (56).

* Aug. de utilit. cred.

(56) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de St Leon, Liv. 1. p. 16, 17, of the Dutch edit.

[G] The Heathens could eaſier anſwer the objections of the Manicheans, than the Chriſtians.] I do not ſpeak abſolutely of all the Heathens, for we have ſeen above (57), that the Philoſopher Meliſſus, who held but one Principle of all things, would not have been capable to anſwer the objections of Zoroaſter, who held two Principles, the one good, the other bad. If there be but one Principle, and if that Principle be eſſentially good, how comes it that men are ſubject to ſo many miſeries? How comes it that they are ſo wicked (58)? If he made the world for their ſake, what did he get by it? An hæc, ut fere dicitis, hominum cauſâ à Deo conſtituta ſunt; ſapientumne? propter paucos ergo tanta eſt facta rerum molitio: an ſtultorum? at primum cauſa non fuit cur de improbis bene mereretur: deinde quid eſt aſſecutus, cùm omnes ſtulti ſint ſine dubio miſerrimi, maximè quòd ſtulti ſunt? Miſerius enim ſtultitiâ quid poſſumus dicere? Deinde quod ita multa ſunt incommoda in vita, ut ea ſapientes commodorum compenſatione leniant: ſtulti nec vitare venientia poſſint, nec ferre præſentia (59), i. e. "Was the world created "for the ſake of men, as you are almoſt determined "to ſay? But was it for the ſake of the wiſe? So "great a fabric was then made for but a few. Was "it for the unwiſe? But firſt; what reaſon was there "why he ſhould deſerve well of the wicked? Se"condly, what did he get by it, ſince all the uni"verſe are unqueſtionably miſerable, even becauſe "they are unwiſe. For is there any thing that "makes men more wretched than folly? Laſtly, "how many conveniencies are there not in this "life? The wiſe, indeed, allay them by a kind of "compenſation of inconveniencies; but the wicked "or fooliſh cannot avoid the evils that are coming "upon them, nor bear thoſe that are preſent." If that only Principle you admit is bad, why can man enjoy ſo many pleaſures (60)? Why can they croud in upon him through all his ſenſes, as through ſo many doors? Whence comes it, that he ſo paſſionately ſeeks after them? Whence that inexhauſtible induſtry, with which he multiplies them, and invents new ones? Nay, whence comes it, that he not only has a notion of honeſty, but that there are even many virtuous and charitable actions done among men? It is impoſſible, will the Manichean ſay, to account for all this, if we do not ſuppoſe that two Principles, the one good, the other bad, ſettled the conditions of the marriage of our ſoul with our body, and in general, all that relates to the government of the world. Meliſſus and Parmenides were not the only Philoſophers, whom theſe difficulties could perplex: The Stoicks were alſo very much puzzled by them: the Stoicks, I ſay, who without denying that there were many Gods, reduced them all to Jupiter, as the ſupreme Diſpenſer of all events (61). To him they aſcribed Providence, and acknowledged him for an infinitely good and infinitely wiſe Being. It was againſt this Plutarch argued, in the objections he urged againſt them, taken from the miſery of mankind. "There is not, ſays he (62), "nor ever was, a wiſe man upon earth; and on the "contrary, there are innumerable millions of un"happy to the utmoſt exceſs, under the government "of Jupiter, whoſe adminiſtration is perfectly good. "But can there be any thing more abſurd than to "ſay, that though Jupiter governs extremely well, "yet we are extremely miſerable? If therefore, "which it is a crime to ſay, he would be no longer "a Saviour, a Deliverer, a Protector, but quite the "contrary of what is ſignified by theſe noble titles, "it would be impoſſible to increaſe the good that is "already in the world, either with regard to the "number, nor with regard to the intenſity of it; "for, as they ſay, where men live in the utmoſt mi"ſery, neither vice nor unhappineſs can be increaſed "in the leaſt. Nor is this the worſt; but they are "angry with Menander, for ſaying, as a Poet, in a "play, that the greateſt cauſe of human miſery, is the too-good Being: for this, they pretend, is againſt "common ſenſe. And yet, they make God, who "is good, the cauſe of evils. For matter could not "produce evil of itſelf, ſince it is deſtitute of all "qualities; and all the diverſities that are in it, "come from him, who moves and forms it; that is "to ſay, from the mind within it, ſince it cannot "move nor form itſelf: it follows, therefore, that "evil comes from nothing, and from what is not; "or if it comes from a moving Principle, it muſt be "from God. But if they imagine that Jupiter does "not govern every part of himſelf *, and does not "uſe it according to his own will and pleaſure, they "ſpeak againſt common ſenſe, and ſuppoſe an ani"mal, whoſe ſeveral members are not ſubject to its "will, but have a particular power in themſelves, "by which they act, without being moved by the "animal to which they belong. For there is no "animal ſo formed, that againſt his will his legs "may walk, his tongue ſpeak, or his horns ſtrike. "But

(57) In the art. MANICHEANS, remark [D].

(58) Ibidem.

(59) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 9.

(60) Siquidem Deus eſt, unde mala? bona vero unde ſi non eſt? Boet. de Conſol. lib. 1. Proſa. 4. p. m. 11. See what I ſhall quote from Tully in the article PERICLES, remark [K].

(61) See Plutarch. adverſus Stoicos, p. 1075.

(62) Ibid. I make uſe of Amiot's tranſlation, Oeuvres Morales, p. 707. Tom. 2. of the Geneva edit. 1621, in 8vo.

* That is, by ſuppoſing him the mind of the Univerſe, every part of which may be then conſidered as a part of Jupiter, as every limb is a part of man. ADD. REM.

" But God muſt ſuffer all this, if his parts being " wicked, do lie, cheat, rob, or murder againſt his " will. But if, as Chryſippus maintains, there is not " the leaſt part in Jupiter that does not act according " to his will, if all that is animated, acts and moves " as it is impelled and moved by Jupiter himſelf, " this is worſe ſtill. It were much better to ſay, " that on account of Jupiter's want of power, there " are numberleſs of his parts, that act againſt his " nature and will, than to ſay that there is no wick- " neſs, no crime, but of which Jupiter is the au- " thor." Obſerve well that concluſion: if we were to chooſe between two evils, and to ſay, either that Jupiter wants power, or that he wants goodneſs, Plutarch is of opinion, that we ought to chooſe the former, and that it is better to aſſert, that God has not the neceſſary power to prevent crimes, than to pretend that he is the cauſe of their being committed (63). Cicero made an advantage of the ſame Doctrine of the Stoicks concerning Jupiter's Almighty Power, to refute Providence, as though the only excuſe that can be alledged for the many diſorders which happen upon earth, were to ſay, that God cannot mind every thing. If this were the ſole excuſe, the Stoicks would be left defenceleſs, for they held that Jupiter's power was infinite. Here follow Cicero's words. At ſubvenire certe potuit (Deus) & conſervare urbes tantas, atque tales. Vos enim ipſi dicere ſoletis, nihil eſſe quod Deus efficere non poſſit, & quidem ſine labore ullo: ut enim hominum membra nulla contentione, mente ipſa ac voluntate moveantur, ſic numine Deorum omnia fingi, moveri, mutarique poſſe. Neque id dicitis ſuperſtitioſè, atque aniliter, ſed phyſicâ, conſtantique ratione. Materiam enim rerum, ex qua, & in qua omnia ſint, totam eſſe flexibilem, & commutabilem, ut nihil ſit, quod non ex ea quamvis ſubitò fingi, convertique poſſet. Ejus autem univerſæ rectricem, & moderatricem divinam eſſe Providentiam: hanc igitur, quocunque ſe moveat, efficere poſſe quicquid velit. Itaque, aut neſcit quid poſſit, aut negligit res humanas, aut quid ſit optimum, non poteſt judicare (64), i. e. " But God could certainly come to " the aſſiſtance of ſuch great and conſiderable cities, " and preſerve them from ruin. For you maintain " that there is nothing but God can do it, and even " without any trouble: for as a man's members are " moved without any trouble, by the mind and at " his own will, thus all things can be framed, " moved, and altered by the bare will of the Gods. " Nor do you maintain this like old women without " any reaſon, but philoſophically, and by arguments. " For you aſſert, that matter, out of which every thing " is made, is flexible, and entirely mutable, ſo that " any thing may be immediately made of it; and " that Divine Providence regulates and governs the " whole; and can do whatever it pleaſes. Whence " it follows, either that God does not know his own " power, or that he neglects the things of this world, " or that he cannot judge what is beſt." Cicero had obſerved juſt before, that the fall of Corinth was to be aſcribed to Critolaus, and that of Carthage to Aſdrubal, and not to God's anger, ſince, according to the Stoicks, God was never angry, notwithſtanding which he ought to have come to the aſſiſtance of theſe two cities (65). The Stoicks were preſſed ſo cloſe, that they were driven to ſay that vice is uſeful, otherwiſe, ſay they, there would have been no virtue (66). * * * Homines feciſſe dicatur: tantam vim eſſe ærumnarum & malorum. Adverſus ea Chryſippus quum in libro περὶ προνοίας *quarto diſſereret, Nihil eſt prorſus iſtis, inquit, imperitius, nihil * inſipidius, qui opinantur bona eſſe potuiſſe, ſi non eſſent ibidem mala. Nam quum bona malis contraria ſint; utraque neceſſarium eſt oppoſita inter ſeſe & quaſi mutuo adverſo quæque fulta niſu, conſiſtere. Nullum adeò contrarium ſine contrario altero. Quo enim pacto juſtitiæ ſenſus eſſe poſſet, niſi eſſent injuriæ? aut quid aliud juſtitia eſt, quam injuſtitiæ privatio? quid item fortitudo intelligi poſſet, niſi ex ignaviæ oppoſitione? quid continentia niſi ex intemperantiæ? quo idem modo prudentia eſſet, niſi foret contrà imprudentia? proinde, homines ſtulti cur non hoc etiam deſiderant ut veritas ſit & non ſit mendacium? namque itidem ſunt bona & mala, felicitas & infortunitas, dolor & voluptas. Alterum enim ex altero, ſicuti Plato ait, verticibus inter ſe contrariis deligatum eſt. Suſtuleris unum; abſtuleris utrumque*, i. e. " Some pretend that " men were made by chance †, conſidering the many " evils to which they are ſubject to. Againſt which " Chryſippus argues thus in his 4th book concerning " Providence: he obſerves, that there can be no- " thing more impertinent and ſilly, than to aſſert, " that there could be good, if there were not evil. " For as good is the oppoſite of evil, it is neceſſary " that both ſhould exiſt, as coming originally from " two contrary tendencies oppoſite to each other: ſo " that nothing can exiſt without its contrary. For " how could there be a ſenſe of juſtice, if there " were no injuries? Or what is juſtice, but a priva- " tion of injuſtice? How could one have a notion of " courage, if there were no cowardice? How of " providence, if there were no imprudence? Why, " adds he, do not ſilly men wiſh alſo there were no " truth, that there might be no falſity? For good " and evil, happineſs and unhappineſs, pleaſure and " pain muſt exiſt together. The one, as Plato ob- " ſerves, being connected with the other, as it were " by their oppoſite ends: if you ſuppreſs either, you " ſuppreſs both."

Let us ſee with how much ſtrength Plutarch refutes the Stoicks upon this ſubject (67). " We muſt there- " fore conclude, that there is no good among the " Gods, ſince there is no evil among them: and " when Jupiter having again collected within him- " ſelf the whole matter, ſhall be alone, all other " diverſities being aboliſhed, there will then be more " good, ſince there will be no evil. But cannot a " whole company ſing, though no man ſings ill? " Cannot the whole body be in health, though no " part of it be out of order? Why then can there " be no virtue without vice? . . . . I wonder why " they do not alſo ſay, that a conſumption is neceſſary " to make a man enjoy his health, and the gout to " make him walk the better; and that Achilles " could not have had a fine head of hair, had not " Therſites been bald. For what difference is there " between them, who ſhall aſſert theſe ſilly things, " and thoſe who maintain that incontinence was uſe- " ful for the being of chaſtity, and injuſtice for the " being of juſtice? Let us then pray the Gods, that " there may be always wickedneſs, bad morals, flat- " teries, and lies; for if theſe be ſuppreſſed, virtue will " alſo vaniſh away with them, and be no more. " But will you have a better notion of his ſweet elo- " quence, and fine method of arguing, conſider " what he adds. As there are ſometimes, ſays he " (68), ridiculous epigrams or ſayings in Comedies, " which of themſelves have no ſenſe, but yet add " ſome eloquence to the play, thus vice may be con- " demned on its own account; but yet it is of uſe " with regard to other things. But firſt, nothing " can be more abſurd, than to aſſert that vice exiſts " by the providence of God, as a bad epigram is " made by the Poet's will. For this being granted, " how can the Gods be ſtyled the authors of good " rather than of evil? How can they hate wicked- " neſs? And how can we anſwer thoſe ſhocking ſen- " timents, When the Gods will ruin a family, they in- " vent ſome cauſe or another; and what God urged " them thus to quarrel together (69)? But farther, a " bad Epigram is ſometimes an ornament to a play, " and leads the Poet to his end, which is to pleaſe " the ſpectators, and make them laugh. But Jupi- " ter the Father of mankind, the ſovereign Being, " the adminiſtrator of juſtice, the beſt artificer (as " Pindar ſtyles him) did not deſign, when he created " the world, to make a great and diverſified Co- " medy, ſerving to inſtruct, but a city common both " for Gods and men, wherein they might live in " concord and happineſs, by the practice of juſtice " and virtue; but to compaſs ſuch a noble deſign, " what occaſion was there for robbers, murderers, " parricides, and tyrants? For wickedneſs was not " ſome elegant Epiſode, pleaſing to Jupiter, ſince " it is not proper to divert men, or to make them " laugh, but rather to occaſion injuſtice and miſery; " ſo that it has not the leaſt ſhadow in it of that " boaſted agreement with nature. But beſides, that " bad Epigram is but an inconſiderable part of the " play, which takes up a very little place in it, nor " are there many ſuch Epigrams, ſo that it does not " offend any of the ſpectators, nor take off the leaſt " thing of the beauty of the performance. But all " abounds with wickedneſs; and the life of man, " from the beginning to the end, is a continual ſcene " of diſorder and miſery, not the leaſt part of it " being

(63) Μυρία γὰρ ἂν ἐπιτιμήσειεν ἀσθένεια καὶ ἀδυναμία τῷ Διὶ ἐκλειπόμενα τὰ μέρη, πολλὰ δρᾷν ἄτοπα παρὰ τὴν ἐκείνου φύσιν καὶ βούλησιν· ἢ μήτε ἀκρασίαν εἶναι, μήτε κακοργίαν, ἧς οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ Ζεὺς αἴτιος. Tolerabilius enim erat infinitas partes dicere Jovi ob ejus imbecillitatem vi facta agere multa improbe contra ipſius naturam & voluntatem, quam nullam eſſe libidinem, nullum ſcelus quod non Jovi autori imputandum eſſe. Plut. adverſus Stoicos, p. 1076. E.

(64) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 38 and 39.

(65) Critolaus, inquam, evertit Corinthum, Carthaginem Aſdrubal. Hi duos illos oculos oræ maritimæ effoderunt, non iratus alicui, quem omnino iraſci poſſe negatis, Deus, &c. Ibid. cap. 38.

(66) Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. cap. 1. The Aſterisks ſet down here, denote that there is a gap here in this paſſage of Aulus Gellius.

* Others read injubidius, ſillar.

† Thus Anthony Thyſius imagines the words of Aulus Gellius muſt be underſtood; he ſuppoſes that the word Caſu, or Fortuna, or ſuch like, was omitted. In A. Gellium, lib. 6. cap. 1. note 2. ADD. REM.

(67) Plut. adverſus Stoicos, p. 1065. Mr. Bayle quotes Amiot's tranſlations; but we have tranſlated this paſſage, and the foregoing, from the original.

(68) That is to ſay Chryſippus, in his book of Nature.

(69) Iliad. lib. 1.

ſeem to admit the two firſt principles [H], and in what ſenſe one cannot ſay, that according

" being free from blame, as they themſelves ac- " knowledge: ſo that it is the worſt and moſt diſ- " agreeable play imaginable (70)." Read in Plutarch the remainder of that paſſage; you will meet there with other arguments, which fully confute the Stoicks paradox concerning the uſefulneſs of vice. And yet it muſt be acknowledged that they were in the right in ſome reſpects: what is there, for inſtance, more uſeful than luxury  for the ſupport of a great many families, who would ſtarve, if great Lords and Ladies ſpent but little? Our Paulicians might argue this in order to prove this ſyſtem of two principles. The bad, would they ſay, produced luxury; the good principle conſented to it as a compenſation for ſomething good, which his adverſary ſuffered him to produce, and beſides he kept to himſelf the right to make ſome advantage of the evil production. But if he had been alone, neither luxury nor any other vice had ever exiſted among men: virtue pure and unmixed had been our good, the object of our deſires, and our happineſs.

Let us obſerve by the by, that no man ought to wonder that Cicero and Plutarch argued as they did againſt the Stoicks: for though that Sect of Philoſophers admitted two principles (71), God and matter, God as an active, and matter as a paſſive principle, yet they did not hold that matter was a bad principle, wherein they were more orthodox than Arnobius. Quid enim, ſays he (72), ſi prima materies quæ in rerum quatuor elementa digeſta eſt, miſeriarum omnium cauſas ſais continet in rationibus involutas. i. e. " But what, " if matter, which conſiſts of the four elements, " contains within itſelf the cauſes of all manner of " miſeries?"

The bulk of the Heathens were not expoſed to the objections I have mentioned; for their publick religion was grounded on theſe two Principles, the firſt, that ſome Gods were benevolent, and the others malevolent; the other, that in the general, the Gods were not always ſwayed by the ſame paſſions: that they were angry, and appeaſed by turns: that they changed ſides; and ſome undertook to favour a nation, and others to perſecute it; in a word, that they thwarted each other's deſigns (73). By this Hypotheſis, the Hiſtory of mankind could be as eaſily accounted for, as by Zoroaſter's. Arnobius has very effectually refuted this Syſtem of two kinds of Gods, ſome benevolent, others malevolent. But he has gone too far, for he urges a Principle, which favours the Manichean Syſtem. He aſſerts, without any reſtriction, that the nature of God does not ſuffer him to vex any one. Whence then, might he have been aſked, come plagues and famines? Do not the Chriſtians call them the ſcourges of God? However it be, let us tranſcribe his own words (74): Quod dici à vobis accepimus, eſſe quoſdam ex Diis bonos, alios autem malos, & ad nocendi libidinem promptiores: illiſque ut proſint, his vero ne noceant, ſacrorum ſollemnia miniſtrari: quanam iſtud ratione dicitur, intelligere confitemur non poſſe. Nam Deos benigniſſimos dicere, leneſque habere naturas, & ſanctum, & religioſum & verum eſt: malos autem, & lævos nequaquam ſumendum eſt auribus; ideò quoniam divina illa vis ab nocendi procul eſt dimota & disjuncta natura. Quidquid autem potis eſt cauſam calamitatis inferre, quid ſit primùm videndum eſt, & ab Dei nomine longiſſima debet differitate ſeponi. Itaque ut vobis commodemus aſſenſum, dextrarum, finiſtrarumque rerum Deos eſſe fautores, ulla nec ſic ratio eſt, cur alios alliciatis ad proſpera, alios verò, ne noceant ſacrificiis commulceatis & præmiis. Primùm quòd Dii boni male non queunt facere, etiam ſi nullo fuerint honore mactati. Quidquid enim mite eſt, placidumque natura, ab nocendi procul eſt uſu, & cogitatione diſcretum: malus verò comprimere ſuam ferociam neſcit, quamvis gregibus mille, & mille alliciatur altaribus. Neque enim in dulcedinem vertere amaritudo ſe poteſt: aut ariditas in humorem, calor ignis in frigora: aut quod rei cuicumque contrarium eſt, id quod ſibi contrarium eſt, ſumere in ſuam atque immutare naturam. Ut ſi manu viperam mulceas, venenato blandiaris aut ſcorpio, petat illa te morſu, hic contractus aculeum figat: nihilque illa profit alluſio, cùm ad nocendum res ambæ non ſtimulis exagitentur irarum, ſed quadam proprietate naturæ. Ita nihil prodeſt promereri velle per hoſtias Deos lævos, cùm ſive illud feceris, ſive contrà non feceris, agant ſuam naturam, & ad ea quæ facti ſunt ingenitis legibus, & quadam neceſſitate ducantur. Quid quòd iſto modo utrique Dii definunt eſſe ſuis in viribus, & ſuis in qualitatibus permanere. Nam ſi bonis ut proſint, res divina conficitur, aliis autem ne noceant, iiſdem rationibus ſupplicatur: ſequitur ut intelligi debeat, nihil dexteros profuturos, nulla ſi acceperint munera, ſierique ex hoc malos: malos autem ſi acceperint, nocendi poſituros mentem, ſierique ex hoc bonos. Atque ita producitur res eo, ut neque hi dexteri, neque illi ſint lævi: aut, quod fieri non poteſt, utrique ipſi ſint dexteri, & utrique iterum lævi, i. e. " I cannot comprehend what " I have heard you aſſert, that ſome Gods are " good, and others bad, and inclined to hurt; and " that divine worſhip is paid them, to ingage the " former to do men good, and diſſuade the latter " from hurting. For it is pious, religious, and true " to aſſert, that the Gods are moſt kind and bene- " volent by their own nature; nor ought we ſo much " as to hear them ſtiled bad, and unkind; becauſe " their divine nature is intirely averſe from all diſ- " poſition to do ill. Whatever can be the cauſe of " miſery, muſt be far remote from the nature of the " Gods. But though we ſhould grant you, that the " Gods are the Authors both of good and evil, yet " even then there would be no reaſon to allure them " by ſacrifices and offerings, to obtain favours from " ſome, and prevent the others from doing us miſ- " chief. For the good Gods could do no harm, " though they were not worſhipped: whatever is be- " nevolent and kind by its own nature, cannot have " even the leaſt thought to hurt; and a malevolent " Being cannot conquer its natural fierceneſs, though " it were courted with thouſands and thouſands of " ſacrifices. For bitterneſs cannot turn itſelf into " ſweetneſs, nor dryneſs into moiſture, nor the heat " of fire into cold. Though you ſtroak a viper, or " coax the venomous ſcorpion, the former will cer- " tainly bite you, and the latter ſting you; nor will " your coaxing prevent your being hurt by them, for " neither of them are provoked to do hurt by any " paſſion of anger, but by their own nature. It is " therefore to no purpoſe to ſooth the malevolent " Gods with ſacrifices, ſince whether you offer them " or not, they will always act according to their own " nature, and follow their inward diſpoſitions, which " urge them on unavoidably. But farther, according " to your Syſtem, both the good and the bad Gods " muſt ceaſe to be what they were by their own na- " ture; for if a divine worſhip is paid to the good, " that they might be uſeful, and to the bad, that " they might not hurt; it follows from thence, that " the benevolent Gods would do no good if they " were not worſhipped, whereby they become bad; " and that the malevolent, if they were worſhipped, " would alter their reſolution of doing harm, and " thus they would become good. So that the matter " is now reduced to this; either that the former are " not good, nor the latter bad; or, which is impoſ- " ſible, that they are both benevolent, and malevo- " lent, at the ſame time." Though this paſſage of Arnobius favours the Manicheans, yet it contains an obſervation which muſt perplex them, and which overthrows their whole worſhip. For the reaſon why they admitted a bad principle was, that they imagined the good principle could do no harm; they thought therefore that the other could do no good; ſo that their worſhip proved needleſs: the benevolent God would never have puniſhed their want of religion, and they could never render the malevolent God propitious. Arnobius argues this objection home againſt the Heathens: but they might have anſwered him, that the fierceſt tyrants make a very great difference between thoſe who honour them, and thoſe who deſpiſe them, and that the meekeſt Kings make the ſame difference between thoſe who revere them, and thoſe who offend them: and that it is thus we ought to judge of the benevolent and malevolent Gods. I do not think that the ſyſtem of Zoroaſter, or that of the Manicheans, are liable to this objection, if a man would argue coherently againſt them.

[H] The Orthodox ſeem to admit two Principles.] It is

(70) See what I have obſerved above, rem. [E], againſt Lactantius. All that Plutarch urges here, does wonderfully corroborate my refutation of that Father's Doctrine.

 See upon Luxury, the ingenious and reverend Mr. Warburton's Divine Legation of Moſes, &c. book 1. ſect. 6. where he has admirably well refuted what Mr. Bayle, and the Author of the Fable of the Bees, have aſſerted, concerning the uſefulneſs of luxury as a vice, which he proves to be only " the " uſing (and " thereby abu- " ſing) the gifts " of Providence, " to the injury " of the Uſer, " either in his " own perſon or " fortune, or to " the injury of " any other, to- " wards whom " he ſtands in " any relation " which obliges " him to aid " and aſſiſ- " tance." p. 84.

(71) Diog. Laert. lib. 7. num. 134. whereupon ſee the Commentators, and Lipſius, Phyſ. Stoic. lib. 2. Diſſer. 2.

(72) Arnob. lib. 1. adverſus Gentes, p. 6.

(73) Sæpe premente Deo, fert Deus alter opem. Mulciber in Trojam, pro Trojâ ſtabat Apollo: Æqua Venus Teucris, Pallas iniqua fuit. Oderat Æneam propior Saturnia Turno: Ille tamen Veneris numine tutus erat. Sæpe ferox cautum petiit Neptunus Ulyſſem: Eripuit patruo ſæpe Minerva ſuo. Ovid. Triſt. lib. 1. eleg. 2. ver. 4.

(74) Arnobius, lib. 7. p. m. 228, 229. See the paſſage from Aulus Gellius, in the article MANICHEANS, quotation (34).

ing to the Manicheans God is the Author of ſin [I]. We ſhall alſo refute a modern Writer, who denied that the Doctrine, which makes God the Author of ſin, leads to irreligion. He is an opinion, which has always been admitted among the Chriſtians, that the Devil is the Author of all the falſe religions, that it is he who urges the Hereticks to dogmatize, that it is he who inſpires men with errors, ſuperſtitions, ſchiſmatical inclinations, lewdneſs, covetouſneſs, intemperance, in a word, who puts them upon all the crimes that are committed in the world: that it was he who made Eve and her huſband loſe their innocence; which fall became the cauſe of all the moral evil, and of all the miſeries to which man is ſubject. The Devil therefore is the firſt principle of evil: but as he is not from eternity, nor uncreated, he is not the firſt bad principle in the ſenſe of the Manicheans. This gave theſe Hereticks I know not what pretence to boaſt, and to inſult the Orthodox. You do the benevolent God a much greater injury, might they ſay, than we do, for you ſuppoſe him the cauſe and creator of the bad Principle; you pretend that he produced him, and that whereas he might have ſtopt him at his firſt ſetting out on his wicked proceedings, yet he ſuffered him to get ſo great an Empire upon earth, that mankind being divided into two cities, that of God, and that of the Devil (75), the former has always been very ſmall, and even for many ages ſo ſmall, that it had not two inhabitants, againſt the other two millions. We are not obliged to explain why our bad Principle is ſo wicked: for when an uncreated Being is ſuch or ſuch, one cannot ſay why it is ſuch: it is its nature: we muſt of neceſſity ſtop there. But with regard to the qualities of a creature, we ought to enquire into the reaſons of them, nor can we find them any where but in the cauſe that produced it. You muſt maintain then, that God is the cauſe of the Devil's wickedneſs; that he produced it himſelf; or that he put the ſeeds of it into the ſoil he created. Now this is doing an infinitely greater injury to God, than we do, by aſſerting that he is not the only independent and neceſſary Being. This makes all thoſe objections appear again, which we have diſplayed above, concerning the fall of the firſt man: it is needleſs therefore to inſiſt any longer upon them. We muſt humbly acknowledge, that all our philoſophy is put to a non-plus here, and that its weakneſs ought to lead us to the light of divine revelation, where alone we can find a firm ground to caſt our anchor. Obſerve that theſe Hereticks made an ill uſe of thoſe paſſages of the ſcripture, in which the Devil is called the Prince of this world (76), and the God of this world (77).

(75) See St. Auguſtin's books, de Civitate Dei.

(76) St. John's Goſpel, chap. 14. ver. 30.

(77) 2d Epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. 4. ver. 4.

[I] In what ſenſe one cannot ſay, that according to the Manicheans, God is the Author of ſin.] The Orthodox ſpeak conſtantly in the ſame ſtrain, when they mention this; it has been the cuſtom, time out of mind, to ſay that to be a Manichean, and to make God the Author of ſin, are two expreſſions, which ſignify one and the ſame thing, and when one Chriſtian Sect charges the other with making God the Author of ſin, they never fail to charge them alſo with Manicheiſm in that reſpect. This charge is well grounded in one ſenſe, ſince it is true, that the followers of Manes acknowledge, that an eternal Being is the cauſe of ſin. But if you turn the tables, you will find, that in another ſenſe they may maintain, that they do not make God the Author of ſin: for they may aſſert, that the good Principle alone deſerves the name of God, and that this great and noble name ought never to be given to the bad Principle; and that conſequently, of all Syſtems, theirs alone clears God of all imputation of evil: all the reſt charge him with it, as the Miniſter I have quoted above owns. "If it be but ſuppoſed, ſays he "(78), that God made a ſcheme of all the events "that were or are to happen throughout all eternity, "and that he ſuffered all the evils, diſorders, and "crimes, which prevail in the world, to be a part of "his ſcheme, this is enough. No man will be perſuaded, that ſo many crimes came accidentally, "and by mere chance, to be a part of the ſcheme of "Providence: and if they were a part of it by the "diſpenſation of God's infinite wiſdom, let that diſpenſation be called permiſſion, or will, you can "never be able to ſilence inquiſitive and bold "men; you will never clearly perceive, that this is "conſiſtent with that hatred, and averſion which "God otherwiſe ſhews for ſin; you will never prevent the Free-thinkers from charging Chriſtianity "with making God the author of ſin: for all men's "common ſenſe leads them to this: namely, to believe, that he, who could prevent the firſt man's "fall as eaſily as he permitted it, and who opened "all thoſe ways in which men have erred ſince, "which he could eaſily ſhut up, may be conſidered "as the author of an evil, which he ought to have "prevented according to his own principles, and to "the hatred he has for ſin, and which he might "have prevented without the leaſt trouble." He ſuppoſes afterwards that the ſcientia media will be objected to him, and he anſwers thus. "This does by no "means remove the difficulty. For I may always "ſay, ſince it be ſo, that God foreſaw that Adam "being placed in ſuch ſad circumſtances, would ruin "himſelf, and numberleſs millions of men, by his "free will, and yet placed him in thoſe ſad circumſtances; it is plain, that he is the firſt author of "all thoſe evils. A Prince, who ſhould know for "certain, that if he puts a man with a ſword in his "hand amidſt a crowd of people, he will raiſe a ſedition, and occaſion a battle in which ten thouſand "men will be killed, might be juſtly conſidered as "the firſt Author of all theſe murders. It were to "no purpoſe for him to ſay, I did not order that "man to uſe his ſword, I did not command him to "raiſe a ſedition: on the contrary, I forbad it him: "I have not moved his arm to kill, nor framed his "voice to encourage men to battle. He will always "be anſwered, you knew very well, and with certainty, that that man placed in ſuch circumſtances, "would occaſion all thoſe misfortunes. It was in "your power to put him in more favourable circumſtances, which had been productive of all kinds of "goods. I am fully perſuaded that that Prince "would have nothing to ſay in his own defence, that "were proper to ſuppreſs the murmurings of his people. And if men will be ſincere, they muſt confeſs, that nothing can be anſwered in God's behalf, "proper to ſatisfy our minds . . . . . (79). Laſtly, "even Socinus's God may be charged with being the "author of ſin . . . . (80). To conclude, I maintain, that there is no ſyſtem free from difficulties, "from St. Auguſtin's God, down to the God of Epicurus, who minded nothing, or to Ariſtotle's God, "whoſe care did not extend farther than the ſphere "of the Moon. For as ſoon as you acknowledge a "general providence, whoſe cares extend to every "thing, in what manner ſoever you conceive it, the "difficulties appear again, and when you think you "have ſhut them out at one gate, they creep in thro' "another." This is ſpeaking very plain. But if this Miniſter had thought of the God of the Manicheans, I mean the good principle which they called God by way of eminence, would not this have obliged him not to expreſs himſelf quite ſo poſitively, and to acknowledge, that their Hypotheſis, at leaſt, clears God; for it charges the bad principle with all the evil? It may be of ſome uſe to know how that Miniſter anſwered thoſe who cenſured him. "We "find alſo among that heap of trifles, adds Monſieur "Jurieu (81), an obſervation upon what I have aſſert-"ed ſomewhere, that whatever method be followed it "will never be able to remove all the difficulties, "which the objections of the prophane raiſe in our "minds, with regard to God's providence concerning "ſin. If theſe Gentlemen know of a method which "perfectly clears up all theſe difficulties, we ſhall be "obliged to them, if they will acquaint us with it."

(78) Jurieu, Jugement ſur les Methodes rigides & relachees, p. 68, 69.

(79) Ibid. p. 72.

(80) Ibid. p. 73.

(81) Jurieu, 2 Apologie, p. 3. col. 2. quoted by Saurin, Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 340.

You are in the wrong, will ſome ſay to me, to acknowledge that the ſyſtem of the Manicheans clears God: for if they pretend that he made an agreement with the bad principle, as you aſſerted above (82), he conſented to the introduction of evil, he engaged himſelf by articles to ſuffer it, and he will'd poſitively, that all the crimes and all the misfortunes of mankind be produced. This is an hea-

(82) Quotation (19) See alſo the article MANICHEANS, rem. [D], at the firſt a-linea or break.

He has even aſſerted that that doctrine exalts God to the higheſt degree of greatneſs, that can be imagined. The antient Fathers knew very well that the queſtion concerning the origin vier charge againſt him, than if it were ſaid, with the Socinians, that he did not know, whether the free creature would ſin or not: and that if he reſolved to run the riſk of it, it was becauſe he had great hopes that the knowledge his creature enjoyed, together with his threatnings, would prevent it from doing evil. I do not think that a Manichean would be much puzzled by that difficulty. For in the firſt place, he might ſay, that God made that agreement, becauſe otherwiſe it would never have been in his power to do the creature any good. There is then a very great difference between Manicheiſm and Socinianiſm. The Socinian owns, that though God could eaſily prevent man's being guilty and miſerable, yet he ſuffered him to fall both into ſin and into miſery. But the Manichean ſuppoſes that he conſented to that fall, only out of a mere neceſſity, and to avoid a greater evil. In the ſecond place one might deny that God ever made an agreement with the bad principle, and aſſert, that with all his ſtrength he does continually and without end oppoſe the ſin and the miſery of the creature, with a deſign to make it perfectly holy, and perfectly content; but that the bad principle, exerting alſo on his part all his power with a quite contrary deſign, there ariſes from this continual ſtrife, that mixture of good and evil which we obſerve in this world; juſt as the action and reaction of cold and heat produce a mixed quality. Apply to this what the ſchoolmen teach of the nature of thoſe mixed bodies, which ariſe from the ſtrife of the elements. I am ſenſible that both theſe expoſitions open a frightful abyſs of difficulties before us: but the queſtion here is only whether or not that hypotheſis clears God. Now theſe wretched Hereticks pretend, that any difficulty whatſoever is trifling in compariſon to that which ariſes from making God the Author of ſin: and it is certain that all the Chriſtians abhor the thought of owning him the cauſe of it.

WHETHER or not the Doctrine which ſuppoſes God the Author of ſin, would lead men to Atheiſm.

The Jeſuits maintain (83), it were better to be an Atheiſt, and to acknowledge no God, than to pay a Divine worſhip to a nature, which forbids man to do evil, and yet makes him commit it, and then puniſhes him for it. They aſſert, that the God of Epicurus is more innocent, and if one may ſay ſo, more a God, than ſuch a one would be. And when the Marcionites and the Manicheans took it into their heads to imagine a ſecond God, whom they ſuppoſed the author of all evils, they worſhipped another, who beſtowed all manner of good. Whereas yours, ſay the Jeſuits of the Reformed, is worſe than men. They, on whom theſe imputations are laid, do not explode thoſe conſequences; they explode only the principle, from which they are inferred: they aſſert only that one cannot without the moſt notorious calumny charge them with making God the author of ſin (84). The Jeſuits pretend that Calvin's Doctrine with regard to Predeſtination is attended with ſuch conſequences as entirely deſtroys the notion we ought to have of God, and leads afterwards directly to Atheiſm (85). The Miniſter, who anſwered Monſieur Maimbourg, convicted him of giving an unfair account of Calvin's Doctrine. He ought to have ſtopt there: for when he pretends that Monſieur Maimbourg drew a falſe conſequence from the Doctrine with which he had charged Calvin, he argues moſt wretchedly. Let the reader judge of it (86). Beſides this, I maintain, that his conſequence is wrong, and that there is nothing more abſurd, and leſs theological, than the inference which the Sieur Maimbourg pretends to draw from the doctrine of theſe Divines: namely, that it entirely deſtroys the notion we ought to have of God, and leads afterwards to Atheiſm. Was there any thing ſaid more raſhly? Let us ſuppoſe the worſt. If that doctrine deſtroys the notion we ought to have of God, it is becauſe it repreſents to us a God, cruel, unjuſt, chaſtiſing and puniſhing innocent creatures with everlaſting torments. And this is exactly what the Sieur Maimbourg means, namely, that this deſtroys the notion of God, becauſe in the notion of God are contained the ideas of the attributes of goodneſs, juſtice, and equity. But in good conſcience, does that doctrine lead to Atheiſm, which repreſents God to us under the notion of a cruel Being, of a tyrant, who exerts his right with an exceſſive ſeverity? . . . . It is a fooliſh imagination to aſſert, that a Doctrine leads to Atheiſm, which ſuppoſes that God is concerned in every thing (87), which makes him to be the cauſe of all things, which makes him be himſelf the ultimate end of all his own actions, which exalts him above the creatures, ſo as that he may deal with them according to ſuch rules as ſeem even unjuſt to the ſenſe of the fleſh. That opinion of the Supralapſarians is ſo far from leading to Atheiſm, that on the contrary it extolls the Deity to the higheſt degree of grandeur and exaltation that can be imagined. For it does ſo humble the creature before the Creator, that according to this ſyſtem the Creator is not bound to the creature by any laws whatſoever, but may diſpoſe of it as he pleaſes, and make it ſubſervient to his own glory by ſuch means as he thinks proper, and the creature as not the leaſt right to contradict him.

(87) And yet Spinoziſm, which ſuppoſes that all things are God himſelf, is a moſt execrable Atheiſm.

This is really the moſt monſtrous doctrine, and the moſt abſurd paradox, that was ever aſſerted in Divinity; and I am very much miſtaken if any celebrated Divine ever ſaid ſuch a thing. Men have turned themſelves all ways imaginable, in order to explain God's influence over the actions of ſinners: they have adhered to the hypotheſis of an abſolute Predeſtination, when they thought it was not inconſiſtent with God's holineſs: but they exploded it as ſoon as they imagined it affected it in the leaſt. They who did not perceive that free will is inconſiſtent with a phyſical predetermination, have conſtantly taught that predetermination: but they who imagined it was inconſiſtent with free will, have exploded it, and admitted only a concomitant and indetermining concurrence. They who imagined that all kind of concurrence is inconſiſtent with the creature's liberty, ſuppoſed it the only cauſe of its own actions (88). Nothing determined them to ſuppoſe it, but the thought, that all the decrees, by which God would concern himſelf in the operations of our will, would render events neceſſary, ſo that our wicked actions would be no leſs an effect of God's will than of the creatures (89). They did not find their account in maintaining that ſin is no being, that it is a mere privation, a mere nothing, which has no efficient but only a deficient (90) cauſe. Laſtly, men have been brought to maintain, that God cannot foreſee the free actions of the creature. Why ſo many ſuppoſitions? What has been the meaſure and rule of all theſe proceedings? It was the deſire of clearing God: men underſtood moſt evidently, that the whole of religion is concerned in this queſtion; and that if it were once taught that God is the author of ſin, it would unavoidably lead men to Atheiſm. And indeed all the Chriſtian Sects, which are charged by their adverſaries with teaching that doctrine, clear themſelves from it as from an horrid blaſphemy and an execrable impiety, and complain of being moſt wickedly ſlandered. And yet we have here a Miniſter, who comes and tells us very gravely, that it is a doctrine, which extols the Deity to the higheſt degree of grandeur and exaltation that can be imagined. Such is the commendation he does not ſcruple to give to a doctrine, which repreſents to us a God, cruel, unjuſt, chaſtiſing and puniſhing INNOCENT creatures with everlaſting torments. He calls our conſcience to witneſs whether the notion of a tyrant God leads us to Atheiſm. And ſuppoſing the worſt, that is to ſay, ſuppoſing that Maimbourg was in the right to aſſert, that according to Calvin, God created moſt men with a deſign to damn them, not becauſe they deſerved it by their crimes, but becauſe ſuch was his will and pleaſure, and that he foreſaw their damnation only becauſe he had decreed it, before he foreſaw their crimes (91); ſuppoſing, I ſay, that Maimbourg charges Calvin very juſtly with aſſerting that they who ſuffer the torments of hell are guiltleſs creatures (92), and conſequently that God is the author of their ſins, Monſieur Jurieu cannot bear that Maimbourg ſhould infer from thence, Therefore Calvin's doctrine deſtroys the notion we ought to have of God, and leads afterwards directly to Atheiſm. He does not pretend only, that there never was any thing more raſh and inconſiderate than that inference (93); he ſtyles it, a fooliſh

(88) Durand de S. Portieu, and ſeveral other famous Divines ſuppoſe it. See a Treatiſe of Monſieur de Lannoi, an abridgment of which is inſerted in Monſieur Papin's Eſſais de Theologie, printed in the year 1687.

(89) See the book of the Capuchin Lewis de Dole, intitled, Diſputatio quadripartita de modo conjunctionis concurſuum Dei & creaturæ ad actus liberos ordinis naturalis, præſertim vero ad pravos, adverſus determinantium & aſſertorum ſcientiæ mediæ modernorum opiniones. That book was printed at Lyons in the year 1634, in 4to.

(90) See againſt all this Monſieur Papin's Eſſais de Theologie, in the Treatiſe againſt Phyſical Predetermination.

(91) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformat. part 1. chap. 19. p. 241.

(92) Ibid. p. 246.

(93) Ibidem.

(83) Father Adam, quoted by Daillé, Replique à Adam & à Cottibi, part 2. chap. 1. p. 2, 3.

(84) See the ſame Monſieur Daillé, throughout that chapter.

(85) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, Liv. 1. p. m. 73. See alſo p. 56.

(86) Jurieu, Apologie pour les Reformateurs, part 1. chap. 19. p. 245, 246. edit. in 4to.

origin of evil is extremely perplexed [K]. They could not ſolve it by the Hypotheſis of the peculiar to that Miniſter. That opinion of the Supralapſarians, ſays he (104), is ſo far from leading to Atheiſm, that on the contrary it extolls the Deity to the higheſt degree of grandeur and exaltation, that can be imagined. For it does ſo humble the creature before the Creator, that according to this ſyſtem, the Creator is not bound to the creature by any laws whatſoever, but may diſpoſe of it as he pleaſes, and make it ſubſervient to his own glory by ſuch means as he thinks proper; and the creature has not the leaſt right to contradict him. This doctrine is otherwiſe ſubject to many inconveniencies, I own it, it abounds with difficulties, which cannot be well ſolved; it has ſomething harſh and cruel in it, which ſhocks us. Wherefore St. Auguſtin's Hypotheſis is doubtleſs preferable to it. What a ſtrange doctrine have we here! What! a Profeſſor of Divinity dares to aſſert, that there are ſyſtems unqueſtionably preferable to that, which extolls the Deity to the higheſt degree of grandeur and exaltation that can be conceived? Is it not certain that all our thoughts muſt aim, not only at the glory of God, but alſo at his greateſt glory? Muſt not our opinions and our actions tend ad majorem Dei gloriam? This muſt not be the motto of a particular company, but of all corporations, of all ſocieties, and even of all private perſons, of each individual. So that a Divine, who on the one hand confeſſes, that the ſyſtem of the Supralapſarians tends to the greateſt glory of God, and promotes it better than any other Hypotheſis, and who aſſerts on the other hand, that St. Auguſtin's Hypotheſis is doubtleſs preferable, is guilty of a prophane and blaſphemous thought. This prophanation cannot be excuſed by conſidering, that the Supralapſarian ſyſtem abounds with ſhocking difficulties; for a few difficulties, more or leſs, do not make it lawful to prefer the leſſer glory of God to the greater, and to place the ſovereign Being in an inferior degree of grandeur and exaltation. If St. Auguſtin's ſyſtem were eaſy and ſmooth, we ſhould not ſo much wonder at the author's bad taſte; but he owns himſelf, that he meets with unqueſtionable difficulties in it, and that though ready to ſink under the load he keeps to that ſyſtem, only becauſe the remiſs methods cannot extricate him (105). For the ſame reaſon he ſhould be a Supralapſarian: for if the ſuppoſition of the Jeſuits do not remove the difficulties of St. Auguſtin's ſyſtem, it is plain alſo, that that Father's Hypotheſis does not move the ſhocking difficulties of the Supralapſarian, ſcheme. All things being duly weighed and conſidered, it is found upon the whole, that the Supralapſarians and they who are called Infralapſarians, do after all hold the ſame ſyſtem; they cannot hurt each other much; the arguments ad hominem and the retortions extricate them out of every objection. You have here in a few words the character of that Doctor: there is no accuracy in his cenſures; no connection in his doctrines; all abounds with incoherencies; inconſiſtencies and flat contradictions run through all his works. They who will be at the pains to examine them with attention, will meet every moment with matter for ſuch a cenſure as this is.

Let us infer from all this, that a Manichean, who will make an advantage of the great application with which the Divines endeavour to invent ſyſtems which may clear God, and of their reſolution never to acknowledge that they make God the author of ſin, will always maintain boldly and with confidence, that that rock is more terrible than any other. Conſider well what has been objected to Chryſippus, who aſſerted (106), it is not without deſign that there are ſome uſeleſs, hurtful, and miſerable perſons. If it be ſo, replied Plutarch (107), what is Jupiter? I mean Chryſippus's Jupiter, if he puniſhes a thing, which is not of itſelf, nor uſeleſs. For vice, according to Chryſippus's opinion, would not be to blame; and on the contrary, Jupiter would be to blame, if he made vice to no purpoſe, or if he puniſhed it, having made it for ſome purpoſe.

[K] The . . Fathers were not ignorant that the queſtion concerning the origin of evil is extremely perplexed.] One paſſage only from Origen, will be inſtead of all the quotations I could bring in here. Ἐπεὶ δ' ἄλλος τις τόπος

(94) Ibid.

(95) Ibid. p. 247.

(96) Ibid.

(97) Ibid. p. 245.

(98) Scaurus apud Senecam, Controverſ. 28. p. m. 272.

(99) Jurieu, Apol. pour la Reformat. p. 244, 245.

(100) See the Apol. pour la Reformat. part 1. chap. 19. p. 246, 247.

(101) Nec multo abſurdiora ſunt ea quæ poetarum vocibus fuſa, ipſa ſuavitate nocuerunt, qui & ira inflammatos, & libidine furentes induxerunt Deos, feceruntque ut eorum bella, pugnas, prælia, vulnera videremus: edia præterea, diſſidia, diſcordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, lamentationes, effuſas in omni intemperantiâ libidines, adulteria, vincula, cum humano genere concubitus, mortaleſque ex immortali procreatos. Cicero, lib. 1. de Nat. Deor. cap. 16.

(102) See the rem. [C] of the art. ÆGIALEUS, and the remarks [X] and [Y] of the article HELENA.

(103) Obſerve, that if it be maintained, as the Proteſtants do, that man is the only cauſe or author of his ſin, the diſtinction they make between God, conſidered as a lawgiver, and as the diſpenſer of events, holds good, notwithſtanding what Pufendorf objects in p. 290, of his Jus feciale divinum, &c.

(104) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformat. part 1. chap. 19. p. 246.

(105) See above, quotation (51).

(106) Plut. de Stoicor. Repugn. p. 1051.

(107) Πεῖός τις ὁ Ζεύς, λέγω δὲ τὸ Χρυσίππου, κολάζων πρᾶγμα, μήτε ἀφ' αὑτοῦ, μήτε ἀχρήστως γινόμενον; ἢ μὲν γὰρ κακία πάντως ἀνεγκλήτους ἔχει κατὰ τὸν τοῦ Χρυσίππου λόγον· ὁ δὲ Ζεὺς εἰ, κλητέος εἴτε ἀχρήστου ὄσας τὴν κακίαν πεποίηκεν, εἴτε ποιήσας ἂν ἀχρήστως, κολάζει. Qualis eſt Jupiter (de Chryſippeo loquor) rem puniens neque ultro neque inutiliter factam? nam Chryſippi ratio efficit vitia omnino culpanda non eſſe, ſed Jovem; ſive is fecit vitia, quæ nihil prodeſſent: ſive punit, cum feciſſet non inutilia. Idem, ibid.

the Platoniſts, which after all is only a branch of the Manichean ſyſtem [L], ſince they admitted two principles: the Fathers were therefore obliged to have recourſe to the privileges of man's free will: but the more one reflects on that method of ſolving the difficulty, the more one finds, that our natural reaſon and philoſophy furniſh us only wherewithal τόπῳ τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἐξετάσεως διόμενος, δυσθήρατός ἐστι τῇ φύσει ἡμῶν, ἐν τούτοις κἀ ἡ τῶν κακῶν ταχθεὶη ἂν γένεσις, i. e. "If there be any difficult queſtion, it is certain-

(108) Origines contra Celſum, lib. 4. p. 207. "ly that of the origin of evil (108)."

[L] The Hypotheſis of the Platoniſts, which after all is only a branch of the Manichee Syſtem.] I ſhall conſider this hypotheſis here, only as it has been explained Maximus Tyrius, in his treatiſe on the the queſtion, Whence come Evils, ſince God is the Author of all that is Good (109)? This Author ſuppoſes, that in order to know the cauſe of the good things which are in this world, there is no occaſion to conſult the Oracle, ſince it is plain enough that they come from God, and that the evils cannot deſcend from Heaven, where there are no envious natures (110); but that in order to know whence the evils come, it is neceſſary to go to the Soothſayers, that is to ſay, to conſult Jupiter, Apollo, or ſuch other Deity, who propheſies, and takes care of the things of this world. He reckons up afterwards the miſeries to which our body is ſubject, whence he infers (111), that man is the moſt unfortunate of all the living creatures.

(109) Τὸ θεῷ τὰ ἀγαθὰ ποιοῦντος, πόθεν τὰ κακά. Cum Deus bona faciat, unde ſint mala. This is the Title of Maximus Tyrius's 25th Diſſertation.

(110) Οὐ γὰρ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ μὰ Δία, οὐκ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. φθόνος γὰρ ἔξω-θεν τοῦ (See hereunder quotation (118) χορεῖ ἵσται. Non enim e cœlo me hercules, non e cœlo. Exulat enim illic invidia. Maxim. Tyrius, Diſſertatione 25, p. m. 253.

(111) Idem, ib. p. 253.

'Ουδὲν ἀκιδνότερον γαῖα τρέφει ἀνθρώποιο,
Nil nutrit tellus homine infelicius uno.

He conſiders next, the numberleſs evils which perſecute our ſoul; and he pretends, that the anſwer of the fatidick Gods, who have been conſulted, is, that men are very much in the wrong, to charge God with being the cauſe of their misfortunes, ſince they themſelves are the Authors of them, by their own fault. He quotes two lines of Homer to repreſent this (112). Τί ἂν ἔτι πρὸς ταῦτα ἀποκρίναιτο ὁ Ζεὺς, ἢ ὁ Ἀπόλλων, ἤ τις ἄλλος μαντικὸς θεὸς; ἀκούσωμεν τοῦ ὑποφάτου λέγοντος, (112) Idem, ib.

Ἐξ ἡμέων γάρ φασι κάκ' ἔμμεναι. οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ
Σφῇσιν ἀτασθαλίῃσιν ὑπὲρ μόρον ἄλγε' ἔχουσι.

Quid quæſo ad iſta aut Jupiter, aut Apollo reſpondebit, aut alius fatidicus Deus? Audiamus quid eorum interpres dicat:

Aſſcribunt ſuperis homines mala, cum tamen ipſi
Criminibus propriis ſibi talia damna crearint *.

* The full ſenſe of this paſſage is given, in the words that go before it.

Heaven and Earth, continues he, are two different places. There are no evils in heaven, and upon earth there is a mixture of evils and goods; but in ſuch a manner, that the goods come from heaven, and the evils ariſe from a depravation natural to the earth, which depravation is of two kinds, the one conſiſting in the properties of matter, the other in the ſoul's free-will: ἢ τὰ μὲν ἀγαθὰ, ἐπίῤῥυτα ἐκ τῆς ἑτέρας· τὰ δὲ κακὰ, ἐξ αὐτεφυοῦς μοχθηρίας ἀνίσταται. διτὴ δὲ αὕτη, ἡ μὲν ὕλης πάθος, ἡ δὲ, ψυχῆς ἐξουσία. Ita ut bona quidem è cœlo veniant: mala vero (ex naturali depravatione terræ inſitâ †) improbitas vero ea duplex; aut enim corrupta materiæ effectio eſt, aut animæ licentia (113).

† Theſe words are left out in my edition of Mr. Bayle's Dict. which is that of Paris 1734.

(113) Idem, ib. p. 256.

As to the firſt kind of theſe depravations, he obſerves, that matter muſt be conſidered as a ſubject on which a good Artificer works: all the beauties it acquires muſt be aſcribed to art: but as there are works upon earth, which are not as they ſhould be, theſe irregularities muſt not be imputed to the Artificer. for his intention never deviates from the rules of his art, no more than a Legiſlator's intention does from the rules of juſtice; it muſt even be remembered, that the divine intelligence does more happily hit its ſcope, than human art does. He makes uſe afterwards of a compariſon; which is, that in Mechanicks there are ſome things which are the chief object of the art, and are directly aimed at, and others which are not an effect of the art, but only conſequences following from the modifications of matter. Such are the ſparks of fire which fly about, when a piece of hot iron is beating upon the anvil. They are no part of the Smith's deſign, but only accidental conſequences, which ariſe from the Smith's action, without his aiming at them, and which are annexed to the properties of iron. Thus we muſt alſo hold, that the evils we obſerve upon earth, are not the work of the divine art; the Artificer aims firſt and directly at the conſtruction of the world; but it happens that theſe evils emanate neceſſarily from his work. The Author adds an obſervation, which is not very well connected with this. He aſſerts, that the Artificer gives the name of Conſervation of the World to thoſe evils we complain of, and which we ſtyle ruins and devaſtations. He pretends, that the architect of this world, deſigns the preſervation of the whole, and that for the good of the whole, it is neceſſary the parts ſhould be afflicted. Ταῦτα ὁ τεχνίτης καλεῖ σωτηρίαν τοῦ ὅλου· μέλει γὰρ αὐτῷ τοῦ ὅλου· τὸ δὲ μέρος ἀνάγκη κακοῦσθαι ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὅλου. *Ea conſummationem * totius vocat opifex. Quia totum reſpicit, cujus cauſa neceſſe eſt corrumpi partes* (114). Plagues, inundations, earth-quakes, the fires of Mount Ætna, do damage to ſome parts of the whole, and ſerve to produce ſome others: for, as Heraclitus obſerved, theſe live by the death of thoſe, and thoſe die by the life of theſe. The death of the earth makes the fire live, that of the fire makes the air live, that of the air makes the water live, and that of water makes the earth live (115). Why then, might one have aſked Maximus Tyrius, did you aſſert, that the natural evils of mankind, were not deſigned by God, nor an effect of his art? If they be ſo neceſſary for the preſervation of the whole, and if the Artificer deſigns the preſervation of the whole, muſt he not deſign thoſe evils alſo? Notwithſtanding this objection, we may aſſert, that according to this Philoſopher's ſyſtem, the plagues, famines, and other misfortunes of mankind, are involuntary, with regard to God, and that they came into his work only as unavoidable conſequences of the diſpoſitions of matter (116). Let us ſee what he teaches, with regard to the other kind of depravation, namely, moral evil. He aſſerts (117), that the power of the ſoul is the matter and nurſe of that kind of evil; and that as it was neceſſary to make an earth, which might produce plants and animals, and contain the evils within its bowels, it was there that the evils being driven from heaven were lodged; that the animals were divided into two kinds, namely of beaſts, and men; that it was neceſſary men ſhould excel the beaſts, and yet be inferior to God: that this inferiority does not conſiſt in their being mortal, for their death is only the beginning of another and an everlaſting life; that God, in order to make them inferior to the divine Nature (118), invented this: he placed the ſoul to a mortal body, as a coach-man on a coach-box, gave her the reins into her hands, and ſuffered her to drive wherever ſhe pleaſed. He put it in her power to drive that chariot according to the rules of art, or againſt thoſe rules. She directs it, and reſtrains the impetuoſity of the horſes. But theſe are perfectly ignorant of all the rules; they turn ſome one way, ſome another; theſe towards intemperance, others towards inconſideration and folly; ſome are dull and lazy: ſo that the chariot being carried up and down, the driver is diſturbed, and ſuffering himſelf to be overcome, he runs to the place where the moſt unruly horſe carries him. He abandons himſelf to intemperance, and to incontinence, if the ſtrongeſt horſe turns that way, and ſo on. Such is this Platonick Philoſopher's whole ſolution.

* Or rather, Conſervationem.

(114) Maximus Tyrius, Diſſertatione 25. p. m. 257.

(115) Concerning this Doctrine of Heraclitus, ſee Daniel Heinſius's Notes in Maximum Tyrium, p. 110. and above, quotation (160) of the article OVID, where that Poet makes Pythagoras teach the ſame Doctrine.

It is defective in two reſpects: for in the firſt place he acknowledges two Principles, God, and Matter; the former indeed very good, but who cannot entirely reform the depravation of the other (119). That natural, and abſolutely incorrigible depravation is the ſpring of natural evils, and the occaſion of moral evil: it gives the human body ſo ſtrong an inclination for vices and crimes, that the ſoul is carried away to them, as it were by unruly horſes, who run away with their rider. In the ſecond place, Maximus Tyrius does not clear God's infinite goodneſs, nor his

(116) See a thought like this in the remark [T] of the art. CHRYSIPPUS.

(117) Maxim. Tyrius, Diſſertatione 25. p. 257.

(118) This is abſurd and impious, and does not agree with what the Author aſſerted above, quotation (110), that there is no envy in heaven. Obſerve, that according to Heinſius's conjecture, θεῖς muſt be joined with χορεῖ in this paſſage.

(119) Compare this with Juſtus Lipſius's words tranſcribed above, in the quotation (59) of the art. CHRYSIPPUS, and in quotation (164) of the article EPICURUS. See alſo the quotation (167) of that article.

withal to tye and bind that Gordian knot faſter and faſter [M]. A learned man pretends that the Pythagoreans gave riſe to that difficult queſtion. They would find in every thing the ſuperlative: that is to ſay that by their interrogations they aimed at the knowledge of what is raiſed to the higheſt degree in every ſpecies. They aſked, for inſtance, what is the ſtrongeſt thing in the world, the moſt antient, the moſt common, the moſt true?

his infinite holineſs. And a kind virtuous father would never ſuffer his children to ride unruly horſes, nor would he ever ſend them to the army, if he foreſaw with certainty, or only if he judged with a great probability, that notwithſtanding all their ſkill, they would fall from their horſes, and be killed by the fall, and that notwithſtanding their good education, they would be ſo corrupted in the army, as to become the moſt infamous of all men. In a word, that hypotheſis ſets bounds to God's power, and leaves all his other attributes open to the Manichean objections: ſo that it is liable to all the difficulties of the Chriſtian Syſtem concerning free-will, without having the conveniencies of it.

[M] The more one reflects . . . . the more one finds that our natural reaſon . . . . furniſhes us only wherewithal to tye . . . that Gordian knot faſter.] I found it by experience, when I read this article over again, to prepare it for a ſecond edition. There aroſe new reflections in my mind, which I had not made before (120), and which convince me again, and more ſtrongly than ever, that the beſt anſwer which can naturally (121) be made to the queſtion, Why did God ſuffer man to ſin? is to ſay, I do not know; I believe only that he had reaſons for it, becoming his infinite wiſdom, but which are inconceivable to me. By ſuch an anſwer, you will ſtop ſhort the moſt obſtinate diſputers; for if they pretend to continue arguing, you will let them talk alone, and they will ſoon hold their tongue. If you entered the liſt with them, if you pretended to maintain, that the ſacred and inviolable privileges of free-will were the true reaſon which moved God to ſuffer men to ſin, you would be obliged to ſolve the objections they ſhould urge againſt you; and I do not know how you could acquit yourſelves of the taſk: for after all, they might object to you two things, which to our reaſon ſeem evident.

(120) See alſo the new reflections, ſet down in the art. ORIGEN.

(121) That is to ſay, without conſulting the ſcripture, but only our philoſophical ideas.

I. The firſt is, that God having given Being to his creatures by an effect of his goodneſs, he ought alſo, in the character of a benevolent cauſe, to have beſtowed upon them all the perfections proper to each reſpective ſpecies. Wherefore it muſt be ſaid that he ſhewed more love to thoſe who received the moſt excellent, than to thoſe who received leſs excellent proprieties from him. It was therefore from a moſt particular goodneſs, that he beſtowed free-will on men, ſince that property places them above all the other Beings which are upon earth. Now it cannot be conceived that a benevolent nature ſhould make a diſtinguiſhing preſent, without deſigning to promote thereby more effectually the happineſs of thoſe, to whom the preſent is made, and therefore he muſt ſee that they receive benefit from it, and prevent them, if poſſible, from turning that preſent to their own ruin and deſolation. If there be no other method to prevent it but by taking the preſent back, it muſt be taken back; for the character of a patron and a benefactor is much better kept up thereby, than by any other means: this is not changing with regard to the Donee; it is preſerving without the leaſt variation the ſame kindneſs to him, with which the preſent was made him at firſt. The ſame goodneſs, which engages one to give a thing, which is judged proper to make thoſe happy who enjoy it, obliges to take it back, the moment it is obſerved it makes them unfortunate: and if one had time and the neceſſary power, one would not wait to take the preſent back, till it had really proved the cauſe of ſome misfortune, one would take it back before it had been detrimental. This is what we find by our ideas of order, and by the notions from which we judge of the nature and eſſential characters of goodneſs, in whatſoever ſubject it reſides, whether in the Creator, or the creature, in a father, a maſter, a King, &c. Whence ariſes the ſubject matter of this dilemma? God beſtowed free-will on men, either through an effect of his goodneſs, or without any goodneſs at all. You cannot ſay, it was without any goodneſs: you will ſay therefore, it was with a great deal of goodneſs: but it follows from thence unavoidably, that he ought to have deprived them of it at any rate, rather than wait till it proved the occaſion of their eternal damnation by the production of ſin, a monſter which from his very eſſence he abhors. And if he had the patience to leave them ſo fatal a preſent, till the evil happened, it is a ſign, either that his goodneſs was altered, even before they left the good road, which you will not dare to acknowledge; or that free-will was not given them out of kindneſs, which is againſt the ſuppoſition granted in the dilemma above.

There are ſome regards of a ſtrict obligation; one ought not to neglect them but in caſes of neceſſity: but when ſuch caſes happen, all thoſe regards muſt be overlooked. A ſon, who ſhould ſee his father ready to throw himſelf out of the window, either in a fit of madneſs, or in a moſt violent grief, would do very well to chain him down, if he could not otherwiſe prevent the miſchief. If a Queen fell into the water, the firſt footman who could get her out again, by taking her round the waſte, or pulling her by the hair (122), though he ſhould tear above half of it off her head, would do very well: ſhe would by no means complain of his want of reſpect for her. Could a man give a more vain and ridiculous excuſe for his ſuffering a Lady well dreſſed to fall into a precipice, than ſaying, that to prevent it he had been obliged to tumble her ribbons, and her head-clothes? On ſuch occaſions it is a kindneſs to force people, and make them ſuffer violence; and though they were to be ſnatched againſt their will out of the jaws of death, it were a kindneſs to do it, even though one ſhould be in danger of putting one of their members out of joint. They will be the firſt that will thank you, when their paſſion will be cooled. The maxim, that to ſave a man who is determined to periſh, is the ſame thing as to kill (123), is of no uſe on this occaſion; and the moſt zealous advocates for toleration will own, that the pretended commandment compel them to come in would be obligatory in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, if the only ſure and infallible method to ſave the Hereticks was to drive them with ſtrokes and blows to Church or to Maſs. I call to witneſs the philoſophical Commentator *. If I ſhould ſee a man, ſays he (124), ſtanding before the door of a houſe in a great ſhower of rain, and if pitying him I had a mind to deliver him of the inconveniency of being wet through, I could make uſe of theſe two methods: I might either deſire him to walk in, or, if I were ſtronger than him, take him by the arm, and pull him in. Both theſe methods are equally proper to obtain the end I propoſed. If he be but ſheltered, it is no matter whether it be of his own accord or againſt his will. For whether he enters the houſe of himſelf, or waits till he be deſired to walk in, or is pulled in by force, he is equally under a covert. If the caſe was the ſame with regard to the avoiding of Hell, I confeſs that our converters would be well-grounded: for if it were ſufficient for that purpoſe to be under the roof of a Church, it would be no matter whether a man entered it of his own account, or was dragged into it by main force; ſo that it would be proper to hire the ſtrongeſt labourers or porters, to ſeize the Hereticks as ſoon as they ſtirred abroad, and carry them on their backs to the next Church: nay, it would be proper, in caſes of ſickneſs, to break open their doors with petards, to pull them out of their beds, and carry them quickly to ſome Church. What we have obſerved concerning the right men have, from the rules of Charity, to vex and even to force thoſe who by that means are preſerved from death, is more true ſtill with regard to Fathers. They would forget their duty, if they did not ſnatch from a ſon a knife or a ſword with which they ſaw he was going to hurt himſelf. They would be obliged, notwithſtanding his tears and his cries, to take from him their preſents, if they knew he would make an ill uſe of them: and if they ſaw he was ready to ruin himſelf for all his life time by ſome intrigue, it would

(122) Thus Queen Chriſtina, who fell into a lake near Stockholm, was got out of it. I think St. Amant inſerted this particular in his poem, intitled, Moyſe ſauvé.

(123) Invitum qui ſervat idem facit occidenti. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 467.

* Who was Mr. Bayle himſelf.

(124) Commentaire Philoſophique ſur contraint les d'entrer, part 3. p. 57, &c.

true? It was anſwered with regard to this laſt point, that men are bad, and that God is good. Which occaſioned this other queſtion; how comes it to paſs, that God being good, men are bad [N]? Simplicius judged it a matter of great importance to ſolve that would be their duty to diſengage him from it by main force, and even by the authority of the civil Power. If in theſe reſpects they neglected to promote their ſon's advantage, if they alledged that they would not uſe force as though he were a ſlave, they would ſhew either that they have no love for him, or that they do not know how to exert it well.

All theſe obſervations prove evidently, that they, who would ſubmit to the judgment of our reaſon the conduct of God's providence with regard to the permiſſion of the firſt ſin, would infallibly loſe their cauſe, if they had no other arguments to urge but this, viz. that the privileges of free-will ought by no means to be infringed. They would be anſwered, what! you conceive God as the father of men, and yet you pretend that he chooſes rather to ſpare them the ſhort and trifling vexation of being forced to leave off an agreeable converſation, in which they were juſt going to make a fatal uſe of their free-will, than to prevent their eternal damnation, which they were drawing upon them by that ill uſe of their liberty? Where did you meet with ſuch notions of a fatherly kindneſs? To have a great regard for free-will, to abſtain carefully from conſtraining a man's inclination, who is going to loſe his innocence, and to damn himſelf for ever, you call it a lawful preſervation of the privileges of liberty? You would be leſs unreaſonable, if you were to ſay to a man who ſtanding by your ſide, fell down and broke his leg, I might indeed have prevented your fall, but I was afraid of tumbling your gown; I had too great a regard for its ſymmetry to undertake the ſpoiling of it: I thought it therefore reaſonable and lawful to leave you expoſed to the danger of breaking ſome of your bones.

I do not deny, that the permiſſion of uſing a thing and abuſing it (125) is ſometimes a moſt particular favour; but in ſuch a caſe, that permiſſion is attended with a promiſe that the abuſe ſhall go unpuniſhed. This therefore is foreign to the queſtion before us. See the margin (126).

II. But what I have to propoſe in the ſecond place will ſtill more perplex the defendants. I have argued hitherto from this principle: when the perſons we love cannot be preſerved either from death, or from infamy, or from ſome other great evil, unleſs we make them ſuffer a leſſer evil, we are obliged to make them ſuffer it. The complaiſance or the indulgence we might have for their fancies, or for their bad inclinations, would in ſuch a caſe be an act of cruelty rather than of kindneſs: and as they would be the firſt to complain of it, as ſoon as they had conſidered the conſequences of it, ſo they would be the firſt to thank us for the evil we made them ſuffer to ſo good a purpoſe. Theſe propoſitions are plain and evident to all the world, nor can it be queſtioned but Adam and Eve would have conſidered the jerks which God had given them to prevent their fall, as a new favour not leſs conſiderable than all his former bleſſings.

Such is the ſubject matter of my firſt obſervation; but I ſhall now urge another argument. I grant the adverſaries all that they pretend: let them aſſert, that ſince man had received the privilege of free-will, it was neceſſary to leave him the entire poſſeſſion and full uſe of it, and not to conſtrain him in the leaſt for any reaſon whatſoever. Let them maintain that it was not then the time to ſave a man by pulling him by the arm, or by the hair, or by throwing him down on the ground, and telling him, It is hard for thee to kick againſt the pricks (127): that liberty was a ſacred barrier, never to be violated, and a privilege which it was never lawful to infringe in the leaſt; I grant all this: but yet were there not other means enough to prevent the fall of the firſt man? The buſineſs was not to oppoſe a corporal motion, which is always a vexatious oppoſition: the buſineſs was only about an act of the will. Now all the Philoſophers maintain with one accord, that the will cannot be conſtrained; voluntas non poteſt cogi; and it is a flat contradiction to ſay that a volition is forced; for every act of the will is eſſentially voluntary. Now it is infinitely more eaſy for God to imprint in the Soul of man ſuch acts of the will as he pleaſes, than it is for us to fold up a napkin, therefore, &c. Here follows an obſervation which is ſtill more to the purpoſe. It is the opinion of all the Divines that God can raiſe infallibly a good act of the will in the human Soul, without depriving it in the leaſt of the functions of liberty (128). A prevenient delectation, the ſuggeſting an idea proper to weaken the impreſſion of the tempting object, a thouſand other preliminary means of acting on the mind, and on the ſenſitive ſoul, do infallibly determine the reaſonable ſoul to make a good uſe of her liberty, and to turn herſelf into the road of virtue, though without being invincibly carried thither. Calvin would not have denied this with regard to Adam's ſoul during the time of his innocency, and all the Divines of the Church of Rome, without excepting the Janſeniſts themſelves (129), acknowledge it with regard to ſinful men. They confeſs that he can merit, though acting only by a grace either efficacious by itſelf, or ſufficient to ſuch a degree, as to produce its effect infallibly. They muſt therefore acknowledge, that an aſſiſtance granted by God to Adam ſo opportunely, or ſo well contrived, as to prevent his fall infallibly, would have been very well conſiſtent with the uſe of free-will, and would not have made him perceive any conſtraint, or any thing diſagreeable, and would ſtill have left him an opportunity to merit (130).

Thus you ſee the defendants are driven out of all their intrenchments. Will they, being reduced to their laſt ſhifts, aſſert, that God owes nothing to the creature, and was under no obligation to furniſh man with a neceſſitating or infallible grace? But why then did they ſay above, that he muſt have a regard for human liberty? If he was obliged to preſerve that privilege to man, and not to conſtrain it in the leaſt, it follows that he owes ſomething to his own work. But waving the argument ad hominem, could they not be anſwered, that if he owes nothing to the creature, he owes all to himſelf, and cannot act inconſiſtently with his own eſſence? Now it is eſſential to an infinite holineſs (131) and an infinite goodneſs, which at the ſame time is Almighty, not to ſuffer the introduction of moral evil, nor of natural evil.

Be it ſo, will they reply at laſt; but ſhall the thing formed ſay to him that formed it, why haſt thou made me thus (132)? This is very well ſaid; and there they ſhould have ſtopt at firſt: it is returing again to the ſtarting-place of the race, whence it had been better not to ſtir. For it is needleſs to engage in a controverſy, if after you have argued a while, you are obliged to confine yourſelf within your own Theſis. The doctrine therefore, which the Manicheans attack, muſt be conſidered by the orthodox as a matter of fact clearly revealed to us; and ſince it muſt be at laſt confeſſed that the grounds and reaſons of it are inconceivable, it is better to own it at firſt and to ſtop there; let the Philoſophers run on with their objections, we muſt look upon them as mere cavils, and oppoſe them only in an humble ſilence, and the Shield of Faith.

[N] That men are bad, and God is good. Which occaſioned this other queſtion, how comes it to paſs . . . . . that men are bad?] Daniel Heinſius is the learned man who acquaints me with this (133). Antiquiſſima Pythagoricorum diſputatio, & ab iis potiſſimum quos ἀκουσματικοὺς vocabant Pythagorici, qui tria quærere ſolebant: Primo, τὸ τί ἐϛι, ſecundo, τὸ τί μάλιϛα, tertio, τὸ τί δεῖ πράτ]ειν . . . . (134). In qua quæſtione tota conſtabat ſeptem ſapientum Philoſophia, qui nihil aliud quærebant quam τί μάλιϛα. Nec quid bonum ſed quid optimum, nec quid difficile ſed quid difficillimum. Notum eſt illud ex Plutarch. Sympoſio ſeptem ſapientum . . . . . Sic cum quæreretur, quid veriſſime diceretur, reſpondebant, ὅτι πονηροὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι, ὅτι ἀγαθὸς ὁ θεός. Unde primo manavit πόρισμα tale, Τῷ θεῷ ἀγαθῷ ὄντι πόθεν κακοὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι. Quod teſtantur verſiculi apud Jamblichum Hippodamantis antiqui Poëtæ, qui in laudem hujus quæſtionis ſcribebat:

(125) The Emperor Nerva permitted theſe two things to the Father of Herod Atticus, who had found a treaſure in his houſe. See Triſtan's Commentaries, Tom. 1. p. 357, and Monſieur Spon's Voyages, Tom. 2. p. 164. Dutch edit.

(126) The beſt method of beſtowing a favour is not to give leave to make an ill uſe of it, but to add to it the art of uſing it well. Otherwiſe, a favour is like a body without a ſoul, as Horace hints, Epiſt. 4. lib. 1. ver. 6. ad Tibullum. Non tu corpus eras ſine pectore: dii tibi formam,
Di tibi divitias dederant, ARTEMQUE fruendi, i. e.
" For you are
" not all body
" void of mind,
" The Gods
" have given
" a ſoul of noble
" kind;
" And wealth,
" and ſkill
" enough to uſe
" thy ſtore."
CREECH.

(127) Acts of the Apoſtles, chap. 9. ver. 5.

(128) See the rem. [G], of the article MARCIONITES.

(129) That is to ſay, by making an advantage of their aſſerting, that they condemn the propoſitions of Janſenius, in the ſame ſenſe in which the Pope has condemned them.

(130) As to this argument, that it was neceſſary to leave man the means to deſerve a reward, ſee the article ORIGEN, remark [E], num. 1. towards the end.

(131) That is to ſay, it ſeems ſo to the light of our weak reaſon.

(132) Epiſtle to the Romans, chap. 9. ver. 20.

(133) Dan. Heinſius, Notis in Maximum Tyrium, p. 106.

(134) I have omitted here what I met with in the original, becauſe it is in confuſion: I ſuſpect that the Printers have skipped ſeveral lines.

that difficulty (e).

(e) See the rem. [N] quotation (138).

Ω θεῖοι πόθεν ἐστὲ, πόθεν τοῖοί δ' ἐγένεσθε :
Ἄνθρωποι πόθεν ἐστὲ ; πόθεν κακοὶ ὧ δὲ γένεσθε ;

Unde hoc dimanavit, Θεῷ τὰ ἀγαθὰ ποιοῦντος, πόθεν τὰ κακὰ, i. e. " It was a moſt antient controverſy a- " mong the Pythagoreans, eſpecially among thoſe " who were called Hearers, who uſed to propoſe " three queſtions ; Firſt, What is ? Secondly, What " is the chiefeſt ? Thirdly, What is proper to be " done? . . . . . In which queſtion the whole phi- " loſophy of the ſeven wiſe men conſiſted, who " examined nothing but what is the chiefeſt. For " they did not examine, what is good, but what " is beſt ; nor what is difficult, but what is moſt diffi- " cult. . . . . Thus if it were aſked what was the " trueſt ſaying, they anſwered, men are bad, and God " is good. Whence aroſe firſt this queſtion, ſince God is " good, how comes it that men are bad? This appears " from ſome lines of Hippodamas an antient Poet, " who wrote upon that queſtion ; thoſe lines are " quoted by Jamblichus, (and are to this purpoſe) " Whence are the Gods ? How comes it they are ſuch ? " Whence are men ? How came they to be bad ? This " gave riſe to the following queſtion : Since good " comes from God, whence comes evil?" Heinſius relates all this in his notes on the diſſertation, which I have quoted above, and of which I have ſet down the title (135). He adds that Maximus Tyrius examined that ſubject, becauſe of an opinion of Plato concerning three attributes of God (136) ; 1. That God is eſſentially good, and goodneſs itſelf. 2. That he is immutable. 3. That he is truth itſelf. By the firſt attribute is meant, not only that God is good, but alſo that he produces good, ſince he is the idea of good, and that the idea of good is the cauſe which produces good. Now as the Platoniſts held that every idea is God, they admitted no idea of evil, and conſequently no cauſe of evil. Thence aroſe that queſtion, whence comes evil ? Ex primo ſequitur, Deo, ſi talis ſit, convenire non tantum bonum καλὰ δύναμιν, ſed etiam καλὰ ἐνέργειαν, nec tantum ut bonus ſit, ſed etiam ut efficiat bonum : quia idea boni eſt. Idea autem boni, boni quoque cauſa eſt & exemplar. Porro cum Ideam mali tollant Platonici, quia, ut Parmenides dicebat, πᾶσα ἰδέα θεός ἐστι, ſequitur ut quæratur, Unde mala proficiſcantur (137). Laſtly, Heinſius obſerves that this queſtion was thought to be of very great importance with regard to piety, and he refers us to Simplicius's Commentary on Epictetus. The words of that Commentator appeared ſo remarkable to me, that I thought they would be an ornament to my Dictionary in this placer ; I ſhall therefore tranſcribe them here (138) : Περὶ τῆς ὑποϛάσεως τῶν κακῶν ὁ λόγος μὴ καλῶς διορθωθεὶς, καὶ τῆς περὶ τὸ θεῖον ἀσεβείας αἴτιος γέγονε, καὶ τῆς τῶν ἠθῶν ἀναγωγίας τὰς ἀρχὰς διεϛάραξε, καὶ πολλαῖς καὶ ἀλύτοις ἀπορίαις ἐνέβαλε τοὺς μὴ καλῶς αἰτιολογοῦντας αὐτήν. Εἴτε ἀρχήν τις λέγει τὸ κακὸν, ὡς εἶναι δύο τῶν ὄντων ἀρχὰς, τό, τε ἀγαθὸν, καὶ τὸ κακὸν, πολλὰ καὶ μεγάλα ἄτοπα συμβαίνει. i. e. " The queſ- " tion concerning the origin and nature of evil not " being well handled, has been the occaſion of im- " piety towards God, deſtroyed the principles of mo- " rality, and expoſed thoſe, who have not well ex- " plained it, to many and unanſwerable difficulties : " For whether one makes God the author of evil †, or " ſays that it is a principle by itſelf, ſo that there " are two principles of all things, the one good, the " other bad, there will follow from thence many and " very great abſurdities." He hints there three great inconveniencies ; for he aſſerts that a falſe account of the origin of evil has been the cauſe of impiety ; and has deſtroyed the Principles of Morality ; and expoſed to many unanſwerable difficulties thoſe who argued wrong upon that ſubject. He confutes the general ſyſtem of the Manicheans with a great deal of ſtrength, and a wonderful judgment : he ſucceeds better ſtill when he comes to their particular explications. But when he attempts to clear up and to prove his own Hypotheſis, he does not ſo well ſatisfy his readers. He follows the ſame method which the antient Fathers followed ; I mean that he aſcribes no other cauſe of the origin of evil but the free-will of the human Soul. He could not chooſe any other ſyſtem ; we muſt abſolutely come to that ; and then we find ourſelves in a croſs-way, of which a learned Abbot at Paris ſaid this not long ago. I have four roads round me, that of the Calviniſts, that of the Janſeniſts, that of the Thomiſts, and that of the Moliniſts. I know very well which I muſt not take, but not which I muſt take. Quem fugiam habeo, quem ſequar non habeo. The firſt road is contrary to the Council of Trent, the ſecond to the Conſtitutions of the Pope, the third to Reaſon, and the fourth to St. Paul. They who are not Roman Catholicks may more eaſily extricate themſelves out of that perplexity, by preferring St. Paul's authority to that of the Popes and of the Councils.

(135) In the rem. [L] quotation (109).

(136) In lib. 2. de Republica.

(137) Heinſius, Notis in Maximum Tyrium, p. 107.

(158) Simplicius, in hæc Enchiridii Epicteti verba, cap. 34. Ὥσπερ σκοπὸς εἴ τις θείη πρὸς τὸ ἀπόλυχνον, ἵνας ἐδὴ κακὸς φύσις ἐν κόσμῳ γίνηται. i. e. " As one " does not put " a put a mark, " to make people " wander out of " the way, ſo " the nature of " evil does not " exiſt in the " world."

† This ſentence is not in the Greek here, but as it is in the Latin tranſlation annexed to it, I ſuppoſe the Printers omitted ſome words, as for inſtance theſe, Εἰπὲ τὸ θεῖον τις λέγει τῶν κακῶν αἴτιον εἶναι. ADD. REM.

PAULINA (LOLLIA). See the notes (a) of the article LOLLIUS.

(a) Remark [G].

PAYS (RENATUS LE) paſſed for a wit. He was of Britany ; but he hardly appeared in any other place but in the Province of Dauphiné [A], where he had ſome employment in the finances. His Amitiez, Amours, et Amourettes, printed in the year 1664, were admired in the Provinces, and even deſerved the approbation of the capital city [B]. There were ſome Ladies of the firſt Quality who read that book with a great deal of pleaſure, and who enquired from the bookſeller what ſort of a man the author was. As ſoon as he heard the Ducheſs of Nemours had that obliging curioſity, he ſent her a deſcription of his perſon. That piece is entitled, Portrait de l'Auteur des Amitiez, Amours, et Amourettes. It is intermixed with proſe and verſe. The ſtyle of it is gay, like that of the work which

[A] He appeared hardly in any other place but in the Province of Dauphiné.] It is for this reaſon Monſieur Allard put him in the Catalogue of the Writers of that Province. The greateſt part of his works, ſays he (1), were compoſed in Dauphiné, either at Grenoble, or at Valence. He might do this without receding from the common practice : for they who draw up a Bibliotheque of a certain country, do ſeldom fail to give a place in it to thoſe ſtrangers, who dwelt there when they wrote or publiſhed ſome books. The following paſſage from the author of the Amitiez, Amours, et Amourettes, will not be foreign to my purpoſe. What likelihood is there, that a genius ſo elevated as YOUR HIGHNESS'S is, a genius to which the greateſt wits of this age do daily pay their homage, and which is conſidered at Court as a ſpring of knowledge, ſhould find any thing agreeable in that collection of my trifles, and in the writings of a man educated in the darkneſs of a remote Province ? Could a wit originally come from Britany, tranſplanted into Gaſcony, and thence upon the mountains of Dauphiné, produce fruits capable to pleaſe ſo fine and delicate a palate as yours is? No, MADAM, I ought not to imagine it ; it would be too great a preſumption in me ; I ſhould be afraid to do you an injury (2).

(1) Allard, Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, p. 169.

[B] His Amitiez, Amours, et Amourettes . . . . . deſerved even the approbation of the capital city.] The people of Paris eaſily pardon the writing of a good book in a man born in the country, provided he lived a great while at Paris : but they take it very ill, if a man, who never left the country, proves a good author : they look upon it as an attempt of a dangerous conſequence : one would think they imagine this is ſomething irregular ; that it is ſhaking off the authority of one's lawful ſuperiors, and ſetting up in the Republick of Letters the Sect of the Independents, which is ſo odious in the Church. They

(2) Le Pays, in his letter to the Ducheſs of Nemours, in which he draws his own character.

which that Princeſs had already approved. The ſucceſs of that firſt work encouraged Monſieur le Pays to give the printers more buſineſs. But his Zélotide being diſliked, he reſtrained his paſſion for writing, and appeared only now and then in print. The letter he wrote to Monſieur du Gué, Intendant of Dauphiné, when enquiries were made about the families of thoſe who falſely pretended to be Gentlemen, was eſteemed pretty good. He proved there the nobility of his Muſe, which was deſcended from Voiture's [C], and collected together ſeveral curious particulars concerning the genealogy of Poets conſidered as ſuch. He only imitated one of the moſt beautiful Epiſodes of Mademoiſelle de Scuderi's Clelia. Some time after he publiſhed a new collection of pieces. It appears from ſome of his Letters, that he had been in Holland and in England. The accounts he gave of thoſe countries are too ludicrous, and very unfair: he intermixed them with ſome ſerious reflections which are abſolutely falſe [D]. They caſt a diſgrace on the French name. He

They were therefore very little inclined to judge favourably of our Author's Amitiez, &c. for it was a book that came to them from the country of the Altobroges; it was the production of an Author born in Britany, and tranſplanted firſt into Guienne, and afterwards on the mountains of Dauphiné. Theſe were the ſchools where he became a Diſciple of Voiture, and where he formed the deſign to ſet up for his ſucceſſor. So that men were very little prepoſſeſſed in his favour. And yet his book ſold extremely well at Paris: it was approved by a great many perſons both at Court and in the city; however, I do not pretend to aſſert thereby, that it was not cenſured, nor deſpiſed by ſeveral perſons. Read theſe words of Monſieur Gueret. As long as the one will be writing love-letters to his Peggy, and the other ſilly jeſts to his butcher, they will not conſpire againſt the State (3). He means Monſieur Le Pays's Letters, and thoſe of Montreuil. He is not ſo diſobliging in the next page, but his compliments are very dry. Becauſe, ſays he, Amours, Amitiez, et Amorettes, was looked on as a pretty title, does it follow from thence, that Fleurs, Fleurettes, et Paſſetems, will meet with the ſame reception? Monſieur Boileau Deſpreaux hinted ſomething againſt Monſieur le Pays. The laſt was received in an handſome manner; Monſieur le Pays did not fall in a paſſion, he did not inveigh againſt him as moſt of his fellow-ſufferers * did. He anſwered civilly and modeſtly (4). Obſerve that what I have ſaid of Paris, I think alſo of antient Rome. I do believe that in Cicero's time, or in Pliny the younger's, the Romans would have been angry, if the Poets and the Orators, who lived beyond the Alps or beyond the Pyrenean hills, had made beautiful works, before they had left their native country.

(3) Parnaſſe Reformé, p. m. 113.

* Who were laſhed in Boileau's Satyres.

(4) See his letter to Monſieur Tiger; it is the 1ſt of the 2d book of the 2d part of his Nouvelles Oeuvres, or New-Works.

In order to ſupport by an authentick proof what I have aſſerted of the great ſucceſs of our Author's firſt work, I need only quote the words of a Journaliſt, who is no flatterer. Let us ſee how he begins his account of another work of that Writer (5). Monſieur le Pays's Amours, Amitiez, & Amourettes have been ſo well received by the gay and polite part of the world, that one muſt conceive an agreeable notion of this controverſy between wit and judgment, as ſoon as it ſhall be known he is the Author of it. It was ſpread abroad that Cupid gave him a feather from his wings to write his Amours, and he made Love quarrel formerly ſo ingeniouſly with Reaſon, that he certainly hath omitted none of the arguments, which can be urged in behalf of wit againſt judgment (6).

(5) Intitled, Demeſlé de L'Eſprit & du Jugement, printed at Paris, 1688.

(6) Baſnage de Beauval, Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, for Sept. 1688. art. 15. p. 129.

[C] He proved the nobility of his Muſe, which was deſcended from Voiture's.] The letter he publiſhed upon that ſubject, was afterwards printed in the edition of his new works; it is intitled, Titres de Nobleſſe de la Muſe Amourette à Monſeigneur Du Gué Conſeiller ordinaire du Roi, &c (7). i. e. "Proofs of the Nobility "of the Muſe Amoretta; to my Lord Du Gué, Coun- "ſellor in Ordinary to the King, &c." A perſon, who read it when it firſt came out, told me for certain, that the Author's deſign was to prove he was a Nobleman in right of his Muſe, and that therefore they were not to require any other proofs of his Nobility, nor pretend to make him pay the land-tax as a Commoner, in caſe he did not give ſuch proofs. But having read that work, I could not meet with any thing in it, that ſhewed ſuch an intention. I cannot tell whether that Author was a Gentleman or not; for it is ſo long ſince I have read his works, that I do not remember thoſe paſſages, in which he might have ſaid I am a Gentleman, either in ſo many words, or in words to that purpoſe. I remember the paſſage in which he mentions a quarrel of his brother: what he ſays of him, is of a Gentleman, but there are numberleſs Commoners, who as they live in a noble manner, would not ſpeak leſs ſtoutly on ſuch an occaſion. Here follows what he ſays in an anſwer to a conſolatory letter (8): The care you have taken in my brother's quarrel, and the kindneſs with which you endeavoured to pacify it, have put me under ſuch obligations to you, that I ſhall never be able to ſhew you my gratitude. I am very ſorry that this little misfortune happened to my brother; but as he muſt have prudence never to engage himſelf in a quarrel, he ought alſo to have courage to defend himſelf, when he is abuſed without reaſon: I would never pardon him, if he ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be expoſed to the leaſt diſgrace in the world (9).

(7) It is the 26th Letter, of the 2d book, of the 2d part.

(8) It was written to him, during the affliction he was under for the loſs of a ſiſter of his. The manner in which he expreſſes his grief, and the love he had for the deceaſed, ſhews that he had a tender heart, and was an honeſt man. See the Letters 42 and 43 of the 2d book.

(9) Le Pays, Amitiez, Amours, & Amourettes, Liv. 2. Lett. 22. p. 1664, of the Dutch edition, 1665.

[D] He made ſome . . . reflections which are abſolutely falſe.] "What ſticks very much to my heart, is, that "they ſuffer the Jews at Amſterdam, where they "will not ſuffer the Catholicks. The ſtews at Paris "do not dread the Conſtable, ſo much as the Ca- "tholicks do Amſterdam, for thoſe houſes where "the holy Maſs is celebrated. However, I have "obſerved, that the greateſt enemy our religion has "here, is policy. The Dutch do not hate Rome, ſo "much as they do Madrid, and I believe they would "chooſe to ſubmit to Alexander VII. rather than to "Philip IV. This is ſo true, that in a company "where I was lately, a perſon ſaying out of joke, "that a Proteſtant Miniſter had got leave to preach "at Madrid, that the Inquiſition was going to be "ſuppreſſed there, and that the Catholick King was "ready to turn Proteſtant; an old Dutchman anſwer- "ed immediately, and from his heart, that if Spain "turned Proteſtant, Holland would be obliged to "turn Catholick. Judge now, Sir, how zealous they "are for their religion, and how much they hate "ours. One may ſafely ſay, that they hate only "to be under the government of Spain (10)." The letter, from which I have extracted this paſſage, is not dated, which is the common defect of that kind of works (11); but we may know by ſome circumſtances, that it was wrote in the year 1662. Judge then, whether the Author knew what he ſaid. Would not one think, that he drew up this account from ſome books compoſed in the time of the Duke of Alva, or before the end of the truce, which Henry IV. cauſed to be concluded between Philip III. and the United Provinces? At that time, ſatyrical Writers might pretend that the Dutch hated the government of the Spaniards, more than their own religion; and I do not queſtion, but this was inſerted in ſeveral books. But it is certain, that when Monſieur le Pays was in Holland, the Dutch had no longer any hatred for the Spaniſh nation: their hatred laſted only as long as their fear: now it was long ſince their fear was vaniſhed away. Since the taking of Boiſleduc, Maeſtricht and Breda, and ſince the war, which Lewis XIII. declared againſt Spain, the United Provinces were ſure never to fall again under the Government of the Spaniards. They were more uneaſy, for fear leſt the Spaniards ſhould be too much weakened, and leſt France ſhould make an advance of their weakneſs, than for fear leſt they ſhould recover what they had loſt. It was this uneaſineſs, which contributed as much as any thing elſe to forward the treaty they concluded at Munſter with Philip IV. and ſince that time, they have been more hearty friends to the Spaniards, than to the French. This was natural, and according to the rules of good policy. There is no occaſion to refute our

(10) Le Pays, ibid. Letter 38, of the 2d book, p. 153, 154.

(11) Do not take this in a very ſtrict ſenſe; for theſe writings are ſometimes dated.

He was a Member of the Academy of Arles [E]. He had the honour to be eſteemed by the Duke of Savoy [F], who conferred upon him the Knighthood of St. Maurice. He wrote a very pretty letter upon that ſubject [G]. He complains often of fortune [H], and loads her with no leſs injuries than the Heathen Poets did. But ſuch complaints are only Author, with regard to the complaints he makes of the want of liberty, under which he pretends the Catholicks labour at Amſterdam, nor with regard to his ſilly and ſatyrical jokes againſt the Engliſh women (12), and againſt the Dutch women (13).

(12) In the 36th Letter of the 2d book.

(13) In the 38th Letter of the ſame book.

[E] He was a Member of the Academy of Arles.] It is an academy of wits, eſtabliſhed after the example of the French academy. No man can become a member of it, no more than of that at Paris, but by petitioning for it. Monſieur le Pays knowing that they deſired to admit him a Member of the Academy of Arles, and that the petition he was to ſend in for that purpoſe, according to their by-laws, would be favourably received, wrote to theſe Gentlemen, and was immediately admitted into their body. His letter is dated from Grenoble, May the 12th, 1668; it is inſerted in the 2d part of his Nouvelles Oeuvres (14), with the compliment of thanks which he wrote to that Academy (15).

(14) It is the 33d Letter of the 1ſt book.

(15) Dated from Grenoble, June the 12th, 1668. It is the 39th Letter of the ſame book.

[F] He had the honour to be eſteemed by the Duke of Savoy.] If my memory does not fail me, he dedicated his Zelotide to that Duke, who wrote him a very obliging letter. The anſwer he wrote that Prince, March the 5th, 1666, is the 19th letter, of the 2d part of his new works. He made a journey to Turin, in the year 1670, and gives us the following account of the honours he received there. "I can aſſure you, "without vanity, or with vanity, if you pleaſe, that "their Royal Highneſſes gave me the moſt obliging "reception. I have been invited, by their orders, "to the hunting-match which is to be on St. Hubert's "day: it will be a moſt ſplendid entertainment. "The Ladies will hunt a ſtag, with equipages em"broidered all over with gold and jewels. After "this, there will be for two days ſucceſſively, Feaſts, "Balls, Balets, Concerts of Muſick, and an Opera. "Preparations have been making a long while for "all this: but after all this, will you believe me, if I "tell you, that his Royal Highneſs ordered a room "to be got ready for me in the Palace, and com"manded his officers to furniſh me with horſes from "his own ſtables for the hunting match (16)."

(16) Le Pays, Nouv. Oeuvres, part 2. Liv. 1. Lettre 41. p. 105, of the Dutch edit.

[G] He wrote a very pretty letter upon that ſubject.] He was admitted a Knight by the Marquiſs of St. Damian, and was preſented by one of that Lord's ſons: another of that Lord's ſons gave the entertainment (17). He deſired the latter, in a very genteel manner, to grant him the income of ſome commandry, becauſe otherwiſe it would be out of his power to accompliſh his vow of hoſpitality. Here follow ſome fragments of his letter; let us remember that he writes to the Grand-Prior of the Order of St. Maurice. Since you are my ſuperior, ſays he (18), and I have the honour to be one of your brethren, I ought from time to time to give your Excellency an account of my behaviour. I would be very unfortunate, if the Alps, which are between us, ſhould deprive me of the inſtructions by which you can direct me. Being thus abſent, I want them more than the reſt of our brethren, and I humbly deſire you, Sir, for the eaſe of my conſcience, to aſſiſt me with your wholeſom advice, and to remove ſome ſcruples I have about the performing of my vows. As for that of chaſtity, I keep it very religiouſly, thanks to the unkindneſs of the Ladies. As for obedience, I have not tranſgreſſed it; and my ſuperiors, who have commanded me nothing, cannot complain of me. But as for hoſpitality, that is indeed the ſubject of my ſcruples; it is with regard to that vow, I have very great remorſes of conſcience. For to tell you the truth, Sir, I do not keep that vow. Not but that I have a great inclination to be hoſpitable; but can a man be hoſpitable, who has neither a houſe to receive his Gueſts in, nor a ſufficient fund to entertain them? Methinks, Sir, when I made that laſt vow, I made alſo tacitly that of being a Commander, ſince it cannot be fulfilled without a Commandry. This muſt determine you to procure me one, and even one of the beſt, that I may be the better able to perform my vow . . . (19). Beſides, by making me a Commander, you will make a thouſand ridiculous perſons hold their tongue, who come and aſk me impertinent queſtions concerning the croſs I wear. Some are ſilly enough to come and aſk me, pray, dear Sir, how much do you get yearly by wearing that croſs? I muſt own that I do not know how to anſwer them. When I ſhall have a Commandry, I ſhall be able to ſatisfy all the world; I ſhall have wherewithal to accompliſh my vow of hoſpitality, and people will let me alone about the income of my croſs. Be ſo kind, Sir, to anſwer my argumenss, and to remove my ſcruples, and you will thereby quiet the ſoul of him, who of all your brethren, is, with the greateſt reſpect, &c.

(17) Ibid. Lettre 43, of the ſame book, p. 112; it is dated from Grenoble, May the 20th, 1671.

(18) Ibid. p. 110.

(19) Ibid. p. 112.

[H] He complains often of Fortune.] This fault is almoſt an epidemical diſtemper in the Republick of Letters. They, who are called Wits, ſignalize themſelves above all the reſt in that kind of complaint. They imagine it would not be giving themſelves airs, if they acknowledged that fortune looked kindly upon them. One would think they fancy, that if they ſeemed to be ſatisfied with her favours, the publick would take it for a confeſſion that they want merit. For it is a common, but very antient ſaying, that ſhe is blind, and does not know how to beſtow her favours well. Read all Balzac's letters with attention: they will acquaint you with two particulars; the one, that he had a very handſome income, ſo that he could treat his friends, give them excellent ſoops, &c. and afford himſelf all the conveniencies of life, in one of the moſt delicious countries of the Kingdom: the other, that he looked upon himſelf as a man confined to a deſart, and ſo cruelly perſecuted by ill fortune, that one would think her ſharpeſt and moſt venomous darts had been ſet apart againſt him. What conſequence can we draw from theſe two particulars, unleſs it be, that he had too good an opinion of himſelf? For a man truly modeſt, whatever merit he may have, will think himſelf fully rewarded, if he has but wherewithal to ſupply all his wants. So that all thoſe common-place topicks, which our wits, and a great many other Writers, urge againſt Fortune, are in reality nothing elſe but a pompous encomium of the great and noble qualities, with which they imagine they are adorned. There is therefore a little too much vanity in the caſe. Let us add, that ſuch complaints are much oftner a proof of the Author's ingratitude towards their age, than of the age's ingratitude towards the Author's: for, generally ſpeaking, they who beſt enjoy the conveniencies of life, make the moſt complaints againſt the perverſe humour of fortune, and againſt the injuſtice of the times.

A REFLECTION on the Author's complaints againſt Fortune.

I ſay this only in general: I do not pretend to make an application of it to our Monſieur le Pays: I am not well enough acquainted with the hiſtory of life, to determine whether or not he ought to have been ſatisfied with his condition. But I think he ſhould not have thought it ſtrange, that men of buſineſs puſhed their fortune better than he could do. For an Officer of the Finances, who writes Love-letters, Sonnets, and Madrigals, muſt never pretend to deſerve the good-will of his ſuperiors, nor their recommendation to be promoted to the greateſt employments, as he would deſerve it by obſerving punctually, like the reſt, this precept of Monſieur Deſpreaux.

Pren moi le bon parti: laiſſe là tous les livres.
Cent francs au denier cinq combient font-ils! Vingt livres.
C'eſt bien dit. Va, tu ſçais tout ce qu'il faut ſçavoir.
Que de biens, que d'honneurs ſur toi s'en vont pleuvoir!
Exerce-toi, mon fils, dans ces hautes ſciences.
Prens au lieu d'un Platon le Guidon des Finances.
Sçache quelle Province enrichit les Traitans:
Combien le ſel au Roi peut fournir tous les ans.
Endurcy-toi le cœur: Sois Arabe, Corſaire,
Injuſte, violent, ſans foi, double, fauſſaire (20).

(20) Deſpreaux, Satire 8. ver. 283.

"Would'ſt thou get honour and a fair eſtate,
"And have the looks and favours of the great?
"Cries an old father to his blooming ſon;
"Take the right courſe, be rul'd by me, 'tis done.

"Leave

only common-place topicks, which are generally too much owing to a man's pride. Let us

" Leave mouldy Authors to the reading fools,
" The poring crowds in colleges and ſchools :
" How much is threeſcore Nobles ? Twenty Pound.
" Well ſaid, my ſon, the anſwer's moſt profound :
" Go, thou know'ſt all that's requiſite to know ;
" What wealth on thee, what honours haſte to flow !
" In theſe high ſciences thyſelf employ,
" Inſtead of Plato, take thy Ricard, boy.
" Learn there the art to audit an account,
" To what the King's Revenue does amount :
" How much the Cuſtom and Exciſe bring in,
" And what the managers a year purloin.
" Get a caſe-hard'ned conſcience, Iriſh proof,
" Which nought of pity, ſenſe, or ſhame, can move :
" Turn Algerine, Barbarian, Turk, or Jew,
" Unjuſt, inhuman, treacherous, baſe, untrue *."

* BOILEAU's works, tranſlated by ſeveral hands, Satyr 8.

To ſtudy politeneſs, to ſpend whole days in writing a Love-letter, to correct a ſonnet or a ſong an hundred times over, till the concluſion of it be happy, well turned, very tender, and very moving ; this is not the way to ſupplant a rival, or to prevent him from ſupplanting you : I mean a rival with regard to the employments which depend upon the Directors of the Finances. If it be a rival in love, well and good. One would much better learn to ſupplant him by ſpending one's time in writing a love-letter, than by employing it in a rule of Arithmetick. But even this parallel holds good only as to the immediate effects : for if you ſhould urge, that a man will be more capable to grow rich by applying himſelf to the rules of arithmetick, than to a piece of gallantry, and that the richer rival will be favoured rather than the man of wit ; I will not pretend to argue againſt it. I have read ſomewhere, that Lewis Sforza uſed to ſay, that wit is but an indifferent qualification for a ſoldier, and that he was not willing to admit thoſe into his ſervice who pretended to it (21). Mareſhal de Gaſſion was of the ſame mind ; he was once ſo offended at the Abbot de la Riviere's reflections, who pretended that his R. H. the Duke of Orleans ought to have raiſed the ſiege of Coutray, that " his anger pro" voking his natural roughneſs, he fell out with him,
" and told him theſe words, Sir Abbot, your men of
" wit are but poor tools for the war (22)." They are as little capable of the Finances, generally ſpeaking.

(21) Silhon, Miniſtre d'Etat, Liv. 1. chap. 13.

(22) The Abbé de Pure, Vie du Marechal de Gaſſion, Tom. 4. chap. 4. p. 36. under the year 1646.

But let us come at laſt to the point : let us ſpeak of our Author's complaints againſt his deſtiny. His letter of complaints (23) againſt fortune is pretty well turned, and contains ſome pretty good thoughts. Here follow ſome paſſages extracted from it. " I " was born under a certain conſtellation, the malig-
" nity of which cannot be conquered, and I am ſo
" fully convinced of that unfriendly conſtellation's
" power, that I lay all my misfortunes to its charge,
" without being ever angry with any man for them.
" And therefore, Madam, though you ſhould never " obtain for me the favour, for which you make ſo
" much intereſt, and with ſo much zeal, I ſhall ne-
" verthelefs be all my life time obliged to you for " your generous and active friendſhip. This is not " the firſt time, that the attempts which are made to " prefer me, prove unſucceſsful. You remember,
" &c, ... In my youth I have done like the reſt ;
" I have hunted after fortune with a reſtleſs mind.
" I have examined which are the places ſhe moſt
" frequently viſits, and I have endeavoured to put
" myſelf in her way. Going to meet her, I ima" gined that as ſhe is blind, ſhe would fall in with " me even without minding it : but I am apt to " think that ſhe had eyes for me alone, ſince ſhe al" ways knew ſo well how to avoid all my approaches.
" I have done all that lay in my power to court her.
" Having obſerved from what happens in the world,
" that ſhe uſes men of letters ill, and men of buſi-
" neſs kindly. I have acted againſt my own incli-
" nation, and made the Finances my ſerious oc" cupation, and the Muſes only my diverſion. And
" yet all my cares and pains have been unſucceſsful ;
" till this day, I could never find her propitious to " me. Since fortune is ſuppoſed to be a blind
" Deity, but a Deity to whom men pay a worſhip,
" which looks like ſomething religious, I imagine
" that one may believe without being an Heretick,
" that this Goddeſs has among her creatures ſome
" elect, and ſome reprobates, who are happy or un-
" fortunate by her choice only, without owing any " thing to their own conduct. Since I have found " that ſhe placed me among the latter, I endeavour
" by all poſſible means to comfort myſelf. . . . . If " my reflections were not tedious to you I would " make many more before I put an end to this let" ter ; I would ſpeak to you with more warmth ſtill
" againſt the whims of fortune. You muſt know
" however, that I do not hate her ſo much for not
" raiſing me, as I hate her for derpeſſing our incom-
" parable friend. I think him much more unhappy
" than myſelf. A man cannot fall from ſo high a " place, without feeling all his life time the pain of
" the blow received by ſuch a fall. But for my part, as " I was always low in the world, I could never fall.
" All the misfortune I labour under is a certain weak-
" neſs, occaſioned by the unſucceſsful attempts I
" have made to raiſe myſelf. Our dear friend's caſe
" is much more to be lamented : I pity him ſo much
" the more, as he had not deſerved his downfall.
" When I ſee a giddy-headed fellow forſaken by " fortune, I am not more ſurpriſed at it, than at a " blind-man's falling down a precipice, when he " walks without a guide. But when I ſee fortune
" pull down a man, ſupported by the moſt conſum-
" mate prudence, I cannot ſufficiently rail againſt
" her unjuſt cruelty. The misfortune is, that a man
" can hardly put himſelf in a condition to eſcape her
" unjuſt practices. She is a Deity who makes a ſport
" with her admirers as well as with her enemies : ſhe
" often hurts thoſe who would avoid her. At " Court ſhe will raiſe you an enemy, who will miſ-
" repreſent all your actions to make them odious, or
" a rival, who will put you out of favour with the " Prince. In the country ſhe will break a ſtone from " a rock, or make an eagle take up a tortoiſe, and " drop it on your head to cruſh you in pieces. She " laughs almoſt equally at the altars, which the " Courtiers ſet up to her, and at the contempt which " the Philoſophers ſhew her. Alas ! if wiſdom and " virtue could but ſecure us againſt her ſtrokes, honeſt
" men would not much fear her, and we ſhould ſee
" none unhappy but the ſtupid, and the wicked. But " men of honour and wit ſeem to be the moſt ex-
" poſed to her power. The eyes of prudence are " not ſharp enough to diſcover the ſecret ſprings,
" which make her wheel turn. The motions of " them are hid from our ſight, and as we cannot " know the cauſe ſo we cannot avoid the effects of " theſe motions. And ſince it is ſo, it would be " a folly to grieve at it. We ought to ſuffer her
" motions, and look upon them as upon thoſe of " the cœleſtial bodies. A man, who ſhould make
" himſelf uneaſy on account of an eclipſe of the " Sun and the Moon, would be thought a ſilly man.
" He who is vexed at the inconſtancy of fortune is not " much wiſer." In another letter (24) he deſcribes the vexations he went through at Fontainebleau, in the proſecution of an affair wherein he did not ſucceed. They had cut off a thouſand crowns from his penſion ; and he could never get them reſtored again. Since I am at Fontainebleau, ſays he, I loſe regularly every day nine or ten hours in a very dull hall, where I have indeed the company of a great many perſons much more conſiderable than myſelf, and who are not received with more ceremony, nor diſpatched with more diligence. . . . . To alleviate my grief, I imagine ſometimes, that a man, who ſhould come without any buſineſs, and with a mind perfectly indifferent, into this hall, where ſo many perſons wait impatiently, would be very much diverted by obſerving our different poſtures. Some are thoughtful, ſome rail, others walk about, others lean againſt the wall : and upon the leaſt noiſe that is made at the Patron's door, all look that way, and though the perſon that comes in through that door be only a footman, they all bow very low to him. If that footman ſays the Patron is ſlightly indiſpoſed, all the affairs fall ſick ; and the misfortune is, that when the Patron is recovered, my buſineſs does not fare much

(23) It is the 1ſt of the 1ſt book of the 2d part of his Nouvelles Oeuvres. It is written to Madam the Counteſs of . . . and not dated.

(24) The 30th of the 2d book of the 1ſt part of his Nouv. Oeuvres. It is written from Fontainebleau, Auguſt the 13th, to the Count de Lionne. The year is not ſet down.

A DESCRIPTION of the proſecuting a buſineſs at Court.

*) Thus, I think, we may tranſlate the word Patineur, which ſignifies a man who touches the women's breaſts, and ruffles their tuckers.

us obſerve, that he was not ſorry the world ſhould know he was a great pawer or ruffler * with the Ladies [I]. The letter he wrote to a Lady, who boaſted that ſhe had given him a ſlap of the face, is pretty malicious (f). It is perhaps only a fiction, a letter which was not really wrote to any perſon; nor would it be the only ſtory which ſeems to be imaginary among the particulars which he relates. It is much the better for it. Sometimes, at laſt, he appears like a flaſh of lightning; then all follow him, fall upon him, and ſtrive to be heard. I endeavoured to be heard like the reſt, but my feeble voice is loſt in the noiſe of the crowd, and cannot be heard. Sometimes to drown my ſorrow, I go and behold the charms of Fontainebleau, and the beauties of the Court. Sometimes I viſit the Queen's maids of honour, and ſometimes the rooms and galleries of the palace. Afterwards I walk along the canals, and then fall into the thick of the foreſt. But the loſs of my thouſand crowns ſpoils all my diverſions, and makes the eyes and complexions of the faireſt Ladies look dull to me, as of Meſdames de Soubiſe, de Briſſac, and de S. Geran, and of Meſdemoiſelles de Lanois, de la Mark, and de Rouvroy; it obſcures the brightneſs of the tapeſtries, pictures, and fineſt ornaments of the moſt ſtately apartments: it makes the water of the canals, fountains, and caſcades look muddy; and fades the leaves and flowers of the elms, of the linden-trees, and of the orange-trees.

(f) See the rem. [I].

